Some years after, he wrote againſt the Cathechiſm of Heidelberg, which was received by the Reformed Churches of Holland. He addreſſed this piece to the States of the province, and, with a prodigious boldneſs repreſented to them the miſchiefs of receiving this Catechiſm, and of the deſign, the miniſters had, ſaid he, of impoſing on every body the neceſſity of thinking and ſpeaking like themſelves. He deſired, that thoſe misfortunes might be prevented, and offered to prove what he advanced. The miniſters, on their part, preſented a writing to the States, full of complaints againſt Koornhert, and declared themſelves ready to juſtify their propoſitions. The States after mature deliberation, reſolved, with the approbation of the prince of Orange, to make Koornhert diſpute with the miniſters before fifteen deputies. Hadrian Saravia, profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden, was choſen to be a diſputant for the miniſters; a notary was appointed him, and another to Koornhert, that whatever ſhould be ſaid, on both ſides, might be authentically ſet down in writing. The diſpute began at the Hague, the twenty ſeventh of October, 1583, and continued to the third of November, when Koornhert deſired leave of the commiſſioners to go to Haerlem, to ſee his wife, who was upon her death-bed. The diſpute began again, the twenty eighth of November; but becauſe Saravia, for four days together, had dictated very long writings to his notary, the deputies reſolved to ſend Koornhert home, there to compoſe his anſwer. It were more polix than the writing of Saravia, and was confuted by a reply of the miniſters, that was much longer. The States finding, that one article, among fifty, that were to be examined, took up ſo many ſeſſions, thought there would never be an end of this affair, and interrupted the courſe of it. Koornhert boaſted of his victory, and that he had ſettled himſelf at the Hague, that he might be the more at hand to diſpute. The order of the States for interrupting the conferences, hindered not the parties from attacking one another in writing (26).

ſynod of Tergou, to permit that they ſhould be continued and ended; that he preſented a petition upon this ſubject to the prince of Orange; that he ſtrengthened it with many arguments; that he beſought him to order it ſo, that, if his petition was rejected, he might at leaſt have leave to go on in modeſtly and chriſtianly confuting errors, and thereby enjoy the liberty of conſcience, which had been purchaſed with ſo much pains; that, in caſe of a refuſal, he begged, as the laſt favour, permiſſion to retire into ſome neighbouring country, in friendſhip with Holland, to ſpend the reſt of his days in finiſhing an Index to the holy Scriptures, upon which he had laboured twenty ſix years, and alſo to prevent the oppreſſion of his conſcience, the dangers of his perſon, the miſeries of poverty, and the ſcandal of the Reformed church; that he deſired to have a ſafe conduct; that he promiſed he would return to the Hague, to terminate the diſpute, when they ſhould think fit to recall him; that all his requeſts being rejected, he nevertheleſs publickly declared, that he found great errors in the Heidelberg Catechiſm; that he got many enemies by it; that he was diſparaged from the pulpit, and elſewhere; that he was loaded with invectives and calumnies; that he met with a great many troubles and vexations, this having prejudiced and provoked ſeveral people againſt him; that he always prudently and conſtantly bore up againſt this adverſity; that there is great probability that he was protected by the prince of Orange [K]; that no one at that time wrote ſo ſtrenuouſly as he for the liberty of the country, and for that of conſcience [L]; that his writings againſt the doctrine of Predeſtination and original ſin were ſtrengthened with ſo many arguments, that the conſiſtory of Amſterdam having ordered James Arminius to confute them ſome years after, this miniſter anſwered, that he did not ſee, that either he or any body elſe could anſwer them from Scripture (b); that, having almoſt finiſhed his Dutch verſion of Eraſmus's Paraphraſe (i), he was ſeized with a diſtemper, in which he ſignalized his patience, and held moſt edifying diſcourſes, till he expired, full of confidence in God, the twenty ninth (k) of October, 1590; that he was buried at Tergou (l); that he would neither be buried at Amſterdam, where he was born, nor at Haerlem, where he ſpent moſt of his time; that he has been praiſed by Iſaac Pontanus, in the deſcription of Amſterdam, and by Grotius, and even by Juſtus Lipſius his adverſary. This is what I gather from the Latin extracts, communicated to me out of Koornhert's Life, written in Dutch. Some other things there are, which I ſhall put in the remarks. I ſhall alſo make uſe of ſome Latin extracts, taken from Gerard Brandt's book, I mean the Dutch hiſtory which he wrote concerning the reformation of the Netherlands. They have been made by the ſame perſon, who imparted to me thoſe of Koornhert's Life, and who underſtands well the Dutch tongue, and is very exact. I think they may be depended on.

(i) Upon the New Teſtament.

(k) I have quoted, above, an author, who ſays the twentieth, but probably this difference proceeds from that of the old and new Style, and from this, that when a man dies in the night between the nineteenth and twentieth day of a month, for inſtance, ſome ſay he died the nineteenth, others that he died the twentieth.

(l) In the great church, with a very honorable epitaph compoſed by his good friend Henry Laurence Spiegel. See Gerard Brandt's Hiſtory of the Reformation in the Netherlands, book xv, ad. ann. 1590.

The ſynod of South Holland being aſſembled at Tergou in Auguſt 1589, Koornhert, who lived in the ſame town, ſent a letter to the aſſembly, to offer them a freſh battle, The ſynod having read the letter, ſent it back to the author, and declared they had nothing more to do with him, and that, if he deſired any thing, he muſt addreſs himſelf to the States (27).

[K] There is great probability, that he was protected by the prince of Orange.] It is certain, that this prince, knowing him to be a man of parts, a great lover of liberty, and a great enemy to the Spaniards, thought him a fit man for the affairs of that time. He made uſe of his pen on ſeveral occaſions; he gave him ſeveral commiſſions; he deſired they would recall him from his exile (28); and one can hardly apprehend, how Koornhert could have withſtood his enemies, if he had not been under-hand ſupported by a very powerful and well-managed protection; for he obſerved no meaſures in relation to the public doctrine of the churches; he attacked the miſſion of their miniſters, condemned all ſects, and was for leaving an entire liberty to the Roman Catholics, which, conſidering the circumſtances of thoſe times, would have been very dangerous. His cenſure on the Cathechiſm of Heidelberg was ſo bold and inſulting, that, ſince the States of Holland, who had it examined by a profeſſor of divinity, and a miniſter, were contented to order, that the copies ſhould be put into the hands of the magiſtrates (29), he muſt needs have had a powerful ſupport. If the prince of Orange had been alive, when Koornhert went to live at Delft, I do not think the magiſtrates would have commanded him to depart in twenty four hours, as they did in the year 1588 (30). Some perſons tried to get him impriſoned for the reſt of his life; but the prince and the ſupream magiſtrates rejected that propoſal (31).

[L] No one . . . . . wrote ſo ſtrenuouſly as he for the liberty of the country, and for that of conſcience.] Whilſt he was at Santen (32) in a voluntary exile, in the year 1574, he drew up the plan of a book, to ſhew all Chriſtian princes, that the conduct of the provinces, which oppoſed the king of Spain, and the duke of Alba, was not a rebellion, nor a popular itch of pulling down images, but an emanation of the ſupreme authority, which the people have to defend their rights, their laws, and the liberty of conſcience. Add to this what I ſay in the remark [H]. The acts of the pacification of Cologne, begun in the year 1579, which were publiſhed at Delft, with the licence of the States, and with excellent notes by Haggai Albada, Koornhert's intimate friend, are thought to be the work of the latter. Euſebius Philalethes aſcribes all this to him, in a book printed in 1617. See likewiſe Koornhert's firſt treatiſe againſt Juſtus Lipſius. He wrote a piece in the year 1584, concerning the means of reſiſting the king of Spain, and he ſhewed, among other things, that it was neceſſary to put themſelves under the protection of France. Being perſuaded, that the Chriſtian peace was one of the moſt important doctrines of the Goſpel, and that it could not be maintained, but by reducing the truths neceſſary to ſalvation, to a ſmall number, and by permitting the difference of opinions with reſpect to other doctrines, he laboured with all his might to put things upon that foot. He took the advantage of the great Eraſmus's opinion (33), and agreed with two doctors of the Reformed church (34); and it ſeems, that prince William was ſomewhat inclined that way. Conſult the Hiſtory of Bor, book 21. fol. 107.

Koornhert was continually ſaying, that Luther, Calvin and Mennon, had ſtrongly attacked abundance of Romiſh errors, but that they had very ill ſucceeded againſt the dreadful and impious doctrine of forcing conſcience; and that, inſtead of oppoſing in the beſt manner, they had rather ſtrengthened it; every one having put it in practice, wherever they could become maſters, and created a new Papacy, by the erection of a ſchiſmatical church, which condemned all others. They have, ſaid he, encouraged the Papiſts, by this means, to continue their method, and have not only gained nothing againſt their perſecuting maxims, but have alſo introduced confuſions and ſchiſms, by taking away the liberty of prophecying (35). As for himſelf, he maintained, that no-body ought to be hated; and that all pious people, who, by faith in JESUS CHRIST, endeavoured to imitate him, are good Chriſtians, and that the magiſtrates ought to account all peaceable people, good ſubjects (36). He was ſo full of this hypotheſis, that, to the prejudice of his tranquillity and temporal intereſts, he made uſe of all his courage, parts, and learning to maintain it (37).

KORNMANNUS (HENRY) a German Civilian, author of ſome curious treatiſes [A], of which there are ſeveral editions. He lived in the beginning of the XVIIth century.

[A] He is author of ſome curious treatiſes.] That, which is intituled, de Virginitatis jure Tractatus novus & jucundus, ex Jure civili, canonico, Patribus, Hiſtoricis, Poëtis, &c. confectus; and that which is commonly printed with it, with this title, Linea Amoris, ſive Commentarius in verſiculum Gl. viſus, colloquium, convictus, oſcula, factum, have been often printed. The oldeſt edition I know of them, is of Francfort, 1610. It is a great and fruitful ſubject; but the author runs over it, and examines nothing to the bottom, and what he ſays is very common. He may pleaſe thoſe, who love brevity. His other works are, Templum naturæ hiſtoricum, ſeu de natura & miraculis quatuor elementorum, De miraculis vivorum, ſeu de natura, proprietatibus, &c. hominum vivorum, at Francfort 1614. De miraculis mortuorum, &c. It has been ſaid, that Kirchmannus, in his book de Funeribus Romanorum, borrows a great deal from this laſt work of our Kornmannus (1). And yet I do not find, that the book de Miraculis mortuorum, came out before the year 1610; whereas the book, intituled de Funeribus Romanorum, was printed in 1604. It is true, the author gave a new edition of it in 1625, and he might have made uſe of our Kornmannus's work for his additions. This we may examine another time, if we have leiſure.

KORTHOLT (CHRISTIAN) doctor and profeſſor of Divinity at Kiel, was born the fifteenth of January 1633, at Burg in the iſle of Femeren (a). He was inſtructed both in piety and learning, with great care, at his father's houſe, and in the ſchool of Burg, till he was ſixteen years of age; after which he was ſent to Sleſwic, where he purſued his ſtudies for two years. He afterwards ſtudied in the college of Stetin, where he gave public proofs of his progreſs; for he maintained two Theſes (b), one De veracitate & taciturnitate, the other, De natura Philoſophiæ, ejuſque in Theologia uſu. He was author of the latter. Being come to Roſtoch, in the year 1652, he was a diligent attendant on the profeſſors lectures, and ſucceſsfully maintained two other Theſes (c), of which he compoſed the firſt. The death of his father obliged him to leave this univerſity, at the years end; but he returned thither ſome months after, and gave new proofs of his knowledge, both by the Theſis de Chriſto θεανθρώπῳ, which he compoſed, and publickly defended, and by the lectures he read at home in Logic, Metaphyſics, and Hebrew. He ſolemnly took his degree of doctor in Philoſophy, in the year 1656; and then he went to ſtudy in the univerſity of Iëna, where he acquired great reputation by the academical acts, in which he was ſometimes Reſpondent, and ſometimes Moderator, and by the private lectures he read upon Philoſophy, the Oriental tongues, and Divinity. He left the univerſity of Iëna, in 1660, and viſited thoſe of Leipſic and Wittemberg, and afterwards returned to Roſtock, where he ſhewed his capacity ſeveral ways; ſo that, in February 1662, he was made profeſſor of the Greek tongue. He took his doctor of Divinity's degree in November the ſame year. Not long before, his parts and learning diſcovered themſelves, in three diſputes with the Roman Catholics [A], in the preſence of Chriſtian, duke of Mecklenburg. He married on the twenty ſixth of April 1664, and was invited the following year to be ſecond profeſſor of Divinity in the univerſity lately founded at Kiel. He was created Vice-chancellor in the year 1666, and in 1675 he ſucceeded Peter Muſæus, who had the firſt Divinity chair. He was ſo deſirous to make this new univerſity flouriſh, and had ſo much gratitude for the kindneſs, which the duke of Holſtein, his maſter, ſhewed him, that he refuſed all the preferments that were offered him in ſeveral places, though they were noble and honourable. This prince procured him the profeſſorſhip of Eccleſiaſtical Antiquities, in 1680, and declared him perpetual Vice-chancellor of the univerſity in the year

His death, which happened the thirty firſt of March, 1694, was a very great loſs to the univerſity of Kiel, and to the Republic of Letters, which he had enriched with a great number of books [B], to which he might have added many more, if he had lived longer. [C] He left two ſons, who tread very worthily in his ſteps.] He had ten children, five ſons, and five daughters, whereof four ſons and four daughters were living, when he died. The two eldeſt daughters were already married, one to Mr Lindeman, profeſſor of Phyſics and Metaphyſics at Roſtock, the other to Mr Paſch, profeſſor of Morality at Kiel (5). The eldeſt of the ſons, HENRY CHRISTIAN KORTHOLT, ſtudied Phyſic, and was then travelling in foreign countries. MATTHIAS NICOLAS KORTHOLT, and SEBASTIAN KORTHOLT, his brothers, had already given excellent proofs of their parts. JOEL JOHN KORTHOLT, the youngeſt of them all, ſtudied well, and was a man of fine hopes. ‘Natu minor, ‘they are the words of the funeral programma, JOEL ‘JOHANNES, pietatis & literarum ſtudio diligen‘ter incumbens, optimam de ſe ſpem excitat, quam ‘abunde jam impleverunt ætate profectibuſque multò ‘majores, MATTHIAS NICOLAUS, & SE‘BASTIANUS, pluribus præclaris bonæ indolis ‘ingeniique excellentis ſpeciminibus editis. —— The ‘younger, JOEL JOHN, applying himſelf dili‘gently to piety and learning, raiſes the greateſt hopes ‘of himſelf, which MATTHIAS NICOLAS, ‘and SEBASTIAN, had already abundantly an‘ſwered, being much his ſeniors both in age and profi‘ciency, and having given many proofs of an excellent ‘diſpoſition and genius.’ I have ſeen the diſſertation de Poëtis Epiſcopis, which Mr Sebaſtian Kortholt printed in the year 1699, and ſubmitted to the examination of the learned, Examini Eruditorum publico, when he was preparing to take his doctor's degree in Philoſophy (6). It is a very curious piece, and it ſhews the great reading of the author.

Since this was printed, I have ſeen two other pieces of his, on which I paſs the ſame judgment: one is intituled, Diſquiſitio de Enthuſiaſmo Poëtico, and was printed at Kiel in the year 1696, in 4to; the other, De Puellis Poëtriis omiſſis ab Adriano Bailleto, printed in the ſame place, in the year 1700. in 12mo. I have been informed alſo, that the author was made profeſſor of Poetry in the univerſity of Kiel, in February 1701, and that his brother (Matthias Nicolas) being invited to Gieſſen, to be profeſſor of Eloquence and Poetry in that univerſity, made his inaugural oration, the twenty ſecond of June 1700. He treated De antiqua Eloquentia recentiorum perperam poſtpoſita a Carolo Peralto ſcriptore libri, cujus eſt titulus, Parallele des Anciens & des Modernes, &c. This oration ſeemed to me to be very good. You may ſee the elogy of this profeſſor, in a letter from Mr Majus (7), dated from Kiel the twenty ſecond of May, 1700.

(d) It is, at the bottom the ſame thing with rector, becauſe there was no other rector at Kiel, but the prince himſelf, who founded that univerſity.

KOTTERUS (CHRISTOPHER) is one of the three fanatics, whoſe viſions were publiſhed at Amſterdam in the year 1657, with this title Lux in Tenebris [A]. He lived at Sprottaw in Sileſia. His viſions begun in June 1616. He fancied he saw [A] With this title, Lux in Tenebris.] I have obſerved, in another place (1), the occaſion of this title and will not repeat it. This book was printed in the year 1657, at the expence of a rich patron (2) whom Comenius had found at Amſterdam. It contains the Revelations of our Chriſtopher Kotterus, thoſe of Chriſtina Poniatovia, and thoſe of Nicolas Drabicius. Comenius publiſhed an abridgment of it in 1660, with this title, Revelationum divinarum in uſum ſeculi noſtri factarum Epitome. He reprinted the whole work with this title. Lux è Tenebris novis radiis aucta, &c. This laſt edition contains the ſequel of Drabicius's revelations till the year 1666. A profeſſor of Divinity at Franeker, a Polander, called Nicolas Arnoldus, preſently wrote againſt this work, and replied to Comenius's apology. Mareſius, profeſſor of Divinity at Groningen, wrote againſt the ſame book, in his theſis de tribus Videntibus, in the year 1659; and when, ten years after, he publiſhed an anſwer (3) to a piece of Comenius concerning the Millennium, he reproached him more than once, and with great vehemence, for printing the pieces of thoſe three pretending prophets. This book, after ſome years, fell into oblivion and contempt; but when the Turks beſieged Vienna, in the year 1683, it was wonderfully ſought after. They, who had lodged the copies in garrets, where they had reſted a long time, fetched them out, and ſold ſeveral of them at a great price; and if the Turks had taken Vienna, I doubt not but they muſt have made a new edition of it, tho' the copies had been never ſo dear. They were very much inquired for in France, the count d' Avaux ſent ſome thither: and therefore we may very well wonder, that Mr Jurieu ſhould ſuppoſe, in the year 1691, that Drabicius was not known at Paris. This ſuppoſitition is inexcuſable, ſince, not long before, he himſelf had very much contributed to ſpread the name of that fanatic all over the world. Beſides he alledged this wrong ſuppoſition as a proof of a ſtate crime; for he pretended, that the Avis aux Refugiez, — Advice to the Refugees, making mention of Drabicius, could not have been written in France. Theſe are things, which my readers would ſcarce believe; wherefore it is neceſſary I ſhould prove them, by giving an account of what was replied to him. Here is the anſwer made by the author he accuſed (4).

'The firſt of his proofs is, that the Avis aux 'Refugiez, Advice to the Refugees, was not written 'at Paris.' Now this he demonſtrates thus:

'He *, who wrote that advice, gives a particu'lar account, of Drabicius's prophecies; he ſaw 'them, read them, and knows all the particulars of 'them.

'But the learned of Paris ſcarce know the name 'of Drabicius.

'Therefore the author of the advice is not at 'Paris.

'If I ſhould deny the firſt propoſition, I am ſure 'he could never prove it; becauſe it does not ap'pear from the Advice to the Refugees, that the au'thor of it knew any thing more of Drabicius, 'than that he attempted to excite a war againſt the 'houſe of Auſtria. Any man of letters may know 'this without reading the books of that Prophet.

'But the ſecond propoſition is ſtill more palpably 'falſe. For, not to ſay, that, during the ſiege of 'Vienna, Drabicius's book was much talked of in 'France, and that many copies were ſent for from 'hence (I my ſelf was deſired by one of my friends, 'at Rouen, to ſend him one) who knows not, that 'the great encomiums Mr Jurieu beſtowed on the pro'phetical Triumvirate, I mean Chriſtina Poniatovia, 'Kotterus, and Drabicius, in a book † more common 'than Almanacks, as he himſelf boaſts of it ‡, uſing the 'beſt compariſon that was ever ſeen; who knows not 'I ſay, that thoſe great encomiums beſtowed on Dra'bicius, and ſo likely to make this prophet talked of, 'have drawn upon the panegyriſt ſome very mortify'ing cenſures from the biſhop of Meaux ‡, and Mr Pe'liſſon . in ſome books, publiſhed at Paris before the 'impreſſion of the Advice to the Refugees? Who 'doubts, that the ſatire intituled L'Eſprit de Mr Ar'nauld, ſo well known ſince the year 1684, raiſed a 'curioſity in abundance of Frenchmen to ſee Drabi'cius's propheſies, the ſcheme whereof Mr Jurieu 'draws †† there, in ſuch a manner as to promiſe the 'public, on one hand, from Drabicius, the ruin of the 'houſe of Auſtria, to the king of France the imperial 'crown, to the Turks the taking of Vienna, Carin'thia, and Stiria, and the deſtruction of the republic 'of Venice, and of the city of Rome, and to promiſe, 'on theo ther hand, in the name of the Proteſtants, all 'that they can do to accompliſh thoſe prophecies?' The learned of Paris muſt have been very ſtupid, if they did not enquire after a book, of which Mr Jurieu has given the following notion. 'I found, ſays he (5), in the 'prophecies of Cotterus, Chriſtina, and Drabicius, 'publiſhed by Comenius, ſomething great and ſur'prizing. Kotterus, who is the firſt of theſe three 'prophets, is great and lofty; the images of his viſions 'are as noble and majeſtical, as thoſe of the antient 'prophets. They are alſo admirable well concerted; 'they are all of a piece; and there is no inconſiſtency, 'in them. It is inconceivable how a meer mechanic 'could have imagined ſuch great things without the 'aſſiſtance of God. The two years of Chriſtina's pro'phecy are, in my opinion, a train of miracles, as great 'as have happened ſince the Apoſtles: nor do we 'find any thing in the life of the greateſt prophets, 'that is more miraculous, than the adventures of this 'maid. Drabicius has alſo his ſublimity. But there 'is much more obſcurity and difficulty in him. Theſe 'three prophets conſpire in foretelling the fall of the 'antichriſtian empire, as what muſt very ſoon come to 'paſs. But then there are ſo many other things in 'them, which offend, that one cannot ſet his heart 'upon them.' If this had not raiſed a deſire of knowing Comenius's prophetical collection, at leaſt, thoſe would have had a curioſity, who had ſeen Mr Peliſſon's Reflexions ſur les differens de la Religion. For when a writer diſcovers a great deal of haughtineſs, it is impoſſible not to feel a ſecret pleaſure, when he happens to be mortified as Mr Jurieu was by theſe words of Mr Peliſſon. 'A prophet, and more than a 'prophet, a forerunner doubtleſs of the Millenium, 'which he declares to us, who at leaſt aſſumes the 'authority of reforming, correcting, and chaſtiſing, 'when he pleaſes, ſuch as he has formally acknow'ledged for prophets, and inſpired men *, a ſort of 'people, whom the event has already proved to be 'guilty of a hundred impoſtures, and who have been 'confounded in the ſight of all the world, by the tak'ing of Buda, tho' they had aſſured us, as from God, 'that it would never return to the Chriſtians by force 'of arms, but by a treaty with the Turks (6).' He gave (7) formal proofs of all this, by quoting the very words of Mr Jurieu (8), and the places where Drabicius expreſsly ſaid, that Buda ſhould never come out of the hands of the Turk, but in a peaceable way. When people are affected towards an author, as they were at Paris, with reſpect to Mr Jurieu, they are ſo well pleaſed to ſee him convicted either of impoſture, or Fanaticiſm, that they will ſeek for ſuch a conviction at the fountain head. But is it true, ſay they, that Drabicius affirms ſuch a thing? may not one ſee it with one's own eyes, that there may remain no ſcruple, to leſſen the ridiculouſneſs of ſuch a ſcene? Then they will ſeek a copy of Drabicius wherever they think it may be had; and if it cannot be met with, they will however keep his name in their memory.

It cannot be ſaid, that I digreſs from my ſubject; for, ſince it is a falſity in point of fact, to ſay that Drabicius's name was ſcarce known at Paris in 1690, it belongs to this Dictionary, and I was obliged to uſe all the proofs, that confute this falſity.

If Mr Jurieu had been contented to ſay, that, in compariſon of the noiſe Drabicius's name would have made in France, in caſe the Turks had taken Vienna, he was ſcarce known at Paris, when the Advice to the Refugees was written, I think he would not be in the wrong; for the taking of Vienna would have made Drabicius more talked of, than the grand viſier. The book, which Mr Jurieu wrote during the ſiege of that town, to praiſe and vindicate the three prophets of Comenius, by his illuſtrations, and learned commentaries, would have been tranſlated into ſeveral languages, ſaw an angel in the form of a man, who commanded him to go and declare to the magiſtrates, that, unleſs the people repented, the wrath of God would do terrible executions. Tho' he had received this order ſix times ſucceſſively, he did not execute it; His paſtor and his friends diſſuaded him from it. But, in April 1619, believing he ſaw the ſpirit, which threatened him with eternal damnation, if he kept ſilence any longer, he diſcharged his commiſſion in a full aſſembly of the magiſtrates, the twenty ninth of Auguſt 1619. They laughed at him. The apparitions went on, and were followed by extaſies and prophetic dreams. The elector Palatine, declared king of Bohemia by the Proteſtants, was concerned in theſe viſions. Kotterus went to him at Breſlaw in December 1620, and acquainted him with his commiſſion. He went to ſome other places, and at laſt in 1625, to the court of Brandenburg (a) [B]. He got himſelf acquainted the ſame year with John Amos Comenius, who became a promoter of his propheſies (b) [C]. Now as moſt of thoſe things turned upon preſages of proſperity to the elector and would have made Drabicius for a long time the diſcourſe of all companies. His performance came to nothing as to Drabicius's memory, by the raiſing of the ſiege: the great Sobieski, two or three hundred leagues off, deſtroyed a book, which was juſt ready to be put to the preſs. I began to know, during the ſiege of Vienna, how much I was miſtaken in believing, that, at laſt, the world was cured of the chimerical hopes, which they had ſo often grounded upon viſions. I every where met with people, that talked of nothing but of Drabicius's prophecies, and who built many caſtles in the air, ſo far as to deſtroy Babylon in a moment. They could not ſufficiently admire how Drabicius could gueſs ſo right with reſpect to Tekely. This is what I wanted them to ſay; for I made it appear, that Tekely, who was then the great actor of this opera, made no figure in Drabicius's book, which is a plain nullity. I queſtion not but the French had been very attentive, if the enterprize of the grand viſier had ſucceeded. They would gladly have lent their hand to the credulous concerning Drabicius's viſions, ſince they promiſed the empire to the king of France. It is therefore certain, that the name of this falſe prophet would have been incomparably more famous at Paris, if the Turks had taken Vienna.

[B] He was . . . in 1625 at the court of Brandenburg.] The elector George William, hearing the great noiſe, that was made of Kotterus's Revelations had a mind to ſee him. He ordered the divines of Francfort upon the Oder to examine him; after which, he ſent for him twice to Berlin, firſt in the year 1625, and then in the year 1626. His renown, ſpreading as far as Strasburg, ſo ſtruck one of the burgomaſters, that he ſent a meſſenger into Sileſia, to intreat Kotterus, to explain to him ſixty two points, and to come to Strasburg, where he might more ſafely exerciſe his prophetical miniſtry. Kotterus anſwered his ſixty two queſtions, but excuſed himſelf from going to Strasburg, upon his having no commiſſion for it from the ſpirit, and ſuffered his picture to be ſent to the burgomaſter (9).

[C] He got acquainted . . . . with John Amos Comenius, who became a promoter of his prophecies.] After the edicts of the emperor, commanding the miniſters of Bohemia and Moravia, in the year 1624, to depart out of the country, it was reſolved in a ſecret aſſembly in March 1625, that the miniſters of Bohemia ſhould retire into Poland, and thoſe of Moravia into Hungary, and that, ſome ſhould be deputed with letters both into Poland and Hungary, to prepare a reception for them. Comenius was deputed to Poland, and, paſſing through Gorlitz in Luſatia, the governor of the young count Zerotin told him, as very comfortable news, that the ruin of Antichriſt was at hand, as it appeared from what the Holy Ghoſt had revealed to a good man of Sileſia, called Chriſtopher Kotterus. He mentioned, and read ſeveral paſſages of it, and, becauſe Comenius was too incredulous, he adviſed him to go to the place, and diſcourſe with the prophet. Comenius, paſſing through Sprottaw, deſired to ſee Kotterus: his wife anſwered him, that he was ſent for by the elector of Brandenburg. The paſtor of that place (10) confirmed the ſame thing to him; he aſſured him that Kotterus was a true ſeer, and gave him his revelations to read. Comenius, waiting till Kotterus's return, meditated on this manuſcript, and was amazed at it. Soon after, he ſaw Kotterus, performed his journey, returned quickly to Sprottaw, tranſlated the manuſcript of the revelations into the Bohemian tongue, and was fully convinced, that they proceeded from God. He returned into Poland, and took the prophet with him who told him in the way, that he knew by revelation, that there would be a council of all Chriſtendom, in which the Pope would be depoſed, and a canon made, forbidding every body hereafter to uſurp the title of univerſal biſhop. Comenius repreſented to him, that he had not read that article in the manuſcript: Kotterus anſwered, I had no orders to write it, but however I have learned it. Returning from Poland, Comenius parted from Kotterus, and went to Berlin, where he found, that, even among the refugees of Bohemia and Moravia, they paſſed very different judgments on this man: ſome held him for a true prophet, eſpecially when the poſt brought news, that the king of Denmark was raiſing troops. Others ſaid, he was a cheat, who, having ſpent his fortune, and not knowing how to live, ſet up for a Prophet. Alii rurſum ex iiſdem meis ſcabioſiſſima de Cottero effutiebant: belluonem, rei ſuæ decoctorem, deſperationeque ad prophetandum adactum dictitantes, miraque de prophetiis ipſius mendacia inter ſe ſpargentes, mihique referentes (11). This made Comenius uneaſy; but Chriſtopher Pelargus, ſuperintendant-general of the churches of Brandenburg, who had examined Kotterus by the elector's order, removed his doubts, by ſaying, that he ought not to queſtion that man's extraordinary miſſion (12), nor repent of his having tranſlated his revelations into the Bohemian Tongue. This tranſlation was not kept ſecret, as the author ſays he deſired; it was ſhewn to ſome perſons, who had it tranſcribed, and ſo the copies multiplied prodigiouſly in Bohemia: Nor is it any wonder, ſince that book promiſed a hundred triumphs to king Frederic. Some time after, it was printed, in the Bohemian tongue at Perna, in Miſnia, with commendations and marginal notes. But all the miniſters did not fall into the ſnare. Two of them, with ſome elders, found fault with the tranſcribing of that book; the intereſt of the true faith, and the danger which they were expoſed to, were the two reaſons that made them vote for the ſuppreſſion of thoſe chimeras, as being either an ingenious fiction, or the fantaſtical dreams of an Enthuſiaſt. 'Scriptum illud (ſive id ab aliquo ingenioſo confictum, ſive ab ipſo fanatico homine conſcriptum eſſet) ſupprimi petierunt. Duplex enim ſubeſſe periculum, & Conſcientiarum, ſi ſe homines à certo dei Verbo ad incerta id genus figmenta abduci paterentur, & Corporis atque vitæ, ſi hæc in adverſariorum veniant manus (13).' In the year 1626, the electreſs Juliana, mother to king Frederic, having acquainted a great lord of Moravia, who was as well as ſhe, a Refugee at Berlin, that ſhe had received a letter from the king her ſon, in which he enquired, whether he could have the prophecies of the man of Sileſia in writing, this great lord procured a copy of them, and, not being able to preſent it himſelf, becauſe he was ſick, he employed Comenius to do it, who was then at Berlin. Comenius, inſtead of delivering it to the electreſs, went directly to the king, who was then at the Hague, deſired audience, harangued him, and, amongſt other things, told him, that, ſince his majeſty and his children bore the principal part in that divine piece, they, who had this manuſcript, would have thought themſelves guilty of an abſurdity, if they had not communicated it to his majeſty. elector Palatine, and unhappineſs to his Imperial majeſty, it happened, that David Wachſman, the emperor's Fiſcal in the lower Sileſia, and in Luſatia, uſed all ſorts of means to ſeize Kotterus, whom he looked upon as a ſeditious impoſtor. Kotterus fell into his hands the ſecond of January 1627. He was examined, and put into a dungeon, and the ſentence of the court of appeals was expected from Prague. The Fiſcal received it the twenty fifth of April; but, as he died a little after, it is not known what it contained. Kotterus was releaſed from impriſonment, and permitted to be viſited by his wife and his friends; and at laſt he was put in the pillory [D], and baniſhed the dominions of the emperor, not to return upon pain of death. He went into Luſatia, which belonged to his electoral highneſs of Saxony, and there lived quietly till his death, which happened in the year 1647 (c). It is by an error of the preſs, that Moreri's Dictionary makes him ninety two years of age [E]. Comenius is inexcuſable for printing ſuch prophecies [F]. He knew, that part of them had proved falſe by the event. Since ‘Non quidem ut Majeſtati Veſtræ iſta præciſè credendi imponatur neceſſitas: ſed, Primùm, ut hæc apud Majeſtatem Veſtram tanquam in archivo ſacro aſſerventur, in futurum teſtimonium: nè, ſi demùm poſt completa prædicta hæc palam fiant, ex eventu ſic eſſe collecta, ſuſpicari quis, aut calumniari, poſſit. Deinde, ut occaſio ſit attendendi, num fortè divina providentia tales in eventus res diſponat. (Nam ſi de imminente rerum mutatione Politicos diſcurſus, vel Aſtrologicas prædictiones, aut ſimiles Prudentiorum conjecturas, cognoſcere non aſpernamur, cur hæc ab altiori venientia principio aſpernari libeat?) Curarunt itaque ex authentico deſcribi exemplar, quod Majeſtati Veſtræ per me humili cùm obſervantia exhibent: ſimulque exhibui (14).’ This is not meant, adds he, to impoſe on your majeſty the neceſſity of believing theſe things, but only to deſire, that you would preſerve them in your archives, to the end, that if they prove true, no body may object, that thoſe predictions were made after the event, and that you may alſo have an occaſion to obſerve, whether providence prepares the way to thoſe great revolutions.

Here the myſtery lies: they would have it, that princes, who are capable of executing a deſign, and intereſted in the execution, ſhould form it, in hopes of ſucceeding in it. This is frequently the firſt motive of our prophets, and apocalyptical commentators, and of thoſe, who favour them. But to return to the thread of the hiſtory.

Comenius was received, and diſmiſſed honourably, by king Frederic, and went into Bohemia, where Kotterus met him, in October 1626, and conferred with ſome miniſters and gentlemen (15).

Here is a paſſage, in which I find no exactneſs. ‘Quam turpiter vero in horum (Cotteri & Drabicii) & Chriſtinæ Poniatoviæ virginis Bohemæ conatibus, qui ejuſdem omnino farinæ erant, juvandis modo dictus Comenius ſe dederit, è Voëtii Diſpp part. 2. p. 1080. liquet (16). —— How ſhamefully the ſaid Comenius promoted the attempts of theſe men (Cotterus and Drabicius) and of Chriſtina Poniatovia, a Bohemian lady, appears from Voëtius, Diſp. part. 2. pag. 1080.’ These are Mr Hartnac's words, in his new edition of Micrælius's eccleſiaſtical hiſtory. He had been condemning the pretended prophecies of Kotterus, and Comenius, who publiſhed them; he had been ſaying, that Drabicius's hand and head were cut off, who well deſerved that puniſhment (17); and then he adds, that it appears, by the 1080th page of the ſecond tome of Voëtius's diſputations, that Comenius committed a moſt ſhameful fault in publiſhing the revelations of thoſe perſons. I have conſulted that place of Voëtius; but there is nothing relating to Comenius, either in the 1080th page, or in the following.

[D] He was put in the pillory.] Theſe are Comenius's words. ‘Poſt aliquot adhuc menſium deliberationem ignominiæ pœna affecerunt tali. Eductum carcere collocarunt ad cippum fori, ferreo adſtrictum collari, affixaque ſupra caput ſcheda, cui inſcriptum fuit: Hic eſt Pſeudo-propheta ille, qui prædixit quæ non evenerunt. Horæ ſpatio ſic ſpectaculo relictus, per Lictorem urbe fuit eductus, exireque patriâ, nec in Cæſaris ditiones redire ſub capitis pœna, juſſus (18). After ſome months deliberation, they ſentenced him to this ignominious puniſhment. Being brought out of priſon, they ſet him in the pillory, with this inſcription over his head; This is the falſe prophet, who foretold things, which have not come to paſs. Being thus expoſed an hour, he was led out of the city by an officer, and commanded to quit his country, and not return into the emperor's dominions, on pain of death.’

[E] It is by an error of the preſs, that Moreri's Dictionary makes him ninety two years of age.] His birth is placed there in the year 1585, and his death in 1647; he therefore lived 62, and not 92, years. But the Printers do often confound the figures 6 and 9.

[F] Comenius is inexcuſable for printing ſuch prophecies.] God forbid, I ſhould pronounce judgment on what paſſes in the heart of my neighbour: thoſe myſteries belong only to God: but on ſome occaſions, one may ſpeak one's thoughts upon appearances. Much more may I be permitted to relate hiſtorically, what others have thought of the conduct of Comenius. Whilſt he lived in Pruſſia, they deliberated about him in the courts of ſome princes, and it was made a caſe of conſcience, whether he did not deſerve the puniſhment, which the law of God decreed againſt falſe prophets. He was ſuſpected to have been counſellor and ſecretary to thoſe, who intended to make an irruption into Bohemia, which they would have executed, if the Engliſh (19) had furniſhed them with the ſupplies, which they demanded. He, and thoſe of his temper, were accounted the abettors of the war, which Ragotski, and the princes Radzivil, undertook againſt Poland. The delivery of the church of God from Papal tyranny, was the object that was ſet before their eyes, to make them take up arms. I ſay nothing, but what I have a good authority for: read theſe words of Arnoldus to Comenius. ‘Prævaricatio illa, quam dicis, tanti tamen non fuit, ut ſuper ea in aulis Principum deliberaretur, caſus conſcientiæ formati viris doctis decidendi mitterentur, an ſim falſus Propheta, & conſequenter, an in me pœna divinitus in falſos Prophetas ſtatuta animadvertendum non eſſet, quod de te in Boruſſia cum adhuc morarer perſcriptum memini, & forte autographum illarum literarum adhuc poſſideo. Tanti, inquam, non fuit illa prævaricatio, ut propter eam πολυπράγμων audirem, ac desertâ ſtatione mea Profeſſoria, Magnatibus pro flabello in concitandis motibus bellicis eſſem, uti de te rumor eſt, qui à manu & conſiliis intimis fuiſſe illis diceris, qui in Bohemiam irruptionem ante annos moliebantur, ſi modo annuiſſent illorum votis Angli ſollicitati. Ego id non dico, quanquam ſtylus literarum tuo non ſit abſimilis. Jam per rumores in Boruſſia (uti niſi me omnino ſallat memoria, illinc ad te perſcripſi,) audiveram, Principes Radzivilios & Rakocium à vobis fuiſſe inductos, qui arma contra Polonos capeſſerent, ſpe liberandæ Eccleſiæ à tyrannide Pontificia, cujus rei haud exigua paſſim in volumine illo triuno extant argumenta. Ego tamen non definio (20). — Yet that prevarication you ſpeak of, was not ſo great, as to occaſion debates thereupon in the courts of princes, and caſes of conſcience to be drawn up, and propoſed to the deciſion of learned men, whether I am a falſe prophet, and conſequently, whether the puniſhment, appointed by God for falſe prophets, ought not to be inflicted on me; which I remember was written concerning you, whilſt I continued in Pruſſia, and, by chance, I ſtill have a copy of thoſe letters. I ſay, that prevarication was not ſo great, as to procure me the appellation of a buſy meddling fellow, who, deſerting my poſt of profeſſor, excite the great to take up arms; as it is rumoured of you, who are ſaid to have been the chief abettor of thoſe, who, ſome years ago, deſigned an irruption into Bohemia, if the Engliſh, whom they ſollicited, had aſſiſted them. I do not affirm this, though the ſtile of the letters is not unlike yours. I had already

Since his death, they have been more and more confuted by the courſe of affairs in Europe. The Turks, who, according to thoſe prophecies, were to deſtroy the houſe of Auſtria, have reſtored it to it's former luſtre, by their continual loſſes [G]. He made himſelf very much ſuſpected of having a deſign to kindle a war. The ſame ſuſpicions are

'ready heard, from common fame, in Pruſſia (as, if I remember right, I acquainted you from thence by letter) that the princes Radzivil and Ragotski, had been induced by you to take up arms againſt the Polanders, in hopes of freeing the church from Papal tyranny; of which there appear very ſtrong proofs in that three-one volume, in many places. Yet I decide nothing.' I do not wonder that Comenius was ſuſpected of political contrivances, and intrigues of war; for a divine, who travels as much as he did, and who has ſuch frequent buſineſs at the courts of princes, is a man, who is not much to be truſted. The electreſs, mother to king Frederic, inquires whether a collection of Kotterus's prophecies is to be had; the perſon, to whom ſhe makes her application, gets a copy tranſcribed, and, not being able to preſent it himſelf, deſired Comenius to do it: Comenius, who is at Berlin, and has but two ſteps to make, to preſent it to the electreſs, chooſes rather to go to the Hague, that he may give it with his own hand to king Frederic, and harangue him upon the contents of the book, which, at leaſt, ſaid he, would make him attentive to the occurrences. This looks very much like the contrivance of a prophetic faction (21). They foretel what they deſire ſhould be attempted, and then they leave no ſtone unturned, to engage in the enterprize ſuch as they think fit for it. It is very likely, that the great pains Comenius took, to re-unite the Proteſtants (22), proceeded from his deſire of forming a powerful party, that might accompliſh the prophecies with carnal weapons. There is another thing, which did Comenius ſome prejudice. He was a man of parts and learning; he argued very ſenſibly in other matters, and in theſe like a man of wit; there was nothing in him that looked like Enthuſiaſm. This made people believe, that he was not perſuaded of what he ſaid. There may be, and there is ſometimes, ſome impoſture in exſtatical grimaces; but thoſe, who boaſt of inſpiration, without ſhewing in their face, or by their words, that their brain is diſordered, and without ever being put out of their natural ſtate, are incomparably more to be ſuſpected of a cheat, than thoſe, who from time to time fall into convulſions, as the Sibyl more or leſs.

He comes, the prieſteſs cry'd; I feel the God;
(Faſt by the ſacred portal as ſhe ſtood)
And now diſorder'd looks, and flowing hair,
Proclaim the wiſh'd-for inſpiration near.
Enthuſiaſtic fury ſwells her breaſt;
And now th' inſpiring pow'r appears confeſs'd.

At Phœbi nondum patiens immanis in antro
Bacchatur vates, magnum ſi pectore poſſit

Os rabidum, fera corda domans, fingitque premendo (24).

The prieſteſs raves within the ſacred bow'r,
And from her breaſt would fain diſlodge the pow'r.
Her efforts vain; his ſeat the God maintains,
And harder, as ſhe ſtrives, the ſtruggling Sibyl reins.

I am willing, that Comenius ſhould not be ſuſpected of any ſiniſter deſign. But what ſhall we ſay againſt thoſe who find fault with him for having publiſhed Kotterus's prophecies as being divinely inſpired, even after the event had proved them to be falſe (25)? I confeſs this ſeems to me inexcuſable. And, as for Drabicius, could it be imagined, that God inſpired him? If God had inſpired him, he would have had Ragotski to deſtroy the houſe of Auſtria, and to know, that heaven had deſigned him for that great work. But if this had been God's will, would he not have inſpired that prince with the deſire of making war againſt the emperor, or at leaſt with ſome credulity for Drabicius? here is a thing, which ſhews the conceitedneſs of Comenius. His ſon-in-law (26) deſired Arnoldus, profeſſor of Divinity at Franeker, to aſſiſt his father-in-law with his good advice, who ſeemed to heſitate about the impreſſion of the three prophets. Arnoldus adviſed him not to print them (27); the ſon-in-law gave the ſame counſel (28), which he grounded upon very ſtrong arguments. But how could Comenius adhere to the advice of two perſons, ſince he had no regard to the decree of the Poliſh churches, which, having examined the pretended revelations of Kotterus, and Chriſtina Poniatovia, condemned them to be ſuppreſſed for ever (29).

[G] The Turks, who, according to thoſe prophecies, were to deſtroy the houſe of Auſtria, have reſtored it to it's former luſtre by their continual loſſes.] See hereupon the indecent inſults of the author of the Avis aux Refugiez. —— Advice to the Refugees. 'It is certain, ſays he (30), that the glory and happineſs of his Imperial majeſty, in this war againſt the Turks, are wonderful; and that, to the eternal confuſion of the prophecies of your DRABICIUS, God has given greater ſucceſs to this prince, than to the emperor Charles V. This falſe prophet, more eager to curſe than Balaam, who even, when a neighbouring king importuned him with great promiſes, would do nothing raſhly, pronounced, for the ſpace of ſeveral years, againſt the houſe of Auſtria, the moſt terrible curſes he could think of, and devoted it, as we may ſay, to the furies and infernal gods, Diris & numinibus infernis, becauſe it had perſecuted your religion. But the event has ſhewn, that he did not underſtand that trade, and that he had no good hand at curſing. No man did ever deſerve leſs the encomium that was beſtowed upon Balaam, He whom thou bleſſeſt ſhall be bleſſed, and he whom thou curſeſt ſhall be curſed; and, if all your prophetical imprecations are like thoſe of Drabicius, people will be forward hereafter to deſire your curſes, and you will be ſought for with greater importunity to utter them, than the king of the Moabites uſed to make Balaam, the falſe prophet, curſe his enemies.' Since the impreſſion of that Advice, the ſucceſs of the emperor's arms has been ſometimes interrupted (31); but this has been but a ſhort reſpite for the Turks; their bad fortune quickly began again to diſplay all it's fury. She was near over-whelming them the laſt year (32); ſhe made them every where feel her indignation, in Dalmatia, in Hungary, in Poland, upon the Archepelago; and, if we may believe our news-writers, they loſt two naval battles, in a little time, laſt winter, though the victors did not think fit to purſue their victory, but rather to quit the iſle of Chios. The new Sultan raiſes in ſome manner the hopes of the Porte. They apply to him what Florus ſaid of Trajan (33); but hitherto it does not appear by the relations of our news-writers, that he has had great ſucceſs. And as for Tekeli, who, during the ſiege of Vienna, was given out for Drabicius's hero, we have lately been told in the Gazettes, that the Turks, weary of the obſtinate malignity of his ſtars, have ſhut him up in the ſeven towers.

This is what I was ſaying in the month of October 1695, whilſt we ſaw a kind of ſuſpenſion of the great and glorious fortune of the Imperial arms in Hungary. The Paris Gazettes daily amplified the victory which the Sultan had lately obtained; the other Gazettes continually diminiſhed it. It was not as yet known to what party, according to the news-writers, the conſequences of this battle would be favourable. The progreſs of the Turks would have confirmed the relations of Paris, and confuted thoſe of Holland and Germany. But they made none at all; they retired, a little after, into their own territories, without ſhewing themſelves as conquerors, and hereby the conteſt was ended, to the confuſion of the Paris Gazetteers. The fortune of his are entertained of a miniſter, whoſe prophecies are of a later date [H]. Advantage has been taken of ſome words, which he has dropped in his book, and by which it is pretended, his Imperial majeſty was uppermoſt afterwards, and eſpecially in 1697, by a defeat of the Ottomans, ſo compleat, ſo ſhameful, and pernicious to them, that there is hardly any like it in their annals. The Sultan who was there in perſon, was ſo mortified with this blow, that he thought of nothing but peace, and accepted it the year following, on what conditions they would preſcribe him, which were moſt glorious and advantageous to his Imperial majeſty. No falſe prophets did ever receive ſuch bloody affronts, as thoſe, which the prophecies, publiſhed by Comenius, received by this glorious treaty of peace. The emperor, whom they did ſo much threaten, mortified, humbled, and trod under foot the haughtineſs of the Ottomans, to whom they had promiſed ſo many conqueſts over the houſe of Auſtria. He added the luſtre of an advantageous peace, to the glory, which had attended his arms, and made him triumphant, by reducing the ſtrongeſt places, and gaining ſeveral battles. He does whatever he pleaſes in Tranſylvania; he has made a kingdom hereditary, which had been always elective (34), and is in poſſeſſion of that whole kingdom, whereas before he only poſſeſſed part of it. What ſhall we ſay of the advantages and glory he obtained by the treaty of Ryſwic, by the recovery of ſo many countries which had been taken from the empire, or his allies, and by the re-union of Friburg and Briſac to the hereditary ſtates of the houſe of Auſtria? if this prince is happy abroad, he is no leſs at home; fecundity, marriages, &c. make his family proſper; his ſecond ſon is to inherit almoſt the whole monarchy of Spain, by ſuch tranſactions as France itſelf has conſented to (35). Take warning by this confuſion of Comenius's falſe prophets, you, who have the confidence to threaten with the Apocalypſe thoſe that do not pleaſe you.

[H] The ſame ſuſpicions are entertained of a miniſter, whoſe prophecies are of a later date.] What I have ſaid of Comenius, I ſay alſo of a famous divine at Rotterdam, who has explained the prophecies of the ſcripture, pretending confidently to be inſpired. I do not pretend to judge of his heart, and I am willing it ſhould be believed, that he did not act againſt his conſcience; but no body ought to take it amiſs, if I ſay, that he has been ſuſpected to have no other deſign than to make people take up arms, and put Europe in a flame. They go upon this, that there appeared no ſign of confuſion in him, when the event gave the lye to his prophecies, in a moſt undeniable manner. ‘He had, ſay they, ſo great an opinion of his own parts and knowledge, that he would have fallen into a mortal diſcontent and humiliation, by ſo terrible a proof of illuſion and ignorance, as this would be; but, being inwardly convinced, that he was not deceived, he has preſerved the ſame good opinion of his underſtanding that he had before, and ſo the ill ſucceſs of a prophecy, which was a meer juggler's trick, has not humbled him.’ They build alſo upon this, that, like Comenius, he has attempted re-unite the Lutherans and Calviniſts (36), in hopes, ſay they, of increaſing the number of troops that ſhould attack Antichriſt. Once more, I am willing that this ſhould only be looked upon as a faithful account of what many ſay and think. Let us go farther, and ſee what one of his adverſaries has publiſhed (37). ‘One muſt needs be ſtupid, not to perceive ſo groſs an artifice, eſpecially when he ſeems to give you notice of it himſelf, and to ſay here and there, ſome things whereby he may diſcover his ſecret hereafter, and ſecure himſelf from your reproaches. It is certain ſays he in one place*, that often prophecies, whether fictitious or true, have inſpired thoſe, for whom they were made, with a deſign of undertaking the things that were promiſed them. Men of ſenſe need no more to make them underſtand his intention, and diſcover his views. And elſewhere: one day, perhaps, the world ſhall know the principal reaſon that made me ſpeak ſo poſitively, and with ſo much aſſurance upon the explication of the prophecies. We ſhall know it, moſt dear brethren, in the way he will then explain it. If he be under a miſtake, as one may well believe he is, he will tell you, I had nothing but conjectures; but a good cauſe ought to be ſupported as well as it can, and our people were to be animated with ſome few hopes. I knew that prophecies, even ſuch as are fictitious, are wont to produce a like effect. If, on the contrary, the preſent junctures, the jealouſy of nations, the indignation of the Proteſtant ſtates for their aſſaulted religion, the controverſies of France with the court of Rome, ſhould produce any important effect, which might give you new hopes; I well knew, would he ſay, what I ſaid in the year 1686; an angel ſpoke to me: but if I had ſaid ſo then, I ſhould have been taken for an impoſtor; the angel himſelf forbad me to ſpeak of it. He ſpeaks to me ſtill and gives me liberty to declare it to you. Follow me; we are going to begin that kingdom of God, of which you doubted, and which, nevertheleſs, you begged of him in your daily prayer.’ Were it true, that Jurieu is guilty of the impoſture, he is charged with, he would have been afraid, that the public had not been able to dive into his ſecret; and therefore, chuſing to preſerve the good opinion of his wit, at the expence of his honeſty, he would have dropped ſome words (38), that might diſcover the myſtery to the clear-ſighted.

The knaveries, that have been diſcovered amongſt the little prophets of Dauphiné, have occaſioned a large comment upon the paſſage of Mr Pelliſon, before cited. We need only read a book, intituled, Hiſtoire du Fanatiſme de notre temps, &c. The hiſtory of the Fanaticiſm of our time, and the deſign there was of making the diſcontented Calviniſts in France riſe up in arms. It was printed at Paris in the year 1692. Mr Brueys, the author of it, having collected together ſeveral paſſages out of Mr Jurieu's book, to prove, that this miniſter ſet up for a prophet, adds immediately; ‘However, it ought not to be imagined, that this miniſter was truly perſuaded himſelf of what he would perſuade others; he deſignedly affected to appear like a prophet. He knew well enough, that he was not; but he had a mind to impoſe upon the people, to make an inſurrection and to kindle a civil-war in the heart of this kingdom, in order to favour the deſign of our enemies. He was ſo full of this deteſtable project, when he compoſed his book of prophecies, that he himſelf cannot forbear diſcovering his deſign to the reader, who has never ſo little penetration. The time in which he wrote, the motives that induced him to it, and the ſtrokes, wherein he has inadvertently ſcattered ſome drops of the venom his heart was filled with, diſcover the deſign of this falſe prophet (39).’ I will not produce the proofs he has given of each of theſe remarks, but will only ſet down what he obſerves concerning the laſt. Here is, ſays he (40), what he has let fall in ſome places of his book, which manifeſtly diſcovers, that he had no other deſign, than to cauſe an inſurrection of the people. ‘The prophecies, which are in that piece, at firſt ſcandalized the moſt underſtanding men of his party; he ſays ſo himſelf, in the ſecond edition of his book. Some ſays he †, believe, that the hopes I gave of a Reſtoration, in a few years, may be very prejudicial. He attempts firſt to ſhew, that there is no reaſon to fear it, and then he adds: It is certain, that often prophecies, whether fictitious or true, have inſpired thoſe, for whom they were made, with a deſign of undertaking the things that were promiſed them. Could he declare more expreſly the intention he had of running the hazard of venting falſe prophecies, to make the malecontents of France riſe up in arms, and inſpire them with the deſign of procuring to themſelves the ſpeedy deliverance, which he promiſed them? Thoſe of his party were not only ſcandalized at his venturing to publiſh ſuch prophecies, but much more at his talking ſo poſitively. He himſelf informs us of it. As to the reflexion, ſays he ‡, which ſo many people have made, that I ſpeak too poſitively of things, which I ſhould have propoſed as ſtrong conjectures: one day, perhaps the world ſhall know the principal reaſon that made me ſpeak ſo poſitively, and with ſo much aſſurance. What then is this principal reaſon, which he dares not ſpeak and which, perhaps, the world ſhall know one day? Is it that he is truly perſuaded of the pretended, he has diſcovered the ſecret of his deſign. They too much exaggerate what they impute to him [I]. My reader may judge of it by examining the paſſages I have ‘things he ſays? This is the only reaſon that ought to oblige an honeſt man to ſpeak poſitively. But if it be his reaſon why does he not ſay ſo? Is he afraid of ſpeaking the truth? Let us preſs him no farther upon it: he is more ſincere than we think; he has already told us this principal reaſon; does he not ſay, that it is certain, that often prophecies, whether fictitious or true, have inſpired thoſe, for whom they were made, with a deſign of undertaking the things that were promiſed them. This is his principal reaſon; we need not ſeek for another. This falſe prophet did not expect, that theſe two paſſages would be put together ſome time or other (41), he had ſeparated them on purpoſe in two different tomes: they are now placed together, and ſo naturally explain one another, that he muſt be blind, who cannot ſee, that, if Mr Jurieu ſpoke in ſo deciſive a manner of the approaching deliverance, which he promiſed the Proteſtants of France, it was becauſe he thinks, that often prophecies, whether fictitious or true, have inſpired thoſe, for whom they were made, with a deſign of undertaking the things that were promiſed them.

Mr Brueys ſeems ſo fully perſuaded, that he has diſcovered all the myſtery, that he repeats this obſervation more than once. Nay, he is ſo malicious as to put his reader in mind of the artifices of the Heathens. ‘This miniſter, ſays he, promiſed the Calviniſts the fall of Popery, and the approaching deliverance of their church; he promiſed them theſe things in the name of God, telling them they were contained in St John's Revelation. And therefore thoſe prophecies could not but inſpire thoſe, for whom they were made, with a deſign of undertaking the things that were promiſed them; becauſe there is nothing that has more force upon the minds of men, than religion; and every thing appears lawful to them, when they firmly believe, that God is on their ſide, and that they are only executing his orders. Thoſe who know what uſe the cunning Greeks and Romans made of their oracles, Diviners, Augurs, and of thoſe prieſts, whom they called Haruſpices, Feciales, Præpetes and Oſcines (42), whoſe functions conſiſted in foretelling the will of the gods, when they deliberated about any important affair; ſome by obſerving the entrails of the victims, others the ſinging, flying, or different motions of certain birds: thoſe, I ſay, who know of what uſe thoſe things were formerly, are not ignorant that men of ſenſe and judgment gave no credit to them, and uſed them only to poſſeſs the people and the ſoldiers with a deſire of undertaking what they promiſed them from their gods; but, at the bottom, it was nothing but what they themſelves had reſolved upon, before they conſulted their oracles. Here you ſee exactly the fictitious prophecies, and the pretended perſuaſion of Mr Jurieu (43).

I here renew the proteſtation I have already made which is, that I do not pretend to be a judge: I only relate what others ſay. It is true, I will not end this remark, without ſaying, that, in all times and countries, prophecies have been forged, to induce people to revolt. I could bring a hundred inſtances of it; but one will be ſufficient. The Spaniards, who rebelled againſt Charles V, ſpread a malicious prophecy, importing that there ſhould reign in Caſtile a prince named Charles, who ſhould ruin and burn the country; but that a ſon of the king of Portugal ſhould take poſſeſſion of Caſtile, and reſtore the kingdom to a good condition. The ring-leaders of the ſedition got this prophecy printed, and ordered every one of their abettors to keep a copy of it (44).

[I] They too much exaggerate what they impute to him.] If you conſider well Mr Brueys's words, you will find an artificial Rhetoric in them, which ought to be ſuſpected. ‘It is not poſſible for Mr Jurieu's beſt friends to diſown, that he publiſhed his predictions upon the Apocalypſe, only with a deſign of raiſing the diſcontented Calviniſts in France; that the league, which was then forming, finding the kingdom divided againſt itſelf, might more eaſily accompliſh it's utter deſtruction, and the Calviniſts might re-eſtabliſh their religion upon the ruins of their country.

‘Now reckon up, if you can, all the crimes and villanies of ſuch an execrable project; the artifices, fictions, and impoſtures, to ſeduce the ſimple; the profanation of Holy Writ, and its ſacred oracles; the impieties and blaſphemies againſt the holy Spirit; the violation of the moſt holy laws of Chriſtianity; the overturning the principles of the morality of Jeſus Chriſt; the contempt of the conſtant practice of the church, and of the examples of martyrs; the forgeting his own maxims; the precepts of revolt againſt the powers, which God has ordained; exhortations to ſubjects, to Chriſtians, to Frenchmen, to take up arms, and join with thoſe who have conſpired the ruin of their country; the horrible wiſhes he induces to make for the defeat of our armies, the plundering of the kingdom, the depopulation of our provinces, the burning of our towns, the effuſion of blood, and the murthers of their fellow citizens, friends, and relations. Laſtly, all the inhumanities and barbarities, that a civil and inteſtine war would have added to the moſt furious and bloody foreign war, that was ever known.

Such mighty ills religion cou'd perſuade.

‘Thus you ſee, to ſpeak of things as they are, the conſequences of Mr Jurieu's falſe prophecies, and the ſcope of the ſeditious writings of this famous defender of Calviniſm, who, to reſtore the public exerciſe of his religion in France, inſpires his party with great fury, and prompts them to greater cruelties, than the barbarous Mahomet cauſed heretofore to be committed for the eſtabliſhment of his Alcoran (45).

Here I muſt quit the character of a meer copyiſt, and take up that of critic. It is falſe any league was forming againſt France, when Mr Jurieu publiſhed his predictions; for they were given out in March, 1686, above two years before he had the leaſt ſuſpicion of what happened in the year 1688. So that the anachroniſm of his adverſary, is here a very groſs fault (46). If Mr Brueys had conſulted Mr Nicole, he would have been more equitable; he would not have been ignorant, that Mr Jurieu, in publiſhing his explication of the Apocalypſe, believed, that arms would have no ſhare in the events, which he predicted. See how Mr Nicole has done him juſtice (47). ‘Who would not, for inſtance, take for a menace of a very bloody war, theſe laſt lines of the preface to his Syſtem of the Church (48). We ſhall quickly eſtabliſh truth upon the throne of falſhood, and the raiſing up of that, which has been caſt down, ſhall be performed in ſo glorious a manner, that it will be the aſtoniſhment of the whole earth. Did ever an author write in ſuch a ſtrain? Who would not believe that ſuch a diſcourſe is to be followed by an army of a hundred thouſand Proteſtants combined together, to reſtore the pretended Reformed Religion in France? Mr Jurieu might even be charged with a ſtate-crime, and looked upon as a ſeditious man. It is therefore neceſſary to undeceive the world in this point, and to inform them, that this diſcourſe is no ways grounded upon any conſpiracy againſt France (49). All that he ſays here, by the by, in ſo dreadful a manner, is much leſs terrible being explained at large by his Accompliſhment of the prophecies. For there we ſee, that this glorious reſtoration of the pretended Reformed ſhall be made without any, or with very little effuſion of blood *, nay, that this will not come to paſs by an army of foreigners, nor by a multitude of miniſters, who ſhall repair into France, but by the effuſion of the ſpirit of God, which ſhall re-animate the extended bodies of Enoch and Elias, that is to ſay, according to Mr Jurieu ┼, the Proteſtants, who were formerly witneſſes of the truth, and who, having cowardly forſaken it, are at preſent deprived of life, and ſtretched out in the place of the city of Antichriſt, that is, throughout all France, the principal part, according to him, of the Antichriſtian empire.’

There is another thing, that Mr Brueys deſerves to be blamed for. He inſinuates (50), that Mr Jurieu is the oracle, that was conſulted, for the erecting of a ſchool (51), wherein children were to be taught to ſet up for prophets. See here the deſcription of that infamous ſchool: ‘ Could this be believed, unleſs one had ſeen it? This was the firſt time, that a ſchool was erected, in which the art of prophecying was taught, and to which they went to learn how to foretel things to come; and, after having gone through the neceſſary trials, they were perſuaded they received the Holy Ghoſt from the impure mouth of a ſacrilegious maſter, who pretended to breath it with a kiſs into the mouth of thoſe miſerable ſcholars (52).’ This is ſo horrible a deſign, that it ought never to be declared, or inſinuated, without good proofs, that a miniſter was ſo wicked as to ſuggeſt the model of it. Mr Brueys has given too great a ſcope to the conſequences he draws from Mr Jurieu's care to ſave the honour of the prophets of Dauphiné (53). ‘ He could never be prevailed with to revoke what he had publiſhed at firſt concerning this propheteſs (54), and he maintained it in all his letters with ſo much obſtinacy, that, even after God had retrieved that maid from her errors, and ſhe became a good and devout Catholic, and confeſſed to her judges how ſhe was ſeduced by Du Serre; this miniſter perſiſted in what he had advanced, was conſtant to his ſhepherdeſs, notwithſtanding her unfaithfulneſs, and had even the imprudence to ſay, ſpeaking of her, and of the other little ſleeping prophets, that they might become rogues, but yet had been prophets. . . . . . (55). This miniſter openly declared in favour of the little prophets, notwithſtanding what the honeſt people of his party could ſay to him; and maintained that their inſpiration was true, with an invincible, but affected, obſtinacy, as I have already obſerved, becauſe he had his views, and deſigned to get ſucceſſors in prophecy, as he had got forerunners (56). . . . . Ought we to (57) wonder after this, that Mr Jurieu could not reſolve upon forſaking thoſe, who had ſo much improved by his leſſons, and that, like a fond father, who does not ſee the imperfections of his children, he would never acknowledge the folly of thoſe, to whom he had given birth?’ The conſequences, that are drawn from hence, are not very juſt; for how many things are there, which men reſolve to maintain, when they find them already done, without knowing how wickedly they have been performed, which they would never adviſe, if they knew it, and if thoſe things were ſtill to be done? thus charity will have us to extenuate, as much as poſſible, the faults of our neighbour, and to ſuſpend our judgment, notwithſtanding the ſtrongeſt probabilities, if they do not amount to a good proof.

Mr Brueys's raſhneſs will more evidently appear, if it be obſerved, that, not contented to inſinuate his accuſation, he propoſed it in clear and affirmative terms, not only againſt the miniſter Jurieu, but alſo againſt many others. ‘ The moſt factious of the fugitive miniſters, ſays he (58), who burned with impatience to ſee again what they had left in France, conſidering, that the ſtratagem, contrived by Mr Jurieu, might advance their affairs, hearing with what greedineſs the malecontents of the kingdom received the prophecies, which promiſed them a ſpeedy deliverance, and perſuading themſelves, that there was no better expedient to bring on a revolt, thought they ought not to loſe ſo fair an opportunity of kindling a civil-war in the heart of the kingdom, which might give it a mortal blow, with a proſpect of ſeeing their religion riſe again upon the ruins of monarchy, which they believed at the very brink of deſtruction. And theſe were the ſame miniſters, who at firſt made a great noiſe againſt his predictions, threatened to complain of them, and were angry he had ſpoken ſo affirmatively; but the falſe prophet having imparted his ſecret to them, and giving them to underſtand, that often prophecies, whether fictitious or true, have inſpired thoſe, for whom they were made, with a deſign of undertaking the things promiſed them; and having told them in the ear that principal and ſecret reaſon, which ſhould one day be known, and which made him ſpeak ſo poſitively; they were quickly ſatisfied; his ſtratagem was approved in their ſecret council, and it was reſolved to propheſy, in order to cauſe an inſurrection.’ Here are two things to be cenſured; for, in the firſt place, no proof can be given, that the French miniſters had a hand in the horrid plot of thoſe ſeducers, who taught little children to pretend to inſpiration; and in the ſecond place, it is not true, that the French miniſters made a great noiſe againſt his predictions, and threatened to complain of them. Mr Brueys alledges that falſe ſuppoſition a hundred times over (59); tho' he has cited, at the 216th page a paſſage, which might eaſily have undeceived him. The paſſage is this: ‘ The other thing, which ſome have been offended at, they are Mr Jurieu's words, concerns the MILLENNIUM. Several divines OF THIS COUNTRY have murmured ſo far, as to threaten to complain of it.’ It is manifeſt, that thoſe loud murmurs came from the Dutch divines, and not from the French miniſters, and did not concern the promiſes of a ſudden deliverance, &c. but the Millennium, a doctrine which was moſt odious to the churches of Holland, and for which Mr Jurieu had been brought into trouble, had it not been for human ſupports. Notwithſtanding thoſe ſupports, complaints were made againſt him in the Walloon ſynod, who inſerted ſome words in an act, of which we may ſay what cardinal d'Oſſat ſaid of the ſtrokes of the ſwitch, which the deputies of Henry IV received (60).

[K] The author of the Thoughts upon Comets maintains, that the prophecies of Drabicius found little credit.] He was more equitable than the perſon cited in the remark [G]: he acknowledged, that the Proteſtants made no great account of Drabicius. ‘ The Proteſtants themſelves, ſays he (61), are not over-perſuaded, that Drabicius was a prophet. Many believe, that he was a Fanatic, who had his brain turned by reading the commentaries upon the prophecies of the Old Teſtament, and the Apocalypſe; that, being full of thoſe ideas, he looked upon the emperors of Germany as ſo many Pharaohs, Sennacheribs, Nebuchadnezzars, and emiſſaries of the great whore, drunk with the wine of the wrath of her whoredom; that he came at laſt to be perſuaded, that God had appointed him to command ſeveral princes to exterminate thoſe perſecutors. They who had ſuffered perſecution, and who thought that the divine providence would puniſh, ſooner or later, the authors of ſo barbarous a conduct, might probably believe Drabicius's viſions. Nevertheleſs, moſt of them made little account of them, eſpecially having experienced that he was deluded, and that he contradicted himſelf frequently in the moſt palpable manner, and ſuch as cannot be excuſed but by recurring to a multitude of gloſſes, which make the incredulous laugh more, than the ſincere confeſſion of that man's errors would; for by the help of ſuch gloſſes, multiplied as occaſion ſerves, there is no falſe prophet but may find an apology.’

[A] He was a native of Hamburg.] And not of Bamberg, as Bellarmin (1), John Gerard (2), Chriſtian Matthias (3), David Blondel (4), and Hottinger (5) affirm. There can be no doubt about it, though a modern author has affected to ſuſpend his judgment. ‘ Res in aprico eſt poſita, ac proinde riſu digna ἐποχὴ Mart. had no ſooner gone thro' his claſſical learning in his country, but he went to travel. He ſaw the principal parts of Europe, and ſo ſtudiouſly cultivated the ſciences in his travels, that he became a very able man. He was doctor of Divinity, and of the Canon-Law, and profeſſor of Philoſophy and Divinity in the univerſity of Roſtoch. He was rector there in the year 1482 (a). Thoſe, who ſay he was a canon of Naumburg are miſtaken [B]. He went from Roſtoch to Hamburg, where he obtained a canon's place in the cathedral. He did not enjoy this preferment, as ſo many others do, like a ſluggard, but ſpent his time in preaching and reading lectures of Divinity. He was elected dean of the chapter in the year 1508, and performed the viſitation of the dioceſe with the diſpoſitions of a man reſolved to cure the diſorders he ſhould find in it. He did the ſame in the year 1514. He did many good ſervices to the town of Hamburg [C], and other Hanſe-towns; and got ſuch a reputation for ability and prudence, that the king of Denmark himſelf made him arbitrator in a conſiderable controverſy [D]. He died the ſeventh of December in the year 1517 [E], being very ſenſible, that the church ſtood in need of a reformation (b) [F]. He wrote ſeveral good books

[B] Thoſe who ſay, that he was a canon of Naumburg, are miſtaken.] Two very learned authors have affirmed it; but Mr Sperlingius, who is writing Albert Krantzius's Life, will ſhew their miſtake. ‘Sunt qui in Collegio etiam Canonicorum Numburgenſium aliquandiu vixiſſe, ac Diaconi partes obiiſſe perhibent, & hos inter Duumviri celeberrimi, Henr. Meibomius Jun. † ac Conr. Schurtzfleiſchius ‡. Sed falli eos, ac Krantzium Numburgum forte numquam videſſe, ſatis ſibi eſſe exploratum, Dn. Sperlingius nobis ſignificavit, in ipſa Krantzii Biographia prolixius ſententiam hanc impugnaturus (7). —— Some pretend, that he lived for ſome time in the college of the canons of Naumburg, and officiated as a deacon; among whom are the famous Henry Meibomius the younger, and Conrard Schurtzfleiſch. But Sperlingius has informed me, that he is convinced they are miſtaken, and that, perhaps, Krantzius never ſaw Naumburg, and that he will more fully refute this opinion in the Life of Krantzius.'

[C] He did many good ſervices to the town of Hamburg, &c.] Under pretence, that this town began, only in the year 1546, to have ordinary ſyndics, one cannot deny what is found in the Daniſh remonſtrance, in anſwer to the apology of the Hamburghers, in the year 1642, viz. that Albert Krantzius was ſyndic of Hamburg; for that title was given, in his time, to thoſe, whom the town deputed upon particular affairs. Now it is certain, that Albert Krantzius was deputed two or three times. He was at the aſſembly of Wiſmar, in the year 1489, in behalf of the Hanſe-Towns (8); and he went into France in 1497, to deſire a truce; and into England, in 1499, to deſire ſome privileges againſt pirates (9). This is what we learn from Mollerus in the book I have quoted: His proofs are in the margin.

[D] The king of Denmark himſelf made him arbitrator in a conſiderable controverſy.] This was in the year 1500. Read what follows (10): ‘Quantam vero, in reliqua etiam Cimbria, Prudentia & Integritate ſingulari ſibi conciliarit Autoritatem, vel inde perſpicies, quod A. 1500. Johannes, Rex Daniæ, & Fridericus, Dux Holſatiæ, Arbitri ipſi Honorarii Partes, in Controverſiis quæ cum Dithmarſis ſibi intercedebant, decidendis, deferre non dubitaverint *. — What eſteem his ſingular prudence and integrity gained him in other parts of that country, appears from hence, that, in the year 1500, John, king of Denmark, and Frederick, duke of Holſtein, did not ſcruple to appoint him arbitrator in a diſpute between them and the Dithmarſi.'

[E] He died the ſeventh of December, 1517]. This appears from his epitaph: it is therefore a miſtake to ſay, with Geſner's continuators, and Theodorus Zwinger, that he flouriſhed in the year 1520. Geſner ſhould not have been taxed with that fault by Mr Mollerus (11). The error of Father Fournier, a Jeſuit, and John Andrew Boſius, is much greater. The Jeſuit makes him die in 1569 (12), and the other in 1570 (13). Thoſe faults would not come near the blunder of a famous profeſſor of Oxford (14), if he took Albert Krantzius to be the ſame with Albertus Magnus, biſhop of Ratisbon. But Mr Mollerus, who taxed him with it, has acknowledged his miſtake, and acquits him clearly of the fault. No body had given him notice of it: he himſelf has diſcovered it, and confeſſes it publickly like an honeſt man. See the 738th and 739th pages of his treatiſe De Scriptoribus Homonymis.

[F] . . . . . being very ſenſible, that the church ſtood in need of a reformation.] He acknowledged this neceſſity, both with reſpect to doctrine and morals, if we may believe Melchior Adam. ‘Animadvertit in doctrina ejus temporis multum fuiſſe errorum & ſuperſtitionum: & mores Canonicorum ac monachorum acerrime reprehendit; eoſque in ordinem redigere conatus eſt. Sed cum id fruſtra ſe tentare videret: quod perverſitas illorum hominum munita eſſet auctoritate Pontificis, dixiſſe fertur: nunquam poſſe eos reduci ad meliorem frugem, niſi prius à viris doctis expugnata arce. Interrogatus cur ſeſe ipſe non opponeret tam craſſis erroribus, reſpondit: ſe neque eruditione neque ætate parem eſſe tantis negotiis (15). —— He obſerved much of error and ſuperſtition in the doctrine of that time; and he ſeverely cenſured the manners of the Canons and Monks, and endeavoured to reform them. But, finding his endeavours fruitleſs, the perverſe behaviour of thoſe men being ſkreened by the Pope's authority, he is ſaid to have declared, that they could never be brought to behave better, till ſome learned man ſhould beſiege and take their fortreſs: And being asked why he himſelf did not oppoſe ſuch groſs errors, he replied, that he was neither learned, nor young enough for ſuch an undertaking.' There is a thing in this paſſage, which puts me in mind of Teleſinus in Velleius Paterculus. This Teleſinus was general of the Samnites, and a very brave captain; he mortally hated the Romans, and approached Rome with an army of forty thouſand men, fully reſolved to puſh on; and to that end he continually animated the ſoldiers with theſe words: It is neceſſary to deſtroy this city; for the wolves, that raviſh the liberty of Italy, will never be wanting as long as this foreſt ſubſiſts, in which they find ſhelter. The words of Paterculus deſerve to be ſet down. Circumvolans ordines exercitus ſui Teleſinus, dictitanſque adeſſe Romanis ultimum diem, vociferabatur eruendam delendamque urbem, adjiciens nunquam defuturos raptores Italicæ libertatis lupos, niſi ſilva, in quam refugere ſolerent, eſſet exciſa (16). He did not argue amiſs. Krantzius was likewiſe of opinion, that, whilſt the court of Rome prevailed, it was impoſſible to ſuppreſs the corruption of the Monks and clergy. Here I muſt expoſe a notable piece of inſincerity in Moreri; for thus his fault ought to be called. He had read Melchior Adam, who ſays, that Krantzius, ſeeing Martin Luther's poſitions againſt the doctrine of Indulgences, cried out, ‘He has too powerful adverſaries; he will never ſucceed; I adviſe him to deſiſt from his enterprize, and to ſhut up himſelf in his cell, and ſay, Lord have mercy upon me (17).' What has Moreri done? he has curtailed this paſſage, and only given us the laſt words of it, which he underſtands as if Krantzius had condemned Luther's attempt. ‘Krantzius, ſays he, deplored, at the hour of his death, this unhappineſs (18), which he had foretold in his life-time. It is affirmed, that in that moment he often repeated theſe words, ſpeaking againſt the ſame Luther, Frater, abi in cellam, & dic, miſerere mei Deus.' Though we ſhould not attend to ſeveral paſſages of Krantzius's works, which teſtify his opinion of the corrupt ſtate of the church, the words, which he pronounced, when he ſaw the firſt poſitions of Luther, would alone ſufficiently acquaint quaint us with Moreri's prevarication. Conſider what follows (19). ‘Vitia quæ doctrinam & cultum Eccleſiæ Romanæ publicum deformabant, agnovit, &, quanto Emendationis eorundem deſiderio teneretur, cum locis Scriptorum ſuorum plurimis, tum Vocibus hiſce Cygnæis eſt teſtatus, quibus ſuum de Theſibus Lutheri Anti-Tezelianis, in Lectulo ſibi Emortuali oblatis, judicium expoſuit †: Vera quidem dicis, Bone Frater, ſed nihil efficies: Vade igitur in Cellam tuam, & dic: Miſerere mei Deus. ——— He acknowledged the corruptions, which deformed the doctrine and public worſhip of the Romiſh church; and he ſhewed his zeal for reforming them, both by many paſſages of their writers, as alſo by theſe ſwan-like words, in which he declared his opinion of the Anti-Tezelian theſes of Luther, which were brought to him as he lay on his death-bed: You ſpeak the truth, good brother, but to no purpoſe: go therefore into your cell, and ſay, Lord have mercy upon me.’ I will conclude this remark with a paſſage, which will teach us, that, if Flacius Illyricus has not made uſe of Albert Krantzius's authority againſt the church of Rome, in his Catalogus teſtium veritatis, the compilers, who followed him, made amends for that omiſſion; for they made a good collection of what they had read in Krantzius, that favoured their deſign. Nay, the editors of the Francfort editions have been at the pains of obſerving thoſe things in the marginal notes. Here is the paſſage I have promiſed (20): ‘Ipſi theologi Proteſtantium cordatiores Scriptoris hujus, licet Pontificii, atque adeo ἀλλοφύλου, Lectionem ſibi habent commendatiſſimam, & Arma ex illo depromunt, quibus adverſus Eccleſiæ Romanæ Hyperaſpiſtas haud infeliciter κατ᾽ ἄνθρωπον depugnatur, Invectivas ſcilicet in Vitia non Monachorum ſolum ac Canonicorum, ſed & Epiſcoporum atque Pontificum, παῤῥησιαστικάς, crebaſque de ſtatu Eccleſiæ & Aulæ Pontificiæ corruptiſſimo querelas. Which, as I wonder they were omitted by Flacius, in his catalogue of* The Witneſſes of the Truth, ſo I find they are carefully compiled by John Wolfius, John Conrard Dietericus, and other moderns. Likewiſe the marginal obſervations, which I ſaid were added to the editions of the works of Krantzius by Wechel, conſtantly refer to theſe kind of paſſages, and are, for that very reaſon, ſtigmatized as impious by Robert Bellarmin, John Bona, and Aubert Miræus, who is not aſhamed to affirm, that the text itſelf has been corrupted by the Heretics.’

[G] He wrote ſeveral good books.] I. A chronicle Regnorum Aquilonarium, Daniæ, Sueciæ, & Norwegiæ. Henry of Eppendorf, tranſlated it into High-Dutch from the manuſcript he found at Cologne (21), and publiſhed his verſion at Strasburg in the year 1545. He publiſhed the Latin text the year following, in the ſame town. A ſecond edition of it was made in the year 1562. John Wolfius, counſellor to the marquis of Baden, procured a third and a fourth at Francfort in the years 1575, and 1583 (22). II. The book intituled, Saxonia, ſive de Saxonicæ gentis vetuſta origine, longinquis expeditionibus ſuſceptis, & bellis domi pro libertate diu fortiturque geſtis Hiſtoria; libris 13 comprehenſa & ad A. C. 1501. deducta. The firſt edition is of Cologne 1520. John Soter or Heylius procured it, and dedicated it to Charles V. That work was printed in the ſame town in the years 1574, and 1595. The Wechels printed three editions of it at Francfort, in the years 1575, 1580, and 1621, which are preferable to the editions of Cologne. This work, tranſlated into High-Dutch by Baſil Faber, was printed at Leipſic in the years 1563, and 1582 (23). III. The book intituled Vandalia, ſive Hiſtoria de Vandalorum vera Origine, variis Gentibus, crebris è patria Migrationibus, Regnis item, quorum vel Autores fuerunt, vel Everſores, Libris XIV. à prima eorum Origine, ad A. C. 1500. deducta. The firſt edition, which is of Cologne, 1519, was followed by three others at Francfort (24). and one at Hanaw (25). The German verſion, printed at Lubec, in the year 1600, was done by Mark Stephen Macropus (26). IV. The book intituled Metropolis: it contains, in twelve books, the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Saxony, Weſtphalia, and Jutland, with the lives of the prelates, that, from the year 780 till 1504, poſſeſſed the twelve biſhoprics of that country. Joachim Mollerus, the younger, a native of Hamburg, counſellor to the dukes of Brunſwic, is the firſt who publiſhed this work. He did it, at Melanchthon's requeſt, from the author's original, which was the only manuſcript extant of that book: Henry Bucholz, biſhop of Lubec, had given it to this Mollerus's father. This firſt edition is of Baſil, by Oporinus, in the year 1548: it was followed by that of the year 1568, from the ſame preſs, and by two others (27) at Cologne (28), and three more at Francfort (29). V. The work intituled, Spirantiſſimum opuſculum in officium Miſſæ in optimum Ordinem pro ſancta & ſuavi Sacerdotum Eccleſiæ inſtitutione digeſtum (30); and the book intituled, Ordo Miſſæ ſecundum ritum Eccleſiæ Hamburgenſis, at Straſburg 1509, in folio. Conſilium de ordine & privilegiis creditorum in bonis ſuorum debitorum. It is inſerted in the fourth volume of the Reſponſorum Juris, printed at Francfort in the year 1572. Inſtitutiones Logicæ, compendioſæ admodum, pariterque abſolutiſſimæ, nec minus Latinæ, at Leipſic in the year 1517. Grammatica culta & ſuccincta, at Roſtoch 1506. There are in the library of Leipſic ſome treatiſes of Philoſophy of Albert Krantzius, which have not been printed (31).

[H] . . . . all thoſe, which are aſcribed to him, are not his.] He is not the author of the Tractatus de Romanis Pontificibus, & præſertim de Victore II. alias Epiſcopo Eyſtettenſi, which Father Jacob (32) aſcribes to him; nor of the Life of Anſgarius, which Geſner's continuators father upon him; nor of the Scriptum de Imperii Romani interitu, aſcribed to him by Scherzerus (33).

[I] His reputation has been aſperſed.] This motto, Per convicia & laudes, might ſuit him as well as many other great men. Several learned men (34) beſtow great encomiums upon him; but ſome critics uſe him very ſeverely. He is accuſed of venting many falſe ſtories, about the original of nations; of citing antient authors very wrong; of tranſcribing whole pages from other authors, without citing any body; and of falſifying the monuments of hiſtory, to gratify his paſſions. Mr Mollerus (35) names the authors of thoſe cenſures, and ſays ſomething in his vindication; he denies not, but that Albert Krantzius was a plagiary; he only endeavours to excuſe him from the practice of that age. ‘Solenne præterea ei eſſe fatemur, Eginhardum, Witekindum, Herm. Contractum, Adamum, Helmoldum, Arnoldum Saxonem, Albertum Stadenſem, Gobelinum, Blondum, Cornerum, alioſque veteres, de verbo ad verbum exſcribere, ac non Periodos ſolum, ſed & paginas atque Capita integra, in ſua inde ſcripta, nulla plerumque Autoris mentione adjecta, tranferre. Obſervatum id nobis in Accuratiori Narrationum de iiſdem Rebus Collatione: Obſervatum & ante nos Vellejo, Reineccio, Meibomiorum Trigæ, Voſſio, Malincrotio, Conringio, Bangerto, Sagittario, Schurtzfleiſchio, Madero, quorum Teſtimoniis Lectores meos nolo obruere (36). ——— I confeſs likewiſe, that he frequently tranſcribes, word for word, Eginhard, Witekind, Hermannus Contractus, Adam, Helmold, Arnold the Saxon, Albertus Stadenſis, Gobelin, Blondus, Cornerus, and other antient authors, and that he borrows, not only periods, but even pages, and whole chapters, for the moſt part without mentioning from whence he takes them. I obſerved this in my accurate compariſon of different accounts of the ſame things: it was obſerved likewiſe, before me, by Vellejus, Reineccius, the Meibomii, Voſſius, Malincrot, Conringius, Bangertus, Sagittarius, Schurtzfleiſch, Maderus, with whoſe teſtimonies I will not trouble my readers.’

KUCHLIN (John) miniſter and profeſſor of Divinity, was born in 1546, in a little town of the county of Heſſe, called Wettera. His father, a good and honeſt mechanic, tho' he had the charge of ten ſons and three daughters, whom he maintained only by the labour of his hands, deſigned to make a ſcholar of him; but he died before the young boy had made any coſiderable progreſs. The miniſter (a) of the place took care of him, the more willingly, becauſe he very much improved in Greek and Latin under Juſtus Wulteius, rector of the ſchool of Wettera. But when Kuchlin was fit to go to the univerſity, he had no little difficulties to overcome by reaſon of his poverty. However he was not diſcouraged, but reſolved to ſeek his fortune; and, to that end, he went to travel, as a young college-adventurer. He found nothing at Francfort. His landlord at Mentz carried him to the Jeſuits, who kept him no longer, than 'till they ſaw that he would not abjure the Proteſtant religion. All that he could find at Straſburg, was a letter of recommendation from John Sturmius to Brentius, who was profeſſor at Tubingen. But the latter did not keep him long, as thinking he was not ſufficiently prepoſſeſſed with the Ubiquitarian notions. Kuchlin went to Heidelberg with the ſame letter of Sturmius, where he at laſt found what he wanted; for Urſinus put him in a way of living, and going on quietly with his ſtudies. The univerſity of Heidelberg was then in a very flouriſhing ſtate. This young man made a great progreſs in ſix years; after which he was ſent to teach in the ſchool at Newſtadt [A], where, amongſt other colleagues, he had Fortunatus Crellius, and Frederic Sylburgius (b). At laſt he was admitted miniſter, and had the church of Tackenheim, which he faithfully ſerved till after the death of the elector Frederic in 1576, when Lewis, his ſucceſſor, expelled the miniſters, who would not turn Lutherans. Kuchlin, retiring into his country of Heſſe, and finding nothing there but diſcouragement, by the advice of his wife, took ſanctuary (c) in the great ark of the fugitives, I mean in Holland. He paſſed thro' Embden in 1577, and ſtaid there ſome time; from whence he was invited to Amſterdam to the office of the miniſtry [B]. He accepted it, and exerciſed it eighteen years: After which, he earneſtly engaged in the maſterſhip of a college of Divinity, which the States of Holland had erected at Leyden in 1591, and of which he had from that time the management for ſome months. It was in 1595, that he wholly left his church at Amſterdam, to fix in this college. He taught Divinity there till his death, which happened the ſecond of July 1606. He had married his two daughters to two learned men, Peter Bertius, and Feſtus Hommius (d). A collection was made, in one volume in 4to, at Geneva, in 1613, of all the theſes of Divinity, which he cauſed to be maintained at different times. Guy Patin has extreamly commended him, and a little too much, for he calls him one of the moſt learned men of his age (e).

[A] He was ſent to teach in the ſchool at Newſtadt.] The author of the Diarium Biographicum (1) ſays, that Kuchlin was rector of this ſchool; but his funeral oration, wherein ſuch a preferment would not have been omitted, ſays expreſsly, that he taught at Newſtadt, when Baſil Pithopœus was rector there. There is another fault in the ſame Diarium: it makes two different books of the Diſputationes Theologicæ ad Catecheſeos Eccleſiarum Belgicarum explanationem, and the Diſputationes de Religionis Chriſtianæ præcipuis capitibus. They are but one and the ſame book.

[B] From whence he was invited to Amſterdam to the office of the miniſtry.] Moreri did ſo little examine the authors he conſulted, that he conſidered only the firſt part of Meurſius's period. If he had read the whole period, he would have ſeen the quite contrary to what he affirms. He ſays, that Kuchlin was miniſter at Embden and Groningen in the Low-Countries; but it is certain he was not miniſter at Groningen. He had his choice of this town, and Amſterdam; and, though he had more inclination to the former than to the latter, yet he was perſuaded to chooſe the latter. Here are Meurſius's words (2). ‘ Inſtinctu uxoris quæ ‘ Belgica erat in Belgium abiit, Emdamque venit anno ‘ CIϽ IϽ LXXXVII. ubi cum operam aliquamdiu tam ‘ in ſchola quam in Eccleſia navaſſet, eodem tempore ‘ ab Amſtelodamenſibus & à Groeningenſibus evocatus ‘ fuit. Ille, cum propter Germanici idiomatis vicinitatem Groeningenſes præferendos judicaret, à clariſſimo viro D. Mensone Altingio graviſſimis rationibus permotus fuit, ut operam ſuam Amſtelodamenſi Eccleſiæ addiceret. ——— At the inſtigation of ‘ his wife, who was a Dutch woman, he went into ‘ Holland, and came to Embden in the year 1587, ‘ where having officiated ſome time both as a ſchoolmaſter and a divine, he was invited, at the ſame ‘ time, by the inhabitants of Amſterdam and Groningen. But, though he preferred thoſe of Groningen, ‘ on account of the vicinity of the German idiom, yet ‘ he was perſuaded by MENSO ALTINGIUS to ‘ ſerve the church of Amſterdam.’

It is alſo great careleſſneſs in the ſame Moreri to ſay, in general, that Kuchlin taught Divinity at Leyden. He ſhould have ſpecified, whether he did it in the quality of profeſſor of the univerſity, or of principal of the Divinity college. Meurſius would have very clearly explained it to him.

KUHLMAN (Quirinus) one of the viſionaries of the XVIIth century. He was born at Breſlaw in Sileſia, the 25th of February 1651 (a), and gave great hopes by his early progreſs (b). But his ſtudies were interrupted by a ſickneſs he had at eighteen years of age (c). He was looked upon as a dead man the third day of his diſtemper. That day he had a terrible viſion. He fancied himſelf ſurrounded with all the devils in hell, and that at mid-day, being not aſleep. This viſion was followed by another of God himſelf, encompaſſed with his ſaints, and Jeſus Chriſt in the midſt of them. He then ſaw and felt unutterable things. Two days after, he had ſtill theſe ſort of viſions (d); and, when he was cured of his diſtemper, he perceived indeed a great change as to thoſe ſights, but he always ſaw a circle of light, which attended him on his left ſide (e) He had no longer any reliſh for literature. He (f) had ſometimes ſuch extaſies, that they hindered him from ſeeing and hearing thoſe that were with with him; and he formed the deſign of abundance of books, which were ſo many methods for learning every thing, without much trouble, and perfectly. At nineteen years of age, he left his native country, where juſtice was not done him, and went to viſit the univerſities. He publiſhed a ſecond edition of his epitaphs (g), a work he had compoſed at fifteen years of age; and he put out a treatiſe of Morality (h): but, as he made an extraordinary progreſs every day, he found the ſheets unworthy of him, which the Printer ſent him, his knowledge was ſo enlarged, while the book was printing (i). He made no account of the public lectures and diſputations in the univerſity of Iëna, and would have no teacher but the Holy Ghoſt (k). His deſire of ſeeing Holland was ſo ſtrong, as not to permit him to put off his journey till he might ſee what would be the iſſue of the war, which had proved ſo miſchievous to that country in 1672. He landed at Amſterdam (l) three days before the town of Naerden was retaken (m). He went to Leyden a few days after, and was not long there, before he met with the works of Behme [A], of whom he had never heard before. The reading of that author was caſting oil into the fire; he admired that Behme had propheſied things, which no body knew of but Kuhlman himſelf (n). There was at that time, in Holland, one JOHN ROTHE, who pretended to propheſy [B]. Kuhlman contradicted the proverb, that people

[A] He was not long at Leyden before he met with the works of Behme.] Jacob Behme, or Boehme, was an Enthuſiaſt, of whom I ſhall ſome time or other ſpeak more largely. He was born in a village of Germany, near Gorlitz, in the year 1575, and, when he had learned to read and write, he was taken from ſchool, to be a Shoemaker. He began to exerciſe his trade at Gorlitz in 1594. He fell into an extaſy for the ſpace of ſeven days, in the year 1600, if we may believe what he publiſhed in a book, intituled, Aurora. This book was preſented to the magiſtrates of Gorlitz, by George Richterus, dean of the paſtors of the place, as containing many errors of Paracelſus and Wigelius; for Behme had applied himſelf to Chymiſtry in his youth. The magiſtrates ſuppreſſed this Aurora as much as they could, and ordered the author to write no more. He was ſilent ſeven years; but when he found, that the director of the electoral laboratory had recommended him to ſeveral perſons at court, as a good Chymiſt, he lifted up his head, and boldly oppoſed George Richterus, and wrote above twenty books in five years time. He died the eighteenth of November 1624 (1). Many perſons ſuffered themſelves to be infatuated with this man's viſions. Kuhlman was not the leaſt of his admirers, as it appears from this paſſage (2): ‘Ejus (Johanni Rothii) inde veſtigia legit Quirinus Kuhlmannus Sileſius, Jacobi Bohemi ſimul propugnator, Calovii vero atque Scherzeri acerrimus inſectator. Sic enim Bohemo redivivo c. 12. In Muſeo meo ſolus paucis diebus plura didici ex uno Bohemo, quam ab omnibus ævi ſapientibus ſimul auditis diſcere potuiſſem. Et in præfat. Operis ejuſdem: Inter innumerabiles viſiones accidit, ut erepto mihi ex muſeo millena luminum millia circa me exorientium intueri daretur. Plura ejuſmodi legi poſſunt apud Calovium in Anti-Bohemo, cap. 32. & ſeq. ——— Quirinus Kuhlman the Sileſian, trod in his (John Rothe's) ſteps, a follower at the ſame time of Jacob Boehme, but a ſtrenuous oppoſer of Calovius and Scherzerus. For thus he ſpeaks in his Bohemus Redivivus, ch. 12. I learned more in a few days by reading only Boehme, by myſelf, than I could from all the learned men of the age put together. And in the preface to the ſame work: Amidſt innumerable viſions, it happened, that being ſnatched out of my Muſæum, I ſaw many thouſands of lights riſing all around me. You may read more of the ſame in Calovius's Anti-Bohemus, ch. 32, &c.’

[B] JOHN ROTHE, who pretended to propheſy.] He was a native of Amſterdam, and had always led a very regular life; but he early diſcovered a melancholy temper, and that he loved to change his religion (3). He was ſo charmed with Labadie, that he became a proſelyte to his ſect, and laboured might and main to procure him new diſciples; but, ſome time after, he ſeparated from him, and ſet up for the head of a party. He ſaid, that the glorious reign of JESUS CHRIST was at hand; and he was not contented with the functions of St John the Baptiſt, I mean of being forerunner and harbinger, but pretended to be the chief director of this great work, and more than ſtandard-bearer of this new world. ‘Hic à Johanne Labadæo, novo, ut videri volebat, Eccleſiarum Reformatore, morumque rigidiore caſtigatore, ſub intenſioris devotionis ſpecie, ita primum dementatus fuit, ut totus ei adhæſerit non tantum, ſed quoſcunque poſſet, ad familiam ejus novam pertrahere totis viribus allaborarit. Verum poſtea, eo quod parem forſan non ferret, nedum ſuperiorem, quo loco Labadæum novæ devotionis artificem & præconem habere tamen tenebatur, quamdiu civitati ejus adſcriptus eſſet, ſeceſſionem ab eo molitus eſt, glorioſum in Chriſto Regnum infando ſtrepitu in terris, magno illo vexillifero, multo felicius erecturus (4).’ He boaſted of his revelations; he promiſed wonders to ſuch as would liſt themſelves under his banner; he diſturbed the church and ſtate with his libels; but nothing came to paſs of what he had foretold; and, to compleat his misfortune, he was ſhut up in the priſon of Amſterdam. See this more at large in Mr Saldenus's Narrative (5). ‘Hinc numeroſas vacillantium animarum copias colligere, ſociis ſuis aureos montes promittere, Eccleſiam Rempublicamque libellorum famoſiſſimorum plauſtris conturbare, Servum Dei Joannem Prophetamque eximium ſeipſum indigitare, Revelationum tandem extraordinariarum univerſa volumina in vulgus ſpargere, neque erubuit neque deſtitit. At quis tandem omnium horum exitus?

Mons parturivit, natuſque eſt ridiculus mus.

Miſſo enim, quod erecturum ſe eſſe gloriatus erat, vexillo, & cum De Raatiis, Someris, Richarſoniis, novi Regni deſignatis Aſſeſſoribus, redux in Patriam factus, ſolutâ ſocietate tribunitiâ & ſchiſmaticâ, patriæ urbis δεσμωτηρίῳ incluſus eſt: impetratâ ſimul pleniſſimâ facultate & poteſtate, Prophetias ſuas ludicras & ridiculas reſumendi & retractandi, periculumque faciendi, num prædicere certiuſcule forſan poſſit, quo tempore & modo ex illo ſuo ergaſterio liberandus tandem ſit, quam multa alia prænunciavit. ——— Hence he neither bluſhed, nor ceaſed to gather numerous forces of unſtable ſouls, to promiſe his companions mountains of gold, to diſturb the church and the ſtate with cart-loads of libels, to call himſelf John the ſervant of God, and a great prophet, and at laſt to diſperſe among the people whole volumes of extraordinary revelations. But what was the event of all this?

The mountain labour'd, and brought forth a mouſe.

people of the ſame trade envy one another (o) [C]; for he wrote with the greateſt humility to this John Rothe (p). He called him a man of God, and John III, the ſon of Zacharias. He begged the aſſiſtance of his knowledge, and denounced woe to thoſe, who did not attend to him [D]. He dedicated to him his Prodromus quinquennii mirabilis, printed at Leyden in 1674, which was the forerunner of two volumes he deſigned to publiſh. He intended to put into the firſt the ſtudies and diſcoveries he had made, ſince his firſt viſion, till the year 1674. We ſhould have found in it a thouſand inventions, that would have aſtoniſhed all ages (q). The latter was to have been the key of eternity, æviternity, and time. He communicated his deſign to father Kircher; and, praiſing the fine works that Jeſuit had publiſhed, particularly the Ars combinatoria, ſive ars magna ſciendi, he gave him to underſtand, that he had only made the firſt draught of what he (Kulhman) deſigned to carry farther [E]. This Jeſuit anſwered the whims of John Rothe; ſhe had a ſovereign preſervative againſt ſuch charms; ſhe would have her prophecy to be like the privileges of the gentlemen of Germany, who hold immediately of the Empire; ſhe would be propheteſs in chief, and hold only of God, without any ſubordination, without any collaterals. However it be, let us ſee what judgment ſhe made of John Rothe, and Kuhlman. 'Which (6) then particularly appeared on occaſion of a famous pretended prophet of Holland, who ſet up ſtandards, to liſt under them the twelve tribes of Iſrael, which he was to reſtore, and whom ſome honeſt people actually followed, beſides others, who, without following him, gave credit to his chimerical revelations. In ſome viſits that he made to her, ſhe eaſily diſcovered his illuſion, though he aſſured her he had a frequent commerce with the angels, and with God, and that he ſhould be for the future as a God to her, ſince God would only diſcover himſelf to her by his means. She was ſo weary of him, as to reſolve not to ſee him any more, nor to open his prophetical letters, which are at preſent ſealed up ſtill among her papers. She cautioned her friends to beware of him, becauſe undoubtedly he was not of God; for ſhe applied to God on purpoſe to know what he was; and God, to the queſtion ſhe asked, Lord, is this man thy prophet? anſwered, No; and to the ſecond queſtion, Who is he then, Lord? he anſwered her, He is a preſumptuous man, over whom the devil hath a great power. God had given her the ſame ſentiments of thoſe of his tribe, and particularly of one Quirinus Kuhlman, who lately printed a letter, which he addreſſed to this gentlewoman, to try whether he could jumble together the ſpirit of God, and the viſions of the devil, with which this falſe prophet has his head filled, roving up and down to ſeduce thoſe who deſerved to be ſeduced, by reaſon of the little eſteem they have for the truth, that comes from God (7).'

We find in Micrælius's Continuator (8), that John Rothe, being the ſon of a man, whoſe name was Zacharias, boaſted of being the forerunner of the ſon of God, with reſpect to the laſt judgment, and that, in the year 1668, he ordered, in king Melchiſedec's name, the emperor, all kings, and princes, to lay down their ſovereignties, for as much as the reign of Jeſus Chriſt was at hand: that he was examined in the year 1677, and ſhut up in priſon by order of the States of Holland and Weſt-Frieſland; and, that afterwards, being ſet at liberty, he was laughed at by every body, his prophecies being found contrary to the event (9). That author ſhould have added, that he was cured of his viſions, that he married, and became as other people. He is ſtill living whilſt I write this (10).

[C] He contradicted the proverb, that people of the ſame trade envy one another.] This was more edifying, take it altogether, than what we have ſeen ſince. We have ſeen two interpreters of the Apocalypſe write one againſt another, though they were agreed upon the pretended myſteries of the year 1689. But becauſe they met in that point of union, by different roads, each would maintain his hypotheſis, to the prejudice of his brother interpreter. This was not well; and, if the public had been leſs indulgent than it was, no body ought to have wondered at it.

[D] He denounced woe to thoſe, who did not attend to John Rothe.] He thundered out (11) 'Væ! væ! ſi prophetias ſervorum Dei ſpreveritis, ſeu Batavia olim mirabilis nunc miſerabilis ſprevit & moriens ſpernit. —— Woe! woe! if you ſhall deſpiſe the prophecies of the ſervants of God, as wretched Holland deſpiſeth, and dying continues to deſpiſe them. Hoc anno, continued he, & hujus anni una die veniet & mors & luctus & fames Babylonis Belgicæ, & igne exuretur cœleſti, quia validus eſt Dominus Deus damnans eam. —— This year, and on one day of this year, the death, grief, and famine, of Belgic Babylon will be happen, and ſhe will burnt with fire from heaven, becauſe mighty is the Lord God, who condemns her.' All this becauſe they had ſpoke much againſt John Rothe, and his viſions had been laughed at. Kuhlman maintained, that heaven had declared for that prophet, by the great ſtorm on the twenty fourth of March, 1674, and by the ruins that happened in ſeveral places the twenty firſt of May following (12). He referred to the Gazetteer, who mentioned them, and applied to his friend the famous words of an old Poet. 'O miſelli Theoſophiſtæ & Diabologi! nullis verbis, calumniis, invectionibus eluditis Prophetam, nimium Deo dilectum,

Et conjurati veniunt ad claſſica venti (13).

—— O miſerable Theoſophiſts, and diabolical ſpeakers, with no words, calumnies, or invectives, do you deceive the prophet, highly favoured of heaven, for whom the æther fights, and under whoſe banners conſpiring winds enliſt.' He apoſtrophized in particular Amſterdam (14), where the wind had torn up many trees; and forgot not the thunder, which fell upon the great church at Utrecht; but eſpecially, he cried out miracle (15), becauſe it thundered on the twenty fourth of March, the day before John Rothe left Holland, whilſt there was ſtill ſome ſnow in the ſtreets, and ice in the canals. Theſe ſtorms, thunders, and lightenings, were, according to him, the fore-runners of the deſtruction of the country; and yet from that time the affairs of the United-Provinces went on better and better every day. It is not improper to obſerve all theſe things, in order to know the predominant ſpirit of ſuch people; they make an ill uſe of every thing, and find their pretended myſteries every where. We have inſtances of it of a later date.

[E] He acquainted Father Kircher that he had only made the firſt draught (16) of what he (Kuhlman) deſigned to carry farther.] Father Kircher did not ſtand to defend his works, nor pretended to be more knowing than Kuhlman. He ſtruck ſail before him, and declared, that, having written in a human way, he pretended not to equal thoſe who wrote by inſpiration. 'Quod porro de arte combinatoria cæteriſque paradoxis meis, tum in polygraphia, tum in muſurgia, jam publicæ luci traditis meliori modo fieri potuiſſe contendis, nil moror cum SCIENTIÆ TUÆ TAM SUBLIMIS ET θεοδάτης prorſus incapacem ineptumque me eſſe humili mentis obſequio fatear. anſwered him civilly, and gave him good advice [F]; and particularly upon the deſign he had to write to the Pope [G]. The prophetical ſpirit had not made our Kuhlman inſenſible to the pleaſure of being praiſed; for there was no encomium written to him, either by thoſe, whom he had preſented with his books, or by others, but what he publiſhed in the front of his Prodromus. As for the praiſes that he beſtows upon his own writings, they are undoubtedly very great (r); but, as he declares, that all his knowledge proceeds from the incarnate wiſdom (s), I will not be poſitive, that it is a ſign of pride (t). I do not well know when he left Holland; but I have lately ſeen a book (u), wherein it is ſaid, that he wandered a long time in England, in France, and in the Eaſt [H]; and that at laſt he was burnt in Muſcovy, on the third day of October ‘ expected, pure and unmixed, among men. . . . . . I doubt not but you are able, through the wonderful capacity of your genius, to produce works greater and more admirable than the trifles I have written.’ Our prophet took this in earneſt, and was not ſenſible, that the Jeſuit laughed at him. He carefully publiſhed Father Kircher's anſwer, and uſed capital letters in the places where he thought himſelf praiſed.

[F] Father Kircher gave him good advice.] Kircher's ſecond letter makes it plain, that he knew the weakneſs of this man, and that he jeers him, when he ſays in a ſerious manner: ‘ Magna ſanè ἄπιςα καὶ ἀνεκφώνητα promittis, QUÆ UTI SUPRA OMNEM HUMANI INGENII CAPTUM LONGE CONSTITUTA SUNT, ITA EA QUOQUE A NEMINE HUC USQUE NON DICAM TENTATA, SED NEC COGITATA QUIDEM FUISSE AUDACTER AFFIRMO, atque adeo aliud mihi ſuſpicari non liceat, niſi talem te divino munere ſcientiam adeptum eſſe qualem ſacra Pagina de PROTOPLASTO & SALOMONE teſtatur: explico Adamæam, Salomonicam, verbo INFUSAM, nulli mortalium niſi Tibi ſoli notam, cæteris inexplicabilem ſcientiam. —— You promiſe wonderful things; which as they exceed all human capacity, ſo I boldly affirm they never were attempted, or ſo much as thought of, by any one before: and therefore I can only ſuſpect, that, by a divine gift, you have acquired ſuch a knowledge, as the ſcripture aſcribes to Adam and Solomon; an Adamic, Solomean, in a word infuſed, knowledge, known to no mortal but yourſelf, and inexplicable to all the world beſide.’ But what follows is charitable advice. All things well conſidered, Father Kircher adviſed him to keep that infuſed knowledge to himſelf, and not to expoſe himſelf to the railleries of an age ſo ſcoffing as this is. Indeed, our age ſeems to be more terrible to the Viſionaries than the preceeding ones. The biſhop of Meaux has touched upon it in one of his books; but I queſtion whether at the bottom the appearances are not fallacious (17). ‘ Quicquid ſit, they are Kircher's words, ego ſane conſiderato rei non parvi momenti negotio, pro ſingulari quo te proſequor affectu, etiam atque etiam quam obnixiſſimè contenderim, ne hanc tuam noviter obtentam ſcientiam Centraliſque abyſſi profunditatem ulli vana quadam jactantia oſtenderes, ne Tertii poſt Adamum Salomonis dicam & cum riſu nomen incurras. Potiſſimum hoc ſæculo ſarcaſtico, quo Criticaſtrorum, Thraſonum, & Sycophantarum non parvus eſt numerus qui aliud non moliuntur, quam ut glorioſos aliorum labores canino dente rodere, ſannis ludibriiſque exponere non ceſſent. ——— Whatever it be, the friendſhip I have for you induces me, upon mature deliberation, earneſtly to adviſe you, not to boaſt of this newly acquired ſcience, leſt you be laughed at by the name of the Third Solomon ſince Adam. Eſpecially in this ſarcaſtical age, in which wou'd-be critics, braggadocios, and ſycophants are ſo numerous, who make it their buſineſs to ſnarl at the glorious labours of others, and to expoſe them to mockery and laughter.’ And, to make greater impreſſion by his remonſtrances, he was pleaſed to tell him what had happened to himſelf; which was, that he had found by experience, that a man expoſed himſelf to many evils, when he raſhly and inconſiderately ſets up for an author. Quanta malorum Ilias ex inconſiderata ſcriptione reſultet, ego jam 40 annorum ſpatio, quo in hoc omnium gentium & nationum theatro, meam utut poſſum perſonam ago, frequenti experientia comperi.

[G] . . . . and in particular upon his deſign . . . . to write to the Pope.] Though Kuhlman fancied, that he was the man promiſed by Drabicius, and though he knew, that Drabicius's promiſes concerned the ruin of the Roman Antichriſt, yet he had a mind to write to the Pope. He thereupon conſulted Father Kircher, and expreſſed to him the paſſionate deſire he had of communicating to the ſovereign Pontif his great ſecrets for the good of Chriſtendom. A te, Reverendiſſime Pater, peterem ne denegares mihi occaſionem præbere, qua Pontificis Maximi manibus propriis quædam Epiſtola à me inſignum obſervantiæ tranſmittenda traderetur . . . . . Vellem enim arcana ponderoſiſſima ad Chriſtianæ Eccleſiæ commodum ſingulariter proficua, candido ore ſtiloque candido, tam admirabili tempeſtate Pontifici communicare amore Reip. Chriſtianæ impulſus. I do not know the particulars of the good advice, the Jeſuit gave him upon this ſubject; he left them out of the anſwer he received; for that paſſage was printed in the following manner: ‘ Quod denique de litteris ad ſummum Pontificem dandis, eidemque propriis manibus à me conſignandis Te cogitare ſcribis . . . . . quæ ſcribo ut quanta cautela & circumſpectione Romæ procedendum ſit cognoſcas. —— As to your deſign of writing to the Pope . . . . which I tell you, that you may know with what caution and circumſpection affairs are to be carried on at Rome.’ But he did not ſtrike out that part, wherein he was told, that his great work, dedicated to the Pope, would be applauded and admired, provided he left nothing in it, that might offend the cenſors of books, and took care not to pretend to an inſpired knowledge ſilentio quoque ſuppreſſa divinitus Tibi inſpirata ſcientia. This laſt counſel, though good in itſelf, was the leaſt likely to be reliſhed; for it is by boaſting of a divine illumination, that one may ſtrike the people with aſtoniſhment (18). Let us ſpeak a word concerning the knavery or folly of falſe prophets. About the time that Kuhlman was ready to write very reſpectfully to the Pope, for the good of Chriſtendom, he wrote to others, that he hoped to ſee quickly the deſtruction of the Papacy. This is the plain meaning of theſe words of Kuhlman, according to the ſtile of our Viſionaries. ‘ O Pontifex Clemens X! an ſigilli mei duplicatum Quinarium X excedes, mox orbis aſpiciet univerſus? In Clemente I Petro & Lino jure præterito Epiſcopatus Romanus incepit: in Clemente X quid futurum ſit tempus evolvet. ——— O Pope Clement X! will the whole world hereafter ſee, whether you will exceed the double Quinary X of my ſeal? The biſhopric of Rome, Peter and Linus juſtly omitted, began in Clement I: what will happen under Clement X, time will ſhew.’ I could name a man (19), who has been extreamly vexed, becauſe the public has been informed, that, whilſt he furiouſly inveighed againſt Lewis XIV, he wrote ſome letters to a duke, full of flattery towards that prince.

H [H] He wandered a long time in England, in France, and in the Eaſt.] I have lately found many little books of this Enthuſiaſt, printed at London at his own expence, ſome in 1681, and others in 1682. The firſt of them dated from London the 24th of June, 1681, is dedicated to Lewis XIV, with this familiar inſcription, Salve Ludovice XIV. Rex Liligere, ſalve. The author exhorts this prince to aſſert the Regale, which was the talk of that time, and acquaints him, that Drabicius had promiſed him the city of Rome (20). We find in this collection a letter, which he wrote from Lubec to Father Kircher, in February, 1676, De ſapientia infuſa Adamæa, Salomonæaque; and a piece, which he inſcribed to Mahomet IV, De converſione Turcarum. It is dated from Conſtantinople the firſt of Auguſt, 1678. The author ſets his myſtical ſeal to it at London, the firſt of May, 1681, and ſignified to the Sultan, that the comet, which appeared the preceeding winter, preſaged the converſion of all nations; and he congratulated his highneſs on having appointed a faſt throughout his empire.

October 1689, for ſome predictions actually ſeditious (x). I do not know whether he cauſed his medal to be ſtruck, as ſome other new prophets have done; but the ſame book informs me, that his effigies came out, under which there are ſo many titles given him [I], that I believe the eaſtern monarchs hardly give themſelves more. If it be thought, that I ſpeak too ſeriouſly, and too copiouſly of him, I deſire it may be known, that there is a ſeriouſneſs, which upon ſuch things is worſe than jeſting; and it is requiſite the world ſhould be informed of the prodigious variety of Fanaticiſm. It is a more contagious evil than is imagined. The reading of Drabicius compleated the ruin of Kuhlman [K]. Thoſe, who have not the Prodromus of the latter, need only read three or four pages of Morhoſius's Polyhiſtor (y), where they will ſee the magnificent promiſes and vaſt projects of this Enthuſiaſt.

For the reſt, he was not one of thoſe inſpired men, who pretend to continence; he was married twice, if we may call a marriage, and not a concubinage, the commerce that is between a man and a woman, without obſerving the formalities preſcribed by the canon and civil laws. He underſtood well enough how to trick people out of their money, and he wrote to ſome perſons in a magiſterial and prophetic tone, that it was neceſſary for the advancing of the new kingdom of God, that they ſhould ſend him ſuch or ſuch a ſum, in default of which he threatned them with the moſt terrible puniſhments the avenging hand of the moſt High could inflict. Van Helmont was one of thoſe, who received ſuch letters; but he was wiſer than to pay any regard to them (z).

'Aſpexiſti ante aliquot menſes, O Capitanee grandis ab Oriente Solis, Cometam in-audite-ingentem, NUNTIUM REALEM REGNI JESUELITARUM, hoc eſt Reſtitutionis Populorum omnium ad Deum Unicum & Triunum. O! well is thee, that thou haſt turned thy mind before God, and, by proclaiming a general faſt throughout thy empire, haſt begun to fulfil the words of the lord to the prophet Drabicius:* If the Chriſtians ſhall refuſe to perform my will in deſtroying the kingdom of Antichriſt, and corrupt doctrine and idolatry, the Turks and Tartars ſhall do it, to the diſgrace of the Chriſtians; which will be an horrour to my angels, and to men.' He wrote to the Aga of Smyrna, the twenty eighth of June 1678 (21). Some months after, he dedicated to the Sieur Van Dam the myſtery of Kotterus's twenty one weeks, in which he declared, that the houſe of Auſtria was about to loſe the Imperial crown. By his piece intituled De magnalibus naturæ ultimo ævo reſervatis, inſcribed, Ad adeptos magoſque orbis terrarum, at Geneva the thirtieth of January 1682, it appears, that he was going into the Holy Land. His Arcanum microcoſmicum is dated from Paris the firſt of November 1681.

[I] There are ſo many titles given him.] Here is what I find in a book I have quoted (22): In effigie quam Andreas Lippius edidit, ita celebratur:

Alter Scaligerum, Taubmannus, Grotius, Opitz!
Barthius, Iſcanus, Gryphius, Muretus, Eraſmus!
Henoch, Joſephus, Davides, Joſhua, Moſes, Elias, Daniel, Salomon, Eliſa, Johannes!
Cyrus, Alexander, Conſtantin, Karl, Fridericus!
Liligerus, Juvenis, Frigerans, Artiſta, Sophata:
O Pater hæc tua ſunt! Hæc ad te cuncta reflexit.

In the print publiſhed by Andreas Lipſius, he is thus celebrated:

Another Scaliger, Taubmna, Grotius, Opitz, Barthius, &c.

A little before, it is ſaid, that he ſometimes called himſelf LUDOVICUS LUDOVICI. The catalogue of his writings, as Mr Witte gives it, does not comprehend the Epiſtolæ Theoſophicæ Leidenſes; but then, it contains nine letters written to Father Kircher; beſides Epiſtolarum Londinenſium Catholica ad Wickleſio-Waldenſes, Huſſitas, Zwinglianos, Lutheranos, Calvinianos; beſides in High Dutch, De cæleſti oſculo amoris, ſive cogitationes poeticæ ex Cantico Canticorum. Diſcurſus ſacri & profani de pulcerrimis virtutum floſculis. Mortalitas immortalis, ſive centum epitaphia. Caduceator Hiſtoricus. Neo-Behmius illuſtratus, &c.

[K] The reading of Drabicius compleated the ruin of Kuhlman.] Kuhlman found in Drabicius's prophecies two paſſages, which he applied to himſelf (23). The firſt contains theſe words (24). 'Qui legit, intelligat! cum numerabitur QUINQUE finem accipient filii contumaciæ, conſpecto me poteſtatem habere in cœlos, terram, mare. —— Let him, that readeth, underſtand: when FIVE ſhall be numbered, the ſons of contumacy ſhall have an end, it being ſeen that I have power over the heavens, the earth, and the ſea.' Here follows the other (25): 'Abundantia benedictonis Te (Drabicium) parata expectat Wratiſlaviæ, ac ſi oculis videas tuis. —— An abundance of bleſſing attends thee (Drabicius) at Wratiſlaw, as tho' you ſaw with your eyes.' Add to theſe two paſſages, that which he took from the Aſtrologico-Prophetical Prognoſtic, written by Paul Felgenhaver in 1647, and publiſhed in 1655. 'Quantus error ſit pacis ſpes, illud nobis duplicatus QUINARIUS demonſtrabit, cum venerit poſt paucos dies. —— How ill grounded are the hopes of peace, the double Quinary will ſhew, when it ſhall come after a few days.' He imagined, that he was that double Quinarius, whom Felgenhaver had promiſed, being convinced of it by two reaſons; firſt, becauſe his name was Quirinus, ſecondly, becauſe, in 1674, it was five years ſince he had received an infuſed ſcience (26). He therefore believed, that then the time promiſed by Drabicius was come, cum numerabitur quinque, finem accipient filii contumaciæ; ſo that he hoped quickly to throw down Antichriſt and Babylon with his pen. Let us hear the Hallelujah's, which he ſung before hand: 'Corruet Antichriſtus proprio ſuo judicio, & Babylon excidium ſuum properabit cum admiratione populorum. Hallel. Quem Cæſares armis potentibus non debellavere, juvenis inermis debellabit in virtute Jeſu Chriſti prælians. Hall. Stant Mercatores Antichriſti horrore procul trementes, deflent interitum ſuum inſperatum ab inſperato timore futurorum. Hall. (27). —— Antichriſt ſhall fall by his own judgment, and Babylon ſhall haſten it's ruin with the admiration of the people. Hallelujah! whom the emperors with powerful arms have not conquered, an unarmed youth ſhall ſubdue, fighting in the ſtrength of the Lord Jeſus. Hallelujah! the merchants of Antichriſt ſtand at a diſtance, trembling with horror; they lament their unexpected deſtruction thro' an unexpected fear of what is to come. Hallelujah!' If I had not read this, I ſhould hardly have believed, that the extravagance of Fanaticiſm could have gone ſo far.

KYRIANDER (William) a German Civilian, after he had begun the ſtudy of the Civil-law in Germany, continued it in France and at Padua, and went afterwards to Venice, to add the practice to the theory, by frequenting the bar (a). He there undertook the tranſlation of a book of Leander Albertus [A], which was printed at Cologn in 1567. You will find in Moreri, that he was ſyndic of Triers, and that he publiſhed the Annals of that town [B]: But you will not find there, that he changed his religion, and that his book was much diſparaged by the Jeſuits upon this account [C].

[A] He undertook the tranſlation of a book of Leander Albertus.] This work contains the deſcription of Italy, and has not been deſpiſed by the learned. Read Voſſius, chapter 12, book 3, De Hiſtoricis Latinis (1), and La Popeliniere, pag. 414 of the Hiſtoire des Hiſtoires. Kyriander made uſe of three Italian editions of this work, which he tranſlated into Latin; but I wonder he ſays nothing of the edition, to which was added the Deſcription of the Iſlands that are near Italy. That edition was printed at Venice, appreſſo Ludouico de gli Auanzi, in the year 1561, in 4to. The tranſlator is very much to be blamed for not having made uſe of it, and for not adding to his work the Deſcription of the Iſlands.

[B] He publiſhed the Annals of the town of Triers.] It is a Folio printed at Deuxponts in the year 1603. Michael Hertzius does not mention this edition. He only mentions that of 1625, and pretends, that thoſe Annals begin with the year of the world 966 (2). Which carries them up to above ſeven hundred years before the deluge. Zeiller (3) might have taught him to ſay 1966, and not 966. In the ſecond Holland edition of Moreri's Dictionary, there is 1066; which goes back to near 600 years before Noah.

[C] He changed his religion, and his book was much diſparaged by the Jeſuits upon that account.] Maſenius ſpeaks of it thus: Kyriander res Trevirenſium, ut fidem Deo Principique ſuo violarat, perverſè perſecutus eſt (4).

LABE (Loysa) a courtezan of Lyons, has been reckoned among the French authors, by la Croix du Maine, and du Verdier Vau-Privas. She flouriſhed at Lyons, in the reign of Henry II, in 1555 (a). Her works were printed there the ſame year [A]. She did not reſemble the courtezans in all things; for, if ſhe was, on the one hand, of their humour, in that ſhe would be well paid for her favours, ſhe had, on the other hand, ſome regard for learned men, which others have not; for ſhe beſtowed her favours on them gratis. Her character will be better known by the paſſage I ſhall quote [B].

[A] Her works were printed at Lyons, in 1555.] They contain a dialogue in French proſe, intituled, Le debat de Folie & d'Honneur (A debate between Folly and Honour), and ſeveral poems of her own invention (1); beſides the writings of ſeveral poets in her praiſe, in Greek, Latin, Italian, and French verſe (2).

[B] Her character will be better known by the paſſage I ſhall quote.] I make no alteration in du Verdier's words. 'Loyſa Labe, ſays he (3), a courtezan 'of Lyons, (otherwiſe called the handſome Ropemaker's 'wiſe, being married to an honeſt Ropemaker) managed a horſe very well; for which reaſon, the 'gentlemen, who had acceſs to her, called her captain 'Loys; ſhe was a woman of a good and chearful 'wit, and tolerably handſome. She obligingly entertained in her houſe lords, gentlemen, and other 'perſons of merit, with diſcourſe, muſic, both vocal 'and inſtrumental, in which ſhe was admirably well 'skilled, reading of good Latin, Italian, and Spaniſh 'books, wherewith her cloſet was curiouſly furniſhed, and with exquiſite ſweet-meats. In fine, ſhe 'communicated to them privately the moſt ſecret 'pieces ſhe had: in a word, ſhe was free of her body 'to ſuch as paid for it: however not to all, not to 'mechanics, and men of mean condition, whatever 'money they might offer her. She loved learned 'men above all, who were ſo much in her favour, 'that thoſe of her acquaintance were preferred before 'any great lord, to whom ſhe would rather do a 'favour gratis, than to another for a great many 'crowns; which is contrary to the cuſtom of thoſe 'of her trade and condition.' This paſſage has been quoted in the continuation of the Critique Generale de l'Hiſtoire du Calviniſme (4), with the addition of this reflexion (5): 'Demoſthenes would have been glad, 'if the courtezan Lais had been like this; he would 'not have made a voyage to Corinth in vain, nor 'experienced,

And is no better dealt with than a ſot.

LABERIUS (Decimus) a Roman knight and a Poet, had an admirable faculty at playing the part of a Mime. He durſt not refuſe Julius Cæſar, who was deſirous he ſhould come upon the ſtage to act one of thoſe pieces, tho' this was very unbecoming his condition, and his age. He excuſed himſelf the beſt he could in his prologue [A], and maliciouſly ſlipped in ſome ſtrokes againſt Cæſar [B]; which determined that

[A] He excuſed himſelf the beſt he could in the prologue.] Macrobius has preſerved it to us, and very judiciouſly obſerves, that a maſter, even when he intreats, uſes a ſort of authority, which there is no reſiſting (1). 'Laberium asperæ libertatis equitem 'Romanum Cæſar quingentis millibus invitavit, ut '*prodiret in ſcenam, & ipſe ageret mimos quos ſcriptitabat. Nullus timor, vis nulla, nulla auctoritas
Movere potuit in juventa de ſtatu:
Ecce in ſenecta ut facile labeſecit loco
Viri excellentis mente clemente edita
Submiſſa placide blandiloquens oratio?
Etenim ipſi Dî negare cui nihil potuerunt,
Hominem me denegare quis poſſet pati? &c (2).

'Cæſar prevailed upon Laberius, by a large gratuity 'to appear upon the ſtage, and act a part in his 'own farces. But power, not only when it invites 'but when it intreats, compels. And therefore Laberius excuſed himſelf in the prologue, as being 'compelled by Cæſar, in the following manner:

Neceſſity, which many would avoid, but few can, whither has it driven me, almoſt in the laſt ſtage of my life? whom neither ambition, nor bribes, nor fear; whom no power, no authority, could influence, in youth; behold how eaſily the courteous invitation of a great man unſettles! Summum ad gradum cum claritatis veneris, Cecidi ego, cadet qui ſequitur, laus eſt publica (6).

In his next new Mime he inſerted theſe verſes :

It is impoſſible always to excel : when you reach the ſummit of perfection, it is with difficulty you will keep your footing, and, when you deſcend, you will fall. I am falling, he who follows me, will fall ; praiſe belongs to the public.

Here follows a paſſage out of Aulus Gellius (7). ‘ C. autem Cæſarem ita Laberii maledicentia & arrogantia offendebat, ut acceptiores & probatiores ſibi eſſe Publii quam Laberii Mimos prædicaret. —— Cæſar was ſo offended at the inſolent behaviour of Laberius, that he declared he preferred the Mimes, of Publius to thoſe of Laberius.’

[D] He was rallied by Cicero that day, and he repaid him in his own coin.] After Laberius had acted his piece, Cæſar preſented him with a ring, and gave him leave to retire. Laberius went to look for a place among the knights ; but they ordered it ſo, that he could find none. Cicero, ſeeing him perplexed, ſaid to him, ‘ Recepiſſem te, niſi anguſte ſederem ‘ I would make way for you, were I not crowded.’ Mirum, ‘ anſwered the other, ſi anguſte ſedes, qui ſoles duabus ſellis ſedere (8). — It is ſtrange you ſhould be crowded who generally ſit upon two ſeats.’ Cicero killed two birds with one ſtone. He laughed at Laberius, and at the many ſenators of a new creation, ſimul & illum reſpuens, & in novum ſenatum jocatus, cujus numerum Cæſar ſupra fas auxerat (9). But the anſwer that was made him, taxed him with trimming (10), that is with neither being a good friend to Pompey, nor Cæſar. Cicero male audiebat, tanquam nec Pompeio certus amicus, nec Cæſari, ſed utriuſque adulator (11). I ſhall obſerve, by the by, that Macrobius has confounded the places of the knights with thoſe of the ſenators : he thought, that the ſenators ſate upon what was called the fourteen benches, which is a miſtake. ‘ Quod Cicero dixit, niſi anguſte ſederem, ſcomma fuit in C. Cæſarem, qui in ſenatum paſſim tam multos admittebat, ut eos quatuordecim gradus capere non poſſent (12). —— Cicero, in ſaying, if I did not ſit too cloſe, reflected upon C. Cæſar, who admitted ſo many into the ſenate, that the fourteen benches could not contain them.’ This was the place of the knights ſince the law of Roſcius Otho.

Sic libitum vano qui nos diſtinxit Othoni (13)

[E] His verſes were not ſo much deſpiſed by Horace, as it is thought.] Here are the words of Horace :

Nec tamen hoc tribuens, dederim quoque cætera, nam ſic
Et Laberi Mimos, ut pulcra poëmata mirer (14).

Nor, granting this, the reſt I ſhall allow ;
So might Laberius' Mimes, obſcenely gay,
For perfect pieces, in my judgment paſs.

Mr Dacier's note runs thus : ‘ Horace does not here condemn Laberius abſolutely, nor ſo much as cenſure his works ; but only ſpeaks by compariſon. Laberius's Mimes were agreeable ; but they were not fine and perfect poems. Nor were they made to that end ; for the Mimes had only obſcene jeſts in them. For which reaſon Ovid calls them Mimos obſcœna jocantes, and they were only deſigned to make people laugh. If Julius Scaliger had well underſtood Horace's meaning, he would not have condemned the judgment, that Horace makes of Laberius's Mimes (15).’

[F] Moreri has committed ſome faults.] I. The Prænomen of Laberius is not Decius but Decimus. II. He ſurvived Julius Cæſar ſo little a time, that there was no need of ſaying, he lived in the reign of Auguſtus. III. It is not true that he received preſents from Auguſtus. IV. And that Macrobius ſays it. V. It is falſe, that Cæſar made him a Roman knight. See what Laberius ſays in the prologue of the farce acted by him in complaiſance to that emperor.

Ergo bis tricenis annis actis ſine nota,
Eques Romanus Lare egreſſus meo
Domum revertar mimus (16).

Which is an undeniable proof, that he was a Roman knight independently of Cæſar. That which deceived Moreri, with many others (17), is, that Cæſar, at the end of the play, gave a ring to this farce-player, as we learn from Macrobius; but it is eaſy to find in that very place a proof of the juſtice of my cenſure. Here is the whole paſſage: ‘ Deinde cum Laberius in fine ludorum annulo honoratus à Cæſare è veſtigio in quatuordecim ad ſpectandum tranſiit, violato ordine, & cum detrectatus eſt EQUES Romanus, & cum mimus remiſſus, ait Cicero prætereunti Laberio, & ſedile quærenti, recepiſſem te niſi anguſte ſederem (18). ——— At the end of the games, Laberius, being honoured with a ring by Cæſar, would have taken his ſeat on the fourteen benches, among the Roman knights as a ſpectator; but, being refuſed admiſſion, and looklng about for a ſeat, Cicero ſaid to him, as he paſſed by him; Laberius, I would make room for you, were I not crowded.’ It is evident, that Macrobius ſays, that the order of the knights was diſhonoured two manner of ways. I. Becauſe a place was refuſed to a Roman knight. II. Becauſe a farce-player was ſent from the ſtage to the place, where the Roman knights ſate. From whence I neceſſarily conclude, that Laberius owed not his knighthood to the favour of Julius Cæſar. All that can be ſaid, is, that he diſgraced himſelf by his complaiſance in acting on the ſtage; and that he was re-habilitated by Julius Cæſar. The ring, that he received, may be looked upon as a new patent of nobility: but this does not excuſe Moreri. Seneca confirms what we have ſaid (19).

LABOURLOTTE (Claudius) one of the braveſt captains of his age, owed his fortune to his courage; for his birth was ſo mean, that it is ſtill a diſpute, whether he was a native of Lorrain, or of Franche Comté (a). It is ſaid, that he had been Barber to count Charles of Mansfeld [A]; and that he did him a ſignal piece of ſervice [B]. He went thro' all the military degrees, till he was made commander of the Walloon troops in the ſervice of the king of Spain (b). He was more fortunate than judicious [C]; for he never more willingly engaged in an enterprize, than when it was very dangerous (c). He was wounded on ſeveral occaſions [D], and at laſt he was killed with a muſket-ſhot, the 24 of July 1600, whilſt he was making an intrenchment betwixt

[A] It is ſaid, that he had been Barber to count Charles of Mansfeld.] This is ſaid by Bongars, in a letter written to Camerarius, the ſixth of Auguſt 1596, in which he ſent him ſome news about the ſiege of Hulſt. ‘ Some, ſays he (1), write, that Labourlotte has been killed in it (2); that man ſo famous for his bravery and courage. He was formerly Barber to count Charles of Mansfeld, who died in Hungary. The cardinal chiefly made uſe of Labourlotte's boldneſs, and Rone's counſel (3).’ He, who, in 1693, publiſhed the hiſtory of archduke Albert, does not ſay, that Labourlotte was a Barber; but he ſays nothing that can prove the contrary. ‘ His birth, ſays he (4), reſembles that of great men, which is frequently diſputed: Lorrain will have him to be her's; Burgundy claims him as her's. The name Claudius favours the Burgundians. Whatever country he be of, it is certain he is come of a good family. The many enemies he has had, are a demonſtration of his extraordinary merit. Envy, like the thunder, paſſes over ſhrubs, and falls upon lofty trees. They ſay he was of mean extraction, and that he handled the razor and the lancet, before he handled the ſword and the pike: but the unprejudiced ſpeak otherwiſe. They ſay, that indeed he knew good remedies for wounds; but that he was led to his ſtudy by curioſity and charity, and not by neceſſity.’ When d'Aubigné (5) relates, that Labourlotte was killed in a ſkirmiſh in the counterſcarp of fort Iſabella, which he had recruited and victualled, he adds, ‘ that he was lamented by the arch-duke, and his ſuperiors, and not by his equals; who, enraged with envy, could not bear, that merit ſhould make a colonel of a country Barber.

[B] . . . . and that he did him a ſignal piece of ſervice.] He delivered him from the trouble of a moſt unlucky marriage. An author, whom I have cited, will not believe it. His words are: ‘ It is ſaid, that he got into the favour of Mansfeld, by ridding him of his troubleſome wife; but I believe nothing of it; he was too honeſt a man to be guilty of ſo baſe an action (6).’ The action would certainly be very baſe, whatever pleaſure it might have given the count. What makes me ſay, that the incredulity of this writer might be ill grounded, is, that Grotius has hinted at that action; an evident ſign, that he did not think the ſtory that was ſpread to be a vain report. His words are worth relating, as informing us of the merit of the deceaſed, with ſome circumſtances well expreſſed. ‘ Huc (7) quoque ſe Claudius Burlota tranſtulerat, bonamque & extremam navavit operam; trajectus globo vir nobilis audaciæ, Lotharingus ortu, curandis olim vulneribus vitam toleraverat: mox per facinus haud honeſtum conciliatus Mansfeldio ferebatur, dictus uxorem ejus ſuſtuliſſe: ſed nactus honores, ita ſe geſſerat, ut mereri majora ſemper judicaretur, quo mors ejus nec luctu apud ducem, nec apud ipſius novitati invidentes gaudio caruit (8). —— Hither likewiſe came Claudius Labourlotte, a man of remarkable boldneſs, and who had formerly lived by practiſing Chirurgery: afterwards he is ſaid to have got into the favour of Mansfeld by a diſhonourable action, I mean, by ridding him of his wife: but, being advanced to honours, he ſo behaved himſelf, that he was always thought to deſerve more; for which reaſon the general lamented his death, but thoſe, who envied his riſing greatneſs, rejoiced at it.’

[C] He was more fortunate than judicious.] Here is what Father Gallucci ſays of him (9): ‘ Animoſus magis quam cautus, accerſere ſæpe non expectare mortem viſus eſt. —— He was more brave than prudent, and was often ſeen to ſeek death, rather than expect it.’ ‘ He would undertake any thing, and was terrified with no danger. He began a fight as if he was ſure of the victory. The bold attempts were committed to him. They, who did not care to be put upon ſuch hazards, or ſaw themſelves eclipſed by his ſucceſs, called him a fortunate fool, hardy fellow (10).’

[D] He was wounded on ſeveral occaſions.] At the ſiege of Noion, in the year 1593; at that of Ardres, in 1596; at that of Hulſt, the ſame year; and at the battle of Newport, in 1600. See Father Gallucci (11): I believe he is miſtaken as to the laſt wound. I have met with no other hiſtorian, that mentions it: and beſides, they all ſay, that Labourlotte, a few days after the battle, brought a conſiderable ſuccour to Newport, which contributed very much to the raiſing of the ſiege, that prince Maurice had laid to that place. As to the wound at Hulſt, it was not mortal, as Bongars will have it. What I have cited from him, in the firſt remark, was written the ſixth of Auguſt 1596: he was not undeceived twenty days after; for he affirms, in a letter of the twenty ſeventh of Auguſt, in the ſame year, that Labourlotte was dead of his wounds (12). Thus you ſee how the very miniſters of princes are ſubject to ſpread falſe news, and not quickly to know the falſity of them. They ought to be more circumſpect in that point, than the perſon I am ſpeaking of, whoſe ability otherwiſe deſerves great encomiums. But when we follow him cloſe, we cannot forbear ſaying, that he too lightly believed agreeable news, and was too haſty in imparting them to his friends. Here is another proof of it, taken from the ſame letter, in which he affirmed, that Labourlotte was dead: You will probably rejoice, when you hear, that the king of Spain is dead, and that the Spaniards will not receive his ſon for their king, as being born of an inceſtuous marriage, Rideas etiam cum intelliges Regem Hiſp. mortuum, & filium repudiari ab Hiſpanis natum nuptiis inceſtis (13). This is what he wrote to his friend, the ſixth of Auguſt 1596. At that time all the news diſadvantageous to Spain was as eaſily believed, as now (14) thoſe that are to the diſadvantage of France.

[E] He was killed the twenty fourth of July 1600.] The author of the hiſtory of archduke Albert ſays the twentyfifth of July, at page 138; but, at page 264, he inſerts inſerts Labourlotte's epitaph, which ſays the twenty fourth. This epitaph is uſeful to the hiſtory of this brave man; and therefore I ſhall ſet it down. ' He ' is buried at Lopogne, with this epitaph; here lies ' the noble and illuſtrious lord, Meſſire Claudius Labourlotte, knight, and counſellor of war to the king, ' colonel of twelve companies of Luxemburghers, lord ' of Bernſtein, Boncour, La Vallée, Lopogne, and ' Baſi. He was killed at fort Iſabella near Oſtend, ' the twenty fourth of July in the year 1600 (15).' I do not think this author has been a good tranſcriber; for, to give an epitaph faithfully, the leaſt letter ought not to be changed. The barbariſms and ſolecisms muſt be retained, if there be any; or the reader muſt be told, that one gives only the ſubſtance of it. Here is the epitaph, as the baron Le Roi gives it (16): I believe it differs very little from the original: Icy giſt noble & illuſtre Seigneur Meſſire Claude de Labourlotte, Chevalier & du Conſeille de guerre, Colonel de douze compagnies Luxembourgeoiſes, Seigneur de Berleſtein, Seigneur de Boncourt, La Vallée, Loppoigne, Baſy: lequel à eſté tué lez Oſtende pour le ſervice de ſa Majeſté le 24, de Julette 1600. Priez Dieu pour ſon ame.

[F] He ſhared in the barbarous actions, which the troops of the Amirante commited .... in 1598.] Their extortions and barbarities ſtrike with horror thoſe who read them in the hiſtories. See the deſcription that d'Aubigné has given of them in few words, in the nineteenth chapter of the fifth book of his third volume. Some lords ſaying to Labourlotte, adds he (17), that the emperor and the German princes would reſent ſuch outrages, he ſhewed them a cow, and ſaid, As much as that beaſt. Note, that the Amirante, who commanded thoſe troops, was Francis de Mendoſa, whom I have already mentioned (18).

[G] He left a ſon.] My author ſhould have ſaid, that Labourlotte left two ſons, Erneſtus and Francis; the firſt was lord of Loppoigne, and died without iſſue; the latter was a monk, and ſo the ſucceſſion of their father fell to their ſiſter. See the Topography of the Walloon Brabant (19).

LACYDES, a Greek philoſopher, born at Cyrene, was the diſciple of Arceſilas, and his ſucceſſor in the academy (a). Some pretend, that he followed not his maſter's doctrine; but I think they are miſtaken [A]. He was poor in his younger days; nevertheleſs he became famous by his diligent application to ſtudy: Beſides, he had a very engaging way of diſcourſing (b). He taught in a garden (c), which Attalus king of Pergamus had made [B]. He anſwered that prince, who ſent for him to court, that the pictures of kings were to be looked on at a diſtance (d). He taught Philoſophy twenty ſix years (e), and reſigned his employment to two of his ſcholars (f). He imitated his maſter in a very commendable thing, which was, that he loved to do good, without caring it ſhould be known [C] The love a Gooſe had for him is very remarkable [D]. He died of a palſy by drinking too much [E]. What Numenius relates of him, looks altogether like a pleaſant tale [F.] Moreri has committed very groſs

[A] Some pretend, that he followed not his maſter's doctrine; but I believe they are miſtaken.] Diogenes Laërtius affirms, that Arceſilas was the founder of the ſecond academy, and that Lacydes was the founder of the third. Ἀρκεσίλαός ἐστιν ὁ τῆς μέσης Ἀκαδημίας κατάρξας πρῶτος. Arceſilas primus mediam invexit Academiam. . . . (1). Λακύδης ἐστὶν ὁ τῆς νέας Ἀκαδημίας κατάρξας. Lacydes novæ Academiæ princeps fuit (2). I had rather believe Cicero, who affirms that Lacydes retained Arceſilas's method, and that Carneades reformed it. ' Cujus (Arceſilæ) ' primo non admodum probata ratio .... proxime à ' Lacyde ſolo RETENTA eſt: poſt autem conficta à ' Carneade, qui eſt quartus ab Arceſila (3). Moſt authors agree, that Carneades was the founder of the third academy: they therefore ſuppoſe, that Lacydes adhered to Arceſilas's doctrine without any innovation. See the remark [A] of the article CARNEADES.

[C] He loved to do good, without caring it ſhould be known.] This was one of Arceſilas's good qualities, as we have ſeen in the remark [I] of his article. Here follows a paſſage of Plutarch (8): ' and what ' Philoſophy tells us, that children uſually reſemble ' their parents, we find in ſome meaſure verified in ' Arceſilas and Lacydes, one of his diſciples (9). For ' when Cephiſocrates was impeached of high-treaſon, ' and Lacydes, with ſeveral others of his friends, ſtood ' by him at his trial, the council for the ſtate deſired, ' that the priſoner's ring, wherein lay the principal evidence againſt him, might be produced in court; ' which Cephiſocrates hearing, dropt it ſoftly off his ' finger; and Lacydes, obſerving it, ſet his foot upon ' it, and hid it. Whereupon being acquitted, and going afterwards to pay his reſpects and thanks to his ' judges, one of them, who it ſeems, had taken notice ' of what had paſſed, told him, that his thanks were ' due to Lacydes, and ſo related the whole ſtory, ' when yet Lacydes had never mentioned it.'

[D] The love a gooſe had for him is very remarkable.] She followed him every where, within doors and without, in the day time, and in the night time. Poteſt & ſapientiæ videri intellectus his (anſeribus) eſſe. Ita comes perpetuo adhæſiſſe Lacydi Philoſopho dicitur, nuſquam ab eo, non in publico, non in balneis, non noctu, non interdiu digreſſus (10). When ſhe died, Lacydes made as noble a funeral for her, as if ſhe had been his ſon or his brother (11).

[E] He died of a palſy, by drinking too much.] Ἡ τελευτὴ δὲ αὐτῷ παράλυσις ἐκ πολυποσίας. Mortuus eſt autem ex Paralyſi, quam ex immodica potione contraxerat (12). Athenæus (13) tells us, that Lacydes and another Philoſopher called Timon, were invited for two days together to a feaſt; and that, in compliance to the humour of the company, they drank plentifully. Lacydes gave it over the firſt day, and retired when he perceived he had enough. Timon, ſeeing him go off, cried out, victory; but the next day he yielded firſt: he could not drink off the bowl that was brought him. Lacydes was even with him. This is a very ſcandalous thing. Philoſophers ſhould never contend for ſuch a victory: it is not only a fault to obtain it, but alſo to attempt it: and though the ignominy of the victor is greater than that of the vanquiſhed, yet the latter deſerves to be cenſured. How many Chriſtian Philoſophers, and even divines, have imitated Timon and Lacydes!

[F] What Numenius relates of him, looks altogether like a pleaſant tale.] Here is the ſubſtance of what he ſays (14). Lacydes diſcovered a great ſtingineſs in his way of living; he truſted nothing to his ſervants; his pantry (15) was inacceſſible to them; he put in, and took out of it himſelf, what there was occaſion for, and never left it open: but that he might not groſs miſtakes [G.] The difference, that father Rapin finds betwixt Arceſilas and Lacydes, is a meer illuſion. Philoſophy, ſays he (g), was reſtleſs under the former, and be troubled with the key, he put it in a hole (16), which he ſealed up, and then he threw his ſeal into the pantry (17) through the hole of the lock. His ſervants, having diſcovered this, eaſily, and as much as they pleaſed, tricked him. It was no difficult thing for them to get the key, and to place it again where he had put it, and to ſeal up the hole. They eat, they drank, they robbed him as they thought fit, and laughed at him into the bargain. He on his part very eaſily perceived the diminution of his wine and proviſions; and, not knowing where to lay the fault, he remembered the doctrine of Arceſilas, who taught, that our ſenſes and our reaſon comprehend nothing, and he attributed the Vacuum of his bottles and baskets to that incomprehenſibility. Thus he began to philoſophize, in Arceſilas's ſchool, againſt the certainty of human knowledge. Nay, he made uſe of that domeſtic experience, to prove, that he had reaſon to ſuſpend his judgment in every thing. I will not alledge a hear-ſay, ſaid he one day, gravely to one of his friends; I know by experience what I am going to tell you; I can ſpeak of it without any doubt. Hereupon he told him from one end to the other the adventure of his buttery. What, continued he, could Zeno ſay againſt an argument of this force, which has ſo clearly demonſtrated to me the Acatalepſia? Have not I reaſon to miſtruſt every thing, when, having ſhut, ſealed, unſealed, and opened again my pantry with my own hands, I cannot find what I had left in it? I only find my ſeal there, which will not permit me to believe that I am robbed. When he came to that part, his friend could hold no longer; he broke out into ſuch a fit of laughter, as made the Philoſopher perceive his blunder, and reſolve to look to his ſeal better. His ſervants did not trouble their heads about it; and whether they had learned from the Stoics, or elſewhere, to diſpute with him, they unſealed his key, without troubling themſelves to put the ſame ſeal on again. They put on another, and ſometimes none at all. It vexed him, when he ſaw their roguery; but they maintained they had never meddled with the ſeal, and that he had forgotten to put it on. He made long diſcourſes to let them ſee, that he well remembered he had ſealed it, and went ſo far as to ſwear it. You have a mind, anſwered they, to divert yourſelf, and to laugh at our ſimplicity. A Philoſopher, like you, has neither opinions nor memory; for you maintained the other day, that memory was an opinion. He confuted them with reaſons different from thoſe of the Academics; but they had recourſe to a Stoic, who taught them how to reply to their maſter, and to elude all his arguments by the doctrine of Incomprehenſibility, which they did with a great deal of pleaſant humour. The worſt of it was, that they continued to rob his proviſions, and Lacydes perceived, that his goods vaniſhed away every day. He found himſelf in great perplexity; his principles, inſtead of ſerving him, were againſt him, and he was forced to behave himſelf like the vulgar. All the neighbourhood was filled with his clamours and complaints. He proteſted by all the gods and goddeſſes, that he was robbed (18); at laſt he took the reſolution not to ſtir out, and to keep within ſight of his buttery-door (19). What did he get by diſputing with his ſervants? he made uſe of the method of the Stoics againſt them, and they anſwered him in the way of the Academics, and beat him with his own weapons. At laſt, reſolving to free himſelf once for all, from the intolerable perplexity he was in, he ingenuouſly told his ſervants; children, we diſpute one way in the ſchools, and we live another way in our houſes. Οὐδὲν δὲ εἰς οὐδὲν ὠφελῶν, ὑπειδόμενος οἷ τὸ σοφὸν αὐτῷ ἔρχεται, ἀπεκαλύψατο. Ἄλλως, ἔφη, ταῦτα, ὦ παῖδες, ἐν ταῖς διατριβαῖς λέγεται ἡμῖν, ἄλλως δὲ ζῶμεν. Verum ubi nihil agit, ſecum ipſe cogitans, quo ſua ſibi verſutia recideret: tandem animi ſenſum palam ac ſine fuco aperiens, nimirum, inquit, famuli, aliter hæc in ſchola diſputamus, aliter vivimus (20).

This is a pretty ſtory, and Mr de la Fontaine might have made it very diverting; but it is plain, that it has been forged by a pious fraud of the Stoics. This has been a method uſed at all times, and in all places; people have always endeavoured, and do ſo ſtill, to turn the doctrine and perſon of their adverſaries into ridicule; and to that end a thouſand fables are invented, if the leaſt pretence can be found to ſtrain maliciouſly the conſequences of their opinions. This paſſion has been ſo blindly indulged againſt the Sceptics, that not only ſincerity, but even probability has been laid aſide; for they never denied, that, in the ordinary conduct of life, men ought to truſt to the teſtimony of their ſenſes. They only denied, that the abſolute nature of objects is juſt the ſame as it appears to be. Note, that Diogenes Laërtius (21) is contented to obſerve, that our Lacydes, having ſealed the door of his pantry, threw his ſeal into it, and that his ſervants made uſe of the ſeal, to ſteal his proviſions, without being diſcovered by him.

[G] Moreri has committed very groſs miſtakes.] I. Inſtead of ſaying, that Lacydes's father was a native of Cyrene, he ſhould have ſaid, that Lacydes was born there. II. He ought not to have adopted Laërtius's error, concerning the foundation of an academy by Lacydes. III. He ought not to have placed his death in the fourth year of the XXXVIth Olympiad. This is no error of the preſs; for he adds, that it was the 113*th year of Rome.* If the Printers had omitted ſomething in the firſt calculation, they would not have erred ſo exactly in the ſecond. It is therefore certain that they followed the copy. Now what can be more abſurd, than to believe, that Arceſilas lived in the CXXth Olympiad, and that Lacydes, his diſciple, died the laſt year of the XXXIVth Olympiad (22)? IV. Though his death had been placed in the fourth year of the CXXXIVth Olympiad, it would ſtill be an error; for he died not till about the ſecond year of the CXLIſt. Here is the proof of it. Diogenes Laërtius obſerves, that Lacydes, who began to be the head of the academy, the fourth year of the CXXXIVth Olympiad, died after he had taught Philoſophy twenty ſix years. Ἐτελεύτησε δὲ σχολαρχεῖν ἀρξάμενος τῷ τετάρτῳ ἔτει τῆς τετάρτης καὶ τριακοστῆς καὶ ἑκατοστῆς Ὀλυμπιάδος, τῆς σχολῆς ἀφηγησάμενος ἓξ πρὸς τοῖς εἴκοσιν ἔτη. Obiit autem cum ſcholam adminiſtrare cœpiſſet quarto anno centeſimæ trigeſimæ quartæ Olympiadis, viginti ſex annis in ſchola conſumptis (23). V. It is an abſurdity to find in theſe words, that Lacydes began to be in reputation . . . . . after he had taught for the ſpace of twenty ſix years (24). VI. This can hardly be ſaid of any profeſſor; for if he ſpends twenty five years in his profeſſion, without eſteem, he runs the hazard, generally ſpeaking, of dying without any reputation.

Note, that Father Hardouin is miſtaken, as to the time of our Philoſopher's death. ‘Obiiſſe dicitur, ‘ſays he (25), anno 4 Olymp. CXXX. —— He is ſaid ‘to have died in the fourth year of the CXXXth ‘Olympiad.’ He cites the 120th page of Diogenes Laërtius, of the London edition, 1664, in Folio. But beſides that, we find there (26) the CXXXIVth Olympiad, and not the CXXXth, it is certain, that it concerns Lacydes's entrance on his profeſſion, and not his death. Father Labbé has committed but one of theſe two faults: he ſays (27), citing Diogenes, that the Philoſopher Lacydes died the laſt year of the CXXXIV Olympiad. It will be asked, whether it can be proved, that he did not die at that time? I anſwer, that there are two proofs to be given for it. The firſt is, that he was not the head of the academic ſchool till after Arceſilas's death (28), and we know, that Arceſilas was cotemporary with Eumenes, prince of Pergamus (29), who ſucceeded not Philetærus till the CXXIXth Olympiad. Father Labbé ſays ſo (30); the correſpondence of this Philoſopher with Eumenes, requires that he ſhould have lived till the CXXXth Olympiad. Which being ſo, it cannot be ſaid, that his ſucceſſor died the fourth year of the CXXXIVth Olympiad; for he taught twenty ſix years. My ſecond proof is drawn from this, that Attalus, king of Pegamus, cauſed the garden of the academy to be made, wherein Lacydes taught, and deſired to have that Philoſopher at his court. There is little probability, that theſe two things relate to the firſt year of his reign, that is, to the third year of and contradicting under the latter. It is certain, that it was never more contradicting, than under Arceſilas.

Let us ſay then, that Lacydes died not the following year; and let us remember, that, if he had taught but a few months in that garden, it would be an abſurdity to give him no other ſchool but that, and even to obſerve, that it had it's name from him. He muſt therefore have taught there ſeveral years, and conſequently he did not die a year after Attalus came to the throne. Seth Calviſius (32) has been guilty of the ſame fault as Father Labbé.

LACISIUS (PAUL) a regular canon of the congregation of Lateran in the XVIth century, was of Verona (a). He taught the Latin tongue in the priory of St Fridian, at Lucca, whilſt Peter Martyr was prior there (b); and having reliſhed, with him, the doctrine of the Proteſtants, he followed him into Germany, where they openly profeſſed it in 1542. After they had been ſome time at Zurich, and at Baſil (c), they were invited to Straſburg by Martin Bucer, and by his means Peter Martyr was made profeſſor of Divinty, and Paul Laciſius, profeſſor of the Greek tongue (d). The latter died at Straſburg, I know not when (e). His Latin verſion of Tzetzes's Chiliads was printed, with the Greek, in 1546, at Baſil, by John Oporinus (f).

LÆVIUS, a Latin poet. It is not certainly known when he lived; but it is very probable, it was before Cicero's time. He wrote a poem, intituled, Erotopægnia, that is, Sports of Love. Aulus Gellius (a) cites two verſes from it. Apuleius (b) gives us ſix from the ſame poet, but does not ſay what work of his he takes them from. Lævius wrote a poem called the Centaurs. But this is a ſmall ſlip in compariſon of the blunder of an author (2), who has put in Aulus Gellius, Livius, for Lævius, and pretended that Aulus Gellius cited Livius Andronicus. How could he cite out of this Livius a paſſage, which concerns a law (3) made in the 656th year of Rome; how, I ſay, could he on this occaſion cite Livius Andronicus, who was a grown man in the 514th year of Rome? for one of his comedies was acted that year (4). The author I confute, pretends, that Nævius and Pacuvius flouriſhed after Livius Andronicus; but had he not ſeen a particular in Aulus Gellius, which manifeſtly proves, that this Livius could not be acquainted with the Licinian Law? Aulus Gellius tells us (5), that Nævius had ſome of his comedies acted in the five hundred and nineteenth year of Rome, and that he bore arms in the firſt Punic war.

LAIS, a famous courtezan, was of Hyccara, a town of Sicily [A]. She was carried into Greece, when her country was plundered by Nicias the Athenian general. She ſettled at Corinth, which was the fitteſt town in the world for women of her profeſſion [B]; and there ſhe made ſo great a noiſe, that no courtezan had ever a greater reſort

[A] She was of Hyccara, a town of Sicily.] This we learn from Plutarch, when he ſpeaks of the taking of that town (1). The inhabitants were ſold, and Lais among the reſt, who was tranſported to Peloponneſus, being yet a virgin (2). Some moderns ſay, that ſhe was ſold at Corinth (3); but they have not conſulted Pauſanias, nor his tranſlator, who might have clearly taught them, that ſhe was ſold at Hyccara, and then carried to Corinth. Pauſanias perfectly agrees with Plutarch; he ſays as well as he, that ſhe was yet a young girl (4). Solinus is contented to make her a Sicilian (5), without ſpecifying the town ſhe was of; but Athenæus, in the thirteenth book, page 588, cites three authors (6), who expreſsly ſay, that ſhe was of Hyccara in Sicily. One of thoſe three writers obſerves, that ſhe went a ſlave to Corinth. Ἀφ' ἧς αἰχμαλώτου γενομένη ἧκεν εἰς Κόρινθον. Ex quo (oppido Hyccaris) captiva Corinthum venit (7). This condemns the moderns I have mentioned. Stephanus Byzantinus (8) ſays alſo, that ſhe was of Hyccara, and quotes (9) Syneſius, who called her Ὑκκαρικὸν Ἀνδράποδον, Hyccaricum mancipium. On the other hand, he cites (10) Neanthes, author of a book concerning illuſtrious men, who ſays, that ſhe was born at Craſtus, a town of Sicily. He alſo cites Timæus, as having ſaid, that ſhe was of Eucarpia in the ſame iſland: and yet we have ſeen, that Timæus, quoted by Athenæus, makes her a native of Hyccara; and ſince no body makes mention of a place in Sicily, called Eucarpia, I find Berkelius's conjecture (11) very probable, namely, that Stephanus Byzantinus made uſe of a copy of Timæus, where the tranſcribers had put Εὐκαρπία for Ὕκκαρα. Caſaubon (12) obſerves, that the country of Lais, like that of Homer, and of ſome other illuſtrious men, has not been well known; and he cites Solinus, who ſays, Lais eligere patriam maluit quam fateri (13). —— Lais would rather chuſe than confeſs her country. Caſaubon adds, that ſome will have her to be born at Pancarpia in Phrygia; but probably his memory failed him (14): he remembered confuſedly, that he had read, that ſome made her a native of Eucarpia in Sicily, a place which Stephanus Byzantinus mentions in the article of Eucarpia of Phrygia. This confounded his ideas; he fancied, that he had read, that Pancarpia, in Phrygia, was Lais's birth-place, according to ſome writers. Pinedo goes farther than Caſaubon, as to the parallel of Homer with this courtezan: he pretends, that ſeveral towns contended for the glory of having produced Lais (15).

[B] Corinth . . . . . was the fitteſt town in the world for women of her profeſſion.] However I do not believe all that is ſaid of her by Lotichius. He affirms, that the Corinthians, in their ſolemn prayers, begged of the gods to increaſe the number of the courtezans (16). He cites Athenæus, who ſays no ſuch thing. But this probably miſled Lotichius; he honeſtly depended upon theſe words of Eraſmus: 'Tantus Corinthi honos habebatur meretricibus, ut quemadmodum ex autoribus docet Athenæus, illic in templo Veneris proſtarent, atque in ſolemnibus precibus illud addi ſoleat, ut Dii augerent meretricum numerum. Quin & illud refert meretrices facto ſacro Veneri, civitatem extremo periculo laborantem ſervaſſe placata Venere (17). ———— Harlots were in ſuch eſteem at Corinth, that, as Athenæus informs us from authors, they proſtituted themſelves there in the temple of Venus, and in ſolemn prayers they uſually added this petition, that the gods would increaſe the number of harlots. He likewiſe tells us, that the harlots, by ſacrificing to Venus, had ſaved the city in extreme danger.' Eraſmus ſtrains the matter. Athenæus ſays only, that there was an antient law at Corinth, ordaining, that, when the town ſhould make ſupplications to Venus in any important affair, they ſhould ſummon as many courtezans as they could, that they might aſſiſt at the pomp of the proceſſion, and pray to that goddeſs, and remain the laſt in her temple (18). reſort [C]. She had been informed by a kind of revelation, that ſhe ſhould be eminent, and get a deal of money ; for ſhe dreamed, that Venus appeared to her, to acquaint her with the arrival of ſome very rich cuſtomers [D]. The moſt illuſtrious Orators, and even the moſt auſtere Philoſophers, fell in love with her. Every one knows, that Demoſthenes made a journey to Corinth on purpoſe to lie with her ; but the price diſcouraged him [E]. It is alſo well known, what a paſſion Diogenes the Cynic had for her [F]. He found her very complaiſant, as poor and ſlovenly as he was, which is more to be admired than her great intimacy with the Philoſopher Ariſtippus, who was a very genteel and polite man. It is ſaid, that ſhe did not love him, and he was jeſted his further account of the matter ; for it is true, that Athenæus ſays, it was believed, that the proſtitutes of Corinth had very much contributed to the ſafety of all Greece, by the prayers they put up to Venus, when Xerxes made his irruption. He adds, that the Corinthians promiſed Venus a certain number of thoſe creatures, if they obtained the favours they begged of her, and that Xenophon, the Corinthian, made a like vow, if he carried the prize at the Olympic games. Having obtained the victory, he punctually performed his vow, conſecrating twenty five young women to the ſervice of Venus, and preſenting them to this goddeſs, during the ceremony of the ſacrifice he offered to her, after his return from the Olympic games. Nay, theſe twenty five girls began the hymn that was ſung during the immolation of the victim. Concerning the whoredom of Corinth, ſee Eraſmus's Adages (19), where he cites a notable paſſage of Strabo (20).

This is ſufficient to make good my text, and at the ſame time to ſhew, that the Heathens could not ſay, that the abominations they publiſhed of their gods, were only poetical ſtories ; for here is a moſt flouriſhing city, which teſtifies by it's laws, and public worſhip, that it believes, that the courtezans by their proſtitutions, did an agreeable ſervice to Venus, and that their interceſſion with her was of the greateſt efficacy to prevent public calamities. It is a ſign they gave credit to the ſtories that were told of this goddeſs's adulteries.

[C] No courtezan had ever a greater reſort.] Of this Propertius (21) gives an expreſs teſtimony.

Non ita complebant Ephyrææ (22) Laidos ædes,
  Ad cujus jacuit Græcia tota fores.

Lais ne'er ſent ſuch ſighing crowds away,
Tho' at her doors all Greece enamour'd lay.

The expreſſions of Plutarch are as ſtrong as can be. He ſays, that Greece was inflamed with the love of Lais, that two ſeas fought for this woman (23), and that ſhe had an army of gallants (24). Ἴστε δήπουθεν ἀκοῇ Λαΐδα τὴν ἀοίδιμον ἐκείνην καὶ πολυήρατον ὡς ἐπέφλεξε πόθῳ τὴν Ἑλλάδα, μᾶλλον δὲ ταῖς δυσὶν ἦν περιμάχητος θαλάσσαις. Inaudiviſtis haud dubie quid Laidi obtigerit. Nobilis illa & tam multis amata viris, quæ ſui deſiderio Græciam inflammavit, atque adeo de qua duo maria certaverant. See her epitaph in the remark [K].

Mrs Jacquette Guillaume ſays, at the 77th page of her Dames Illuſtres (25), 'that one of the principal gallants of Lais, a public courtezan, erected to her a ſtatue like that of Pallas, with this inſcription : To the divinity of Lais, for having triumphed over the wiſdom of all the Philoſophers, and the courage of all the conquerors.' I wiſh ſhe had quoted ſome good author, or at leaſt ſome author, for it ; for her own authority cannot well be depended upon.

[D] She dreamed, that Venus appeared to her to acquaint her, with the arrival of ſome very rich cuſtomers.] It was Venus, ſirnamed Melænis, or the black, that appeared to her. She had a temple, with this title, in a ſuburb of Corinth (26). It has been thought, that this ſirname was given her becauſe, generally ſpeaking, men go about the multiplication of their kind by night (27), and not like beaſts by day (28). If this reaſon of the ſirname Melænis was a ſolid one, it does not ſeem that Venus, as black, ſhould have ſhewn herſelf in a dream to young Lais, who was not deſigned to mind the diſtinction of days and nights. However it be, this dream was mentioned by an Orator in one of his pleas : you need only read theſe words of Athenæus: ἢ καὶ Ἀφροδίτη ἡ ἐν Κορίνθῳ ἡ Μελανὶς καλουμένη, νυκτὸς ἐπιφαινομένη ἐμηνύεν ἐραστῶν ἔφοδον πολυταλάντων. ὡς Ὑπερίδης μνημονεύει ἐν τῷ κατὰ Ἀρισταγόραν δευτέρῳ. Huic (Laidi) cum eſſet Corinthi, Venus Melænis ſive Nigella dormienti noctu ſe oſtendit, & adventum prænunciavit amatorum qui forent pecunioſiſſimi, ut memorat Hyperides Actione ſecunda contra Ariſtagoram (29). —— When Laïs was at Corinth, Venus Melænis, or the black, appeared to her in a dream, and foretold the arrival of ſome very rich lovers, as Hyperides relates it in his ſecond oration againſt Ariſtagoras.

[E] Demoſthenes made a journey to Corinth on purpoſe to lie with her ; but the price diſcouraged him.] This ſtory has been very prettily dreſſed up in French by Mr le Pays (30). 'Aulus Gellius tells it thus (31) : 'Lais Corinthia ob elegantiam venuſtatemque formæ grandem pecuniam demerebat : conventuſque ad eam ditiorum hominum ex omni Græcia celebres erant : neque admittebatur, niſi qui dabat, quod popoſcerat. Poſcebat autem illa nimium quantum. Hinc ait natum eſſe illud frequens apud Græcos adagium, οὐ παντὸς ἀνδρὸς ἐς Κόρινθον ἔσθ' ὁ πλοῦς Quod fruſtra iret Corinthum ad Laidem qui non quiret dare quod poſceretur. Ad hanc ille Demoſthenes clanculum adit ; &, ut ſibi copiam faceret, petit : at Lais μυρίας δραχμὰς ἢ τάλαντον popoſcit. Hoc facit nummi noſtratis denarium decem millia. Tali petulantia mulieris atque pecuniæ magnitudine ictus expaviduſque Demoſthenes avertit ; & diſcedens, Ego, inquit, pœnitere tanti non emo. Sed Græca ipſa, quæ fertur dixiſſe, lepidiora ſunt, οὐκ ὠνοῦμαι, inquit, μυρίων δραχμῶν μεταμέλειαν. —— Lais earned a great deal of money by the elegance and beauty of her perſon ; and many of the richer ſort flocked to her from all parts of Greece. But her price was very high. Hence they ſay aroſe that proverb, ſo frequent among the Greeks, that it was not every man, that could make a voyage to Corinth. Demoſthenes came privately to this lady, and asked the favour : but Lais demanded a whole talent. Demoſthenes, ſtruck with the inſolent demand, went away, ſaying, I am not for buying repentance ſo dear.'

[F] It is well known what a paſſion Diogenes the Cynic had for her.] She obliged him to the full ; he kiſſed her gratis. This is what Ariſtippus's ſervant repreſented to his maſter, who laviſhed his eſtate upon that proſtitute. But Ariſtippus anſwered him ; I pay her well, not that others may not lie with her, but that I may do it. Ὀνειδιζόμενος ὑπὸ οἰκέτου, ὅτι σὺ μὲν αὐτῇ τοσοῦτον ἀργύριον δίδως, ἡ δὲ προῖκα Διογένει τῷ κυνὶ συγκυλίεται. ἀπεκρίνατο, ἐγὼ Λαΐδι χορηγῶ πολλά, ἵνα αὐτὸς αὐτῆς ἀπολαύω, οὐχ' ἵνα μὴ ἄλλος (32). Ariſtippus was the moſt obliging man in the world to his miſtreſſes ; he was not jealous of them, nor did he regard their beſtowing upon others the ſame favours he received. This is what he declared to Diogenes, who told him (33), 'You lie with a proſtitute ; either leave her, or be a cynic as I am. Do you think it abſurd, anſwered Ariſtippus, to lodge in a houſe, that has lodged many others, or to embark in a veſſel, which has carried many paſſengers ; No, replied Diogenes. Juſt ſo, ſaid Ariſtippus, it is no ways abſurd, to have to do with a woman, whom many others have known before (34).' Here is a diverting deſcription of the equipage, with which theſe two Philoſophers rambled about Lais's houſe, if we believe Taſſoni. jeſted upon for it. The anſwer he made thereupon is very blunt [G]. Some ſay (a), that her emulation of another courtezan (b), made her give acceſs to the poor as well as to the rich, to ſignalize herſelf by the multitude of her admirers; but others maintain, that ſhe never beſtowed her favours at a cheap rate, till ſhe grew old [H]: ſome will have it, that ſhe then, only practiſed as a bawd [I]. Others ſay, that notwithſtanding

e dall' altra parte comparire il ſuo rivale Ariſtippo, tutto profumato, e attilato, ſputando zibetto, e mirarlo di torto, e levargli il muro; e la Signora ſtarſi alla geloſia, pigliandoſi guſto di vederli paſſeggiare al ſereno (35). ——— But how diverting to ſee Diogenes the Cynic, with his torn, or patched, cloak, his greaſy beard, without a ſhirt, and ſlovenly, and louzy, act the lover, paſſing by the door, of the famous Lais, and on the other ſide appears his rival Ariſtippus, all perfumed, and dreſſed out, ſpitting civet; the lady in the mean time taking a pleaſure in ſeeing them walk backwards and forwards in the open air.'

[G] The anſwer he made thereupon is very blunt.] I do not think, anſwered he, when he was told, that Lais did not love him, that wine and fiſh love me, and yet I feed on them with a great deal of pleaſure. This I learn from Plutarch: his words have not been well underſtood by Amiot; for he ſuppoſes, that Ariſtippus anſwered, I neither love fiſh nor wine, tho' I live upon them with pleaſure. You will find no ſuch thought in the Greek. Ἀρίςιππος τῷ κατηγοροῦντι Λαΐδος πρὸς αὐτὸν ὡς οὐ φιλούσης, ἀποκρινάμενος ὅτι καὶ τὸν οἶνον οἴεται καὶ τὸν ἰχθὺν μὴ φιλεῖν αὐτὸν, ἀλλ' ἡδέως ἑκατέρῳ χρῆται. Ariſtippus qui Laïdem apud ſe vituperanti quod non amaret, reſpondit: A vino quoque & piſce non puto amari me, tamen utroque libenter veſcor (36). On another occaſion, Ariſtippus gave an anſwer, which ſeveral authors have mentioned: it ſhews, that, tho' he often went to Lais, he was no ſlave to his paſſion: Cum eſſet objectum habere eum Laïda, habeo, inquit, non habeor à Laïde (37). The anſwer is ſhorter in Athenæus (38), ἔχω καὶ οὐκ ἔχομαι, habeo & non habeor. Several authors mention this anſwer. Diogenes Laërtius has it in the life of Ariſtippus; and Lactantius relates it thus: 'Ariſtippo Cyrenaicorum magiſtro cum Laide nobili ſcorto fuit conſuetudo, quod flagitium gravis ille philoſophiæ doctor ſic defendebat, ut diceret, multum inter ſe, & cæteros Laidis amatores intereſſe, quòd ipſe haberet Laidem, alii verò à Laide haberentur. O præclara, & imitanda bonis ſapientia: huic verò liberos in diſciplinam dares, ut diſcerent habere meretricem. Aliquid inter ſe, ac perditos intereſſe dicebat, ſcilicet, quod illi bona ſua perderent, ipſe gratis luxuriaretur. In quo tamen ſapientior meretrix fuit, quæ philoſophum habuit pro lenone, ut ad ſe omnis juventus doctoris exemplo, & authoritate corrupta, ſine ullo pudore concurreret (39). ——— Ariſtippus, head of the Cyrenaics, had an intrigue with the famous harlot Lais; which that grave doctor of Philoſophy defended by ſaying, there was a great difference between himſelf and the reſt of Lais's lovers, for that He had Lais, but Lais had them. O Philoſophy, worthy the imitation of good men! A fit teacher, to train up youth to intrigues! There was ſome difference, he ſaid, between him and the abandoned; that is, they ruined their fortunes, and he enjoyed the pleaſure gratis. In which however the harlot was the better Philoſopher; for ſhe got a Philoſopher to pimp for her, and to ſet all the youth an example of following her without ſhame.' The reflexion of this father of the church is very wrong; he does not ſeem to have underſtood the thought of the Philoſopher. Ariſtippus's meaning was this; I go to Lais, I am in poſſeſſion of this right (40); but ſhe does not keep me in ſubjection; I remain ſtill maſter of this correſpondence; and I can leave it, whenever I pleaſe. He meant not, as Lactantius ſuppoſes, that this commerce coſt him nothing. I have mentioned, above, the complaint of Ariſtippus's ſervant on account of the great expences his maſter was at to pleaſe Lais. I ought not to forget, that this Philoſopher dedicated ſome books to that courtezan (41).

[H] . . . . . others maintain, that ſhe never beſtowed her favours at a cheap rate till ſhe grew old.] Epicrates made very ſatirical verſes upon her. When ſhe was young, ſays he (42), ſhe was ſo haughty by reaſon of her wealth, that it was harder to get a ſight of her, than of Pharnabazus. But now ſhe is old, you may do with her what you pleaſe; ſhe drinks every where; ſhe indifferently admits the old and young; ſhe is grown ſo humble and good humoured, that ſhe offers her hand, to beg an alms. Athenæus gives us theſe verſes of Epicrates: he takes them from a book intituled Anti-Lais. Mr Baillet has forgot it in his collection of the Anti's. It is impoſſible to reconcile the authors who ſpeak of Lais. She was almoſt inacceſſible according to Epicrates, when ſhe was young. Another author ſays, ſhe was called Axine by reaſon of her rough humour, and becauſe ſhe exacted upon her lovers; ſhe asked too great a price (43), and gave no quarter (44), particularly to foreigners; for ſhe knew they could not ſtay long, and had no time to beat down the price, and that if ſhe took not from them a great ſum at once, ſhe would have no opportunity of recovering what ſhe ſhould abate. See the Greek words of Ælian, which I have quoted in the margin (45). Athenæus deſcribes her much more eaſy. He ſays that ſhe made no difference betwixt the poor and the rich, οὐ διακρίνουσα πλούσιον ἢ πένητα (46). She took nothing of Diogenes. Probably ſhe imitated the charitable Phyſicians, who take no fees of the poor; but ſhe made it up upon the rich, as ſeveral Phyſicians do, who take nothing of the poor.

[I] Some will have it that ſhe, then, practiſed only as a bawd.] There was no deity among the Heathens, that was ſerved more faithfully than Venus; for generally the proſtitutes kept on their trade, as long as it was poſſible; and when the wrinkles of old age deprived them of all lovers, they did not give over that ſervice; they betook themſelves to the teaching of ſcholars, and managing intrigues. This is what Claudian ſays of Lais.

Haud aliter juvenum flammis Ephyreïa Lais
E gemino ditata mari, dum ſerta refundit
Canities, dum turba procax, noctiſque recedit
Ambitus, & raro pulſatur janua tactu,
Seque reformidat ſpeculo damnante ſenectus,
Stat tamen, atque alias ſuccingit lena miniſtras,
Dilectumque diu quamvis longæva lupanar
Circuit, & retinet mores quos perdidit ætas (47).

So Lais, her once boaſted conqueſts o'er,
And doors with crowding lovers throng'd no more,
Turns bawd, and kindly leads the willing maid
Thro' each vile practice of her former trade.

This puts me in mind of the invalids or diſabled ſoldiers, who have been ſometimes mentioned in our Gazettes. When they can no longer bear arms, they are ſent upon the coaſts to exerciſe the militia. If you would have another compariſon, conſider the mule ſpoken of by a Greek hiſtorian (48). Having done long ſervices to the people of Athens, ſhe was exempted from labour, with permiſſion to go and paſture where ſhe pleaſed; but that ſhe might not be uſeleſs, ſhe went and placed herſelf before the waggons, and in ſome meaſure incouraged the beaſts of burthen that drew them. For which reaſon it was ordered, that ſhe ſhould be kept all her life at the public expence.

I ought not to forget a blunder of the moſt learned Barthius. He thought (49), that Syneſius gives us the hiſtory of Lais, in a letter, wherein he ſpeaks of a courtezan, who was at firſt concubine to a maſter of a ſhip, and then to a Rhetorician, and afterwards to a ſervant, and then a proſtitute, and at laſt a bawd. It is certain that Syneſius does not mean Lais, but the mother of a Rhetorician, newly married to Syneſius's niece: an under match, which was extreamly ungrateful to that author. Here is the whole paſſage. Πλὴν εἰ μή τι λέγουσιν ὅσοι καὶ τὸν νυμφίον ἡμῖν μητρόθεν ἀποσεμνύνουσι γενεαλογοῦντες αὐτὸν ἀπὸ τῆς ἐν φήμῃ Λαΐδος. ἡ γὰρ Λαῒς ἔφη τις ἤδη λογογράφος, ἀνδράποδον, ἦν Ὑκκαρικὸν. ἐκ Σικελίας ἐωνημένον, ὅθεν ἡ καλλίπαις ἡ τεκοῦσα τὸν περιβόητον. καὶ αὐτὴ πάλαι μὲν ἐπαλλακεύετο ναυκλήρῳ δεσπότῃ. ἔπειτα μέν τοι ῥήτορι, καὶ τούτῳ δεσπότῃ. τρίτῳ μετ' ἐκείνους withſtanding the pleaſure ſhe found in diſtinguiſhing herſelf by the great number of her admirers, ſhe left Corinth, where ſhe had always a crowd of galants, and went to Theſſaly in queſt of a young man with whom ſhe was paſſionately in love [K]. The women of that country conceived ſo much jealouſy againſt that beautiful woman, that they put her to a cruel death. They drew her into the temple of Venus, and there ſtoned her (c), or, according to others, killed her with the ſtools they found at hand. All authors do not agree, that ſhe died in that manner [L]. I have ſaid in another place (d), that ſhe performed her apprenticeſhip under the Painter Apelles; and indeed, it ſeems that he got her maiden-head, if we may depend on the authors I have alledged. See (e) how he anſwered thoſe, who laughed at him, under pretence, that he had choſen a novice: but if the matter be diſcuſſed, we ſhall have reaſon to doubt of this ſtory [M]. The conjecture of thoſe, who ſay, that there were two courtezans ὁμοδούλῳ καὶ λάθρα τῇ πόλει. ἔπειτα λαμπρῶς τῇ πόλει, καὶ προὔστη τῆς τέχνης, ἧς ἐπειδὴ τὴν ἐργασίαν ὑπὸ χαλαρᾷ ῥυτίδι κατέλυσε, τὰς ἐν ἡλικίᾳ παιδοτρίβει, καὶ τοῖς ξένοις ἀντικαθίστησιν. Niſi forte aliquid dicunt qui & ſponſum nobis à matris genere verbis efferunt, genus ejus à famoſa illa Laide ducentes. Nam Lais (dixit jam quidam hiſtoriarum ſcriptor) mancipium fuit Hyccaricum, emptum ex Sicilia, unde nobis venit illa pulchrorum filiorum mater quæ celebrem illum peperit. Et ipſa quidem olim ſcortum fuit Naucleri heri, deinde, Rhetoris ſimiliter heri, tertii deinde poſt illos conſervi, & clam civitatis, deinde palam civitatis artique præfuit meretriciæ, à cujus opera poſtquam ob maturas rugas deſtitit, adultas jam puellas in ea inſtituit, hoſpitibuſque pro ſe ſubſtituit (50). ——— Unleſs perhaps they ſay ſomething who extol the bridegroom on account of his maternal deſcent, pretending to derive it from the renowned Lais. For Lais (a certain hiſtorian ſays) was a ſlave of Hyccara, bought from Sicily, whence we have that mother of a beautiful offspring, who brought forth this famous man. And ſhe herſelf was formerly concubine to a maſter of a ſhip, next to a Rhetorician, in the third place to a fellow-ſervant, and privately to a whole city; afterwards ſhe publickly profeſſed the trade of a whore; and, when incapacitated by age, ſhe inſtructed young women, who ſupplied her place with ſtrangers. Here you ſee a woman, of whom it might be affirmed, that the laſt ſtate was worſe than the firſt; for her proſtitution was leſs pernicious than her trade of procuring.

[K] She went to Theſſaly, in queſt of a young man, with whom ſhe was paſſionately in love.] What has been ſaid (51) of the poverty, and procuring trade of Lais, does not agree with what Plutarch ſays of her; for he affirms, that when this courtezan left Corinth, ſhe had there a great army of galants, and that the women of Theſſaly killed her only for the envy they bore to her beauty (52). The Theſſalian ſpark ſhe fell in love with was called Hippolochus, if we believe Plutarch, but Athenæus calls him Pauſanias (53). They both agree, that the temple of Venus, in which ſhe was killed, had a ſirname given it, which denoted that crime; it was ſirnamed according to Plutarch, the temple of Venus Homicide, Ἀφροδίτης ἀνδροφόνου, and according to Athenæus, the temple of Venus Profaned, ἀνοσίης Ἀφροδίτης. A tomb was built to Lais upon the river Peneus with this epitaph:

Τῆς δὲ ποθ' ἡ μεγάλαυχος Ἀνίκητός τε πρὸς ἀλκὴν
Ἑλλὰς ἐδουλώθη κάλλεος ἰσοθέου,
Λαΐδος, ἣν τέκνωσεν Ἔρως, θρέψεν δὲ Κορίνθος,
Κεῖται δ' ἐν κλεινοῖς Θετταλικοῖς πεδίοις.

Hujus aliquando, magnanima, & fortitudine invicta
Græcia, formâ deabus æquiparandâ, victa & in ſervitutem redacta eſt
Laïdis, amoris filiæ, alumnæ Corinthi,
Quæ in nobilibus Theſſaliæ campis ſita jacet (54).

Here the fam'd Lais lies, in death's cold arms:
Greece felt the pow'r of her exalted charms,
Love gave her birth, and Corinth's walls a place:
The fields of Theſſaly her aſhes grace.

Athenæus confutes thoſe, who ſaid, that ſhe was buried in a ſuburb of Corinth called Cranion. However it is true, that her monument was ſeen in that ſuburb (55), and nothing hinders but that it might be there, and in Theſſaly too: for, tho' the Corinthians had not her body, they doubtleſs erected a monument to her. They engraved upon it a lioneſs, whoſe fore-feet reſted upon a ram (56). See Alciatus's Emblems (57). According to Pauſanias, the galant, that Lais went to Theſſaly in queſt of, was called Hippoſtratus. For the reſt, I do not think Geuſius's conjecture to be ſolid. He believes, that the women of Theſſaly ſacrificed Lais to Venus, as having made herſelf odious to that goddeſs, by the ambition of equalling, and even eclipſing her. He grounds his conjecture upon their leading her to the temple of Venus, though they might have killed her in in other places. ' Veriſimile eſt, ſays he (58), quod ' hæc Lais ab invidis & furioſis iſtis feminis non ' ſimpliciter necata, ſed tanquam piacularis victima ' Deæ Veneri in ejus templo immolata fuerit; quia ' forma ſua & pulchritudine Veneris ipſius gloriam ' affectaſſe, imo obſcuraſſe, & ita indignationem & ' iram ejus in ſe excitaſſe videbatur. Nam quare ipſam non in alio loco, in foro, platea, vel ædibus ' occiderunt? quare ipſam in Veneris templo lapidibus ' & ſcamnis obruerunt, niſi propterea, ut Laida Veneris æmulam coram ipſa Venere in ſacrificium mactarent?

[L] All authors do not agree, that ſhe died in that manner.] Some ſay (59) that ſhe was choaked with an olive-ſtone; and ſo her death was much like that of Anacreon. Others pretend, that ſhe died in the venereal act (60). Which to one, who had devoted herſelf to the ſervice of the goddeſs Venus, was a glorious death; ſhe died in the bed of honour, and in ſignalizing her fidelity; juſt as when a warrior is killed in a battle. Some body has ſaid, that an emperor ought to die ſtanding (60*): but, according to the principles of the Pagans, a courtezan, to die gloriouſly, ought to be in a quite different poſture; and Lais, in her way, did what Veſpaſian adviſed emperors to do.

[M] We ſhall have reaſon to doubt of this ſtory.] Let it be remembred, that the birth of Lais ought to be placed in the fourth year of the LXXXIXth Olympiad, and that Apelles, being at ſea, was forced by a ſtorm to put in at Alexandria, under the reign of Ptolemy, the ſon of Lagus (61), which reign could not begin at fartheſt till the CXIVth Olympiad. The moſt convenient ſuppoſition for the authors of that ſtory would be to ſay, that Apelles was but twenty years old, and that Lais was twenty five at the time they ſpeak of, and that he put into Alexandria, the firſt year of Ptolemy's reign: and therefore he muſt have been born the firſt year of the XCIſt Olympiad. But then, would he not have been near ninety five years old, when Ptolemy, the ſon of Lagus, began his reign? And is it likely, that, at ſuch an age, he would have been in a capacity of bearing the ſea, and doing what he is ſuppoſed to have done at the court of Egypt? Would this great age have been paſſed over in ſilence by all the writers that remain? Theſe difficulties cannot be removed but by extending the time of Lais's virginity longer, that is, by ſuppoſing, that this Painter, at twenty years of age, entertained her, when ſhe was already forty or fifty five years of age. Now this is to ſuppoſe things quite contrary to probability, and to what we find in authors. It would be much more reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that Apelles was twice as old as Lais. It is highly probable, that ſhe began her filthy trade very early, and conſequently, that Apelles did not debauch her. Note, that the fountain of Pyrene, from whence, it is ſaid, he ſaw

tezans called Lais [N], is grounded upon this, that every thing that is ſaid of Lais cannot be underſtood of the ſame woman, without contradicting chronology. There is no probability, that ſhe was the daughter of Alcibiades (f), or that ſhe was an author [O]. We have a very pretty epigram of Auſonius upon the looking-glaſs her return, when he was ſtruck with her beauty, was at Corinth. Wherefore, if this ſtory were true, it muſt be concluded, that he made ſome ſtay in that town, which I do not believe any author has poſitively ſaid.

[N] Some conjecture, that there were two courtezans called Lais.] She I ſpeak of was removed to Corinth, when Nicias commanded the Athenian army in Sicily, that is, the ſecond year of the XCIſt Olympiad. She was then ſeven years old, if we believe Ariſtophanes's Scholiaſt (62). Now, ſince Demoſthenes durſt not go to Corinth, but incognito, in order to lie with Lais, he could not be a young ſcholar, but a man of a great reputation. He muſt therefore be ſuppoſed to have been at leaſt thirty years of age, and ſo Lais would have been then ſixty ſeven years old (63). Therefore there is no probability, that Domeſthenes would have been deſirous to ſee her, or that ſhe would have asked a great ſum of him. It was therefore another Lais, who asked Demoſthenes ſo much, There were therefore two courtezans called Lais. The difficulty would be very great, though we ſhould ſuppoſe, that Demoſthenes made this voyage to Corinth at about twenty years of age; for our Lais would have been then near ſixty. I find, that many authors build upon a paſſage of Athenæus, wherein it is ſaid, that Alcibiades was always attended by two concubines, namely Damaſandra, the mother of young Lais (64), and Theodota, who took care of his funeral, when he was killed in a town of Phrygia. This paſſage of Athenæus is of ſome weight; for it ſuppoſes there was a woman, called Lais before her who was the daughter of Damaſandra; nevertheleſs there remain great difficulties. In the firſt place, Athenæus, who ſays ſo many things concerning Lais, makes no diſtinction; he ſpeaks all along as if there never had been but one Lais. Does a man expreſs himſelf thus, when he is perſuaded, that there are two, and intends to inform his reader of it? ſecondly, Plutarch ſpeaking of Lais, the daughter of Alcibiades's concubine, ſays expreſsly, that ſhe was a native of Hyccara in Sicily, and that ſhe was brought a ſlave from thence. Ταύτης λέγουσι θυγατέρα γενέσθαι Λαΐδα, τὴν Κορινθίαν μὲν προσαγορευθεῖσαν, ἐκ δὲ Ὑκκάρων Σικελικοῦ πολίσματος αἰχμάλωτον γενομένην. Hujus ferunt filiam fuiſſe Laidem, quæ dicta fuit Corinthia quum Hyccaris Siciliæ oppidulo fuerit captiva abducta (65). Thus, according to Plutarch, the ſame Lais, whom Athenæus calls the younger, is ſhe who was born in Sicily before the XCIſt Olympiad; ſo that if ſhe, who asked ſuch a great price of Demoſthenes, is different from this, there muſt have been a third Lais; for ſhe, who in Athenæus's account, would be the firſt, muſt have preceded the Sicilian, who was ſold in Hyccara, the ſecond year of the XCIſt Olympiad, and would have been ſtill more incapable, than the ſecond mentioned by Athenæus, to receive a viſit from Demoſthenes. In the third place, the great ſum, demanded of this Orator, maniſeſtly ſuppoſes, that the courtezan was very young. A woman does not ſet ſuch a value upon herſelf, when ſhe is above thirty five years. Now, as there is a great probability, that Alcibiades's concubine was already the mother of Lais, when Alcibiades died, the firſt year of the XCIVth Olympiad, we muſt ſay, that Lais was at leaſt twenty years older than Demoſthenes; and at this rate, if this Orator, at thirty years of age, had made a voyage to Corinth, to lie with that courtezan, he would have been in love with a woman of fifty, who rated one of her nights at near 4000 livres (66). For my part, inſtead of admitting two Lais's, I had rather ſay, that the Greek authors, who were bad Chronologers (67), have applied to the courtezan of this name an adventure of Demoſthenes, which concerned another woman of pleaſure. Note, that, in another place, Athenæus ſays, that Alcibiades, being general of the army, had with him two concubines, Timandra, the mother of Lais the Corinthian, and Theodota the Athenian (68). This plainly intimates that Timandra was then the mother of Lais; and it is certain, that the ſame Lais, who was born in Sicily, was called the Corinthian. Plutarch ſays ſo expreſsly (69). Note alſo, that Athenæus calls Lais's mother ſometimes Damaſandra, and ſometimes Timandra, and aſcribes to Theodota the care of Alcibiades's funeral; but Plutarch ſays, that Timandra was the mother of Lais, and that ſhe buried Alcibiades (70).

[O] It is not probable, that ſhe was an author.] Pliny (71) mentions two things, which he had read in the writings of a woman called Lais. He names her the firſt time with Elephantis, and the ſecond time with Salpe, and a little after he makes mention of a midwife, called Sotira. It is known, that Elephantis had written ſome books full of obſcenities. See the remark [P] of the article HELENA, and Suetonius in the forty third chapter of the Life of Tiberius, and Martial in the forty third epigram of the twelfth book. Galen witneſſes (72), that Elephantis had written a treatiſe of Coſmetics. I have obſerved, in another place (73), the meaning of that word. Salpe was of the iſle of Lesbos (74), and had written a book of jeſts, or of ſports and diverſions; but there is no great probability, that Pliny alledged her with reſpect to that work. ‘ Lais & Salpe, ſays he (75), ‘ canum rabioſorum morſus, & tertianas quartanaſque ‘ febres, menſtruo in lana arietis nigri, argenteo ‘ bracchiali incluſo;’ that is, according to du Pinet's verſion, ‘ Lais and Salpe, two very renowned courtezans, ſay, that, if we wrap up ſome menſtrual blood in the wool of a black ram, and put it in a ſilver bracelet, it is good for the bitings of mad dogs, and tertian and quartan ugues.’ This is clearly to inſinuate, that theſe two women had written a book of medicinal receipts. Father Hardouin affirms, that Salpe wrote De Remediis muliebribus (76). The other paſſage of Pliny, in which Lais and Elephantis are joined, intimates the ſame thing. ‘ Quæ Lais & ‘ Elephantis inter ſe contraria prodidere de abortivis, ‘ carbone è radice braſſicæ, vel myrti, vel tamaricis in ‘ eo ſanguine exſtincto; item aſinas non concipere tot ‘ annis, quod grana hordei contacta ederint: quæque ‘ alia nuncupavere monſtrifica, aut inter ipſas pugnantia: cum hæc fecunditatem fieri iiſdem modis, quibus illa ſterilitatem prænunciaret, melius eſt non credere (77).’ That is, according to du Pinet's verſion, ‘ As to what the courtezan Lais †, and the poeteſs Elephantis ‡ ſay of the menſtrual blood, and to cauſe a child to diſſolve in the mother's belly and of the coals made of the roots of cabbages, myrtles, or tamarisks, and extinguiſhed in the ſame blood, there is no reaſon to give any credit to it: for one of them contradicts the other. The ſame may be ſaid of what they tell us, that a ſhe aſs will not conceive for ſo many years, as ſhe has eaten grains of barley ſtained with the ſame blood. Theſe two courtezans ſay many monſtrous things upon this ſubject, to which we ought to give no credit; for what one of them ſays helps propagation, the other holds to be proper againſt it.’ This tranſlator undertakes to decide a thing, which Pliny has not expreſſed. He ſays boldly, that the courtezan Lais is here ſpoken of; and doubtleſs he means her, who makes the ſubject of this article. If he had ſaid this, in a marginal note, he would have ſhewn himſelf leſs raſh; but he gives it as the true verſion of the words of the original, which is an inexcuſable boldneſs. Father Hardouin has been infinitely more reſerved; he confeſſes, that he does not know, whether Pliny cites one of the two courtezans called Lais, and he calls her Midwife, obſtetrix, whom Pliny quotes (78). If I did not find remedies for the tertian and quartan ague, in Pliny's words, but only for barrenneſs, and receipts for abortion, I ſhould be more inclined to believe, that he cites a book written by our Lais, or aſcribed to that famous courtezan; for there are hardly any people ſo well skilled in what can promote or prevent conception, or cauſe abortion, as thoſe of Lais's trade, a trade, that takes up the wretched art of doing a good turn to thoſe, who are afraid of diſgrace; a trade, in a word, which terminates in that, when age does no longer favour the other functions. But after all, I do not think it probable, that our Lais wrote books. However I would not deny, that thoſe, which are mentioned mentioned by Pliny, and ſet by him in oppoſition to thoſe of another leud woman, named Elephantis, were aſcribed to her. I queſtion, whether an honeſt matron, expert in ſecrets, and a Midwife by profeſſion, would have been called Lais; for this name, like that of Chryſis and Thaïs, and the like, was beſtowed upon the naughty tribe, in the works of the Poets. And it was doubtleſs in alluſion to that cuſtom, that a book was printed in France, towards the beginning of the XVIth century with this title, A Dialogue of Aretin, wherein are related the lives, manners, and behaviours of Lais, and Lamia, courtezans of Rome. Ariſtænetus calls his miſtreſs Lais (79). By that word is meant not only a woman he loved (80), but alſo a woman by whom he was beloved and favoured, without any reſerve; for he ſays, that her bones were almoſt flexible, and that the tracts of his embraces remained imprinted on them, as much almoſt as on the fleſh, which covered them. Οὕτω μὲν τοι σύμμετρα καὶ τρυφερὰ τῆς Λαΐδος τὰ μέλη, ὡς ὑγροφυῶς αὐτῆς λογίζεσθαι τὰ ὀστᾶ τῷ περιτυπτομένῳ δοκεῖν· τοιγαροῦν ταῦτα μικροῦ γε ὁμοίως δι᾽ ἁπαλότητα συναπομαλάττεται τῇ σαρκὶ, καὶ ταῖς ἐρωτικαῖς ἀγκάλαις ὑπείκει. Cæterum tam concinna, tam delicata Laidi membra, ut preſſius adtrectans dicas lenta & ductilia oſſa. Nam ea fere una cum carne impreſſos digitos recipiunt tenerrima, ceduntque amplexis amatorum ulnis (81).

[P] We have an epigram of Auſonius upon the looking-glaſs of this leud woman.) Auſonius does but tranſlate an epigram of Plato, which is in the Anthologia. He has done it very well:

Lais anus Veneri ſpeculum dico: dignum habeat ſe
  Æterna æternum forma miniſterium,
At mihi nullus in hoc uſus, quia cernere talem
  Qualis ſum nolo; qualis eram nequeo (82).

Venus, this glaſs I dedicate to thee;
Uſeleſs, alas! the utenſil to me;
My former face I can't, my preſent will not ſee.

This is to ſuppoſe, that Lais ſurvived her beauty, and that her looking-glaſs became to her an uſeleſs, and even unpleaſant utenſil. This agrees with the authors, I have mentioned in the remarks [H] and [I], but not with Plutarch. See the remark [K].

You will find, in the commentaries upon Alciatus's Emblems, ſome Latin verſes, in which Lais's complaints are prettily repreſented. They were grounded upon two reaſons: the firſt was, that ſhe found, herſelf impaired, when ſhe conſulted her glaſs; the ſecond was, that ſhe ſtill felt the flames of luſt; ſhe complained, that ſhe had all the laſcivious deſires of youth in a body almoſt decrepit. It was a ſad thing.

Et tamen idem animus ſtimulos ſub pectore eoſdem
  Et noto ſenſit fervida corda Deo;
Sic ſecum: Facie nimium vivacior, ô mens,
  Cur dudum hæc anus eſt, tuque puella manes (83).

Still the ſame pow'rful deity ſhe confeſs'd,
And the ſame paſſions warm'd her aged breaſt.
Then ſighing, thus ſhe ſaid: how ill we ſee
A youthful mind, and an old face, agree!

The truth is, that an old courtezan of Venice was repreſented under her name. 'Accepi pridem à viris 'Italici ſoli, id ſcriptum fuiſſe in quandam meretri'cem Venetam, quæ ætatis lapſo, ſeu decuſſo flore, 'quoties ſe in ſpeculo conſpiceret, fronte jam rugis 'obſita, miſere contabeſcebat, & nihilo ſegnius ardore 'tentiginis premebatur (84).' Horace has afforded this thought:

Dices, heu (quoties te ſpeculo videris alterum)
Quæ mens eſt hodie cur eadem non puero fuit?
Aut cur his animis incolumes non redeunt genæ (85)?

Oft as in the too faithful glaſs you ſpie
That alter'd form, you with a ſigh will cry;
O! that I thus had thought, e'er youth was o'er,
Or that theſe thoughts cou'd fleeting youth reſtore!

[Q] She was ſo much in love with Eubates, that ſhe obliged him to promiſe her marriage.] Her paſſion muſt needs have been very violent, ſince ſhe was willing to ſubmit to the laws of Hymen (86), which would not have permitted her to continue freely her proſtitution. She diſcovered to Eubates the deſire ſhe had to marry him. He pretended to give his conſent, fearing her ill offices: but he did not lie with her; he put off that affair till after the games, in which he was to diſpute the prize. He obtained it, and thought no more of his promiſe of marriage. He returned to Cyrene his country, contenting himſelf to take along with him the picture of Lais. He thought, by that means, that he ſhould be a man of his word. The wife he had at Cyrene thought herſelf obliged to recompenſe ſo noble a continence; for which reaſon ſhe erected a ſtatue to her huſband. I am afraid, that Ælian (87), who relates this ſtory, has loſt all the wit of it. Clemens Alexandrinus relates it in fewer words; but he calls the man Ariſtotle, whom Ælian calls Eubates; and he quotes the book of Iſter περὶ ἰδιότητος ἄθλων, de proprietate certaminum. He does not agree with Ælian in all the circumſtances. Ὅτε Κυρηναῖος Ἀριστοτέλης, Λαΐδα ἐρῶσαν ὑπερεώρα μόνος, ὁμωμοκὼς ἐν τῇ ἑταίρᾳ, ἦ μὴν ἀπάξειν αὐτὴν εἰς τὴν πατρίδα, εἰ συμπράξειεν αὐτῷ τινα πρὸς τοὺς ἀνταγωνιστάς, ἐπειδὴ διεπράξατο, χαριέντως ἐκτελῶν τὸν ὅρκον, γραψάμενος αὐτῆς ὡς ὅτι μάλιστα ὁμοιοτάτην εἰκόνα, ἀνέστησεν εἰς Κυρήνην. Et Cyrenæus Ariſtoteles amantem Laidem ſolus deſpexit. Cum meretrici itaque juraſſet, ſe eam eſſe in patriam abducturum, ſi ei adverſus decertantes adverſarios in aliquibus opem tuliſſet, poſtquam id perfecit, lepide à ſe ſcriptum juſjurandum exequens, ejus quam ſimillimam Cyrenæ ſtatuit imaginem (88).

[R] She could not conquer the continence of . . . . Xenocrates.] Lais laid a wager, that ſhe would oblige this Philoſopher to divert himſelf with her at a game of love. She pretended to be frighted, and, under that pretence, took ſanctuary in his houſe, and ſpent the night there; but he did not meddle with her. When ſhe was required to pay her wager, ſhe anſwered, that ſhe had not laid it about a ſtatue, but about a man. Thus an old interpreter of Horace (89) relates the ſtory. Diogenes Laërtius aſcribes this to the courtezan Phryne, and does not ſpeak of the wager. He ſays (90), that ſhe fled to Xenocrates's houſe, pretending, that ſome body purſued her; and as he had but one bed in the houſe, ſhe intreated the Philoſopher to let her have part of it. He conſented to it. After that, ſhe made other demands, which came to nothing. Whence it was, that when ſhe was asked, how things went, ſhe anſwered, ſhe had lain, not with a ſtatue, and with a man. Some ſay, that Xenocrates's diſciples one day put Lais into his bed, and that he was ſo fully reſolved to preſerve his continence, that he ſeveral times ſuffered inciſions to be made in his privy-parts, and fire to be applied to them. Ἔνιοι δὲ Λαΐδα φασὶ παρακατακλῖναι αὐτῷ τοὺς μαθητάς, τὸν δὲ οὕτως εἶναι ἐγκρατῆ, ὥστε καὶ τομὰς καὶ καύσεις πολλάκις ὑπομεῖναι περὶ τὸ αἰδοῖον. The Latin tranſlation runs thus, Quidam verò diſcipulos Laidem illi injeciſſe in lectulum tradunt, illumque adeò fuiſſe continentem, ut cum ſe ad libidinem incitari præſenſiſſet, & ſecare & urere verenda ſæpe pateretur (91). We ought not to be ſatisfied either with the Greek author or his tranſlator. The latter adds of his own head, that Xenocrates found in him the rebellion was a famous maſter in that art; and yet neither Pliny, nor Pauſanias, nor any other writer, make mention of him. I will make but one remark for the faults of Moreri, and thoſe of ſome other Dictionaries [T]. There never was a more extravagant boldneſs, than that of Antony de Guevara. He has vented a thouſand ridiculous falſities about Lais [U], as if he had found them in antient authors. I had almoſt paſſed over in ſilence the adventure of the Sculptor Myron [X].

rebellion of luſt (92); and as to Diogenes Laërtius, he does not tell us what became of Lais: he puts her in the Philoſopher's bed, without ſaying what ſhe did there, or how ſhe came out again, and, inſtead of finiſhing the narration of this particular adventure, he falls upon a general thing; that is, upon the remedies, which Xenocrates had ſeveral times made uſe of, to be proof againſt love.

[S] She defended herſelf one day very artfully againſt Euripides, who cenſured her with reaſon.] Euripides, with pen in hand, was going to compoſe ſomething in a garden. Lais, ſeeing him in that poſture, accoſted him, and asked him (93) what he meant by ſome words, which he had uſed in one of his tragedies (94), to denote, in general, a man, who does filthy actions. He was ſurprized at the impudence of this queſtion, and anſwered her, You your ſelf are one of thoſe I mean (95). She fell a laughing, and quoted a verſe (96) in which he ſaid, that an action was not filthy, unleſs he who did it thought it ſo, Τὶ δ' αἰσχρὸν εἰ μὴ τοῖσι χρωμένοις δοκεῖ, Ecquid vero turpe eſt niſi qui utuntur ſic putent (97)? We are not informed, whether Euripides was confounded by this argument ad hominem, or whether he made any reply; but it is certain, Lais could not have more handſomely brought her ſelf off, nor have more ſubtilly perplexed her cenſurer. This maxim would carry the Philoſophical ſin to the utmoſt point, and would be of dangerous conſequence; for which reaſon the Philoſopher Antiſthenes (98) corrected it in this manner, Αἰσχρὸν τόγ' αἰσχρὸν κἂν δοκῇ κἂν μὴ δοκῇ. What is filthy is filthy, whether it appears ſo, or not, to thoſe who do it. Stobæus aſcribes this correction to Diogenes the Cynic (99), and not to Antiſthenes, as Plutarch does (100).

There is reaſon to doubt of this converſation; for ſince Euripides died in the XCIIId Olympiad (101), when Lais could not be above fifteen or ſixteen years old, it is not likely, that he had any diſcourſe with her upon this point, or any other. We ſhall be the more eaſily convinced of it, if we conſider, that he ſpent his laſt years at the court of Archelaus, where no author ſays that Lais had ever been. Suppoſe, as much as you pleaſe, two courtezans of this name, you will never clear the matter; for the firſt muſt be ſhe, who was ſold, when Hyccara was plundered by Nicias. But, according to Ariſtophanes's ſcholiaſt, ſhe was then but ſeven years old. By this Chronology that ſcholiaſt raiſes a very conſiderable difficulty on the mention that is made of Lais in Ariſtophanes's Plutus, a comedy, that was acted at a time, when Lais could not as yet be famous (102). The difficulty will vaniſh, if it be ſuppoſed, that it ought to be read Nais, and not Lais in that play. You will find this correction in Athenæus (103). It is certain, there was a courtezan named Nais, and probably many authors have confounded her with Lais. Perhaps it was with Nais, that Euripides entered into diſcourſe.

[T] I will make but one remark for the faults of Moreri, and ... ſome other Dictionaries.] Moreri's firſt fault conſiſts in ſaying that Lais lived in the 420th year of Rome. She muſt then have lived about the end of the CXIth Olympiad: judge whether this can be ſaid of a perſon, who was removed from Sicily to Corinth, in the ſecond year of the XCIſt Olympiad. There is no recurring to the hypotheſis of two Lais's, ſince, beſides that Moreri ſpeaks only of one, he expreſsly ſays, that he ſpeaks of that Lais, who was a native of a little town of Sicily called Hyccara. This Lais is manifeſtly ſhe, who was ſeven years old, when Hyccara, her native town, was taken in the ſecond year of the XCIſt Olympiad. II. It is not true, that Plutarch ſays, that it was believed, ſhe was daughter to Alcibiades. Moreri cannot father this falſity upon Amiot; for it is plain, that in this phraſe l'on dit que Laïs . . . eſtoit ſa fille (104), the word ſa ought to be referred to Timandra, Alcibiades's concubine, and not to Alcibiades. There is no ambiguity in the Greek (105). How could Alcibiades be Lais's father, who went not into Sicily, but with Nicias? Was not Lais then ſix or ſeven years old? III. It is not true, that Lais went to Alexander's camp; ſhe had been dead a long time before Alexander was born. Amiot has occaſioned this fault: for, not underſtanding a paſſage of Plutarch (106), wherein ſome words are wanting, he tranſlates it, that Lais, falling in love with Hippolochus . . . . left mount Acrocorinthus . . . . and went to the great camp of Alexander.

Charles Stephens is miſtaken, in ſaying, that Lais removed from Sicily to Corinth, that her proſtitution might be more profitable to her. She was but ſeven years old, when ſhe went to Corinth, and ſhe went thither againſt her will, having been bought in Hyccara by a man, who carried her with him into Greece as a ſlave. This fault has not been corrected by Lloyd or Hofman. I can ſcarce believe, that Charles Stephens found in any good author what he ſays; I. That Lais, going into Theſſaly, ſo gained the love of the young men of the country, that they poured out wine before her door. II. That the Theſſalian women, out of envy, ſtabbed her, whilſt they were performing their devotions in the temple of Venus, at which the men could not be preſent. III. That this action drew upon Theſſaly a plague, which ceaſed not, till they had built the temple of Venus ἀλλοσία (107). Lloyd and Hofman have both of them theſe three particulars.

[U] Antony de Guevara . . . . has vented a thouſand ridiculous falſities about Lais.] I will not ſtay to refute them, and ſhall only mention a ſmall part of them. He ſays (108) that ſhe was born in the Iſle Bithrite in the confines of Greece; 'and, as the 'chroniclers have written of her, ſhe was the daugh'ter of a great prieſt of Apollo's temple, who lived 'at Delphos, a man greatly experienced in the art 'of Magic, by which ſcience he foretold the ruin 'of his daughter. Now this amorous Lais, was at 'the heighth of her glory in the time of the renown'ed king Pyrrhus. . . . . who, being a youth of ſix'teen or ſeventeen years of age, came into Italy to 'make war with the Romans . . . . This amorous 'Lais remained a long time in king Pyrrhus's camp, 'and with him ſhe came into Italy, and returned 'with him from the war . . . . and retired to the 'city of Corinth, to make her abode there, in which 'place ſhe was followed, and courted by many kings 'Lords, and princes.' He afterwards relates the adventure of Demoſthenes, and concludes with ſaying, that Lais died at Corinth at ſeventy two years of age. How can a man have the confidence to publiſh ſuch groſs falſities? There are above 130 years between the birth of Lais, and Pyrrhus's expedition againſt the Romans, and above forty betwixt the death of Demoſthenes and that expedition. And yet this impoſtor has impoſed upon men of ſenſe, for it was after him that Brantome vented many fables concerning Flora (109). I ſay nothing of Du Verdier Vau-Privas, who tells us, that Lais was a long time in king Pyrrhus's camp in Italy (110). He had read this in Guevara, and took it to be true.

[X] The adventure of the Sculptor Myron.] It is one of the ridiculous adventures of a grey-headed lover. Myron, venerable for his hoary head, went to Lais, to ask a night of her, but was ſent back without ſo much as being heard. He thought he had found the reaſon of her flight, and hoped, that if he ſhould offer himſelf with a brown head of hair, he ſhould be admitted. He thereof changed the colour of his hair, and returned to Lais: What a fool you are ſaid ſhe, to come to ask a thing of me, which I have refuſed your father. Auſonius tells the ſtory very prettily (111).

Canus rogabat Laïdis noctem Myron:
  Tulit repulſam protinus.
Cauſamque ſenſit: & caput fuligine
  Fucavit atra candidum.

Idemque vultu, crine non idem Myron,
  Orabat oratum prius.
Sed illa formam cum capillo comparans,
  Similemque non ipſum rata,
Fortaſſe & ipſum, ſed volens ludo frui,
  Sic eſt adorta callidum:
Inepte, quid me, quod recuſavi, rogas?
  Patri negavi jam tuo.

Old, hoary, Myron, ſetting age aſide,
One night of Lais ask'd, and was deny'd.
The cauſe he found, and black'd his ſilver hair,
And once more waited on the cruel fair.
By the chang'd colour of his locks deceiv'd,
The nymph addreſs'd him, not the ſame believ'd;
Fool that thou ar't, fondly to hope to gain
A favour, which your father ask'd in vain!

Coſtar has given a liſt of ſome witty ſayings, aſcribed to different perſons; amongſt which he has this anſwer of Lais: ' Spartian, ſays he (112), relates, that an old ' man, who was very grey-headed, having been de' nied ſome favour by the emperor Adrian, came to ' ask it again a few days after, having painted his hair ' of the fineſt black he could meet with. This prince, ' diſcovering the trick, wittily anſwered him, What ' you ask of me, I have already denied your father. ' Nevertheleſs, in Auſonius, it is the courtezan Lais, ' who makes this ingenious anſwer; and yet Athe' næus does not ſpeak of it, though he has ſo care' fully preſerved to us all the notable ſayings of that ' handſome lady.' If the conjecture of ſome moderns was right, we need not wonder that Athæneus ſays nothing of this witty repartee of Lais; for they pretend, that Auſonius invented it (113). I mean, that, knowing the emperor Hadrian's anſwer, he feigned that Lais made uſe of it, and made an epigram upon it. I believe this anſwer came rather from a woman, than from the emperor Hadrian; for one can hardly imagine any good reaſon, why an old man, after a refuſal, ſhould fancy, that, appearing as a man without grey hair, he ſhould obtain from this prince what he deſigned to ask of him. It is eaſy to conceive why he might hope for ſuch a thing, if he deſired a love-favour from a lady. We may ſay then, that the writers of Hadrian's hiſtory, men of little judgment and exactneſs, have confounded with his witty ſayings, thoſe which he only recited. He had read ſomewhere, what Lais is ſaid to have anſwered Myron: perhaps he had read, that this anſwer was made to ſome other old galant, by ſome other courtezan: he told the ſtory before his friends; the thing going from one hand to another loſt it's principal circumſtances, ſo that at laſt Hadrian was looked upon as the inventer of it (114).

I will not end this remark without ſaying, that Mr Coſtar praiſes this witty ſentence of Lais too much. I confeſs, the anſwer was ſmart, and fit to mortify the galant, and to give the courtezan the pleaſure of laughing at the old man; but, in ſhort, ſhe reaſoned very ill, and againſt the rules of her art. I have refuſed the ſon, much more ſhould I refuſe the father, is the principle of a woman of pleaſure; her argument turns upon this hinge: but here, on the contrary, Lais ſuppoſes, that, ſince ſhe has denied a decrepit old father, ſhe ought to deny his ſon, a young man, full of vigour. This is forſaking one's principle and fundamental rules.

To conclude, Myron could not be young, when Lais was in her glory: he flouriſhed in the LXXXVIIth Olympiad (115), ſeven or eight years before ſhe was born.

LAMBECIUS (PETER),

one of the moſt learned men of his age, was born at Hamburg in the year 1628. He went early to ſtudy in foreign countries, at the expence of the learned Luke Holſtenius, his uncle; and he made ſo great progreſs, that, at nineteen years of age, he publiſhed a book (a), which was extremely applauded. He ſtaid eight months at Toulouſe with the archbiſhop Charles de Montchal, and two years at Rome with Cardinal Barberini. He was made profeſſor of Hiſtory at Hamburg, the thirteenth of January, 1652, and rector of the college of that town, the twelfth of January 1660. He had taken his doctor of Laws degree ſome years before in France. He had a thouſand vexations in his own country, as well becauſe his ſcholars would not obey him, as becauſe his enemies accuſed him of Heterodoxy, and even of Atheiſm, and ſharply cenſured his ſtudies and his works. The unfortunate marriage, which he contracted [A] in 1662, having compleated his miſfortunes, he gladly liſtened to the propoſals of the queen of Sweden, who adviſed him to retire elſewhere. He therefore left his wife and country, and took a journey to Vienna, from whence, having had the honour to wait on his Imperial majeſty, he went to Rome, and there made public profeſſion of the Romiſh religion. He had abjured the Lutheran long before [B]; tho' he made ſtill profeſſion of it. He returned to Vienna towards the end of the year 1662, and was very well received by the emperor, who made him firſt his ſub-librarian, and afterwards his firſt librarian, with the title of his Counſellor and Hiſtoriographer (b). He continued in that employment to his death, and acquired

[A] The unfortunate marriage, which he contracted.] It may be ſaid of many learned men, that they behave themſelves with reſpect to marriage, as Pomponius Atticus did with reſpect to Poetry. ' Attigit quoque ' poëticen: credimus ne ejus expers eſſet ſuavitatis (1). ' —— He touched upon Poetry: that he might, I ſup- ' poſe, have a reliſh of it's ſweetneſs? They have a mind to try it, that they may know what pleaſure there is in it. But I do not think, that Lambecius had ſuch thoughts; for he married an old woman; and, as ſhe was very rich, it is probable he hoped only for the pleaſure of having a good eſtate. His hopes were quickly fruſtrated; the lady was ſo covetous, as not to ſuffer her husband to make uſe of her eſtate. She declared her mind ſo ſoon upon that point, that Lambecius had not been married above a fortnight, when diſcontented and weary of his condition, he left his houſe and his country, never to return again. Here follows my voucher. Ad hæc adverſa poſtquam tædium Conjugii, inauſpicato A. 1662. cum Vetula Divite, ſed parca, atque avara (A. 1690. Hamburgi defuncta,) contracti, acceſſit, haud difficulter à Chriſtina, Suecorum Regina, Hamburgum delata, perſuaderi ſibi eſt paſſus, ut, duabus poſt nuptias Hebdomadibus vix elapſis, patriam & uxorem, d. 14. *Apr. [B] He had abjured the Lutheran religion long before.] Nihuſius, a famous convert, was, in Holland, the director of Lambecius's ſtudies: he began his converſion; after which, the Jeſuit James Sirmond compleated it, at Paris. He would have engaged his proſelyte to take the habit of St Ignatius; but he could not perſuade him to it. Let us ſee the proofs that are given of theſe facts. [C] He acquired a great reputation by the books he publiſhed.] I ſhall ſay ſomething of thoſe he publiſhed before he was the emperor's librarian. The firſt was his Prodromus Lucubrationum Gellianarum, printed at Paris in the year 1647. The ſecond was, if I miſtake not, *Origines Hamburgenſes, ſive liber rerum Hamburgenſium primus ab V. He deſigned to continue this hiſtory to his own time; but he only publiſhed the ſecond book. Liber ſecundus rerum Hamburgenſium ab A. Baronis à Boineburg, & H. Conringii ad eundem encomiaſticis (5). Here follows the judgment, that was made of thoſe two works by the author, whom I cite ſo often in this article. 'Ambo libri (in quibus, præter nimii in patriam Aſfectus veſtigia, paſſim obvia, & ab eodem ſubinde profluxerunt, παροράματα nihil facile reprehendas) ſumma diligentia & fide ſunt congeſti, & Narrationum ſingularum Veritas Locis Scriptorum ac Diplomatum Antiquiſſimorum, cum judicio ſelectis, confirmata (6). —— Both books, (in which, except a too frequent partiality for his country, there is nothing to be found fault with) are compiled with the greateſt diligence and fidelity, and the truth of every narrative confirmed by paſſages ſelected with judgment out of writers, and antient Diplomas.' Lambecius printed a book at Paris, in folio, in the year 1655, in which he diſplayed a great deal of learning. I mean his Animadverſiones ad Codini Origines Conſtantinopolitanas, & ad Anonymi excerpta & ad Leonis Imp. Oracula. I ſay nothing of his orations, which he publiſhed in the year 1660, nor of ſome other books of his: I proceed to that vaſt work he compiled at Vienna, which the reader may form a juſt idea of by theſe words of Mr Baillet. 'Though the catalogue of the manuſcripts of the emperor's library at Vienna be divided into eight volumes in Folio, it is not yet finiſhed, the death of the author having deprived us of ſo curious and important a work. Lambecius had undertaken, in that great work, the explication of the manuſcripts of that library, which he has done in a critical and hiſtorical manner; reſolving to lay out upon it all his learning and induſtry; in which he has very much diſtinguiſhed himſelf from all the catalogue-makers I have ſpoken of. It muſt be confeſſed, that there are abundance of very particular and curious things in this copious and ſplendid commentary: but the author might have included the ſubſtance of ſo many volumes in a narrower compaſs, if he had conſulted rather the income and leiſure of private perſons, than the magnificence and majeſty of his prince (7).'

[D] He died in April, 1680.] I keep to this date, becauſe herein I find Neſſelius (8) more to be credited, than thoſe who place Lambecius's death in September, 1679 (9). Perhaps we might eaſily reconcile Meibomius and Neſſelius, as to the day; for the twenty fourth of March, according to the old ſtile, belongs to the month of April, according to the new. But theſe two authors differ very much as to the diſtemper Lambecius died of; one ſays, that it was the plague, the other that it was the dropſy. *Henr. LAMBERT, biſhop of Liege, or rather of Maeſtricht. It is a common opinion, as I have ſhewn in another place (a), that he was killed by Pepin's order, at the ſuggeſtion of Alpaïde; but the thing is not certain. This is what I ſhall diſcuſs [A]. So

[A] This is what I ſhall diſcuſs.] I ſhall make uſe of the proofs alledged by the baron le Roi in one of his books. He is of opinion, that neither Pepin, nor Alpaïde, had any hand in St Lambert's murther, and he builds (1), I. Upon the ſilence of Godeſcalcus, a cotemporary writer. Here then is a negative argument, on which Dr John de Launoi lays ſo much ſtreſs. Godeſcalcus aſſigns no other reaſon for the murther of St Lambert, than the murther of two brothers related to Dodon. Theſe two brothers had uſed Lambert very ill; for which reaſon they were killed by two of his relations. Dodon, a potent lord, and of great intereſt with Pepin, would neither ſuffer this murther to go unpuniſhed, nor revenge himſelf upon inconſiderable perſons; he reſolved therefore to make away with St Lambert, for whoſe ſake his two couſins had been murthered. This was the only reaſon, according to Godeſcalcus, of this biſhop's death. He ſays nothing of Pepin or Alpaïde. II. Mr le Roi (2) obſerves, that the firſt, who imputed St Lambert's murther to Pepin, was a canon of Liege, called Anſelme, who lived in the XIth century. This canon failed not to ſay, as well as thoſe that lived before him, that Dodon cauſed St Lambert to be murthered, to revenge the death of his two relations; but he related alſo, as another tradition, what concerns Alpaïde's reſentment againſt this prelate. III. It is obſerved (3), that Sigebert (4) ſuppreſſed the ancient cauſe, mentioned by all authors, and ſpoke only of the new one, which Anſelme began to publiſh. Thus you ſee how errors ſucceſſively and gradually increaſe. The authors, who ſucceeded Sigebert, have ſaid nothing of the ancient cauſe, or elſe they have confounded it with the new, and added a hundred circumſtances to it, unknown to the firſt Hiſtorians (5). Baron le Roi cites very grave authors, who reject the new tradition, and anſwer the inſtance brought againſt Godeſcalcus's ſilence. They will have it, that the true cauſe of St Lambert's martyrdom was ſuppreſſed by him, to avoid provoking Pepin's ſucceſſors. Father Mabillon anſwers, that, ſince they durſt publiſh, that Charles Martel was damned, it might with the ſame boldneſs have been ſaid, that his father had cauſed a biſhop's death? 'Ut hæc ratio valuerit in Godeſcalco, inquit Mabillon, cur eam cauſam diſſimulavit Stephanus, qui ſub extremis Carolinæ ſtirpis regibus vivebat? Sane longe atrocior erat fabula de Caroli Martelli damnatione, quam tamen Hincmarus Remorum Archiepiſcopus, Adrevaldus, aliique Auctores, imperante Carolo Calvo Martelli abnepote, in vulgus jactare non dubitarunt. Unde omnino incertum videtur an Landebertus ob increpitum de pellicatu Pipinum cæſus ſit, at vero alienum omnino videtur à tanti principis bonitate & clementia ut cædis illius fuerit auctor (6). ——— If this reaſon is of any weight in reſpect to Godeſcalcus, ſays Mabillon, why did Stephanus ſuppreſs that cauſe, who lived under the laſt kings of Charles's race? certainly, the fiction of Charles Martel's damnation was more odious, which nevertheleſs Hincmarus, archbiſhop of Rheims, Adrevaldus, and other authors, in the reign of Charles the Bald, great-grandſon of Martel, made no ſcruple to ſpread among the vulgar. Whence it ſeems altogether uncertain, whether Lambert was murthered for reproving Pepin on the account of whoredom; and it even ſeems quite inconſiſtent with the goodneſs and clemency of that prince, to have been the author of that murther.' Father Jourdan, cited by Mr le Roi, makes no queſtion, but that Pepin married Alpaïde with all the uſual ceremonies, after he had divorced Plectrude. It is true, 'that the Chriſtian law forbad ſuch divorces and marriages; nevertheleſs, human laws permitted them at that time even among Chriſtians. Theſe ſecond marriages had nothing of ſhame or infamy in them (7).' This Hiſtorian obſerves (8), 'That Pepin and Alpaïde had been a long time parted, when Lambert was aſſaſſinated in the year 708. Alpaïde, adds he, had no hand in

So many authors have written his Life, that it is diſfigured thereby [B]. I have only read that, which was printed at Liege in 1657, compoſed by the Sieur du Boſc de Montandré. The title of it is, Le Courtiſan Chrétien, &c. The Chriſtian Courtier ſacrificed as a State Victim to the Paſſion of the Court: or St Lambert, biſhop of Tongres and Martyr, ſacrificed for the intereſts of Conjugal Honour.

'in it, ſince ſhe was parted from Pepin at the beginning of the century, and retired into a monaſtery. '..... Ado was the firſt, who, 180 years after, 'imputed the death of that ſaint to Pepin and Alpaïde.' Hadrian Valeſius, cited by the ſame Mr le Roi, obſerves, that, notwithſtanding the canons, people married in thoſe days a ſecond wiſe, in the liſe-time of her that was divorced, and that Pepin made uſe of that cuſtom. He ſays however, that others maintain, that Pepin never divorced Plectrude, nor married Alpaïde, and that Beda favours this opinion. He is in the right to add, that it is probable, that out of flattery to Pepin's deſcendants, who reigned in France, Hiſtorians ſuppoſed, that Alpaïde was married (9).

(9) Certe haud parum ſimile veri eſt finxiſſe hoc in Principum ſuorum gratiam auctores, qui dominantibus Pippini poſteris ſcripſere, & Alpaïdem quæ viva Plectrude juſta & ligitima Pippini conjux eſſe non poterat, uxorem Pippini poſteriorem vocaviſſe, ne Carolus ex pellice ſuſceptus crederetur, ceu regio generi aliqua inde nota inureretur. Hadr. Valeſius, Rerum Francicarum, Tom. III, lib. xxiii, pag. 379, apud le Roi, ibid.

We find, in the ſupplement to Moreri's Dictionary, Mr Godeau's arguments againſt thoſe, who on this ſubject follow Sigebert's chronicle; but thoſe arguments do but create confuſion. One thing ſeems to me to be certain, that it is of no uſe as to the true cauſe of St Lambert's murther, to know whether Alpaïde was married in form, or whether ſhe remained a concubine; for ſince the church ſeverely condemned marriages contracted after a divorce, biſhop Lambert would not have failed to call Pepin's commerce with Alpaïde, a concubinage, though Pepin had married her. Thus, by ſuppoſing the marriage, their opinion, who ſay, that Pepin was cenſured, remains ſtill probable. And becauſe a prince's miſtreſs has generally more intereſt than a lawful wife, it is no ways neceſſary, that Alpaïde ſhould be married to Pepin, to apprehend, how ſhe could prevail with him to put the biſhop to death, who cenſured them. Father Jourdan's chronological reaſon is, in my opinion, the beſt that can be urged againſt Sigebert.

[B] So many perſons have written his life, that it is diſfigured thereby.] This is Father Mabillon's obſervation, which baron le Roi furniſhes me with. 'Sanctus Landebertus ...... plures habuit vitæ ſuæ 'ſcriptores, Godeſcalcum Diaconum Leodienſem ſupparem. Stephanum Epiſcopum Leodienſem ineunte 'ſæculo X. Anſelmum ejuſdem Eccleſiæ Canonicum 'medio ſæculo XI. Nicolaum itidem Canonicum, & 'Reinerum Monachum ſæculo XII. Denique Ægidium Aureæ Vallis Cænobitam medio ſæculo XIII. 'Felicior certe futurus ſi vel unicum eumque diligentem habuiſſet. At S. Landeberto, id quod pluribus ſanctis, accidit, ut dum auctores alius poſt alium ipſius res geſtas illuſtrare exornando amplificandove moliti ſunt; eas è contrario incertis ac fabuloſis 'narrationibus inepte obſcurarint atrocibuſque mendis 'fœdarint (10).——The life of St Lambert has been 'written by ſeveral authors; Godeſcalcus, deacon of 'Liege; Stephanus, biſhop of Liege, in the beginning 'of the Xth Century; Anſelm, canon of the ſame 'church, in the middle of the XIth Century; Nicolaus 'likewiſe, a canon, and Renierus, a Monk, in the XIIth 'Century; laſtly, Ægidius, a Monk of the Golden 'Vale, in the middle of the XIIIth Century. It 'would have been certainly much better for St Lambert, had but one author, and he a careful one, written his life: but it has happened to him, as to many 'ſaints, that whilſt authors have ſucceſſively endeavoured to illuſtrate and ſet off their actions, they 'have unskillfully obſcured them with uncertain and 'fabulous accounts, and ſpoiled them by notorious miſtakes.' This is the origin of ſo many impertinent falſhoods. The multitude of panegyrics and lives will always produce this effect: no body is contented with the wonders publiſhed by foregoing authors; they therefore invent new ones, much more in favour of the book, and it's author, than in favour of the hero, who makes the ſubject of the book.

(10) Mabillonius, in Commentario ad Vitam S. Lamberti, apud Baronem le Roi, ubi ſupra, pag. 251.

I muſt except the legendaries; for they have commonly more at heart the reputation of the ſaint, than any thing elſe; but the reaſon is, becauſe the greater it is, the more it will encreaſe the number of devotees, and pious charities. Here follows a fine paſſage of Ludovicus Vives, wherein he condemns the falſe zeal, which has ſtuffed the hiſtory of ſaints with ſo many fabulous ſtories. 'Quæ de iis ſunt 'ſcripta, præter pauca quædam, multis ſunt commentis fœdata, dum qui ſcribit affectui ſuo indulget, & non quæ egit divus, ſed quæ ille egiſſe eum 'vellet, exponit: ut vitam dictet animus ſcribentis 'non veritas. Fuere qui magnæ pietatis loco ducerent mendaciola pro religione confingere: quod & 'periculoſum eſt, ne veris adimatur fides propter falſa, '& minimè neceſſarium: quoniam pro pietate noſtra 'tam multa ſunt vera, ut falſa tanquàm ignavi milites atque inutiles oneri ſint magis, quàm auxilio (11). '——The accounts of them, ſome few excepted, are 'full of fictions, whilſt the writer gives himſelf a 'ſcope, and ſets forth, not what the ſaint did, but 'what he would have had him done: inſomuch that 'the author's ſancy, not truth, dictates the life. Some 'have thought it great piety to lie a little for the 'ſake of religion: which is a dangerous thing (ſince 'what is falſe may deſtroy the credit of what is 'true,) and by no means neceſſary; ſince there are 'ſo many things true, that falſe accounts, like idle 'or uſeleſs ſoldiers, are rather a burthen than a 'help.'

LAMBERT (FRANCIS) a Franciſcan Monk, born at Avignon, was one of the firſt Monks in France, who renounced his order, to embrace Lutheraniſm. He arrived at Wittemberg in the month of January 1523 (a). He taught Divinity, and began by explaining there the prophet Hoſea. The Commentary he made on that prophet was printed at Straſburg in the year 1525, in 8vo. He dedicated it to Frederic duke of Saxony, and inſerted in his Epiſtle Dedicatory an account of the martyrdom of John Caſtellan, who had been burnt at Metz for having followed the Reformation. He added to the commentary on the fourth chapter of Hoſea a treatiſe De arbitrio hominis vere captivo contra impios liberi arbitrii adſertores. He had publiſhed in 1524 his commentary on the Song of Songs; and in dedicating it to Francis I, he obſerves that he had already ſent to that prince his treatiſe on marriage, de ſacro & fideli Conjugio, and that he had inſerted therein a letter, in which he acquaints him with his reaſons of abjuring Popery, and marrying (b): he publiſhed ſeveral other commentaries on the Scripture, and divers controverſial writings [A], which have been a long

This edition of his Commentary on the Revelations, is not the firſt; for this is what Bullinger ſays: Mr Francis Lambert, a man of learning and great piety, has taken great pains on the Apocalypſe, having publickly read that a long time very little known. He was very much eſteemed by Luther [B]. I do not very well know when he left Wittemberg; but I believe it was in 1526, and I know that he ſettled at Marpurg, and that he was there profeſſor of Divinity, and that he died there the eighteenth of April, 1530 (c). De integritate viri nulla eſt dubitatio: teſtes ſunt apud nos, qui illum & in Francia & in Baſilea audierunt; tum Baſileenſis ſuffraganeus ille Tripolitanus, cum pellicano, dant illi pulchrum teſtimonium. The honeſty of the man is unqueſtionable; we have here witneſſes of it, who heard him both in France and at Baſil; which teſtimony of his good character is confirmed by Tripolitanus, ſuffragan of Baſil, and Pellicanus. And though we abound in excellent lecturers, yet, if poſſible, we will not loſe him: I am thoroughly ſatisfied with the man, and think he deſerves to be aſſiſted. But you know my abilities, that it is not in my power to maintain him, who myſelf live upon alms. I think the prince ſhould be perſuaded to beſtow twenty or thirty florins on him (which would not be money thrown away, but lent to the Lord,) till he be ſupported by his relations, or maintain himſelf by his own induſtry.*' We learn from this paſſage, that our Lambert took the falſe name of Johannes Serranus, that he was of a noble family, that he had been a Franciſcan twenty years, that he had been in office in his order, that he had ſtaid ſome time at Baſil, and brought from thence a good teſtimonial of his probity. Luther (6) compoſed a preface to a book, which this Ex-Monk of Avignon publiſhed, De Minoritarum Regula. It appears by another letter of Luther, that this proſelyte, preparing to go to Zurich, to be nearer France, an attempt was made to procure him from the elector, the expences of his journey (7). If this letter of Luther was written to Spalatin in the month of Auguſt (8), 1523, we muſt believe, that Lambert changed his deſign, becauſe they gave him a poſt in the univerſity, and thus what Mr de Seckendorf adds, that he had neverthelеſs compoſed at Wittemberg, and dedicated to the elector, the expoſition of ſome of the prophets, and of the Song of Songs, and St Luke's Goſpel (9), would not be referred to it's true time, and there would be in it a tamen a little miſplaced. But it is probable, Luther wrote this in the month of Auguſt, 1526, whence we muſt conclude, that the tamen is very right, and that the journey to Zurich was put a ſtop to, becauſe Lambert was called into the country of Heſſe, as I am going to ſay.

[C] He was one of the principal inſtruments employed by the landgrave to introduce the reformation in his dominions.] He had been recommended to this prince as a man remarkable for his piety, wit, and learning, and able to confound and ſilence the Popiſh doctors. For this reaſon he deputed him to the ſynodical aſſembly, held at Hamburg, the twenty firſt of October, 1526. There Lambert expoſed to public diſputation, an hundred and fifty Lutheran propoſitions, and maintained them vigorouſly againſt the attacks of the guardian of the Franciſcans of Marpurg. The landgrave ſuffered every body to enter the liſts, and cauſed the reſpondent's theſes to be explained in German by his chancellor, when any one deſired it. After the diſpute, he ordered the Monks and Nuns to quit their convent; he appropriated their revenues to the ſupport of the univerſity of Marpurg, and of the hoſpitals; he ſettled Lutheran miniſters in the churches, and broke down the images. Lambert was choſen profeſſor of Divinity in the univerſity founded at Marpurg, in 1527 (10).

LAMECH, a deſcendant in a right line from Cain, was of the ſeventh generation, reckoning from Adam. The Holy Scripture (a) obſerves, that he had two wives, one whereof was called Adah, and the other Zillah, and it is believed, that this obſervation has a myſtery in it, ſince it ſerves to ſhew us the origin of Polygamy. It did not begin in the poſterity of Seth, who feared God, but in the corrupt and depraved poſterity of Cain, and by Lamech [A], who told his two wives, that he had killed a man. Such an origin, ſay they, muſt needs be ſcandalous. However it be, the marriage of this firſt tranſgreſſor of the law of Monogamy, eſtabliſhed in the terreſtrial paradiſe, did not bear the marks of reprobation, if we may judge of it by temporal bleſſings; for children proceeded from it, who had the skill of inventing

(a) Geneſis, chap. iv.

[A] And by Lamech.] The author of the Polygamia Triumphatrix was a very odd man; he ſpent his eſtate and his life in maintaining the lawfulneſs of Polygamy, and yet one wife would have been too much for him (1). He mightily commends Lamech's reſolution of marrying two wives (2), as an heroic action, and highly praiſes him, as being the firſt, who attentively examined that command of God, encreaſe and multiply, and who, having well conſidered it, made it his duty to obey it, according to the full extent of his ſtrength, by marrying two wives (3). No body durſt venture upon it before him; the remembrance of Eve's tranſgreſſion, and the conſideration of Adam's baniſhment, had made people timerous in that reſpect. Lamech was the firſt, who made that bold ſtep, with an heroic courage, without minding the difficulties that he was ſenſible of. He commented, not in words, but in actions, upon the text of the univerſal law, encreaſe and multiply; a law, which is a true commandment, and not a meer benediction (4). By this means he broke the ice, and gave a good example to thoſe that came after him. Obſerve here how this poor author was bigotted in favour of Polygamy; it was his darling notion; he thought that the Scripture mentions the double marriage of Lamech as an excellent exploit; whereas divines maintain with reaſon, that it was with a deſign to brand Polygamy in it's birth.

venting many good things [B]. Now the inventers of arts were ſo much eſteemed, that moſt of them have been placed in the number of the gods. It was therefore a great glory, and conſequently a remarkable temporal bleſſing at that time, to have the wit that was neceſſary for invention; but it is no ſign, that God approved of Lamech's Polygamy. The ſcripture mentions only four of this man's children (b); but, according to Joſephus (c), he had ſeventy ſeven by his two wives. What he told his wives is a riddle to me [C]; I ingenuouſly confeſs, it is above my underſtanding. I have ſlain a man, ſaid he (d), to my wounding, and a young man to my hurt; if Cain ſhall be avenged ſeven fold, truly Lamech ſeventy and ſeven fold. Many pretend, that he meant he had killed Cain [D], and Tubal-Cain; for there is a common tradition, that Lamech, who had been a great lover of hunting, continued the ſport, even when by reaſon of his great age, he was almoſt blind (e). He took with him his ſon Tubal-Cain, who not only ſerved him as a guide (f), but alſo directed him, where and when he ought to ſhoot at the beaſt. One day, as Cain was laid among the thickets, Lamech's guide ſeeing ſomething move in that place, gave him notice of it; whereupon Lamech ſhot an arrow, and ſlew Cain. He was extreamly concerned at it, and beat his guide ſo much, as to leave him dead upon the place. This, ſay they, is the way to make ſenſe of his words, which run thus, according to the vulgar tranſlation, Occidi virum in vulnus meum, & adoleſcentulum in livorem meum; wherein he diſtinguiſhes his way of killing the man (it was by a wound) from his way of killing the young lad, which was by bruiſes, that made his body black and blue. There are a thouſand abſurdities

[B] The ſkill of inventing many good things.] Jabal and Jubal, the ſons of Adah, Tubal-Cain, and Naamah his ſiſter (5), whoſe mother was Zillah, are the four children of Lamech, that are mentioned in Scripture. Jabal invented tents; Jubal invented ſome muſical inſtruments: Tubal-Cain invented ſeveral inſtruments of braſs and iron. The holy ſcripture, which teaches us this, does not attribute any invention to Naamah; but, if we believe the Rabbins, ſhe invented the art of ſpinning and weaving (6).

[C] What he ſaid to his wives is a riddle to me.] It is no eaſy thing to know how the words of Lamech in the original ought to be tranſlated. The Geneva verſion makes uſe of the future tenſe, I will ſlay, and repreſents Lamech as a man, who was to receive a wound before he ſhould kill: but the Vulgar renders it, I have ſlain; and as for the wound, one cannot tell to whom it relates; for this phraſe, Occidi virum in vulnus meum, is a barbariſm, which means nothing in Latin, and may ſignify whatever we pleaſe, as ſoon as we depart from the rules of Grammar. Some interpreters, well skilled in the Hebrew language (7), tranſlate it neither by the preter-tenſe, nor by the future, but reduce it all to a conditional propoſition. I would kill a man with a wound, and even a young man with a cudgel, or with my fiſt, if they would attack me. Now what way is there of coming at the true conſtruction of a period, which is as much in the future as in the preter-tenſe, and as much in the optative as in the indicative mood. But though we could get clear of the matter in the grammatical ſenſe, we ſhould not be far advanced; it would ſtill remain to be conſidered, what Lamech meant, ſpeaking to his two wives; which is no little difficulty. Nothing ſeems more remote from probability than the thought of thoſe, who take all this to be a rodomontade of Lamech (8): others take it to be a menace that he would kill his wives, if they continued to vex him by their bawling and diſputes (9). But others, on the contrary, take it to be an interrogation, deſigned to remove their fears: they were afraid that ſome body would kill him: he bids them have a good heart. with theſe words, Have I ſlain a man, &c.

[D] Many pretend, that he meant he had killed Cain.] A commentator (10), otherwiſe a very judicious and learned man, is miſtaken here; for he thinks it is the moſt probable interpretation of Lamech's words. He brings two proofs for it. Firſt, ſays he, Cain's poſterity extended itſelf to the deluge, and yet Moſes confines it to Lamech and his ſons; of which doubtleſs there is no other reaſon than this, that Cain's Life ended in the generation of Lamech, who killed him. Second, ſays he, the only reaſon why Moſes has related the murther, committed by Lamech, is, to point out the miſerable death of Cain. I could confute theſe proofs ſeveral ways. but I ſhall only ſay, that Pererius ſuppoſes a thing, which has no probability, viz. that it was Moſes's intention to inform the world, that Lamech killed Cain. If he had had ſuch an intention, would he have left ſuch impenetrable darkneſs in the fourth chapter of Geneſis? Had the death of Cain any thing myſterious in it, which ought to have been involved in ſuch ænigmatical expreſſions? In truth, if it could be proved, that Moſes had a like intention, we ought to apply to him this verſe of the goſpel, never man ſpake like this man (11), and cry out, tacui, Domine, quia feciſti, I was ſilent, O Lord, becauſe it was thou that dideſt it. That would be unpardonable in an author not inſpired. For the reſt, I pretend not to oppoſe, in general, the thought of thoſe, who take for marks of inſpiration, in the relations of Moſes, certain ſingularities, which are of ſuch a nature, that it is not probable an author would ever have made uſe of them, if he had directed his own work (12).

[E] There are a thouſand abſurdities in this ſtory, and the circumſtances that attend it.] I. It is an ill-grounded ſuppoſition, to ſay, that Lamech was almoſt blind (13) with old age, whilſt Cain, his grandfather's grandfather, was ſtill alive. II. It is abſurd to make him go a hunting at an age ſo decrepit, that he could not ſee his game, and ſtood in need of a guide to tell him when he was to ſhoot an arrow. III. It is abſurd to ſuppoſe, that the reaſon, which induced him to talk in this manner to his wives, was their ill treatment of him at that great age; either becauſe they could not reſiſt his exceſſive laſciviouſneſs, or becauſe of the ill manners of his children (14). What probability is there, that, at ſo great an age, he could give occaſion to his two wives to complain of his too frequent careſſes? IV. It is abſurd to ſay, that, when Lamech had been guilty of this double murther, his wives refuſed to lie with him, as believing that the race of Cain was to come to an end, according to the oracle, after the ſeventh generation (15): this, I ſay, is abſurd; for God was ſo far from threatening Cain to deſtroy his deſcendants after the ſeventh generation, that he aſſured him, that whoever ſhould kill him, ſhould be puniſhed ſevenfold. It is ſtill more abſurd to ſay (16), that Lamech led his two wives to Adam, and that he deſired him to catechiſe them, upon their refuſal to lie with him, and that Adam, beginning to reprimand them, was interrupted in ſuch a manner, as put him to confuſion. Does it become you, ſaid they to him, to teach us our duty? Let your cenſures fall firſt upon your ſelf, ſince for ſo many years you have lived apart from your wife's bed. I omit the little conſiſtence there is between the age they make Lamech to be of, and his eagerneſs to make his two wives hearken to reaſon, with regard to matrimonial enjoyment. I do not ſay, that the pretended recrimination would have been better imagined, if Adam had cenſured Lamech at their requeſt, and upon the complaints of his two wives; but I ſay, that Adam and Eve's ſeparation from bed, after Abel's death, having laſted, according to the idle fancies of the Rabbins, but 130 years, it is abſurd to ſuppoſe, that Adam was reproached for it, as a thing that continued ſtill, when Cain was killed. Iſaac Voſſius has, upon this ſubject, confounded Lamech, who had two wives at one time, with

But who is ſo ſtupid, as not to ſee the folly of this tale? It would follow from thence, that Lamech, who was the ſeventh from Seth, lived long before Seth was born.*’ It is abſurd to ſuppoſe, that Tubal-Cain being yet a young lad, was killed by his own father; how could he have been the inventer of divers inſtruments of braſs, as the Scripture ſays he was? LAMIA, a Roman family. It was a branch of the houſe of the Ælii [A], into which probably it entered only by adoption; for it is ſaid to be deſcended from LAMUS (a) the ſon of Neptune, and king of the Læſtrygones, who lived in a town, which was afterwards called Formiæ. This is the opinion of Horace [B]. So antient a Genealogy as this, with which the Poet flatters his friend ÆLIUS LAMIA, is doubtleſs the reaſon why Juvenal, being willing to denote a lady of the firſt quality, made uſe of theſe words, quædam de numero LAMIARUM (b). It is very probable, that he, to whom Horace inſcribes the ſeventeenth ode of the third book, and whom he mentions, in ſeveral other places, with marks of eſteem, was the father of LUCIUS ÆMILIUS LAMIA (c), who died towards the end of the reign of Tiberius, in the 786th year of Rome, after he had been governor of Syria [C]; from whence he was recalled to be governor of Rome. He was honoured with the funeral rites of a cenſor (d). From him perhaps deſcended ÆLIUS LAMIA, the huſband of Domitia Longina, whom Domitian took from him. He put him to death ſome time after [D]. There was alſo one LUCIUS ÆLIUS LAMIA, who for having too zealouſly embraced Cicero's party againſt Piſo, was baniſhed. Afterwards he was made Ædile, and then Prætor, after the death of Cæſar, in the year of Rome 711. Some think it was he, who, being thought dead,

(b) Juven. Sat. VI, ver. 383.

(c) Glandorp, Onomaſt. pag 14, ſays, he is the ſame, who died in the year 786. He makes him live too long.

(d) See the remark [C], citat. (23).

[A] It was a branch of the houſe of the Ælii.] The Antonini, emperors of Rome, deſcended from that houſe; it contained ſeven or eight branches, that were all Plebeian; viz. the Cati, the Tuberones, the Galli, the Stilones, the Præconini, the Segani, and the Lamiæ (1). No one ſays, that the Ælii deſcended from Lamus king of the Læſtrygones; but this was ſaid of the Lamiæ; and therefore the latter muſt have entered by adoption into the family of the others.

[B] This is the opinion of Horace.] Theſe are his words (2):

Æli vetuſto nobilis ab Lamo,
Quando & priores hinc Lamias ferunt
  Denominatos, & nepotum
    Per memores genus omne faſtos:
Autore ab illo ducis originem
Qui Formiarum mœnia dicitur
  Princeps, & innantem Maricæ
    Littoribus tenuiſſe Lyrin
Late tyrannus.

Ælius, whoſe race from Lamus came,
Whence firſt aroſe the Lamian name;
From him your high deſcent you prize,
Who bade the walls of Formiæ riſe;
Who wat'ry Lyris taught t' obey,
And rul'd with wide-extended ſway.

The antient Romans were as ridiculous in point of Genealogy, as people are at preſent. How many families did they not ſay deſcended from a companion of Hercules, or ſome other perſon of the fabulous ages? Silius Italicus believed, that Lamus had reigned in Cajeta (3). See Bochart's Geographia Sacra (4).

[C] LUCIUS ÆLIUS LAMIA .... governor of Syria.] He had only the title of it, and did not keep it long; the injuſtice done him upon that occaſion proved glorious to him. ‘Extremo anni mors Ælii Lamiæ funere cenſorio celebrata, qui adminiſtrandæ Suriæ imagine tandem exſolutus urbi præfuerat. Genus illi decorum, vivida ſenectus; & non permiſſa provincia dignationem addiderat (5). —— At the end of the year, the death of Ælius Lamia was honoured with ſuch funeral rites, as belonged to the dignity of cenſor; who, having laid down his imaginary government of Syria, was made Præfect of the city. He was of an honourable family: enjoyed a vigorous old age; and the not permitting him to enjoy the province turned to his honour.’ He had commanded in Africa (6).

[D] ÆLIUS LAMIA ..... Domitian put him to death ſome time after.] I ſpeak of it in the article of DOMITIA LONGINA, where I cite the neceſſary authorities. Juvenal alludes to the death of this Lamia in the fourth ſatire.

Sed periit poſtquam Cerdonibus eſſe timendus dead, ſo that fire was put to his funeral pile, recovered his ſenſes by the action of the fire [E]. Conſult Streinnius's Roman families, and Glandorp's Onomaſticon (e).

[E] LUCIUS ÆLIUS LAMIA . . . . being thought a dead man . . . . recovered his ſenſes by the action of the fire.] See what Valerius Maximus ſays of it: ‘ L. quoque Lamiæ prætorio viro æquè ‘ vocem fuiſſe ſuper rogum conſtitit (8). —— L. La- ‘ mia likewiſe, of Prætorian dignity, was found to be ‘ alive, when on the funeral pile.’ Pliny alſo makes mention of it (9).

LAMIA, a town of Theſſaly. It is chiefly memorable for the battle that was fought, in it's territory, between the Athenians, aſſiſted by the other Greeks, and Antipater, governor of Macedonia. It was after the death of Alexander. The ſucceſs of that battle was very fatal to the Athenians, and to ſeveral other towns of Greece (a). Suidas is miſtaken in ſaying, that Antipater loſt the battle (b).

LAMIA, the daughter of Neptune. The Greeks ſaid, that the Africans named her Sibylla; that ſhe was the firſt woman that propheſied; and that Jupiter had a daughter by her, named Herophyle, who was one of the Sibyls (a). Others ſay, that Lamia was a handſome African woman [A], by whom Jupiter had ſome children, and that Juno deſtroyed them all out of jealouſy; which threw the mother into ſuch a furious grief, that ſhe not only became ugly, but alſo ſo cruel, as to ſteal away children, and killed them (b). Hence doubtleſs came the popular tradition, which the Poets adopted upon the ſtage [B]. Lamia, or the LAMIÆ, were ſpoken of under another notion; for it was ſaid, that they could lay aſide their eyes, and reſume them when they thought fit. They took them out in their own houſes, and put them in again, when they went abroad. It is the emblem of curioſity and ſelf-love [C]. Philoſtratus repreſents them as very laſcivious [D]. I know not whether the fiſh LAMIA [E] had it's name from what the fables ſaid of the Lamiæ, or whether the latter owed their name to that fiſh. Moreri's faults are not conſiderable [F].

[A] Several ſay, ſhe was a handſome African woman.] Many authors agree in making Lamia a native of Africa. Doris, or Duris (1), does it; and ſo does Heſychius. Ariſtophanes's Scholiaſt (2) ſays, that ſhe was the daughter of Belus and Libya. Conſider this paſſage of Euripides.

Οὐκ οἶδε Λαμίας τῆς Λιβυστικῆς γένος;

Quis Africanæ neſciat Lamiæ genus
Infame nomen & tetrum mortalibus (3)?

Who knows not Lamia, thy deteſted race,
Moſt infamous, and Africa's diſgrace?

Diodorus Siculus relates, that Ophellas, king of Cyrene, going to meet Agathocles, who made war with the Carthaginians, found a cavern, wherein it was ſaid, that queen Lamia was born (4). Bochart (5) thinks, that the name Lamia is derived from the Punic word labam, or labama, which ſignifies ſtill, among the Arabians, to devour.

[B] The popular tradition, which the Poets adopted upon the ſtage.] It is upon this that Horace gives them good advice.

Ficta voluptatis cauſa ſint proxima veris,
Nec quodcumque volet, poſcat ſibi fabula credi,
Neu pranſæ Lamiæ vivum puerum extrahat alvo (6).

Fiction ſhou'd ſtill the ſemblance bear of truth:
Thus, ſhou'd unnatural Lamia eat a child,
And then diſgorge, alive, the human meal,
The tale improbable wou'd ſhock belief.

Philoſtratus ſays, that the Lamiæ were fond of human fleſh (7). Among the old womens ſtories, in ſome countries, there are many, in which fairies are mentioned, as great eaters of children.

[C] It is the emblem of curioſity and ſelf-love.] Conſult Plutarch (8), who ſays, that like Lamia, who was blind at home, and, when ſhe went out, took her eyes out of a box, in which ſhe kept them, every man is very intent upon the faults of his neighbour, but makes no uſe of his eyes to diſcover his own vices.

[D] Philoſtratus repreſents them as very laſcivious.] He ſays (9), that, out of a principle of leudneſs, they enticed the men, whom they deſired to devour, in a proper time and place; and that they eſpecially delighted to eat handſome boys, when they were grown fat and plump. It was not eaſy methinks, to grow fat in the ſervice of thoſe laſcivious creatures. Philoſtratus ſhould have thought of this difficulty. Perhaps one might apply to the preſent ſubject, the explication, which ſome have given of the fable of Diomedes king of Thrace, who fed his mares with the fleſh of his gueſts. The meaning of which is, according to ſome, that he forced them to ſatisfy the luſt of his daughters, till they had nothing left but ſkin and bones. ‘ Diomedes Thraciæ Rex cùm aliquot haberet filias ſalaciſſimas, cogebat hoſpites ut earum libidinem ſatiarent; dictus ob id equas humanis carnibus paſcere; equa enim & mulier ſolæ animalium appetunt marem etiam prægnantes, unde equiendi vocabulum, ut ait Ariſtoteles *, trahitur maledicto in fœminas procaces: comedunt verò carnes humanas, cùm viros exſugunt, & coitu emaciatos ad tabem perducunt; ut recte Solomon † à mulierum conſuetudine revocet adoleſcentes, ne fruſtrà gemere incipiant, poſteaquàm carnes ſuas conſumpſerint (10). —— Diomedes king of Thrace, having ſome very leud daughters, obliged his gueſts to ſatiſfy their luſt; whence he was ſaid to feed his mares with human fleſh; for a mare, and a woman, are the only animals, who deſire the male, when pregnant; whence, according to Ariſtotle, leud women are ſaid, by way of reproach, equire, to play the mare: and they devour human fleſh, when they drain men, and waſte them away through copulation; ſo that Solomon rightly diſſuades young men from the company of women, leſt they begin to lament in vain, after they have conſumed their fleſh.’

[E] The fiſh LAMIA.] It is a fiſh of a prodigious bulk and voracity. Some times the whole body of a man has been found in it's belly. See Mr Ray in his Hiſtory of Fiſhes, and the following remark, wherein I cenſure Calepin.

[F] Moreri's faults are not conſiderable.] I. Phavorinus, who is a modern author (11) ſhould not have been cited. II. Much leſs ought he to be cited before Suidas. III. Inſtead of ſaying, that the antients gave the Lamiæ the name of Lares, he ſhould have ſaid Larvæ. IV. He ought not to have cited Rhodiginus, but Philoſtratus, from whom he took all that he has ſaid of the Lamiæ (12). V. He ſhould however have cited the twenty ninth, and not the forty ninth book; for his Antiquæ Lectiones contain only thirty books. VI. He ſhould not have cited Pliny, ſince he has ſaid nothing of the fiſh he calls Lamia (13); and yet Moreri wanted an author, who had conſidered the Lamiæ as extraordinary fiſhes. LAMIA, a celebrated courtezan, the daughter of an Athenian, named Cleanor (a). From a player on the flute, which was her profeſſion, ſhe became the concubine of Ptolemy I, king of Egypt; but, before that, ſhe had made her ſelf famous as a woman of pleaſure [A]. She was taken, with ſeveral of her companions, in the ſea-fight, wherein Demetrius Poliorcetes obtained the victory over that prince, near the iſle of Cyprus (b). Being brought to Demetrius, ſhe appeared ſo charming to him, though ſhe began to decline [B], that ſhe was afterwards his favourite miſtreſs. For this reaſon it was ſaid, that the others loved him, but that he loved her. He was jeſted upon on this account [C]. He ſo loaded her with riches, that ſhe found herſelf in a capacity of living at a very expenſive rate [D]. She was excellent at witty ſayings and repartees

[A] She had made herſelf famous as a woman of pleaſure.] Plutarch affirms it. Theſe are his words; Ἐν δὲ τούτοις ἡ περιβόητος ἦν Λάμεια, τὴν μὲν ἀρχὴν σπουδασθεῖσα διὰ τὴν τέχνην, (ἐδόκει γὰρ αὐλεῖν οὐκ εὐκαταφρονήτως) ὕστερον δὲ καὶ τοῖς ἐρωτικοῖς λαμπρὰ γενομένη. In his nobilis illa fuit Lamia, quæ initio propter artem fuit in pretio habita. Siquidem ſcienter tibia canebat. Poſt extitit commercio meretricio celebris (1), ——— Among theſe, was that famous Lamia, who was at firſt eſteemed as an artiſt; for ſhe played skillfully on the flute. She afterwards became a famous courtezan. When a woman is paid for ſinging, dancing, or playing upon inſtruments; I mean, when ſhe makes a trade of it on the ſtage, or in ſolemn aſſemblies, it is the high-way to debauchery. No wonder then, if our Lamia, from a player on the flute, became a courtezan. The tranſition is very natural.

[B] She appeared charming to Demetrius, though ſhe began to decline.] I ſhould have uſed more proper terms, to repreſent her old, if I had only conſulted Plutarch; but having read in Athenæus, that ſhe had a daughter by Demetrius (2), I thought the expreſſions were to be ſoftned. Theſe are the words of Plutarch: Τότε γοῦν ἤδη λήγουσα τῆς ὥρας, καὶ πολὺ νεώτερον ἑαυτῆς λαβοῦσα τὸν Δημήτριον, ἐκράτησε τῇ χάριτι καὶ κατέσχεν’ ὥστε ἐκείνης εἶναι μόνης ἐραστὴν τῶν δὲ ἄλλων γυναικῶν ἐρώμενον. Tunc verò etiam exoleſcente forma multo ſe minorem pellexit Demetrium, adeoque lepore devinxit & cepit eum, ut ab aliis mulieribus amaretur, unius illius eſſet amator (3). At that time, tho’ in the decline of her beauty, ſhe enſnared Demetrius, who was much younger than herſelf, and ſo captivated him, that, tho’ beloved by other women he loved only her. I ſhall ſet down another paſſage below (4), that is no leſs expreſs. It is commonly ſaid, that, in families, love deſcends much more than it aſcends; fathers love their children, more than children love their fathers. The ſame thing may be ſaid of the love of men to women; the men are commonly older than the women they love. But this rule admits of many exceptions, and even in royal families: witneſs the Dauphin, who fell in love with an old widow, under the reign of Francis I. I mention it in the article of DIANA of POITIERS. We ſee here a young king led captive by a woman much older than himſelf. Nor need we wonder at it, ſince an old courtezan, with ſome remains of beauty, ſupported with art and cunning, may ſtrongly captivate a young man. However it be, if Demetrius found great charms in Lamia, the firſt time he ſaw her, ſhe appeared no leſs charming to him in the privacies they had together: Φησὶ δὲ τὴν Λαμίαν τὸν βασιλέ’ εὐμελῶς κελητίσαι ἰπερεπαινεθῆναιθ’. Idem ait Demetrium ab incubante Lamia concinne ſuaviterque ſubagitatum fuiſſe, & idcirco eam laudaſſe (5). It was not only her agility, that made her ſo charming to Demetrius ſhe gave him amorous bites (6), which probably pleaſed that prince, as much as his paſſion for her diſpleaſed his friends. They could not diſſemble it; for, when his embaſſadors ſaw the ſcars, which Lyſimachus ſhewed them in his thighs and arms, they anſwered him that the king their maſter had ſome alſo in his neck, which were the effect of the teeth of the furious beaſt Lamia. We muſt know, that Lyſimachus had fought with a lyon, and ſhewed them the marks of the wounds he had received in that fight. The words of the original have more grace than the ſubſtance I give of them. Ἀφίκοντο γοῦν τινες παρ’ αὐτῷ κατὰ πρεσβείαν πρὸς Λυσίμαχον, οἷς ἐκεῖνος ἄγων σχολὴν ἐπέδειξεν ἔν τε τοῖς μηροῖς, καὶ τοῖς βραχίοσιν ὠτειλὰς βαθείας ὀνύχων λεοντείων. καὶ διηγεῖτο τὴν γενομένην αὐτῷ μάχην πρὸς τὸ θηρίον, ὑπὸ Ἀλεξάνδρου συγκαθειρχθέντι τοῦ βασιλέως. οἱ δὲ, γελῶντες ἔφασαν, καὶ τὸν αὐτῶν βασιλέα δεινοῦ θηρίου δήγματα φέρειν ἐν τῷ τραχήλῳ Λαμίας. Venerunt ad Lyſimachum aliqui ab Demetrio legati, quibus ille per otium altas in cruribus & brachiis ſuis leoninorum unguium cicatrices oſtendit, expoſuitque ſuam cum leone pugnam, quam ab Alexandro rege cum illo concluſus conſeruerat. Illi in riſum effuſi ſuum quoque regem prædicaverunt immanis feræ in collo ferre morſus Lamiæ (7). —— There came to Lyſimachus certain embaſſadors from Demetrius, to whom he took an opportunity of ſhewing the deep ſcars in his legs and arms, which he had received in fighting with a lion, with whom, by Alexander's command, he had been ſhut up. They falling into laughter, ſaid, that their maſter could ſhew likewiſe the bites of a great beaſt, called Lamia, on his neck.

[C] He was jeſted upon on that account.] People wondered to ſee Demetrius, who took a diſlike to his wiſe Phila, becauſe ſhe began to decline, become ſuch a ſlave to Lamia, who was already in decay (8). He one day asked Demo, what ſhe thought of Lamia, who was playing on the flute while they dined. She is an old woman, ſaid Demo. When the deſert was brought in, You ſee, ſaid he to Demo, how many things Lamia ſends me. My mother, anſwered Demo, will ſend you more, if you will alſo lie with her (9). Note, that ſhe was a courtezan, who had been concubine to Antigonus, Demetrius's father, and who was afterwards loved by Demetrius (10). Plutarch ſays ſhe was ſirnamed Mania; but Athenæus (11) ſpeaks of Demo and Mania, as being two diſtinct courtezans. There aroſe a violent hatred betwixt Lyſimachus and Demetrius, which gave Lyſimachus occaſion to reflect upon Demetrius's fondneſs for Lamia. She is, ſaid he, the firſt courtezan, that I ever ſaw taken from the ſtage. Demetrius anſwered, I will have him to know, that my whore is more honeſt than his Penelope (12). James Amiot has not underſtood this: he makes Lyſimachus ſay, hitherto I have never ſeen a whore play in a tragedy. Plutarch's words do not mean this. Λυσίμαχος λοιδορῶν εἰς τὸν ἔρωτα τῆς Λαμείας ἔλεγε νῦν πρῶτον ἑωρακέναι πόρνην προερχομένον ἐκ τραγικῆς σκηνῆς. Lyſimachus inſectans eum ob Lamiæ amores, dictitabat nunc primum ſcortum ſe ex tragica prodiens (13) ſcena vidiſſe. The beſt verſion would not clear this thought of Lyſimachus, if we were ignorant of a thing related by Athenæus (14); namely, that Demetrius had ſaid, that Lyſimachus's court reſembled a comic ſtage; none come out of, but ſuch as have only two ſyllables in their names. Thus he laughed at one Bithes, one Paris and ſome others, whoſe names were no longer, and who were Lyſimachus's chief favourites. When Lyſimachus heard this jeſt, he only anſwered, that he never ſaw at his court a whore taken from a tragic ſtage. He alluded to Lamia, who was a player on the flute (15), and conſequently of a profeſſion uſed in the acting of tragedies.

[D] She found herſelf in a capacity to live expenſively.] It is common for the miſtreſſes of kings to be fond of immortalizing their names by magnificent buildings. Lamia was of this humour; ſhe cauſed tees [E]; and, as the Athenians carried their flatteries of Demetrius to the moſt extravagant impieties, they built a temple to this concubine, under the name of VENUS LAMIA [F], though, on a certain occaſion, they were very much diſcontented to ſee their money beſtowed upon this woman [G]. The Thebans committed the ſame impiety (c). The ſtory we read, in Athenæus, concerning Demetrius and Lamia, is not fit to be mentioned in a modern language [H]. I queſtion whether Ælian has exactly related what he ſays of theſe two perſons [I]. Plutarch tells us how Lamia animadverted on a judgment paſſed upon love matters [K]. What I have ſaid againſt Antony de Guevara about Lais, I repeat on the account of Lamia. He has publiſhed as many lies about the one, as about the other. Brantome has been impoſed upon by it [L]. Moreri is very ſhort upon this head; and therefore I have not cauſed a moſt noble portico to be built in Sicyon, of which an author (16) publiſhed a deſcription. She one day gave a very magnificent entertainment to Demetrius. There was a book upon this ſubject (17). Χωρὶς δὲ τούτων αὐτὴ καθ' ἑαυτὴν ἡ Λαμία τῷ βασιλεῖ παρασκευάζουσα δεῖπνον, ἠργυρολόγησε πολλούς. καὶ τὸ δεῖπνον, οὕτως ἤνθησε τῇ δόξῃ διὰ τὴν πολυτέλειαν, ὥστε ὑπὸ Λυγκέως τοῦ Σαμίου συγγεγράφθαι. δι' ὃ καὶ τῶν κωμικῶν τις οὐ φαύλως τὴν Λαμίαν Ἐλέπολιν ἀληθῶς προσεῖπε. Præter hæc ipſa ſeorſum Lamia cœnam regi parans, à multis pecuniam conciliavit, atque ob immenſos ſumptus uſque adeo fuit illa celebrata cœna, ut eam Lynceus Samius mandaverit literis. Quamobrem Lamiam comicus quidam appoſite veram Helepolim vocavit (18). Plutarch had been ſpeaking of the great ſums, which Demetrius had obliged the Athenians to give to Lamia (19); and he adds, that this woman beſides made many perſons give her money for the feaſt ſhe prepared for Demetrius.

[E] She was excellent at witty ſayings and repartees.] Athenæus ſays ſo. Ἦν δὲ, ſays he (20), Λαμία σφόδρα εὔθικτος καὶ ἀττικὴ πρὸς τὰς ἀποκρίσεις. Fuit quidem certe Lamia dicteriis ſalſa & acuta, prorſuſque in reſpondendo Athenienſis. —— Lamia certainly had a keen wit, and was a perfect Athenian at a repartee.

[F] The Athenians . . . . . . built a temple to this concubine under the name of VENUS LAMIA.] They built another to Leæna, concubine to the ſame Demetrius (21), and paid the ſame honour to the favourites of this prince. Altars, libations, and hymns, were not wanting. Demetrius was ſo ſurprized at it, that he openly ſaid, that there was then no citizen in Athens, that had any courage. His thought has been miſerably disfigured by Athenæus's tranſlator. He makes him ſay, that there would never be in hell an Athenian of a great ſpirit: Admirante ipſo Demetrio quæ tum fierent, palamque dicente apud inferos nullum unquam futurum magni excelſique animi civem Athenienſem. One letter, put in the room of two others (22), has occaſioned the prodigious change of this thought. Theſe are Athenæus's words: Ὥστε καὶ αὐτὸν τὸν Δημήτριον θαυμάζειν ἐπὶ τοῖς γενομένοις, καὶ λέγειν ὅτι οὐδεὶς ἐπ' αὐτοῦ Ἀθηναίων γέγονε μέγας καὶ ἁδρὸς τὴν ψυχήν. This reflexion of Demetrius puts me in mind of an exclamation of Tiberius, ‘ Memoriæ proditur Tiberium, quotiens curia ‘ egrederetur, Græcis verbis in hunc modum eloqui ‘ ſolitum, ô homines ad ſervitutem paratos? Scilicet ‘ etiam illum, qui libertatem publicam nollet, tam ‘ projectæ ſervientium patientiæ tædebat (23). —— It ‘ is related of Tiberius, that, as often as he went out ‘ of his palace, he uſed to expreſs himſelf in Greek ‘ words to this purpoſe; O men prepared for ſlavery? ‘ Even he, who was an enemy to the public liberty, ‘ was weary of ſuch ſervile patience.’

[G] . . . . tho' they were . . . diſcontented to ſee their money beſtowed upon this woman.] Amongſt many violences, which the Athenians ſuffered from Demetrius, nothing vexed them more than the order he gave, that they ſhould pay him immediately 250 talents. He cauſed this tax to be raiſed with great rigour, and precipitation; and when the money was ready, he commanded them to pay it in to Lamia, and the other courtezans ſhe had in her train; this is, ſaid he, to buy them ſoap. Theſe words, and this uſe, was a greater vexation to the Athenians, than the loſs of their money. Ἰδὼν ἠθροισμένον τὸ ἀργύριον, ἐκέλευσε Λαμίᾳ καὶ ταῖς περὶ αὐτὴν ἑταίραις εἰς σμῆγμα δοθῆναι· ἡ γὰρ αἰσχύνη, τῆς ζημίας καὶ τὸ ῥῆμα τοῦ πράγματος μᾶλλον ἠνώχλησε τοὺς ἀνθρώπους. Ubi coactum argentum vidit, Lamiæ juſſit id, cæteriſque meretricibus quæ circa eam erant, ad ſmegma præberi. Pupugit enim cives pudor magis quam jactura, & verba, quibus eſt uſus quam exactio (24). At preſent we ſhould ſay pin-money, inſtead of ſoap. See the margin (25).

[H] The ſtory, which we read in Athenæus, concerning Demetrius and Lamia, are not fit to be mentioned in a modern language.] Judge of it by this Latin; ‘ De ‘ Lamia rurſum Machon hæc ſcribit, Demetrium aliquando inter pocula, varia genera unguentorum oſtentantem Lamiæ tibicinæ, ut illa non ita jucundè ‘ olere dixit, non nihil commotum & tanquam vellicatum, quòd improbans omnia petulantiùs illuderet, innuiſſe ut Nardinum quoddam afferretur, & ‘ cùm pudendum manu confricuiſſet, ac digitis contrectaſſet, dixiſſe, hoc Lamia olfacita, quantum à ‘ reliquis diſtet, cognoſces: illam verò ſubridentem reſpondiſſe, atque, ô miſer, omnium longè putidiſſimum ‘ hoc eſſe mihi videtur: regemque mox ſubjeciſſe, ‘ è regia tamen glande per Jovem eſt, ô Lamia (26).

[I] I know not, whether Ælian has exactly related what he ſays of theſe two perſons.] Demetrius, ſays he (27), who reigned over ſo many nations, went often in his arms, and with his diadem on his head to the courtezan Lamia. He would have very much diſgraced himſelf, if he had ſent for her; but he went very carefully to her houſe. I make leſs account of this prince, than of Theodorus the piper, who rejected Lamia's intreaties to viſit her. This is the ſtory of that author: which I cannot but ſuſpect; for Demetrius never ſaw Lamia, till ſhe was preſented to him, after the naval victory he obtained over the king of Egypt. Lamia was no longer a common woman; ſhe belonged to the king. If it be ſaid, that, after ſhe belonged to Demetrius, ſhe had her houſe a-part, and that therefore it is very poſſible, that Demetrius might be ſeen to viſit her; I anſwer, that he would not have gone to her as to a public courtezan, but as to a miſtreſs, whom he believed to be ſolely at his pleaſure, and whom he had enabled to have a fine houſe of her own. If it be ſo, Ælian's cenſure comes to nothing; for when once a prince is engaged in public concubinage, it is the ſame thing whether he goes to his miſtreſs, or ſhe comes to him: nay, it is more ſcandalous to ſee her lodged in his palace, than in a houſe of her own. I am perſuaded, that Lamia had her lodgings with Demetrius; and, if ſhe had not, Demetrius went not to ſee her, as a courtezan, who opened her doors to all comers. And yet this is Ælian's ſuppoſition, upon which he builds the morality of this chapter.

[K] Lamia animadverted on a judgment paſſed on matters of love.] The fact is this: Thonis (28), an Egyptian courtezan, had demanded a great ſum of a young man, who loved her: whereupon the bargain broke off; and the lover withdrew re infecta. He dreamed in the night, that he lay with that woman, which cured his paſſion. Thonis, underſtanding the whole myſtery, pretended, that the young man ought to pay her, and ſummoned him before the judges. Bochoris condemned the defendant to put the money in a purſe, which ſhe demanded, and to move it ſo that the ſhadow of it might fall upon Thonis. This judge meant by it, that opinion is but the ſhadow of truth, and that the young man's pleaſure in a dream was only the ſhadow of a real one. Lamia a competent judge in theſe matters, ſaid one day, that this judgment was unjuſt; becauſe the ſhadow of the purſe had not cured the courtezan's paſſion for the money, whereas the dream had cured the young man's paſſion (29).

[L] Guevara has publiſhed as many falſities of Lamia as of Lais. Brantome, has been impoſed upon by him.] He gives out (30) ſome maxims, as if they were Lamia's, which are only Guevara's fictions. If we not many faults to charge him with [M]. I am ſurpriſed at a doubt of Mr Menage [N].

You will find a great commendation of this Lamia in a book (d) that Mr Baudelot publiſhed in the year 1698.

we muſt take the advice, ſays he (31), of a courtezan, who was one of the moſt famous in former times, and very well skilled in her profeſſion, viz. Lamia who ſaid, &c. One Francis Voilleret, Sieur de Florizel, counſellor, notary, and ſecretary to the king, houſe and crown of France, publiſhed (32), as true matter of fact, all the falſities he had read, in that Spaniſh author, concerning the three courtezans Flora, Lais, and Lamia. So true it is, that one bad author is enough to ſpoil many others.

[M] Moreri is very ſhort upon this head, I have not many faults to charge him with.] I. This expreſſion, The Thebans conſecrated to her the temple of Venus Lamia, is fallacious: it induces one to believe, that the Thebans had a temple of Venus Lamia, which they conſecrated to Demetrius's miſtreſs. Moreri ſhould therefore have ſaid, to avoid ambiguity, that the Thebans built a temple in honour of this miſtreſs, and called it the temple of Venus Lamia. II. It is not true, that Plutarch makes mention of this; he ſhould have cited Athenæus. Moreri had this falſe quotation from Charles Stephens (33).

[N] I am ſurprized at a doubt of Mr Menage.] He queſtions whether the courtezan Lamia is the ſame Athenian lady, that was kept by Demetrius Phalereus. An eadem eſt ac illa nobilis femina quam amabat Phalereus (34)? in calling her a noble woman, he builds upon theſe words of Diogenes Laërtius: Ἀλλὰ ἀστῇ καὶ εὐγενεῖ συνῴκει Λαμείᾳ τῇ ἐρωμένῃ. Verum urbana ac nobili amica Lamia utebatur quam amabat. If theſe words be pointed thus, one may very well deny, that Lamia, the miſtreſs of Demetrius Poliorcetes, was loved by Demetrius Phalereus; for the miſtreſs of Demetrius Poliorcetes was only a player on the flute, and conſequently was not of a noble family. Menage was in the right to cenſure Dalechamp, who has tranſlated theſe words of Athenæus, Δημήτριος δ' ὁ Πολιορκητὴς οὐ δαιμονίως ἤρα Λαμίας τῆς αὐλητρίδος thus, Demetrius Phalereus Lamiam tibicinem amavit perditiſſime; but he ſhould likewiſe have cenſured Aldobrandin, who ſays, that the Thebans, out of complaiſance to Demetrius Phalereus, built a temple to Venus Lamia, in order to honour the memory of his miſtreſs Lamia (35). Aldobrandin cites Cœlius Rhodiginus, l. 29. c. 5. Here are three things to be cenſured. I. It was not to pleaſe Demetrius Phalereus, but Demetrius Poliorcetes, that the Thebans built this temple. II. Aldobrandin ſhould have quoted Athenæus, and not Cœlius Rhodiginus. III. He ſhould have ſaid, that the Athenians had the ſame complaiſance as the Thebans.

LAMPONIANO (JOHN ANDREW) deſcended from an illuſtrious family of Milan (a), was one of three domeſtics of Galeazzo Sforza, duke of Milan, who conſpired againſt that prince, and killed him in St Stephen's church, the twenty ſixth of December 1476. It was Lamponiano that gave him the two firſt wounds. He pretended to remove the crowd, and to have letters to preſent to the duke. He was enraged againſt him on account of a law-ſuit [A], in which he could not prevail with this prince to interpoſe his good offices againſt his adverſary; he hoped to find his account in a revolution of the ſtate; and he wanted an after-game, for he had ſquandered away the greateſt part of his patrimony, and found himſelf as vain, and as much addicted to luxury as before. His two accomplices were Charles Viſconti, and Jerom Olgiati. The latter was engaged in this black conſpiracy by the glory, which a School-maſter, who hated the duke, repreſented to him in the murder of a tyrant [B]. As for [A] He was enraged againſt the duke of Milan on account of a law ſuit.] The thing was thus, according to Paul Jovius: 'Ad audendum immane uſque 'adeo & periculoſum facinus vehementer incitabat 'illata ſibi injuria à Caſtellioneo Comenſium antiſtite, 'à quo ſacri latifundii poſſeſſione contra jus interrupta locatione, ſe perinique ſpoliatum querebatur. 'Totum autem ejus injuriæ odiique venenum vertebat in principem, qui à ſe ſuppliciter deprecante eam 'contumeliam, ſæpe rogatus adverſarium in extrahenda lite præpotentem, neque advertere, neque mollire 'voluiſſet (1). ——— He was prompted to this great 'and dangerous attempt by the injurious treatment of 'the biſhop of Como, who, as he pretended, had unjuſtly robbed him of large poſſeſſions. He turned 'his whole reſentment of this injury againſt the prince, 'whom he had in vain petitioned againſt his too 'powerful adverſary.' This puts me in mind of Philip King of Macedon, who was killed by a man (2), who could not obtain from him the revenge he deſired for a bloody affront (3). He thought no longer of revenging himſelf on the author of that affront, but on the prince, who did not do him juſtice (4).

[B] Olgiati . . . . . was engaged . . . . . . by the glory which a ſchool-maſter, enemy to the duke, repreſented to him in the murther of a tyrant.] His name was Cola Montanus, and he had been preceptor to Galeazzo Sforza, who, remembering, more than he ſhould have done, the laſhes he had received from his pedagogue, ordered him to be publickly whipped. Hic cola quondam Galeacii pædagogus dirum in principem odium conceperat impotenti ejus contumelia percitus, quod ille puerilium verberum nimis memor, poſtquam adolevit, imperiumque ſuſcepit, ipſi Colæ tanquam immiti ſubagreſtique præceptori, acceptas olim plagas nudatis clunibus loro palam rependi juſſiſſet (5). Cola, exaſperated with this affront, inflamed young Olgati with an ardent deſire of glory, by murthering the tyrant, and by that means reſtoring the liberty of his country. He extolled to the skies the merit of Brutus and Caſſius. In a word, it was he, who, by his vehement exhortations, inſpired him with the deſign of executing that horrid attempt (6). Olgiatum penè imberbem, leviſſimumque adoleſcentem inani ſpe parandæ gloriæ inflaverat Cola Montanus literarii ludi magiſter; ſi occiſo tyranno patriam in libertatem aſſereret; ſæpe Caſſios & Brutos in ſchola magnis extollens laudibus, qui gloria ducti pulcherrimi facti conſilium olim ſuſcepiſſent (7). So true it is, that a bad leſſon is able to do great miſchief, and that princes themſelves ought to take care not to be hated by inconſiderable men. There are few ſuch. Cola, being taken ſome time after, fell into the hands of Laurence de Medicis, who cauſed him to be hanged (8). The courage he inſpired into Olgiati, in hopes of an eternal fame, did not fail him at the place of execution. Olgiati and his comrade made their eſcape, by reaſon of the confuſion, which the aſſaſſination of the duke cauſed in the church: but becauſe no body durſt harbour them they were taken two days after. Their puniſhment was ſuited to their crime; and Olgiati expreſſed a great conſtancy: 'Olgiatus ipſe mirum 'viſu audituque veſana conſtantia obſtinatum animum 'in conſpectu carnificis gerens, ſeſeque in ipſa morte 'confirmans hæc contumaci ore protulit verba; collige te, Hieronyme, ſtabit vetus memoria facti; mors 'quidem erit acerba, ſed tormentum breve, atque 'ejus fama perpetua (9). ——— Olgiati, maintaining 'a moſt wonderful conſtancy in the ſight of the executioner, and at the inſtant of death, ſpoke theſe obſtinate words; Courage, Jerom! the fame of thy 'action will live for ever; death is indeed bitter; 'but the torment is but ſhort, whereas the credit of 'it will be immortal.' for Charles Viſconti he was moved to it by two powerful reaſons [C]. Lamponiano endeavouring to eſcape thro' the women, was killed by a Moor. His corps, biting the ground [D], was delivered to the mob (b), who made it their ſport for ſome time (c). Peter Crinitus made ſome verſes in praiſe of this aſſaſſin [E]. It is ſaid, that this duke of Milan had very good qualities (d), and that he governed like a good prince, without any notable fault, except a prodigious lewdneſs; which it was ſo much the eaſier for him to ſatisfy, becauſe the ladies of his court gloried in their galantries [F].

Quem non mille acies, quem non potuere phalanges
Sternere, privata Galeaz dux Sfortia dextra
Concidit, atque illum minime juvere cadentem
Aſtantes famuli, nec opes, nec regna, nec urbes.
Hinc patet humanis quæ ſit fiducia rebus,
Et patet hinc ſævo tutum nil eſſe tyranno (10).

Great Milan's duke, unconquer'd in the field,
To private violence at laſt muſt yield.
He fell; attending ſervants naught avail:
To ward the blow e'en wealth and kingdoms fail.
Learn hence, there is no truſt in human things,
Nor any ſafety for tyrannic kings.

[C] . . . . as for Charles Viſconti, he was moved to it by two powerful reaſons.] In the firſt place he was provoked to ſee that the Sforzas had uſurped the dominion, to the prejudice of his family. Secondly, he had a ſiſter, whom Galeazzo had debauched, and afterwards imparted to a handſome young man, who was his catamite. Germanæ ſororis probro quam Galeaſius adamaret, atque ſubigeret, permovebatur: tanto indignantius quod eam decoro adoleſcenti, qui ætatis florem principi fruendum dediſſet, conciliaſſe & communicaſſe ſuſpicaretur (11). This prince was reckoned ſo leud, that not only his amours were talked of, but alſo his pimping (12). We have here an inſtance of female compliance. Francis Viſconti's ſiſter, not content to gratify the duke with the uſe of her body, ſatisfied alſo the leudneſs of his catamites, when he pleaſed. Probably ſhe had no great difficulty in giving this mark of complaiſance to the duke, ſince it was in favour of a handſome young man.

[D] His corps, biting the ground.] I may uſe this phraſe in the literal ſenſe, ſince Paul Jovius expreſſes himſelf thus. 'Ipſius Lamponiani cadaver ſolum lingua & dentibus commordens jacebat (13). —— The body of Lamponiano lay biting the ground with it's tongue and teeth.'

[E] Peter Crinitus made ſome verſes in praiſe of this aſſaſſin.] They are in the ſecond book of his poems (14), and are intituled, De virtute Joannis Andreæ Lamponiani Tyrannicidæ. The ſix firſt run thus:

Parabat olim ſacra Bruti manibus
  Antiqua virtus Italum.
Ac forte lectam dum rependit hoſtiam
  Marti dicatam vindici,
Frontem retorſit illico ad acres Inſubres
  Mirata fortem dexteram.

Old Italy, for fortitude rever'd,
Once, ſacred rites to Brutus' ſhade prepar'd;
And, whilſt ſhe bid the choſen victim dye,
Sacred to Mars, th' avenging deity,
Perhaps ſhe look'd toward the Inſubrian land,
In admiration of th' advent'rous band.

We muſt not wonder, that Peter Crinitus praiſed this aſſaſſin; for we find an hymn (15) in praiſe of Balthazar Gerard (16), among the ſacred poems of Levinus Torrentius, biſhop of Antwerp. Among other elogies, this is to be found in it.

Morte inſerendus cælicolum choris
Æterno ab omni labe puram
Reddis ovans animam parenti.

Pure from all ſpot, triumphantly you die,
And join, by death, the chorus of the sky.

[F] The ladies of his court gloried in their gallantries.] The deſcription, which Paul Jovius gives of the corruption of the women of that country, is horrible. They looked upon chaſtity as an obſtacle to politeneſs; they thought, that the love of that virtue was not good breeding, and looked like the awkward air of a country-woman. In ſhort, they did not believe that lying with a prince was an action contrary to virtue; they pretended, that the way to raiſe their husbands above others, was to make them wear golden horns. Galeazzo, who was a handſome vigorous young man, and of a leud temper, found his account in it. Paul Jovius's words are much better than mine, therefore I inſert them here. His artibus quum boni, ſplendidiſſimique principis nomen tueretur, premebant ejus famam intemperantes vagæque libidines. Nam ea tum erat ex multo ocio luxuriantis ſeculi conditio, in ipſis præcipuè nobilioribus matronis, ut totum pudicitiæ decus ab humanitate aulæ alienum prorſus & ſubagreſte putaretur, ideoque princeps ad licentiam libidinis proclinatus, & juventæ vigore venuſtateque oris ſupra omnes ſpectatu digniſſimus, procacibus fœminarum oculis & deſideriis cupidiſſimè deſerviret. Erat enim tum vulgatum inter fœminas, nullam ex principis concubitu fieri impudicam, earumque maritos qui ineptis hirci videri poſſent, ita excellere aureis cornibus, ut dignitate cunctos anteirent (17). This is, doubtleſs, the utmoſt degree of corruption; for if any thing prevents chaſtity from being baniſhed out of the world, it is the annexing, with reſpect to women, an idea of diſgrace to the contrary vice (18). It is the main barrier, to ſtop a little the progreſs of leudneſs, and hinder it from over-flowing all mankind like the waters of the deluge, which ſpared but few perſons.

LANDA (Catherine) ought to be reckoned among the learned women. It is one of the ten towns, that make up what is called the provoſtſhip or prefecture of Haguenau, towns, which, excepting as to matters civil and criminal before the provoſt of Haguenau, pretend to hold immediately of the empire (b) [A]. They

[A] It is one of the ten towns . . . which pretend to hold immediately of the empire.] Mr Heiſs will explain this to us. ‘Haguenau, ſays he (1), is the firſt of the towns of Alſace dependant on the prefecture, the tribunal of which is eſtabliſhed in the ſame town. After the treaty of Munſter, the king of France, in imitation of the landgraves of Alſace, his predeceſſors, retained this provincial council, in which his great bailif, or lieutenant, preſided. But, as it has been entirely ruined in the laſt war, the moſt Chriſtian king has removed this council to Briſac. This town, as well as the other nine, at that time, acknowledged the king for protector, on the ſame terms as they acknowledge the emperor, and the princes of Auſtria, in that quality, without derogating from that immediateneſs, in virtue of which theſe ten towns pretend to continue free ſtates of the empire. But, as they have been convinced of the right of ſovereignty, with which the king of France has been inveſted, they have renounced this immediateneſs, and have entirely ſubmitted to his moſt Chriſtian majeſty. The other nine towns are Colmar, Schleſtat, Weiſemburg, Landau, Oberkheim, Kaiſerberg, Munſter in the valley of St Gregory, Roſheim, and Turcheim.’ They had not yet ſubmitted to this yoke in the year 1673. They were very far from it: you need only read theſe words of the duke de Navailles. ‘Intending to go to Briſac, I paſſed through Colmar. I there found, that the inhabitants, as being near ſo conſiderable a place as Briſac, affected an extraordinary independance. Their town was filled with all ſorts of warlike ammunitions and proviſions; they appeared little diſpoſed to receive, and ſubmit to, the king's orders. They took no care, with regard to me, to ſhew a proper reſpect to thoſe, with whom the king entruſted his authority. There were ſtill in that country, Scheleſtat, Haguenau, and four other little Imperial towns; they were very much united, always kept deputies at the diet, and were ever taking liberties contrary to the obedience, they owed to the king. And when I arrived at Briſac, theſe ſeven towns, which pretended to be Imperial, ſent deputies to me. Thoſe of Colmar were at the head, and ſpoke for the reſt. They harangued me in the ſame manner they had done my predeceſſors. They ſeemed to make uſe of expreſſions, which did not ſufficiently ſhew the ſubmiſſion they owe to the king, treating him only as their protector: I anſwered them, that he had, with regard to them, a ſtronger title; that he was their guardian, and that it belonged to him to regulate their conduct. I ſpoke to them with ſo much force, that the intendant, who was preſent, ſaid to me before them: Sir, if your predeceſſors had made them know their duty as you do, the king would have more authority in this province, and theſe gentlemen would not be at ſo great an expence in keeping deputies at the diet. Theſe deputies were thunder-ſtruck, and they fell upon their knees before me. I thought I ought to mortify them a little, I ſent the next day five hundred horſe to take the cattle at the gates of their towns. This opened their eyes, and ſhewed them their error in pretending to be independent of France. They came a ſecond time to ſpeak to me; but I would not hear them, and I ſent them word, that I muſt be going to Philipsburg (2).’ A little after, he tells the king, that he had a fair opportunity to put Colmar, and the other towns, which call themſelves Imperial, on the proper footing (3). The king immediately profited by this advice; for, going into Alſace, he ſeized on the towns of Colmar and Schelſtad (4). The other towns ſurrendered upon a bare ſummons, on pretext, that the king had a right to thoſe places as great bailif of Haguenau, and that he ſeized them, to prevent the Imperialiſts from taking advantage of two ſuch convenient poſts, as thoſe two towns were (5).

Whether the free towns of Alſace could retain their immediate holding of the empire, under a protector or guardian, who was king of France.

I remember there was great reaſoning about the reduction of theſe places, and that there were ſome, who ſaid, it was folly to pretend they could ſtill keep their liberty. It was not impoſſible, they ſaid, that they might be at once under the form of a commonwealth, and under the guardianſhip of the landgrave of Alſace, as long as this landgrave was a German; but, when he was king of France, there was a kind of neceſſity that they muſt, ſooner or latter, fall under his full authority. This followed from the order of political affairs, and the natural courſe of human things. A town could not be free, and at the ſame time acknowledge for it's protector, or guardian, a king, who might be at war with the emperor, or the empire. Can clients declare againſt their patrons? If they cannot lawfully, the prefecture of Haguenau muſt neceſſarily ſide with France in thoſe wars; and if it cannot juſtly do this, as being a part of the Germanic body, it muſt either declare againſt France, or deſire a neutrality. In the firſt caſe, the king of France had juſt as much right to ſubjugate Colmar and the other Imperial towns of Alſace, as the four foreſt-towns. In the ſecond caſe, it muſt be conſidered whether the towns of the prefecture of Haguenau were really deſirous to obſerve a neutrality, or only pretended to deſire it, with the ſole view of putting themſelves into the hands of the emperor's troops. If this be the ſole motive of their deſiring a neutrality, they muſt expect to be treated as a concealed enemy, who, in point of prudence, muſt not be allowed time to diſcover their ill deſigns. But, ſuppoſing that they ſincerely deſire to be neuter, it remained to be examined, whether they could maintain themſelves againſt the German troops, who would endeavour to oblige them to receive a garriſon. It is plain, they were not ſtrong enough to ſupport themſelves in a neutrality; and thus order will have it, that the king of France ſhould not ſuffer the Germans to have places of arms there, eſpecially conſidering that the Spaniards were at that time maſters of Franche Compté. The protector or guardian muſt ſupport his title, that his pupil may not declare againſt him. If this title obliged him to hinder any one from uſing the towns of Alſace ill, it authorized him to hinder any one from arming them to his prejudice; for it would be ſtrange indeed, if a monarch were obliged to protect a ſtate, which thought it ſelf obliged to declare war againſt him. The mutual obligations both lie under contradicts this; and, conſequently, thoſe who ſhould yield to France the protection of the Imperial towns of Alſace, would neceſſarily open a door to a full authority over them. The incompatibility of titles began from that

They were yielded to France by the peace of Munſter to belong to it in the ſame manner as they had belonged to the houſe of Auſtria; but by degrees all reſtriction has ceaſed (c). Some have pretended, that the citizens of Landau have not been cavillers, and that they maintained their town at a time when the others were pillaged (d). This ſeems to me to imply, that, during the long war, which ended by the peace of Munſter, and in other ſuch like times, they were not unſeaſonably obſtinate in reſiſting the ſtrongeſt. They gave an inſtance of this compliance in the year 1634, as may be ſeen in Puyſegur's Memoirs (e). Another writer (f) obſerves, that they have not been ſubject to inteſtine diſſentions, and that they have always forbore provoking, by words or actions the neighbouring princes, and that, in 1552, the troops of Henry II, king of France, and thoſe of Albert of Brandenburg, did them a great deal of miſchief. The Sieur de Val affirms, that the wine of Landau is the beſt Rheniſh wine that can be drunk (g). This town was but moderately ſtrong at the time of the peace of Ryſwic, in 1697, but, ſoon after, it was fortified with all imaginable care. The famous Mr de Vauban employed his whole ſkill in it. The Imperialiſts, under prince Lewis of Baden, blocked it up in the month of April 1702, and opened the trenches the ſeventeenth of June following. The place was ſurrendered by capitulation the tenth of September. The king of the Romans arrived in the camp the twenty ſeventh of July [B]. that time to be propagated; and, if the emperor had eſtabliſhed places of arms at Colmar and Scheleſtad, in order to make irruptions as far as Dijon, and Lyons, no one would have commended France for ſuffering theſe towns to enjoy all their privileges, but would rather have laughed at her imprudence and ſimplicity.

People reaſoned almoſt after the ſame manner, when ſhe ſeized on Strasburg; a town, which neither would, nor could, always preſerve it's neutrality, and which ſurrendered it's bridge to the German armies toties quoties. It was a thorn in the foot, too big to be left there. One of two things muſt be, either that Strasburg ſincerely deſire a ſtate of neutrality, and religiouſly obſerve it, or that it be capable of making a reſiſtance, when any one would oblige it to declare for one ſide. Now nothing of this was true, ſaid theſe reaſoners. I believe they might be eaſily refuted by thoſe who teach the Civil-law in the univerſities.

[B] The king of the Romans arrived in the camp the twenty ſeventh of July.] The news-writers of his party gave out, that the count de Melac, governor of Landau, ſent a trumpet to him, the ſame day, to compliment him, and to deſire him to let him know where he intended to fix his quarters, that they might not fire upon them; but that the intrepid monarch, having thanked him for his civility, ſent him word at the ſame time, that he might fire where he pleaſed; that his quarters were every where (6). An officer of the garriſon of Landau relates this piece of news as follows (7). The count de Melac ſent a trumpet, the thirty firſt of July, at eight of the clock in the morning, to the enemy's camp ..... to demand of the prince of Baden, where were the king's quarters: this prince informed the king of the Romans of it, who anſwered, ‘ that his quarters were at Inphling; that he thanked him for the ſword he had ſent him (8); that he might fire every where, ſerving his king as he had hitherto done.’ It is certain, that, in this, the count de Melac acted as has been practiſed for a long time towards kings, who aſſiſt at a ſiege. The beſieged governor pays them this compliment. As to the anſwer of the king of the Romans, we muſt obſerve two things; the one, that the accounts of the two parties are not extremely different at the bottom; the other, that, being always gallant, it is eſpecially ſo, the firſt time it is uſed; for, when a king is informed, that another has made uſe of it, he thinks himſelf bound in honour to imitate, and, if poſſible, go beyond him. It is no longer a matter of choice, but a kind of neceſſity. I have been told, that the late William III, king of England, made uſe of this anſwer, when the governor of a place paid him this compliment. I know not whether it is true; but I know very well, that he never beſieged any place, the governor of which acknowledged him as king. Be it how it will, he was not the firſt author of this anſwer; for, to ſay nothing of thoſe, who may have made uſe of it before the year 1667, there is a printed proof, that it was uſed that year at the ſiege of Liſle in Flanders. Read what follows: As ſoon as the count de Broüay, governor of the place, was informed, that his majeſty (9) was arrived in the camp, judging rightly that there was no farther room for feint, he made the citizens take an oath of fidelity, more than ten thouſand of whom proteſted they would periſh ſooner than ſurrender. He then ſent a compliment to his majeſty, offering him his choice of the fineſt houſes within one league round Liſle, and even whatever he wanted for his houſehold from out of the city, during the ſiege; and deſired to know, where he would fix his quarters, that he might give orders not to fire that way; but he added, that he entreated his majeſty not to take it ill, if he defended that place with the utmoſt vigour, for the ſervice of the Catholic king, his maſter. His majeſty, after having thanked the count de Broüay for his compliment, returned only this anſwer, that his quarters were all over his camp, and that the more obſtinate his reſiſtance was in oppoſing this conqueſt, the more glorious would be the ſucceſs of it to his majeſty (10).

The king of the Romans gained great eſteem during this long ſiege; this firſt campaign was very much to his honour. The count de Melac, who ſaw him, the eleventh of September, received from him great honours and great praiſes (11). He ſupped the ſame night with prince Lewis of Baden, who paid him a thouſand civilities, and told him, that it was believed in the Imperial army, that he dealt with the devil (12), to which the count de Melac replied, ‘ that he dealt with him juſt as much as he, but that the prince's correſpondence was the better, ſince the devil had ſerved him beſt (13).’

[C] What the news-writers publiſhed concerning this ſiege will give me occaſion to make ſome remarks.] Thoſe of France continually ſaid, that it did not advance, that the garriſon repulſed every aſſault, and occaſioned the ſlaughter of an infinite number of Germans: the news-writers of the other party ſaid, on the contrary, that they eaſily carried every thing they attacked, that the Imperialiſts ſcarce loſt a man, and that the mines of the beſieged were always countermined, or that, if they were not, the enemy ſet fire to them ſo improperly, that they occaſioned no loſs. The author of the Mercure Galant reaſoned much on the conſequences, which might attend the conqueſt of this place. He pretended, that it coſt the emperor at leaſt five or ſix millions (14), and that the number of troops, which periſhed before Landau, muſt amount at leaſt to 15000 men (15). I believe, adds he, that, were I to calculate the loſs, which the Germans confeſs in the journals they commonly make, I ſhould find, that it amounts to much more, though theſe journals are not faithful. I know not what journals of the Germans he means; but I can ſcarce believe that he ſaw any other than thoſe, which they ſent to the Dutch news-writers, and which we ſee printed in the Hiſtorical Letters, and in the Mercure Politique of the Hague. Now by theſe journals it does not appear, that the Germans had more than 800 men killed, from the beginning of the ſiege to the beginning of September. We have not ſeen in theſe books the particulars of the following days to the capitulation of the place; but we may judge, that it would not contain above forty killed. The number of the wounded is incomparably greater according to theſe journals; and yet ſome gentlemen, or cure that fond credulity they know ſo well how to inſpire. They forgot

Dutch Gazettes, affirm, ſince the capitulation, that the number of the wounded was but double that of the ſlain. The latter amounted to a little more than 700, and the former, (of whom the moſt part were cured) to a little more than 1400. It is difficult to reconcile this with what the ſame Gazettes had ſaid, that, for want of infantry, they were at laſt obliged to make the dragoons ſerve, and, as moſt of the wounded died, it was believed, that the beſiegers made uſe of balls of a particular quality; but it is not my buſineſs here to reconcile the Gazetteers with themſelves; it would be almoſt as difficult as to reconcile the Gazetteers of the two parties; the queſtion is only to know, whether the journals of the beſiegers acknowledge the great loſs, which Mr de Vizé ſpeaks of. Let us obſerve, by the way, that a priſoner, whom the garriſon of Landau took the thirty firſt of July, affirmed, that the Germans had already loſt near 2500 men, and that every one of them ſaid, the balls of the beſieged were all poiſoned, becauſe none of the wounded recovered (16). The other news, which he told, is ſo falſe, that we ought to give very little credit to what he ſays concerning the loſs of the Germans.

Mr le Noble maintains, that they loſt, in this ſiege, 4 princes, 286 officers, and 12000 ſoldiers or thereabout (17). I believe, in reſpect to the 4 princes, he was deceived by this paſſage: ‘ The young prince ‘ of Bareith died the firſt of this month of the wound ‘ he had received before Landau, at the aſſault of the ‘ ſixteenth to the ſeventeenth of Auguſt. He is the ‘ fourth prince that the war has deprived us of in a ‘ very ſhort time, and whoſe death I am obliged to ‘ give notice of in this month only (18).’ A little more attention would have informed Mr le Noble, that the author there means the duke of Holſtein, the prince of Commerci, the count of Soiſſons, and the prince of Bareith; but the firſt loſt his life in Poland, the ſecond in Italy, and the fourth recovered of his wound, as he might have learned by the author's own retractation, which I ſuppoſe he miſunderſtood (19). Judge, I pray you, whether an author, who ſo groſsly miſtakes as to the number of princes killed at a ſiege, deſerves much credit in what he ſays concerning the number of officers and ſoldiers, who periſhed at it.

One cannot ſufficiently wonder at the ignorance, which the Paris Gazetteer, and the author of the Mercure Galant, have diſcovered of the ſtate of the ſiege (20). Thoſe who ſhould truſt to their relations, would ſwear, that, at the beginning of September, the affairs of the beſiegers were no farther advanced than at the beginning of July, and that they were even in a worſe condition by the frightful ſlaughter, which the garriſon made the twenty fifth, twenty ſixth, and twenty ſeventh of Auguſt, in repulſing the attacks of the Germans. Theſe are three imaginary attacks. We ſee the following words in a Mercure Galant dated the fourteenth of Auguſt (21). It is an unheard of thing, that, after a ſiege of two mouths and a half, a great army ſhould not have yet taken any of the outworks of Landau. This author might have talked after the ſame manner a month after, in reaſoning upon his own accounts, and thoſe of the Paris Gazette, which had ſaid nothing of any progreſs of the beſiegers ſince the above-mentioned date of the fourteenth of Auguſt. What is more ſurpriſing is, that the Paris Gazette of the ſixteenth of September, the day on which the ſurrender of Landau was known at Paris, went on talking in the ſame tone; inſomuch, that it prepared infinitely leſs for the news of the capitulation of the place, than that of the raiſing of the ſiege. We may ask hereupon, did theſe public news-writers know what paſſed before Landau, or did they not? If they believed the accounts they publiſhed, their ignorance was very groſs and inexcuſable; for from the firſt days of the month of September, there were private perſons in the provinces, who knew very well, that Landau could not hold out longer than the tenth at the fartheſt. We have ſeen in Holland letters which have expreſsly mentioned this piece of news. Is it not ſhameful, that public news-writers ſhould know leſs of the ſtate of a ſiege, than a meer conntry tradeſman? Is it not a reproach to them, to have no other lights than the report of deſerters, whoſe buſineſs it is to pleaſe by agreeable lies, and to gain by it an advantageous reception? If theſe news-writers were well informed of all that paſſed at Landau, their inſincerity was monſtrous and inexcuſable. Why did they ſo diſguiſe things? did they fear to cauſe an inſurrection in the provinces by a faithful account? This fear, which perhaps would be reaſonable in other countries, was ridiculous in that in which they wrote. I know not then to what to impute the perplexity they threw themſelves into by the neceſſity of finding ſome ſolution, when at laſt they were obliged to publiſh the unforeſeen news of the capitulation. They were ſo ſeverely handled (22) on the ſubject of the taking of Namur in 1695, that it is ſtrange they did not profit by it. I am of opinion, that the ſiege of important places will always be a troubleſome rock for the news-writers (23). I would have them always remember, that the taking of a place is not ſubject, like the gaining of battles (24), to hiſtorical Pyrrhoniſm, and that therefore it is better to prepare the readers for it by degrees, than to overwhelm them with it all at once, when they leaſt expect it. Tela prævifa minus feriunt. The diſguſt at being impoſed upon aggravates the chagrin they feel on the ſudden news of a capitulation, which overthrows the hopes they had conceived. I ſay nothing of the inſulting raillery they are expoſed to, when at laſt they are obliged to confeſs the ſurrender of a place, before which the news-writers had made the enemy dance attendance, without allowing them to have made any progreſs. They become the jeſt of the news-writers of the oppoſite party (25).

Here is another very ſurpriſing thing. It was not known at the court of the elector of Bavaria what paſſed before Landau, and this may make us think, that Catinat knew no more of it. The garriſon beat the chamade the ninth of September (26), it was reduced to the utmoſt extremity, and the governour had remonſtrated to the council of war, from the fourth of September, that it was time to capitulate (27). It is pretended (28), that, about the twenty ſecond of Auguſt, he had ſent a man (29) to the mareſchal de Catinat, to inform him, that he could hold out but eight days. Nevertheleſs the French envoy at the court of the duke of Bavaria imagined, the ninth of September, that the taking of the town of Ulm would oblige the enemy to raiſe the ſiege. His electoral highneſs, he wrote word that day (30), does not doubt but this will oblige them to abandon Landau . . . . when the junction of his troops with thoſe of France ſhall be once made, we ſhall cut out ſo much buſineſs for the king of the Romans, and prince Lewis of Baden, and ſo dangerous in this country, that they will not think Landau of importance enough to detain them on the other ſide the Rhine. The elector of Bavaria wrote to the king of France, ‘ that a perſon, whom he had ſent ‘ to the Imperial camp before Landau, had brought ‘ him word, that that place could yet hold out fifteen ‘ days, ſo that it might be ſtill ſuccoured in time, ‘ after the ſurprize of Ulm (31).’ If theſe words may ſerve by way of conſolation or excuſe for the news-writers of Paris, I ſhall think my ſelf happy in having produced them.

Some of thoſe, who ſuffered themſelves to be deceived by the fabulous relations, which came from Alſace, have themſelves undeceived the public, whom they had led into miſtakes; for we find what follows in a work of the author of the Mercure Galant. ‘ As for the chimerical accounts, which have been ſpread ‘ about, of pretended ſallies, in which it was affirmed that we had killed two or three thouſand men, ‘ and of furious aſſaults made on the out-works of the ‘ place, in which they no leſs magnified the enemy's ‘ loſs, who gave theſe aſſaults with thouſands of men, ‘ no action of this nature really paſſed. The garri‘ ſon was not numerous enough to make ſuch kind ‘ of ſallies, and the enemy had not enough damaged ‘ the place, to give ſuch aſſaults: thus the ſituation ‘ of affairs at that time is a ſufficient anſwer to thoſe, ‘ who publiſhed theſe accounts, and were but too ‘ ready to believe them. None of all theſe actions, ‘ in the journal you have been reading, deſerve the ‘ name of battles (32).’

Let us conclude with this paſſage of the ſame author (33): ‘ It is indiſputably true, that no peace ‘ will be made, unleſs the emperor be obliged to give ‘ up this place (34), in caſe it be not retaken before that time. Whenever the king has been willing to grant peace, this prince has given up, in confirmation of that ſame peace, the places which he had on the other ſide the Rhine, and it has been conſented to at the ſame time, that he ſhould keep all thoſe, which he was in poſſeſſion of on this ſide; and this has been taken for a rule, becauſe the Rhine forms a kind of barrier.' I am ſurprized, that an author, who talks thus, ſhould not know, that, by the peace at Nimeguen, France remained in poſſeſſion of Briſac and Friburg two important places on the other ſide the Rhine. I might add, that the peace of Munſter left her miſtreſs of Philipsburg, as well as Briſac. Where is then the rule this author ſpeaks of?

[D] The news-writers did not fail to make reflexions on the long continuance of the ſiege of Landau.] I need only produce the words of a very witty writer. He will afford us, not only a comment on my text, but likewiſe an illuſtration of the foregoing remark. ‘This ſiege is ſo far advanced, that we daily expect the news of a capitulation: the French reproach us with the ſlowneſs of this conqueſt; but I know not whether it be not more diſgraceful to her than to us. The prince of Baden wiſely judged that he ought to be ſparing of his men. With this judicious precaution, this able prince has not followed that furious and murdering way, which deſtroys ſo many brave men, and ſometimes the whole flower of an army. If Landau be ſurrendered, the troops of the Upper Rhine would have ſuffered no extraordinary fatigue, and would march out of the trenches as out of an encampment, ſtill freſh and ready for a new expedition. But, ſince the prince of Baden has by no means haſtened the execution of his deſign, it follows, that he has given the enemy all the neceſſary time to ſuccour the place: how comes it then, that they have not ſtirred? Does it not ſeem as if the prince of Baden affected to act without precipitation, the better to ſhew the weakneſs of France? This ſlow conduct in that general looks as if he would defy any one to prevent his ſtriking the blow. It were to be wiſhed for the honour of marſhal Catinat, or rather his maſter's, that the place had been taken in a few days. The ſiege is protracted; in the mean time the mareſchal, who ought to endeavour a ſuccour or a diverſion, keeps at a diſtance, entrenches himſelf, as if the noiſe of the cannon of the beſiegers affrighted him, and quietly ſuffers the town to be taken .... The French readily allow, that the length of the ſiege of Landau proceeds from the moderation and prudence of the prince of Baden. As they make a merit of every thing, and turn even their loſſes to the encreaſe of their reputation, they pretend, that this duration of the ſiege is ſolely owing to the vigorous defence of the beſieged. Will you believe their news-writers? The beſiegers fall before Landau like the leaves of a tree ſhook by a ſtrong wind towards the end of autumn; they loſe a thouſand men at the attack of a work, which they do not carry; if, the next day they become maſters of the poſt, they are driven from it the third day: you will ſee at laſt, they will talk of raiſing the ſiege .... Can any one advance ſuch groſs untruths? But can any thing be more injurious to the public, than to ſuppoſe them capable of acquieſcing in ſuch wretched impertinence (35)?' Thus does this witty author reaſon, in his news of the month of Auguſt 1702: let us produce what he ſays in that of the following month.

‘The town of Landau has at length changed it's maſter (36). .... An ill omen of what was to follow. In France, they took all poſſible precautions to lull the people aſleep, and make them believe this diſgrace would never happen. The news-writers never tired themſelves ſo much as on occaſion of the ſiege of Landau. If all that they publiſhed about the beſiegers were true, their army was but ſome broken remains, and nothing would be more aſtoniſhing than the ſurrender of the place. The Imperialiſts were knocked on the head without gaining any advantage; or, if they had the good fortune to carry a poſt, they were preſently driven from it. Theſe falſhoods at preſent do no honour to the count de Melac, or his garriſon. How did this brave governor all at once ſpoil his fine defence? What panic ſeized him? Should he not have crowned his valour, and tried the patience of the Germans to the utmoſt? A good commander capitulates only to avoid a general aſſault, and it is affirmed theſe beſieged had loſt nothing. Now that the town is taken, how will they gild the pill, that the people may ſwallow it, without perceiving it's bitterneſs (37)? ..... Let us not imagine, that the tranquillity, with which France has ſuffered Landau to be taken, takes off any thing from the glory of this conqueſt. It cannot be denied, that the beſieged made a vigorous reſiſtance; the long continuance of the ſiege proves it. If the French are to be believed in this matter, the weakneſs of the garriſon alone obliged them to ſubmit. His moſt Chriſtian Majeſty was told, that if the count de Melac could have been rein-forced with 1500 men, the place would have eſcaped. A melancholy conſideration, and which ſerves only to aggravate the misfortune! But how does this agree with the pretended good fortune of the beſieged in loſing but few men upon every attack? Was the garriſon then ſo ſmall? this would be an unpardonable neglect in a fortreſs of this conſequence. Let us compromiſe the matter. Both ſides were equally vigorous: if the Imperialiſts attacked the town with great courage and reſolution, the French anſwered them with no leſs valour and intrepidity, with this circumſtance, that the prince of Baden, willing to ſpare his troops, marched ſtep by ſtep, ſure to conquer, and defying all obſtacles (38).'

Let us make ſome remarks on the ingenious thoughts of this author, and ſay, in the firſt place, that, in the ſituation things were in, it were to be wiſhed, for the common good of his Imperial majeſty, and his allies, that the town of Landau had been taken after a ſiege of three weeks. Prince Lewis of Baden might have executed, after this, whatever he pleaſed: the French would not have been in a condition to croſs any of his deſigns: but the meaſures, which the length of the ſiege ſuffered them to take, broke thoſe of the Imperialiſts in ſuch a manner, that prince Lewis of Baden could execute nothing after the ſurrender of the town of Landau. The length of the ſiege gave France the advantage: the governor of the place received a letter from mareſchal Catinat, the tenth of Auguſt, in which he was directed to hold out as long as he poſſibly could, to prevent the enemy from making other attempts during the remainder of the campaign; that this would be the moſt ſignal ſervice he could do the king (39). Thus, the loſs which the beſiegers would ſuſtain of a great number of ſoldiers and officers, in vigorouſly puſhing on the attacks, would be made up with intereſt by the deſigns they might put in execution before the end of the campaign.

I ſay, in the ſecond place, that the thought of our news-writer, to wit that it would be diſgraceful to the count de Melac to have behaved in the manner the French accounts relate, is very juſt. This governor would have imitated the poets, who do wonders in the four firſt acts of a tragedy, but ſucceed very ill in the laſt, wherein good poets principally exert their genius, and for which they reſerve the moſt exquiſite ſtrokes (40). It cannot be denied, that the whole world ſaw with extreme ſurpriſe the concluſion of this ſiege. Even thoſe on the ſide of the beſiegers believed that it would be very bloody, and that the laſt aſſault would be fatal to many brave officers. On the contrary, it was found to be the eaſieſt thing in the world, and they knew not what to think of it, nor what would be the unravelling of the affair. The news-writers have ſaid many things on this occaſion not worth repeating. What is moſt probable, is, that the garriſon was too weak to ſtand the laſt aſſault. We learn by the journal of this ſiege, that, from the fourth of September, the count de Melac repreſented, that there were many brave men in the garriſon; that it was for the intereſt of the king to preſerve them; that they wanted the moſt neceſſary things, as money, medicines, and proviſions; that theſe ſix days they had made broth for the ſick of horſe-fleſh, not reckoning the want of ammunition (41). The ſame journal relates (42), that, when the enemy gave the the laſt aſſault, the beſieged were retired to the half-moon, near the bridge of communication. Hence it was that the beſiegers met with little or no oppoſition.

In the third place, let us conſider theſe words; was the garriſon then ſo ſmall? this would be an unpardonable neglect in a fortreſs of ſuch conſequence (43). As ſoon as it was known, that the place was inveſted, the Dutch Gazetteers ſtrove to out do one another in publiſhing, that the garriſon was very ſmall, and that it wanted many neceſſaries. I know ſome, who blamed theſe gazetteers for thus leſſening the glory of prince Lewis of Baden. They will remedy this one time or other, replied another ſort; be in no pain about it; for, when the place ſhall be ſurrendered, they will not fail to publiſh a large liſt of ammunitions and proviſions found therein by the Imperialiſts: neither will they fail to give out, that the garriſon was very numerous at firſt, but that the greateſt part had periſhed by the ſword, or the fire of the Germans, by deſertions, and by ſickneſſes. It is not yet time to confeſs, that the place is well provided; the buſineſs is to make the readers expect that it will be ſoon taken.

I have wondered at the ſilence of the officer, who drew up the journal of this famous ſiege. He ſhould have told us the number of the garriſon, when the place was inveſted, and when it beat the chamade; but this he has not done. Thoſe, who find a myſtery in every thing, pretend, that, thro' a political flattery, he choſe rather to leſſen the glory of the garriſon, than to take off in the leaſt from the king's prudence. If he had ſaid, that the place was not provided with neceſſaries, or a good garriſon, he would have accuſed the king his maſter of a prodigious neglect, and given great honour to the long reſiſtance of the beſieged. Now it was better that theſe ſhould loſe part of the praiſes due to them, than that their common prince ſhould be expoſed to cenſure. This, ſay ſome, occaſioned this officer's ſilence. Others ſay, there was a way to have injured no body, which was to have obſerved, on the one ſide, that the garriſon and proviſions were very inſufficient, and, on the other, that the king had very wiſely judged them ſufficient, ſince, for reaſons capable of entirely ſatisfying political prudence, he had believed, that the elector of Bavaria would declare himſelf time enough to fruſtrate the deſign of taking Landau.

I have read in a news-writer, that the garriſon of this place conſiſted of 2200 men, when it marched out, and that the French ſay, they loſt but 412 men, in the ſiege (44). If this be true, it muſt have conſiſted, at firſt, of but 2612 ſoldiers, a number infinitely too ſmall for the defence of ſuch a fortreſs.

Let us not forget the remark of a news-writer of Paris (45). The beſiegers 'had ſtill much way to 'make, and many aſſaults to give, before they could be'come maſters of it in form; and they would have 'had ſtill more to do, and have loſt more men than 'they did, ... had it not been for the treache'ry of an Engineer, who came to their camp, and 'diſcovered to them ſeveral mines: thus the treachery 'of this Engineer, and the want of neceſſaries in 'the place, were the cauſe that the Germans be'came maſters of it.' The Dutch Journaliſts agree, that the fugitive Engineer did great ſervice to the Imperialiſts (46); but what they added appeared to be groundleſs, to wit, that 'he was intercepted attempting 'to return to the town, after having taken an exact ſur'vey of the works of the beſiegers. The prince of Ba'den would have had him hung up upon a tree with'out form of proceſs; but this Engineer having of'fered to dry up the ditches of the place, and to per'form other ſervices, if they would give him his life 'general Thungen remonſtrated, that it would be 'good to try that which he promiſed to do; and 'this opinion prevailed. Preſently he was put in 'irons, and informed, by the hang-man of the army, 'that he had nothing to do but to think in earneſt 'of executing his promiſes, in which if he failed, 'he ſhould be hung upon a gallows, which was 'ſhewed him (47).' It is not at all probable, that he had the leaſt intention of returning to Landau; he knew too well, that he ſhould be there condemned to the moſt ignominious puniſhment. The journal of the ſiege informs us, that, on the twenty ſixth of Auguſt, 'Mr de la Rouſſilaire, captain of the gates, 'had orders from the count de Melac to deliver to 'the executioner the orders of Ladoder (48), and 'to cauſe the effigy of the ſaid Ladoder to be hung 'on a gallows by the executioner, at the bottom 'of which was written; The unworthy Engineer Lado'der, a traytor to his king and country. A gallows 'was erected at the fort, in the half moon of the 'attack, where he was hanged in effigy (49).' The count de Melac was ſo incenſed againſt him, that, when he was to receive the hoſtages of the prince of Baden for the capitulation, he ordered, that, notwithſtanding they had laid down their arms, if Ladoder appeared, they ſhould fire an hundred musket ſhot at him; but the hoſtages ſaid, that he had been wounded the evening before in the arm by a musket ball (50).

The news-writer, who has obſerved, that the diverſion cauſed by the ſurpriſe of Ulm did not hinder the king of the Romans from taking Landau (51), forgot dates. How could the taking of Ulm, which was not known when Landau capitulated, retard the reduction of Landau?

[E] The governor demanded, that the inhabitants ſhould be maintained in the exerciſe of their reſpective religions, and that the Roman Catholic religion ſhould be preſerved in it's purity?] This article was obtained with this reſtriction, conformably to the treaties of Munſter and Ryſwic. The two points of the demand are ſurprizing, when one reflects that the king of France, who gives up Landau, and the emperor to whom he ſurrenders it, are two princes, who have ſhewed a great zeal for the extirpation of the Proteſtants, and the propagation of the Catholic religion. Was it neceſſary to demand of ſuch an emperor, that he ſhould maintain the Catholic religion in this place? Is it not a ſuperfluous care? Was it proper beſides to tye up his hands, to prevent him from aboliſhing hereſy? He might do it in a conquered town; for the law of arms permitted him this, unleſs the contrary were ſtipulated and agreed to by the articles of the capitulation. If his Imperial majeſty does not endeavour ſo effectually to re-unite this whole town entire to the body of the Papacy, as to re-unite it to the body of the empire, will not this be the fault of the king of France, who has made himſelf protector of the Heretics of Landau, by inducing the emperor ſolemnly to promiſe, that they ſhall not be troubled in the exerciſe of their religion (52)? He was in hopes, ſay ſome, that the place would be given up to him by the firſt treaty of peace. Are they aware, that, to avoid diſparity, and to act conſiſtently with his paſſed conduct, he mnſt rather wiſh to recover Landau entirely Catholic, than to recover it mixed with divers religions? and conſequently he ought to leave the Imperialiſts full liberty to make converts there by the beſt means they could. If he thought, that he ought not to allow them this liberty which might prove very inconvenient to the heretical inhabitants; if, in a word, he deſired to procure an advantage to thoſe inhabitants, what becomes of his zeal as a converter? What unequal, what irregular, conduct would not this be? But, at the bottom, his diſquietudes would be a little ſuperfluous; for he ought not to fear, in the preſent ſituation of things, that the emperor ſhould haraſs the Proteſtants of Landau: his Imperial majeſty has too great obligations to the whole party, and too much intereſt in keeping fair with it, to introduce the converting ſpirit into conquered places. One cannot therefore comprehend the motive of the fourth article of the long capitulation preſented to the beſiegers.

Some perſons, who, by dint of refining, plunge themſelves into viſionary notions, venture to ſay, that the court of France has ſo expreſsly ſtipulated the preſervation of the Romiſh faith, in order to ſhew that the Catholics of Landau ſtood in need of protection, under the dominion of an emperor devoted to the Proteſtants. What chimeras!

As to the purity, in which it is demanded that the Romiſh religion ſhall be preſerved, I have met with none who could explain to me what it meant; for, to pretend, that it was deſigned to prevent the introducing of Janſeniſm, or, on the contrary, the introducing of the ſuperſtitious practices and looſe maxims, with which the Jeſuits and Monks infect religion, this in truth would be the conceit of a viſionary. Did they then apprehend a kind of Samaritaniſm? Were they deſirous to guard againſt I know not what mixture of Lutheran or Calviniſtical opinions with the points decided in the council of Trent? I am clearly of opinion that this is chimerical; but I know not which way to determine about it.

LANDO (Hortensio) a Phyſician, born at Milan, lived in the XVIth century. He is the author of ſeveral books, and he loved to publiſh them under falſe names. He is thought to be the author of a dialogue, publiſhed under the name of Philalethes, againſt the memory of Eraſmus. That conjecture ſeems to be well grounded [A]. He wrote two dialogues, which have been falſely aſcribed to Cardinal Aleander [B].

[A] That conjecture ſeems to be well grounded.] Here I ſhall perform a promiſe, which I made in the remark [C] of the article ERASMUS, by ſetting down the import of the Memoir which I have quoted in that place. Herold believed, that a Phyſician, born at Piacenza, whoſe name was Baſſiano Landi, or Lando, concealed himſelf under the name of Philalethes. For my part, I rather believe it was Hortenſio Lando, a Milaneſe, and a Phyſician too, and a man of parts, who wrote ſeveral Latin and Italian books, in which he always affected to appear in a diſguiſe. He took the ſame name, Philalethes, in a dialogue, intituled, Forcianæ Quæſtiones, in which he examines the manners and genius of the ſeveral nations of Italy. It is true that, in this laſt dialogue, he calls himſelf Philalethes Polytopienſis, whereas, in the dialogue againſt Eraſmus, it is Philalethes Utopienſis, or ex Utopiâ civis. Which, ſo far from expreſſing any real difference, ſhews, on the contrary, that both theſe books are the productions of the ſame genius. He alſo called himſelf ſometimes Hortenſius Tranquillus; which Simler, the abridger and continuator of Geſner, has not obſerved, ſpeaking of Hortenſius Tranquillus, and Hortenſius Landus, as two different writers. We have a book of this Lando, intituled, Un Commentario delle più notabili e moſtruoſe coſe d'Italia, in 8vo. A diverting book; to which having not prefixed his name, he ſupplies that with a little advertiſement at the end, where he ſays: Godi, lettore, il preſente Commentario nato del coſtantiſſimo cervello di M. O. L. detto per la ſua natural manſuetudine il Tranq. Who ſees not that theſe three letters M. O. L. ſignify Meſſer Ortenſio Lando, & Tranq. Tranquillo. Next to this there is, Un Catalogo de gli inventori delle coſe che ſi mangiano, e delle bevande ch'oggidi s'uſano; at the end of which are theſe capital letters SUISNETROH SUDNAL ROTUA TSE. Which being read backwards, according to the order of the words make: HORTENSIUS LANDUS AUTOR EST. In the ſame manner at the end of his Paradoſſi, printed at Venice in 8vo, 1544, SUISNETROH TABEDUL, that is, HORTENSIUS LUDEBAT. It is therefore very probable, that it was not Baſſiano, but Hortenſio Lando, who was the author of the dialogue, which Herold anſwered: and what confirms me in this thought, is, that Hortenſio being to prove in one of his Parodoxes, that it is no diſhonour to be a baſtard, alledges, the example of many men of letters. Peter Lombard, Giaſon Maino, Longelius, Celio Calcagnini, and Eraſmus, ſpeaking of the latter in theſe words. O quanti letterati hannoci ancora dato i furtivi abracciamenti, &c. hannoci dato un Eraſmo di Roterodamo, e per opra d'un valente Abbate ce lo dettero.

I muſt not forget the Collection of Letters, which he printed at Venice, appreſſo Gabriel Giolito, in 1548, in 12mo. It is intituled, Lettere di molte valoroſe donne, nelle quali Chiaramente appare non eſſer ne di eloquentia ne di dottrina alli huomini inferiori. There is at the end of it a ſhort advertiſement (1) of Bartholomæus Peſtaloſſa, Rhetus, which intimates that Hortenſius Lando collected theſe letters into one volume, at the requeſt of Octavianus Raverta, 'Qui ob inſignem animi pietatem Terracinæ Pontifex deſignatus eſt (2). —— Who, for his remarkable piety, was nominated to the biſhopric of Terracina.'

[B] He wrote two dialogues, which have been falſely aſcribed to cardinal Aleander.] The following paſſage was communicated to me by the author the foregoing remark. 'The two dialogues, one whereof is intituled, Cicero relegatus, and the other Cicero revocatus, were not written by Jerom Aleander, but by Ortenſio Lando, a Mileneſe, ſirnamed Tranquillo. They are dedicated to Pomponio Trivultio; and becauſe the inſcription of the epiſtle dedicatory is thus expreſſed, Pomponio Trivultio, H. A. S. D. Henry Lewis Chaſteignier, biſhop of Poitiers, thought that the letters H. A. ſignified Hieronymus Aleander. But they have been put there without any reaſon for it; or perhaps, by an equivocation, H. A. have been put for H. L. A. that is Hortenſius Landus, the true name of the author. Simler, the continuator of Geſner, attributes theſe dialogues to Hortenſius Tranquillus Mediolanenſis, whom he erroneouſly diſtinguiſhes from Hortenſius Landus; for Landus and Tranquillus are one and the ſame writer. He loved to diſguiſe his name, and yet deſired nothing more than to be known. L'Autore della preſente opera, ſays he under the name of Paulo Maſcranico, in an advertiſement to the reader, at the end of his Paradoxes, il qual fu M. O. L. M. ‡ detto per ſopranome il Tranq. At the end of his Commentario d'Italia, in another advertiſement to the reader, under the name of Nicolo Morra, he ſpeaks thus. Godi Lettore, &c. (3). At the end of his Sermoni funebri delle beſtie, he names himſelf at length, and without any diſguiſe Hortenſio Lando ditto † il Tranquillo. Now this Lando, or Tranquillo, owns, in his laſt paradox, the dialogue, Cicero relegatus, to be his work. "Non dubito certamente, ſays he, che molti non ſi habbino da maravigliara che ancora fatto non habbia la pace con M. Tullio, qual gia ſono poco meno di dieci anni ⸸ chio mandai con ſuo gran ſcorno in eſſiglio —— I doubt not but many wonder I have not yet made peace with Cicero, whom, ten years ago, I ſent into ſhameful exile." And lower, "Quando ſcriſſo il dialogo intitolato Cicerone relegato. —— When I wrote the dialogue intituled Cicero relegatus."

LANGIUS (Paul) a German Monk, would ſcarce have been known by the chronicle he compoſed, if he had not inſerted in it ſome complaints againſt the vicious lives of Eccleſiaſtics, and beſtowed praiſes upon Martin Luther (a). Which has been the reaſon, why the Proteſtants have cited him a thouſand times. He was born at Zwicka in Voigtland, and became a Benedictin Monk in the year 1487, in the monaſtery of Bozau, near Zeits in Miſnia (b). The abbot Trithemius ſent him, in 1515, to rummage all the convents in Germany, in order to make a collection of all the manuſcripts that might ſerve to illuſtrate the hiſtory, or to enlarge the catalogue of eccleſiaſtical writers (c). Langius laboured alſo for himſelf in examining the libraries; for this was of great uſe to him, when he wrote his chronicle (d) [A]. It begins, according to Voſſius,

[A] His chronicle.] It is intituled, Chronicon Citicenſe. But this is no reaſon, why du Pleſſis ſhould call the author of it Moine de Citique, Monk of Citique. Coëffeteau, inſtead of correcting it, made uſe of the ſame words. Nor are thoſe of Rivet better, Le Moine Citique, The Citique Monk. See their paſſages in the remark [C]. Foreigners have great reaſon to complain, that the French do ſo disfigure proper

Voſſius, in the year 1468; but he is miſtaken [B]. Coëffeteau made uſe of a poor evaſion [C], when he anſwered the Myſtery of Iniquity, wherein ſome words of Langius were alledged. I do not think that to be a ſolid reflexion, which Andrew Rivet made with relation to Piſtorius, who publiſhed the chronicle of this monk, in the year 1583 [D]. Moreri's per names, that they cannot be known. Voſſius makes this obſervation againſt the illuſtrious Thuanus (1). But here the miſchief does not conſiſt only in diſfiguring the name of a town, but in ſomething worſe; for, under pretence, that Langius compoſed the chronicle of a cathedral, he has a name given him, derived from that church. Now that name does not ſuit him.

[B] Voſſius is miſtaken.] This book of Langius is a chronicle of the epiſcopal church of Zeitz. The emperor Otho I. founded this cathedral in the year 968. Pope John XIII confirmed it (2). Langius extends his chronicle from the foundation of it, till the year 1515, and not only gives the hiſtory of the biſhops of Zeitz, but alſo ſpeaks of the other biſhops of thoſe parts.

[C] Coëffeteau made uſe of a poor evaſion.] Du Pleſſis Mornai does not forget the praiſes that Langius beſtowed on Martin Luther. 'Paul Langius, a Monk of Citique, and a diſciple of the abbot Trithemius, at the time that Luther began to appear; though he did not leave his monaſtery, yet he was very much moved, and gave him an incredible teſtimony: "This Martin, ſays he, was a conſummate, profound, and incomparable divine, who endeavoured to reſtore the holy Theology to the dignity of it's original, and to the firſt purity and innocence, ſincerity and ſimplicity of the goſpel, deriding all ſecular Philoſophy." . . . . . In another place, under the year 1503, adding to him Carloſtad and Melanchthon; "They handle, ſays he, and teach the holy Theology, giving the wheat of the word of God, without any chaff; that is, without mixing it with Philoſophy and ſyllogiſms. They above all kept to the goſpel of Chriſt, and to the apoſtle St Paul, whom they take for their patron and foundation; and to the ſtudy of learning, they add the fear of God, and the ſeeds of all virtues, which they ſow in the hearts of their diſciples, by words, examples, and books." And leaſt it ſhould be replied, that it was before Luther had oppoſed the Pope, ſee how he ſpeaks of him under the year 1520, after having diſcourſed of the abuſes and exceſſes of indulgences. "This man, ſays he, by his doctrine and admirable preaching, brought all indulgences to nothing. He diſſuaded the people from buying them, affirming, that they are no ways neceſſary to ſalvation, and do not procure the remiſſion of ſins, but make people careleſs of repentance, and of all good works, and even are an incentive to vice," He further ſays, "That the merits of Chriſt and his ſaints are not a treaſury of indulgences; ſince in the primitive church, and for above a thouſand years after, there was nothing written of them by the holy men and doctors of the orthodox church. So far were they then from entertaining ſo great an opinion of them, as they do now, from a deſire of wealth, which accrues from them. Moreover, he affirmed and proved, that the church of Rome is not, of divine right, the firſt, nor the head of other churches, &c. And therefore, ſays he, they hitherto perſecute him as another Athanaſius, eſpecially for having maintained this poſition, and ſome other important doctrines, which not only the Romans continue to impugn, but alſo very many learned men, eſpecially the Thomiſts; and yet this Martin, who is undoubtedly the firſt and wiſeſt divine of our age, has not been hitherto vanquiſhed, confirming and proving his doctrine by the teſtimonies of the goſpel, and of the apoſtle St Paul, and even by the original texts of the antient orthodox fathers (3)." Du Pleſſis does not forget the corrective, added by Langius to ſo many bold propoſitions. 'And thus, ſays he, this Monk ſpeaks, non aſſertivè, ſed admirativè, not to affirm any thing, but out of admiration, ſuſpending his judgment, like many others, till the matter be decided in a general council.' I put Langius's words in the margin (4). They fully ſhew, that he was a Catholic.

Here follows Coëffeteau's anſwer. 'What Mr du Pleſſis urges from Paul Langius, a Monk of Citique, and a diſciple of the abbot Trithemius, ſhews the ſincerity of the Proteſtants, and their fairneſs in the publication of authors. For they make Langius ſay ſeveral things concerning Luther, which are entirely contrary, not only to the doctrine, which Langius conſtantly profeſſed to his death, but alſo to what he wrote in the ſame chronicle, wherein are inſerted the praiſes of Luther. Poſſibly the Proteſtants fancy they can make us believe, that this author was both a Lutheran and a Papiſt, a Heretic and a Catholic. Otherwiſe, certainly, they cannot reconcile what they make him ſay, with his firſt writings. And let no body be deceived by the name of Piſtorius the publiſher, for though he turned Catholic, it was ſome time after, and he was ſtill a Proteſtant, when he publiſhed this chronicle, with ſome other works of the German writers. Nay, he ſays, that he had it from Henry Petreus, who lived at Baſil among the Heretics. Moreover, thoſe who were guilty of the impoſture, were fully perſuaded, that it would be difficult to believe, that Langius ſpoke ſo advantageouſly of the perſon and doctrine of Luther; for which reaſon they added a poor and inſipid ſubterfuge, making him ſay, that what he had written about it, was not aſſertivè, but admirativè, not to affirm any thing but out of admiration, ſuſpending his judgment, &c. One would think that Langius was in queſt of a maſter, and was yet unreſolved, what religion to embrace (5).' This is a poor anſwer, and it were better to ſay nothing at all, than to uſe it. Father Gretſer gave it up, and thought it more to the purpoſe to ſuppoſe, that good Langius, being extremely deſirous to ſport with a woman, looked upon Luther as a hero, that was to deſtroy celibacy. Let us ſee how the apologiſt for du Pleſſis anſwered this pleaſantry, and Coëffeteau's ſubterfuge. 'Paul Langius, a Monk of Citique, gives ſuch a noble and great character of Luther's doctrine, that our Monk cannot bear it, and accuſes the publiſhers of his work of having added to it all that is produced out of it upon this ſubject, meaſuring their corn by the buſhel of the Papiſts, who corrupt, with additions and mutilations, all the writings that come into their hands. And yet it has pleaſed God to remove that objection, in that it was publiſhed by a man, who was then brooding the apoſtacy, which he at laſt hatched: namely, Piſtorius, who would not have failed to diſcover afterwards this artifice, if he had done it, or any other that he knew of. Gretſer, who might have aſked him ſome queſtions about it, had not the impudence, though it be a predominant quality in him, to accuſe the publiſhers of any impoſture. He choſe rather to abuſe this poor Monk in theſe words. "It is this Langius, whoſe feet itched, at the firſt hearing of the Lutheran goſpel, to run from his monaſtery, thinking that the acceptable time was come, in which it ſhould be lawful for the Monks to throw off their cowls, and marry the nuns." At that time the Monks knew well enough how to lie with them, without marrying them, had they had no other itch. Coëffeteau is not ignorant, that they want no opportunity of ſcratching it elſewhere (6).' Theſe laſt words manifeſtly ſhew, that the common places, the miſſionaries make uſe of on account of the marriage of the reformers and Monks, who embraced the Proteſtant religion, are not ſo favourable to them as they imagine. It affords them a large field for declamation; they make an odious deſcription of the ſenſuality of thoſe proſelytes: but they are eaſily anſwered, becauſe it is but too true, that thoſe, who make a vow of celibacy, do not always obſerve it; and common ſenſe teaches, that, if the miniſters of the church have not the power to abſtain from women, it is better they ſhould allay their heat with their own wives, than thoſe of other men.

[D] I do not think that to be a ſolid reflexion, which Andrew Rivet made.] We have ſeen, that he pretends, that Piſtorius would have diſcovered his fraud, when he turned Papiſt. I believe he is miſtaken. If Piſtorius had interpolated Langius's manuſcript, he would would never have boaſted of it. Such a confeſſion would have procured but an inconſiderable advantage to the church of Rome. Whether Langius praiſed Luther in the year 1520, or whether he diſpraiſed him, or did not mention him at all, is but a trifle at the bottom. But Piſtorius could not have diſcovered his cheat, without making himſelf contemptible to the Papiſts, and expoſing himſelf to the inſults of the Proteſtants, who would have found, in his own confeſſion, wherewithal to convict him of being a wicked man. People are not willing to own ſuch faults: they are too material.

LANGIUS (RODOLPH) a gentleman of Weſtphalia, and provoſt of the cathedral church of Munſter towards the end of the XVth century, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his learning, and his zeal for the reſtoration of polite learning. He ſtudied firſt at Deventer, after which he was ſent by his uncle, the dean of Munſter, into Italy, and followed the greateſt maſters of literature, Laurentius Valla, Mapheus Vegius, Francis Philelphus, and Theodore Gaza. By this means he acquired a good taſte of the Latin ſtile both in verſe and proſe, and confirmed himſelf in it by ſeveral compoſitions. He took this journey in company with Maurice count of Spiegelberg, and Rodolph Agricola; and, after their return into Germany, they all three laboured to drive out barbariſm, and were the firſt, who, by their example, and their exhortations, brought into credit the beſt way of writing Latin, and of teaching that language. Langius, being ſent to the court of Rome, by the biſhop and chapter of Munſter, under the pontificate of Sixtus IV, acquitted himſelf very well of his commiſſion, and returned with the letters of that Pope, and of Laurence de Medicis, which gained him ſtill greater eſteem with thoſe who deputed him; and this put him in a condition the better to execute the deſign he had of making polite learning flouriſh, and baniſhing from the ſchools the barbariſms that reigned in them. He was forced to ſtruggle ſome years with thoſe who patronized it [A], and who pleaded, that it was dangerous to introduce a new method of teaching: but at laſt he overcame theſe obſtacles; and he prevailed on his biſhop to found at Munſter a ſchool, the direction of which was given to able perſons. He pointed out to them the method of inſtruction, and the books they were to explain, and gave them acceſs to his fine library. This ſchool, being thus eſtabliſhed a little before the end of the XVth century, became very flouriſhing, and ſerved Germany as a nurſery of literature till the revolutions, which Anabaptiſm cauſed at Munſter in the year 1534. Langius died in the year 1519, aged eighty years. He publiſhed ſome poems, which prove, that, before Conrad Celtes, Germany produced ſome famous Latin Poets (a) [B].

Rodolph

[A] He was forced to ſtruggle ſome years with thoſe who patronized barbariſms.] The univerſity of Cologne oppoſed the commendable deſign of Langius; but he had in his favour the ſuffrages of the Italians; and this was an authority, which fully determined the biſhop of Munſter. You will ſee more particulars in theſe words of Chytræus (1). ‘Cauſam bonarum literarum & emendationis ſtudiorum doctrinæ barbaræ, paſſim in omnibus Collegiis & Scholis regnantium, majore cum fructu egit (Langius) tametſi aliquot adhuc annos reluctantibus veteris Barbariei patronis, ac nominatim Academia Colonienſi, quæ datis ad Conradum Ritbergenſem Epiſcopum, qui Henrico Swartzburgenſi ſucceſſerat, & ſummum Collegium, literis, uſitatum tot ſeculis inſtituendæ adoleſcentiæ & docendi rationem & libellos, in ſcholis retineri, & mutationes novas, & ſtudiis & diſciplinæ periculoſas, faveri flagitabant. Etſi autem erudite & graviter Conſilii ſui cauſas Rodolphus explicabat: tamen ad Italorum doctorum judicia ipſi provocare neceſſe fuit. Qui cum emendationem doctrinæ in ſcholis uſitatæ neceſſariam eſſe & Langium recte, Lovanienſes (2) perperam judicare, in reſponſis ad Epiſcopum ſuis pronunciaſſent; Epiſcopus qui Italorum, apud quos olim vixerat, cenſuram magni faciebat, facultatem aperiendæ novæ bonarum literarum ſcholæ Collegio dedit. ——— Langius more ſucceſsfully pleaded the cauſe of polite learning, and a reformation of thoſe barbarous ſtudies, which prevailed in all the colleges and ſchools, though for ſome years he met with oppoſition from the patrons of the old barbarity, particularly the univerſity of Cologne, which, by letters to Conrad Ritbergenſis, biſhop, and ſucceſſor of Henry Swartzburgenſis, and to the ſupreme college, earneſtly intreated them to patronize the antient method of inſtruction in the ſchools, and to diſcountenance theſe innovations ſo dangerous to ſtudy and diſcipline. And although Rodolph with great learning and earneſtneſs explained the reaſons of his undertaking, yet he was forced to appeal to the judgment of the learned Italians; who, in their anſwers to the biſhop, having pronounced, that a reformation of the learning of the ſchools was neceſſary, and that Langius had judged right, but the univerſity of Louvain wrong; the biſhop, who paid a great deference to the opinion of the Italians, among whom he had formerly lived, gave the college power to open a new ſchool of humanity.’

(1) David Chytræus, in Saxonia, lib. iii, pag. m. 80.

(2) As the author had not ſpoken of the univerſity of Louvain, but of that of Cologne, perhaps we ſhould read Colonienſes, and not Lovanienſes; but perhaps he had forgot to ſay, that the univerſity of Louvain wrote alſo to the biſhop of Munſter, to thwart the deſigns of Langius.

[B] He publiſhed ſome poems, which prove, that, before Conrad Celtes, Germany produced ſome famous Latin poets.] Let us cite the ſame evidence once more: ‘Primus autem Germaniæ Poëta, ipſius Rodolphi Agricolæ judicio, avorum ætate, aliquot ante Conradum Celten annis celebris, hic Rodolphus Langius fuit, editis, de excidio Hieroſolymæ poſtremo, de obſidione Noveſii, de Paulo Apoſtolo, de Maria Virgine, Poëmatis clarus. De quo condiſcipulo & æquali ſuo Hegius cecinit:

Jam ferre Poëtas
Barbarie in media Weſtphalis ora poteſt.
Langius hanc decorat majorum ſanguine clarus
Monaſteriaci lauſque decuſque ſoli
Primus Melpomenem qui rura in Weſtphala duxit
Cum caneret laudes, maxime Paule, tuas.

——— But the firſt German Poet, in the opinion of Rodolph Agricola himſelf, in the time of our anceſtors, ſome years before Conrad Celtes, was this Rodolph Langius, famous for his poems, on the laſt deſtruction of Jeruſalem, the ſiege of Neus, the apoſtle Paul, and the Virgin Mary. He was ſchool-fellow and equal of Hegius, who thus celebrated him.

Weſtphalia, which barbarity o'er-runs,
Can now produce Apollo's tuneful ſons.

Langius

(b) Idem, in ea Oratione, pag. 108.

Langius exalts her glory, whoſe great name
To riſing Munſter gives immortal fame.
He firſt a temple to the Muſes rais'd,
And in Weſtphalian verſe the great apoſtle prais'd.

Note, that Chytræus, in making uſe of the word editis, declares that theſe poems were printed. Nevertheleſs the abridger of Geſner's Bibliotheque (3), who mentions ſome other poems of Langius, inſinuates ſome doubt; for he ſays, that Herman Hamelman, who acknowledges to have ſeen them, does not ſpecify whether they were manuſcripts, or printed works.

LANGIUS (Joseph) a native of Keiſerſberg (a) in the upper Alſace, and profeſſor of Mathematics, and the Greek tongue at Friburg in Briſgaw, was writing his Elementale Mathematicum (b) in the year 1612, which was not printed (c), according to Voſſius, till five years after (d). Iſaac Habrecht, a Philoſopher and a Phyſician, enlarged it, and adorned it with notes and figures, and publiſhed it (e) in the year 1625. Langius had printed, at Straſburg, in 1598, a Florilegium [A], in 8vo, which was followed ſome time after, by a book in Folio, intituled Polyanthea Nova [B]. He lived ſeveral years in the Proteſtant communion, and then he embraced the Romiſh faith (f). I give the titles of his other books [C].

[A] A Florilegium.] It is an alphabetical collection of ſentences, apoththegms, compariſons, examples, and hieroglyphics. Such a book is of uſe to ſcholars, in dilating upon a theme. It might be alſo ſerviceable to learned men, if all the citations had been well collated with the originals; but little care has been taken of that. Our Langius was contented to tranſcribe the modern compilers, and among others Thomas Hibernicus (1), whoſe book, Flores Doctorum, abounds with faults.

[B] Polyanthea Nova.] The author, in this book, has followed the ſame method, as in the Florilegium. The Index of Spain corrects ſome places in it, and gives an account of the books intituled Polyanthea. I think it will not be amiſs to give the ſubſtance of that account. The firſt Polyanthea was printed in 1512 (2): it is the work of the Monk Dominicus Nanus Mirabellius, author of the Monoteſſaron Evangeliorum. The ſecond was compiled by a Bookſeller of Cologne, called Maternus Cholinus, and publiſhed in the year 1585 (3). He added to Mirabellius, all that he thought proper to be copied from three books, that had been publiſhed, I mean from the collection of Bartholomæus Amantius, and from the Sententiarum opus abſolutiſſimum ex probatiſſimis auctoribus excerptum (4), and from an anonymous book printed at Lyons. Cholinus, beſides, inſerted his own collections. The third, intituled Polyanthea nova, is the work of our Joſeph Langius, and was printed at Geneva in 1600, at Lyons in 1604, at Francfort in 1607, and ſeveral times ſince. The fourth, called Polyanthea noviſſima, is divided into twenty books, and differs from the third only in ſome additions. The fifth, called Florilegium magnum, ſeu Polyanthea floribus noviſſimis ſparſa, was publiſhed at Francfort, in 1621. What is new in this book, is owing to the induſtry of Franciſcus Sylvius Inſulanus. I have mentioned elſewhere (5) Gruterus's Supplements: they contain two volumes; ſo that the Florilegium magnum contains three volumes: the firſt is Sylvius Inſulanus's; the ſecond and third, printed at Francfort, in 1624, are Gruterus's.

LANGLE (John Maximilian de) miniſter of the goſpel, was born at Evreux in 1590. He was made miniſter of the Reformed church at Rouën in 1615, being then but twenty five years of age. He diſcharged all the functions of his miniſtry for fifty two years with great reputation, piety, and eloquence. We have two volumes of his ſermons, one upon the eighth chapter of the epiſtle to the Romans, the other upon ſeveral texts of the Scripture, and a diſſertation, by way of a letter, in defence of Charles I, king of England. Seven years before his death, he fell into a palſy, which occaſioned an impediment in his ſpeech; notwithſtanding which, his ingenious and pious converſations were both pleaſing and edifying. He died in 1674, in the eighty fourth year of his age, leaving ſeveral children behind him [A], who inherited his merit and his virtue (a).

(a) I publiſh this article juſt as it has been communicated to me.

[A] He left ſeveral children.] SAMUEL DE LANGLE, his eldeſt ſon, was born at London, and was carried into France being one year old, where he conſtantly lived, till the laſt perſecution obliged him to retire into England. He was a miniſter almoſt in the ſame year of his age as his father, and jointly officiated with him in the church of Rouën, for twenty three years. He was afterwards invited to Paris in 1671, to ſerve the church that met at Charenton, and was very much eſteemed in both places for his gravity, his ſolid learning, and conſummate prudence, being an intimate friend of Mr Claude. The perſecutions of France, and particularly that which deprived fathers of their children, obliged him to retire into England. The univerſity of Oxford made him doctor of Divinity, without his asking it: and king Charles II gave him, as a teſtimony of his eſteem, a prebend in the abbey of Weſtminſter. He was born in 1622. He fell ſick in the ſeventy firſt year of his age, in June 1693, of a violent diſtemper, which laſted eight days, but hindered him not from preſerving all the ſtrength of his parts, continually making excellent diſcourſes to his relations and friends, and eſpecially to his children, to whom he had given the ſame education he received from his father. The public has yet ſeen no other writings of his, beſides a letter upon the differences between the Epiſcopalians, and Preſbyterians in England. Dr Stillingfleet, the preſent biſhop of Worceſter (1), printed it at the end of one of his books upon the ſame ſubject; but they have found, among his manuſcripts, a treatiſe concerning the Chriſtian truth, which he began ſome years before, and finiſhed a little before his death. It is hoped, that Mr de Langle, his eldeſt ſon, and a miniſter too, will publiſh it in a little time. He alſo made many critical obſervations upon ſeveral places of the ſcripture, and particularly on the Pſalms, which it is believed he would have publiſhed himſelf, if he had lived long enough to put them in order as he deſigned them (2).

As for the other children of John Maximilian de Langle, the memoir, I cite, ſays nothing of them.

(1) He died in 1699, ſince the firſt impreſſion of this paſſage.

(2) A Memoir, imparted to me, which I print juſt as I have received it.

LANGUET (Hubert), a native of Viteaux in Burgundy (a); became famous for his ability and virtue, in the XVIth century. Having read a book of Melanchthon in Italy, he was ſo deſirous of knowing that great man, that he went to viſit him in Germany. He contracted a very ſtrict friendſhip with him [A]. He charmed him with his fine converſation; for he had a very good memory, and an exquiſite judgment (b). He was a long time one of the chief counſellors to Auguſtus elector of Saxony (c); and, if we may believe Thuanus, he did not leave that court [B], till he was ſuſpected of being one of thoſe, who adviſed Gaſpar Peucer to publiſh an expoſition of the doctrine of the Euchariſt, agreeable to the Geneva confeſſion. This hiſtorian adds, that, having left the court of Saxony, he retired to the prince of Orange, and was employed in great affairs, and that, whilſt he applied himſelf to them, he fell ſick, and died at Antwerp, the thirtieth of September 1581, being ſixty three years old (d). He had a great ſhare in the eſteem of Mr du Pleſſis Mornai [C]. He is thought to be the author of the ſpeech, which was made to Charles IX, the twenty third of December 1570, in the name of ſeveral princes of Germany [D]. The famous treatiſe,

[A] He contracted a very ſtrict friendſhip with Melanchthon.] All that I have ſaid about this, is afforded me by Joachim Camerarius, in his life of Melanchthon. Hunc (Languetum) lectio libri cujuſdam in Italia ubi tunc ipſe degeret, a Philippo Melanchthone compoſiti cupiditate incenderat videndi autorem illius, & ea ſtimulos perpetuo admovens perpulerat tandem ut in Germaniam veniret, & Wittembergam ſe conferret (1). Languet came to Wittemberg in the year 1549 (2), and kept ſo cloſe to Melanchthon, that, excepting ſome journies from time to time, he never left him. Neque ab ipſo diſceſſit. niſi interdum per intervalla quædam peregrinationum, quibus mirifice delectabatur, donec Philippi Melanchthonis vita in terris duravit (3). Languet's converſation was admirable. He ſpoke learnedly of the intereſts of princes, and was thoroughly acquainted with the hiſtory of illuſtrious men (4). His memory never failed him as to the circumſtances of time, or proper names; and he had an extraordinary ſagacity at diſcovering the inclinations of people, and foreſeeing the event of things. He, who gives him this teſtimony, was particularly acquainted with him. Neque ego, ſays he (5) audivi ullum alterum, qui tam prudenter & certo, & planè, dilucidè, diſertè, exponeret, quicquid narrare inſtituiſſet. Non ille in hominum nominibus falli, non indiciis temporum errare, non confundere rerum negotiorumque ſeriem. Erat autem in eo ſingularis ſagacitas in notandis naturis hominum, & conjiciendo, quo quiſque ſuopte ingenio deferretur, & quæ eſſet voluntatis inclinatio. Conſiliorum etiam ſolertiſſimus æſtimator, & eventuum futurorum proviſione admirabilis.

I will add to this, what Mr de la Mare ſays, that about the year 1548, a German gave Melanchthon's Loci Communes to Languet; that Languet, having read that book four or five times in one year, during his travels, was freed from thoſe doubts, which had perplexed him a long time, and conceived an extraordinary eſteem for Melanchthon; that, having conſulted the chief divines of Leipſic, he embraced the Proteſtant religion, and put himſelf under the diſcipline of Joachim Camerarius, who taught the belles lettres in the univerſity of Leipſic; that he lodged in the houſe of that profeſſor; that, ſeeing the troubles of that country, he undertook a journey into Italy, till he might ſettle in Germany as ſoon as things ſhould be quiet there; that he ſtudied the Civil-Law a year at Padua, where he took his doctor's degree, and afterwards went to Bologna; and that, during that time, as Joachim Camerarius relates (6), he was ſo charmed with a new book of Melanchthon, that he wiſhed for nothing ſo earneſtly, as to return into Germany to ſee the author of that book, which he did in the year 1549. I find ſomething in this account, that is liable to a difficulty: for it is not natural, that a man, who had conceived ſuch an eſteem for Melanchthon, by the reading of his common-places of Divinity, that he took him for the only wiſe man in the world (7), ſhould make a journey to Leipſic, ſtay there, and embrace the Proteſtant religion, without going to ſee that divine; and that he ſhould not deſire to make him a viſit, till he had read another book of his at Bologna. It is not true, that Camerarius ſays, that this other book was the treatiſe de Anima, and that it made Languet reſolve to return into Germany. He expreſſes himſelf ſo, as to make one believe, that he means a firſt, and not a ſecond journey. Perpulerat tandem ut in Germaniam veniret (8). Laſtly, it is ſtrange, that, if Languet had been Camerarius's diſciple and his boarder at Leipſic in 1548, Camerarius ſhould ſay, that he did not come into Germany till 1549, out of a deſire of ſeeing Melanchthon, which proceeded from his reading a book of his in Italy. Either he, or Mr de la Mare, muſt be miſtaken. In all likelihood Camerarius's account is right; for Languet (9) himſelf tells him, that, having read in Italy Melanchthon's common-places, in the year 1547, and not thinking him ſufficiently clear about the Euchariſt, he reſolved to go and conſult the author, and that he ſaw him in 1549. Would he have ſpoke after this manner, if he had embraced the Proteſtant religion at Leipſic in 1548, and if Camerarius had been his profeſſor and landlord in the ſame year in the ſame town?

[B] If we may believe Thuanus, he did not leave that court, &c.] Thuanus ſpeaks of it too generally. The expoſition of the doctrine of the Euchariſt came out in the year 1573. Languet was not then at the court of Saxony, but at that of the emperor; and did not leave that employment till 1577. A letter which he writ from Prague the firſt of March 1577 (10), informs us, that he had obtained leave from his electoral highneſs of Saxony to retire whither he pleaſed. Ever after he held a great correſpondence with that elector, tho' he applied himſelf to the affairs of prince Caſimir, or of the prince of Orange. All this is proved by his letters, publiſhed in the year 1699.

[C] He had a great ſhare in the eſteem of Mr du Pleſſis Mornai.] That appears from this paſſage (11): ‘At his arrival at Antwerp, Mr du Pleſſis found his wife and children ſick; and a ſon whom God had given him, died immediately in his abſence; beſides he found Mr Languet, his particular friend, dead, whom Madam du Pleſſis, tho' ſick her ſelf, had attended to his laſt breath. His laſt words were: That the only thing he was ſorry for, was, that he could not ſee Mr du Pleſſis again before he died, to whom he would have left his heart, if it had been poſſible. That he had deſired to live to ſee the world grow better; but ſince it ſtill grew worſe he had nothing more to do with it; that the princes of this time were ſtrange people; that virtue had much to ſuffer, and little to gain by them; that he very much pitied Mr du Pleſſis, who would feel a good deal of it, and would have a bad time to go through; but that he ſhould not deſpond, and God would aſſiſt him: he entreated her to requeſt one thing of him, that, in the firſt book he ſhould publiſh, he would make mention of their friendſhip. This Mr du Pleſſis did, not long after, in a ſhort preface at the beginning of the Latin verſion of his book concerning the truth of the Chriſtian religion.’ What he ſays in praiſe of Hubert Languet in that preface, and what others have publiſhed upon the ſame ſubject, has been carefully collected by Voëtius (12). The epitaph alone is worth a panegyric. You will find it in the ſame Voëtius. Note, that Languet expreſſed a very great affection for Mr du Pleſſis at the time of the Paris maſſacre (13).

[D] The ſpeech made to Charles IX, in the name of ſeveral German princes is aſcribed to him.] Mr Colomiés gives a very ſolid proof of it in his Mêlanges Hiſtoriques treatiſe, intituled VINDICIÆ CONTRA TYRANNOS, is aſcribed to him [E]. The Latin letters, which he wrote to Sir Philip Sidney, were printed at Francfort in 1633 (e). riques (14). He takes it from a letter of Languet to his hero Sir Philip Sidney, written from Vienna the firſt of January, 1574.

[E] The famous treatiſe, intituled, VINDICIÆ CONTRA TYRANNOS.] What I have ſaid above in the project of this Dictionary, at the word Brutus, is too long to be conveniently inſerted here. I have thought it more proper to place it at the end of this work by way of diſſertation.

Some ſay, he is the author of the book de Furoribus Gallicis (15), but without any good grounds (16). It was believed in his family, that he wrote the famous apology for the prince of Orange; which they inferred from his ſending a copy of it to each of his relations, as a thing of his own writing. Nevertheleſs Grotius (17) aſcribes this apology to another Frenchman, who was called Peter de Villiers (18).

[F] They have publiſhed . . . . . . a large collection of letters he wrote to the elector of Saxony.] Mr Ludovicus, profeſſor in the univerſity of Hall, procured that edition. We ſhould have been ſtill more indebted to him, if he had added an Index to it, and if he had taken care, that the faults of the Printers, or tranſcribers, in the proper names, had been more carefully corrected. It is a wonder he put no preface to that book, and that the editions of Germany being generally valuable for the indexes there ſhould be none in Languet's letters, which wanted it more than many other books; becauſe each letter contains ſeveral particular facts, which have no connection with a general ſubject. Here is the title of that book: Arcana ſeculi decimi ſexti. Huberti Langueti, Legati, dum viveret, & Conſiliarii Saxonici Epiſtolæ ſecretæ ad Principem ſuum Auguſtum Sax. Ducem & S. R. I. ſeptemvirum. Ex ΑΡΧΕΙΩ. Saxonico deſcriptas primus à Muſeo edit Jo. Petr. Ludovicus. The abbot Nicaiſe aſſured me, that the life of the author, written by Mr de la Mare, would be prefixed to it; but that did not prove true. It was publiſhed by itſelf in the town of Hall in 1700, in 12mo. If it had come to my hands ſoon enough, this article had been better and fuller. I refer you to Mr Bernard (19), who gives a very large and exact account of that piece: it is well written, and very curious.

[G] We muſt not forget . . . . . . a converſation, which Thuanus had with him.] He became acquainted with Languet at the Baden waters, in the year 1579, and was ſo charmed with the carriage and fine diſcourſes of that worthy man, that he thought he never could part from him. This is the encomium he beſtows upon him; which I relate, becauſe neither Voëtius nor Mr Teiſſier have mentioned it. 'Argentina Badam ventum, ubi Thuanus Languetum vacuum nactus ita mordicus per triduum ei adhæſit, ut ab eo divelli non poſſe putaretur. Ita candor hominis illum ceperat, inſigni probitate, judicio non ſolum in literis, ſed in publicis negotiis, quæ tota vita ſub variis principibus magna fide geſſerat, præditi, ad hæc rerum Germaniæ callentiſſ. ut Germanos ipſos res patrias ſuas doceret. Toto illo tempore cum eo aſſiduus, niſi quantum aquis ſumendis impendebat, cum multa didicit, tum breviculum manu ipſius perſcriptum, quod & nunc ſervat, poſtquam hinc diſceſſit, ab eo accepit, quo generalis Germaniæ ſtatus, ſicut hodie eſt, comitiorum jus, circulorum nemerus, conſiliorum ordo deſcribitur (20). 'From Strasburg he came to Baden, where Thuanus, finding Languet at leiſure, ſtuck ſo cloſe to him for three days, that it was thought he could not be parted from him: ſo taken was he with the candour of the man, his remarkable probity, and his judgment, not only in matters of learning, but alſo in public affairs, which he faithfully tranſacted, during his whole life, under various princes; add to theſe his thorough knowledge of the affairs of Germany, in which he was able to inſtruct the Germans themſelves. He ſpent that whole time with him, excepting as much of it as was employed in drinking the waters; during which he not only learned many things, but likewiſe received from him a ſmall manuſcript, which he ſtill keeps, deſcribing the preſent ſtate of Germany, the rights of the Diets, the number of the Circles, and the order of the Councils.' He ſays, that Languet ſhewed him a German lord, who was at a window with his wiſe, and afterwards asked him with a ſmile, If it was in your choice, would you prefer ſuch a handſome woman before the archbiſhopric of Cologne? Thuanus, not knowing what was the drift of his queſtion ſaid nothing. Languet explained to him the myſtery, telling him, that this German lord was the count of Iſemburg, who had lately reſigned the archbiſhopric of Cologne to marry Joan de Lignes, ſiſter to the count of Aremberg. He added, that the ſuppreſſion of celibacy in Germany was inconvenient to the great Proteſtant lords; for whereas in the time of Popery, they made their daughters Nuns, with a certain proſpect of ſeeing them ſome time or other raiſed to the dignity of an abbeſs, in ſome very rich convent, they were obliged to marry them in a country where people multiply very faſt (21).

I think the diſpute ſtopped there.

LARROQUE (Matthew de) in Latin Larroquanus, one of the moſt famous miniſters the Proteſtants have had in France, was born at Leirac a little town of Guienne, near Agen in 1619. The misfortune he had to loſe his parents juſt before he came of age, who for their rank and virtue were among the moſt eminent of their town, was followed ſoon after by the loſs of his patrimony, nor is it known by what accident, or by whoſe fraud it happened. This was ſo far from diſcouraging him, that it animated him more vigorouſly to ſeek conſolation in his ſtudies, and to add to his claſſical learning, the knowledge of Philoſophy, and eſpecially of Divinity. He made a very great progreſs in them, and was admitted miniſter with ap lauſe. He was obliged to go to Paris two years after his admiſſion into the miniſtry, in order to oppoſe the cavils of thoſe who endeavoured to ruin his church. He could not overcome them; but he met with favourable conjunctures on other accounts. He preached ſometimes at Charenton, and was ſo liked by the ducheſs de la Trimouille, that ſhe choſe him to be miniſter of the church of Vitré in Bretagne, and afterwards gave him many marks of a particular eſteem. The ſame did the prince (a) and the princeſs of Tarente, and the ducheſs of Weimar (b). He ſerved that church about twenty ſeven years, and applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the fathers with unparallelled ardour. He quickly gave public proofs of the progreſs he had made in it; for the anſwer he publiſhed to the motives of converſion of a certain miniſter (c), who had changed his religion, was full of their teſtimonies. The books he afterwards printed, extremely raiſed his reputation [A]. He contracted a very cloſe friendſhip with Mr Daillé and his ſon, which was kept up by a frequent correſpondence of letters. The journey he made to Paris, procured him the acquaintance of ſeveral learned men [B]. The church of Charenton reſolved to call him thither in 1669; but the envy of ſome falſe brethren was ſo violent, that they uſed all artifices to prejudice the court againſt him, inſomuch that his majeſty injoined that church to lay aſide their thoughts of him, notwithſtanding the deputy-general of the Proteſtants (d) offered to be anſwerable for the good conduct of Mr de Larroque. It was a very great concern to him to be ſlandered; but the teſtimony of a good conſcience was his remedy. He was invited to be both miniſter and profeſſor of Divinity at Saumur. He accepted the firſt employment, but refuſed the latter, as judging it prejudicial to the ſtudy of eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, which was his favourite paſſion. He was preparing for his journey to Saumur, when the intendant of the province (e) forbad his undertaking it. He appealed

[A] The books he afterwards printed, extremely raiſed his reputation.] He publiſhed in 1665, an anſwer to a book of the gentlemen of Port-Royal, intituled L' Office du St Sacrament, &c. the office of the holy ſacrament, or the tradition of the church concerning the Euchariſt, collected from the holy fathers, and other eccleſiaſtical authors. This anſwer was very much eſteemed: ‘ Mirâ cum ſolertiâ nimis Catholicorum virorum, qui ut legentibus fucum farcrent SS. Patrum textum vel mutilaverant, vel pravo commento inquinaverant, pias fraudes vel impias dicam neſcio, retexit. Mirati ſunt omnes nihil inter reſpondendum illum fugiſſe, nihilque vindicandum intactum ſiviſſe, tantâ ſagacitate ac diligentiâ unum quodque expendens officium, ut in ejus meſſem nemo pedem, vel Spicilegii cauſa intulerit (1). —— He with amazing ſagacity detected the pious, or rather impious frauds of the Catholic writers, who, to deceive their readers, had either corrupted the text of the holy fathers, or perverted it by their falſe comments. It was univerſally admired, that in his anſwer, nothing ſhould eſcape him, or be left untouched, which wanted vindication, while he diſcuſſed every particular with ſuch uncommon induſtry, and ability, as to leave no room for any one ſo much as to glean after him.' As much as this book deſerved admiration, it did not come up to the excellent work which this author publiſhed ſome years after, with this title, Hiſtoire de l' Euchariſtie. There were two editions of it in leſs than two years, and it was tranſlated into Engliſh. The author did not put his name to the firſt edition; but he did to the ſecond, which is that of 1671. It is true, it appeared there under ſome diſguiſe by the Bookſeller's fault, who undoubtedly miſtook a q, for a g, in the author's manner of ſubſcribing his name (2). From whence it has happened that ſeveral controverſiſts of the Romiſh communion have named him Larrogue, inſtead of Larroque. He printed at Geneva in 1670, two Latin diſſertations, de Photino & Liberio, wherein, among other things, he ſhewed ſome errors of Petavius concerning the epocha of Photinus's condemnation. He confuted in a third diſſertation what Mr David had urged againſt the firſt. After this he engaged in the defence of his deceaſed friend Mr Daillé againſt two learned Engliſhmen. That book is intituled, Obſervationes in Ignatianas Pearſonii Vindicias, nec non in Beverigii Annotationes. —— Obſervations on Pearſon's Vindication of Ignatius, and on Beveridge's Annotations. He had almoſt finiſhed his reply to Dr Beveridge's anſwer, but being deſired by ſome of his friends to drop that diſpute, he readily complied with their requeſt. His book concerning the conformity of the diſcipline of the reformed churches of France with that of the primitive Chriſtians, came after thoſe I have mentioned, and and was followed by a treatiſe on the communion in both kinds, in anſwer to a book of the biſhop of Meaux. This is what we find in the life of the author prefixed to a poſthumous book publiſhed by Mr de Larroque his ſon in 1688. We find no mention there of the tract concerning the nature of the church, nor of that concerning the Regale; which too pieces muſt be added to the foregoing books. As to this poſthumous book it is intituled, Matthæi Larroquani Adverſariorum ſacrorum libri tres. Opus Poſthumum. It is to be hoped the public will ſome time or other be obliged with that excellent work.

LASCARIS (Constantine) left Conſtantinople, his native place, in 1454, and retired into Italy. He was one of thoſe who reſtored in the Weſt the knowledge of the Belles Lettres. He taught this firſt at Milan, whither he was invited by Francis Sforza. After them he went to viſit cardinal Beſſarion at Rome, from whom he received ſeveral marks of friendſhip. He went afterwards to Naples, where he taught Rhetoric, and the Greek tongue with applauſe. At laſt he went to Meſſina, where he remained till his death. He drew a great concourſe of ſcholars thither, and among others Peter Bembus, who was promoted to the dignity of a cardinal, by Clement VII. He left his library to the ſenate of Meſſina: It was compoſed of excellent books, which he had brought from Conſtantinople. The ſenate had honoured him (a) with the right of freedom, and his funeral was ordered at the public charge. His marble tomb in the church of the Carmelites, has been ruined by the injuries of time, and never was repaired (b). Our Laſcaris is author of ſome books [A].

(b) Taken from Jerom Raguſa, in Elog. Siculorum.

[A] He is author of ſome books.] They concern the Greek Grammar: Aldus Manutius printed them with ſome other ſmall pieces of the ſame nature in Greek and Latin. Beſides theſe, Laſcaris made a collection of the learned men, who flouriſhed antiently in Sicily (1).

(1) The Jeſuit Jerom Raguza has inſerted it in his Elogia Siculorum, printed at Avignon, in 1690.

LASCARIS (John) ſirnamed Rhyndacenus (a), was of the family of Laſcaris, which has produced ſome emperors of Conſtantinople. He took ſanctuary in Italy, after the deſtruction of the Eaſtern empire in the XVth century, and was very kindly received by Laurence de Medicis. This great favourer of learned men thought him proper to be employed in making a collection of the beſt books which were in Greece, and to that end deputed him to the Sultan [A]. This deputation had a happy ſucceſs,

(a) Perhaps from a town called Rhyndacus between the Helleſpont and Phrygia, mentioned by Stephanus Byzantinus.

[A] Laurence de Medicis deputed him to the Sultan.] Twice, if we may believe Paul Jovius, who adds that this Sultan loved Philoſophy, and had a particular eſteem for Laurence de Medicis. It is neceſſary to ſet down the words of that hiſtorian; for I muſt compare them with thoſe of Varillas. It is a point of criticiſm. ‘ Is (Laurentius Medices) tum ‘ abſolvendæ Bibliothecæ ſtudio tenebatur. Ob id ‘ Laſcarem, ad conquirenda volumina Byzantium cum ‘ legatione ad Bajazetem bis miſit: nec defuit ho‘ neſta petenti, nuſquam Barbarus Imperator, quippe ‘ qui erat totius philoſophiæ ſtudioſus, Averroiſque ‘ ſectator eximius, & de Laurentio privatim tanquam ‘ de illuſtri cultore virtutis, optimè ſentiret, quum ‘ paulò ante Bandinum percuſſorem fratris, fuga in ‘ Aſiam elapſum in catenis ad ſupplicium tradidiſſet ‘ (1); ſingulari quidem religionis, atque juſtitiæ ex‘ emplo; quòd ille immane ſcelus in templo auſus, ‘ merita pœna plectendus cenſeretur. Itaque Laſcares ‘ tuto abdita Græciæ perſcrutatus, quum patriæ opes ‘ victoribus ceſſiſſent, nobiliora divitiis antiquæ dig‘ nitatis volumina collegit, ut in Italia ſervarentur (2). ‘ He (Laurence de Medicis) was then intent on com‘ pleating his library. For this purpoſe he twice deputed ‘ Laſcaris to Conſtantinople to Bajazet, nor did the ‘ Sultan diſcourage the well intended errand, being ‘ himſelf addicted to the ſtudy of Philoſophy, and a ‘ celebrated follower of Averroës, and having alſo a ‘ particular regard for Laurence's virtuous character, ‘ to whom he had a little before ordered Bandini to ‘ be delivered up in chains who had fled into Aſia, for ‘ the murder of his brother; an eminent inſtance of re‘ ligion and juſtice, in giving up an offender to condign ‘ puniſhment, for ſo horrid a crime committed in a ‘ church. Therefore Laſcaris being permitted to ranſac ‘ the hidden treaſures of Greece, though the riches of ‘ his country had been ſwallowed by the conquerors, yet ‘ he collected volumes of antiquity much more valuable ‘ than

II, pag. 320, & ſeq. and pag. 439 Note, That Mr Wicquefort is very much miſtaken in this matter: See his Traité de l'Ambaſſadeur, Tom. I, pag. m. 269.

ceſs, for the Grand Seignor permitted Laſcaris to ſearch all the libraries, by which means an infinite treaſure of rare learning was tranſported into Italy. After that Laſcaris went into France, where he had the eſteem of Lewis XII, who ſent him to Venice, in quality of embaſſador [B]. He went from thence to Rome in the pontificate of Leo X, and

‘ than riches, in order to their being depoſited in Italy.’ Varillas thought this narrative of Paul Jovius was too dry, and therefore he has embelliſhed it with abundance of circumſtances, as if, inſtead of faithfully tranſlating another man's work, he had been employed to turn it into a romance. Here is his account (3): ‘ Laurence de Medicis received Laſcaris with open arms; and committed to him the care of his library: one day as they diſcourſed about the means of enriching it, Laſcaris recollected that Bajazet II, emperor of the Turks had an inclination for Philoſophy, and having cauſed Averroës's commentaries upon Ariſtotle to be explained to him, would probably not be unwilling to have the Peripatetic writings preſerved from the wreck of learning. Laurence de Medicis promiſed to furniſh him with all things neceſſary for a voyage to Conſtantinople, if he would engage in that deſign. Laſcaris took him at his word, and embarked without any other credentials, than what Laurence de Medicis gave him to his factors. However, he found acceſs to the Grand Seignor, and was introduced to his highneſs, who received him much better than he expected. They had a very long converſation, and Bajazet expreſſed to him all the eſteem, an infidel was capable of, for the virtue of Laurence de Medicis, and permitted him (on his account) to buy up all the manuſcripts which were to be ſold in his empire. His highneſs appointed perſons to conduct him to the places where he knew there had been libraries, and to prevent thoſe who had plundered them, from ſelling the books too dear. Thus Laſcaris had the conveniency of going through all Greece, and collecting thoſe rare volumes, which are ſtill preſerved, in the king's library. However, he brought only one half of them in the firſt voyage he made; becauſe the pleaſure of ſhewing his patron the authors he had recovered, and which were ſuppoſed to be loſt, would not let him ſtay from Florence any longer than two years. But Laurence de Medicis ſent him back three months after, deſiring him to continue his ſearch, wherever there had been learned men. Laſcaris waited again upon Bajazet, and received from him new civilities. He ſearched all Peloponneſus, and returned as it were in triumph, in a veſſel laden with the remainder of the ſpoils of the Greek tongue. But he had not as yet placed his manuſcripts in the ſumptuous building deſigned for them, when Laurence de Medicis died, and left Italy in a calm, which was not of long continuance. The French army entered Florence, and plundered the books as well as the other effects of the houſe of Medicis.’ Here are not only many circumſtances, which Varillas has forged to embelliſh and enlarge his ſtory, but alſo ſome falſifications; for he ſuppoſes, I. that Laſcaris had no credentials to the Grand Seignor. What is then the meaning of theſe words of Paul Jovius, Byzantium CUM LEGATIONE ad Bajazetem miſit? II. That the rare volumes collected by Laſcaris, are in the French king's library, the French army having plundered the books and other effects of the houſe of Medicis, in the time of Charles VIII. To confute this hiſtorian in this particular, we need only put him in mind, that he himſelf ſays in another book (4), that the houſe of Medicis was plundered by the Florentines, before the troops of Charles VIII, entered into Florence. He ſays expreſsly, that the Florentines plundered the prodigious collection of ſtatues, pictures, BOOKS, and medals, which foreigners came to ſee with admiration in the palace of Medicis. Note, that the books of this library, which may have been brought into that of the French king, were conveyed thither by another channel than the expedition of Charles VIII. This removal is more modern; ſee Father Jacob in his treatiſe of libraries: he will inform you that Catherine de Medicis brought among other things to Henry II, her husband, the manuſcripts of the famous library of Medicis, which were put into the royal library, where they are ſtill preſerved (5).

When it ſhall be proved that Varillas had any other authority than the elogies of Paul Jovius, for what he ſays of Laſcaris in his Anecdotes de Florence, I will ſee, whether I am wrong in accuſing him of being the inventer of moſt of the circumſtances he has mentioned. If he had met with what Jovius remarks, in another book, he would have given us a relation yet much more paraphraſtical: this would have been a ſcene full of decorations. Jovius relates that the baſha Cherſeoglis got leave for John Laſcaris to ſearch all the libraries of Greece, when, by order of Leo X, he went in queſt of old manuſcripts. ‘ Nec illud quidem erga literarum ſtudia eximiæ benignitatis officium prætermittendum videtur, quòd Laſcari, quem ſupra memoravimus Græcorum nobiliſſimo, pariter atque doctiſſimo antiquos codices juſſu Leonis decimi conquirenti, cunctas Græciæ bibliothecas impetrato ad id regio diplomate, liberè excutiendas aperuit (6). — Nor muſt that good office of his to the Republic of Letters be forgot, in procuring for Laſcaris, that noble and learned Greek, whom I before mentioned to be ſent by Leo X, to ſearch for antient manuſcripts, the Grand Seignor's leave to examine all the libraries of Greece.’ This hiſtorian had been ſaying that this baſha having turned Mahometan out of ſpite, preſerved in his heart the Chriſtian faith, and had a crucifix concealed in a cloſet, which he worſhipped in the night, when no body could diſcover him. He ſhewed his crucifix to John Laſcaris, who afterwards related all theſe particulars to Jovius. The diſguſt which induced him to an outward abjuration of Chriſtianity was this. He was going to be married to a great beauty, when his father falling in love with her, reſolved to take her from him, and marry her himſelf. This injury ſo enraged the ſon that he retired to the neighbouring garriſons of the Turks, and afterwards to Conſtantinople, where Bajazet gave him a very kind reception, and promiſed him one of his daughters in marriage. The young man turned Mahometan, quitted his name of Stephen, and took that of Achomat, and Cherſeoglis, and became ſon-in-law to Bajazet (7). What paraphraſes and flouriſhes ſhould we not have ſeen in the Anecdotes of Florence, if Varillas had come to the knowledge of this Latin paſſage? Non, ut cæteri ferè omnes à prima pueritia per delectus Chriſtianis parentibus erepti, ſed jam planè vir (Cherſeoglis) ita à majorum religione diſceſſit, ut nunquam ex arcano veræ pietatis obliviſceretur. Is Cherſechii reguli in Illyrico, ad montem Nigrum filius, quum adamata ei ſponſa quæ erat è Stirpe Serviæ Deſpoti, ad paratas nuptias duceretur, concupivit eam illico, quod eſſet egregiæ venuſtatis: procaci oculo improbus pater, omnemque pudorem ſuperante libidine, ſibi ſtatim impotenter excluſo filio nuptias celebravit, fruſtra reclamantibus propinquis, qui id facinus filio contumelioſum patrique & domui infame deteſtabantur. Itaque juvenis tantæ injuriæ indignitate commotus, præcipitique actus deſperatione, &c (8). I leave others to examine whether Jovius has not confounded the voyages which John Laſcaris made by order of Laurence de Medicis, with the voyage he ſuppoſes that he made into Greece under Pope Leo X. Bajazet died before the pontificate of Leo X, and I queſtion much whether Cherſeoglis had any great intereſt with the ſucceeding Sultan; and it is certain, he was never in ſo great a capacity of ſerving John Laſcaris, as in Bajazet's reign.

[B] Lewis XII . . . . ſent him to Venice in quality of embaſſador.] I find he ſent him thither in 1503, and 1505. See Peter Bembus in the Hiſtory of Venice (9), where he mentions the occaſion of thoſe embaſſies, and the ſubſtance of the embaſſador's ſpeech. Vianoli (10) affirms, that in 1507, the republic hearing of the league of Cambray, diſmiſſed Laſcaris embaſſador to Lewis XII, but how could this league be then known, which was not concluded till December 1508? See the margin (11).

What Mr de Wicquefort ſays of this embaſſy, is not very complaiſant. The Pope, ſays he (12), ‘ knew, when it was too late, the fault which he had been guilty of, in making choice of an impertinent and ridiculous miniſter. John Laſcaris, whom Lewis XII, ſent on an embaſſy to Venice in the year 1503, was not much better. He was deſcended from a family which had formerly given great princes to the empire of Conſtantinople, and was very learned, but knew nothing and made another voyage into Greece, from whence he brought ſome young gentlemen to be educated in the college which was founded on mount Quirinal, in order to preſerve the right pronunciation of the Greek tongue (b). He returned into France in the reign of Francis I [C], and having ſtaid there ſome time, he went to Italy again, and died at Rome of the gout, being about ninety years of age. He was buried in the church of St Agatha. Tho' he had no ſettled income, he had always wherewithal to ſupply his expences, and yet he was intirely regardleſs of his domeſtic concerns, and loved to live great. His indolence did not ſuffer him to compoſe many books (c) [D]. He underſtood Latin very well, and did not think it beneath him to be corrector of the preſs [E]. I muſt examine Gyraldus's relation [F]. I omitted,

‘ nothing at all of the affairs of the world. Beſides, he had a very mean preſence, and lived ſo very low and ſordidly, that inſtead of appearing like an embaſſador, and doing honour to the king, his maſter, he affected to imitate the falſe modeſty of thoſe who giving themſelves up intirely to contemplative Philoſophy, profeſs an affected poverty and ſomething of the manners of a Cynic. His commiſſion was the more difficult to execute, becauſe he had orders to borrow money, and to make an alliance, at a time when the inclinations of the ſenate were not at all in the French intereſt; becauſe the affairs of that king were not in a very good condition in Italy. Laurence Suarez de Figueroa, embaſſador from Ferdinand the Catholic king, who did not fail to make his advantage of the diſcontent of the republic, which could not bear that king's ſending them a pedant inſtead of an embaſſador, ſaid in full ſenate, that they might judge how the king of France would uſe them, if after the conqueſt which he pretended to make of the kingdom of Naples, he gained his ends, and could tyrannize over Italy as he pleaſed; ſince in his very troubles and neceſſities he deſpiſed the ſenate ſo much, as to ſend them a Greek Philoſopher, who was juſt come from the college.’

[C] He returned into France in the reign of Francis I.] Paul Jovius ſays nothing of it, which is the reaſon why Varillas ſaid nothing of it neither. His paraphraſe on that hiſtorian imports, that Laſcaris not knowing what to do, engaged himſelf with Charles VIII. And that being a man fit for buſineſs, he had an embaſſy, given him to Venice, which he honourably diſcharged in the reign of that monarch, and of Lewis XII, his ſucceſſor. At laſt, Leo X being made Pope, invited Laſcaris to Rome to be one of his council (13). This, according to Varillas, was Laſcaris's laſt employment; which is a manifold miſtake; for this Pope did not make him his counſellor, but director of a Greek college (14), and afterwards this learned man had ſome employment at Paris. I take it to have been that of the king's library-keeper, which I ground upon a letter, wrote by James Tuſanus to Angelus Laſcaris, the ſon of John, in which are theſe words (15). ‘Jani patris tui excellentem in Romana lingua, nedum veſtra, peritiam pluribus hic verbis ne fuſius perſequar, illud certe dicam: Græcæ literaturæ quantum uſu, quantum ſcientia præcellat, ex hoc intelligi vel maxime poſſe, quod eum ex cunctis veſtri generis hominibus de ſententia doctiſſimorum delectum princeps noſter Franciſcus accerſendum eſſe cenſuerit, ut Muſeo, quod in hac urbe longe omnium principe multo celeberrimum ſperamus excitatum iri, propediem, velut alter Apollo præſideat. ——— I ſhall not mention particularly your father's great abilities in the Latin, much leſs in your own language, but cannot forbear obſerving, that his ſuperior knowledge in the Greek learning may be even moſt certainly demonſtrated from hence, that out of all your learned men our king Francis made choice of him to preſide like another Apollo over the library which is going to be eſtabliſhed in this great city.’ Here follows a paſſage, which though not free from faults, will however ſerve for a proof of this matter: it is taken from James du Breul's Antiquities of Paris (16). Emanuel Chryſoloras had Angelo Tifernas for his diſciple, who in the year 1523, being at Paris, inſtructed in the Greek tongue John Laſcaris, and William Budæus, two learned men, who have publiſhed many fine books, as Mr Genebrard witneſſes in his chronology, in theſe words: Anno 1523. Chryſoloræ, qui primus litteras Græcas Florentiam Coſmo Mediceo Florentino Duce attulit, diſcipulus Tifernas in Franciam venit, Budæumque literas Græcas docuit. Deinde Janus Laſcaris mortuo Laurentio Mediceo Mœcenate ſuo. Atque inde literatura Græca, deſerta Italia ad nos migravit. Now this Laſcaris and Budæus, as the ſame author teſtifies, were the firſt, at whoſe ſollicitation king Francis I, founded his library of Fontainebleau, and afterwards appointed royal profeſſors, as the ſame author ſays. Laſcari & Budæo authoribus, Franc. I. Bibliothecam Fontenablæam inſtruxit, indeque anno 1530. linguarum & mathematum profeſſores. Nam cæteri ſunt adſcriptitii. There are many things to be cenſured in this paſſage. I. Tifernas was called Gregory and not Angelo. II. He died in the XVth century, how then could he come to Paris in 1523? Father du Breul had been ſaying that Chryſoloras, who died at Conſtance the fifteenth of April 1415, had taught him Greek. This was ſufficient to ſhew, that he did not live till the reign of Francis I. III. It is abſurd to pretend that John Laſcaris, a native of Greece learned the Greek tongue of an Italian (17). IV. It is a groſs ignorance to ſay, that in 1523, he and William Budæus were young ſcholars. Budæus was then fifty ſix years old, and was looked upon as the moſt learned man, and the greateſt Grecian in France. V. Genebrard's paſſage cited by du Breul ſignifies that John Laſcaris came into France after Tifernas, and after the death of Laurence de Medicis. He who cites it, did not underſtand it. Note, that Laſcaris returned into France in the year 1518 (18), and that he continued there in 1528 (19). Which ſhews that Moreri is guilty of a groſs fault, for he ſays that he died a little after Leo X, was made Pope.

[D] His indolence did not ſuffer him to compoſe many books.] He was deſired to make ſome verſions of the Greek authors, but he could hardly be perſuaded to tranſlate ſome tracts of Polybius concerning the art of war (20). I find in the catalogue of the Bodleian library, his book De Veris Græcarum literarum formis, ac cauſis apud antiquos, printed at Paris in 1536, in 8°. and his orations, printed at Francfort in 1573. Geſner (21) ſays that his Latin and Greek epigrams were printed at Baſil in 1537.

[E] He underſtood Latin well, and did not think it beneath him to be corrector of the preſs.] The paſſage of Eraſmus, which I have quoted in another place (22), ſhews, that John Laſcaris was maſter of the Latin tongue, Jovius gives him the ſame commendation. ‘Valebat Latina facundia, ita ut verſus, qui extant perſcriberet (23). —— The verſes he has publiſhed prove him maſter of the Latin tongue.’ Beſides theſe two teſtimonies, and that of Tuſanus (24), I could add ſome others, if it were neceſſary. Note, that Laſcaris was not pleaſed with the commendation given him by Eraſmus, in the dialogue intituled Ciceronianus. He joined with the malecontents, who wrote ſatirical verſes at Paris againſt the author of that dialogue (25). He was too exceptious and angry without reaſon; for theſe are Eraſmus's words: ‘De Jano (Laſcare) quoniam adhuc ſupereſt, dicendum eſt parcius. Morum comitate generis nobilitatem præ ſe fert, acri judicio vir, multæ in Epigrammatibus argutiæ: poterat inter Ciceroniani cognominis candidatos numerari, ni crebræ legationes ac Regum negotia revocaſſent hominem à Muſis (26). ——— As to John Laſcaris, ſince he is yet living we muſt ſay the leſs of him. His great complaiſance ſhews his noble birth; he was a man of great judgment, and a fine writer of epigrams; and had not his frequent embaſſies and ſtate employments diverted him from his ſtudies he might have been reckoned amongſt the candidates for the Ciceronian honours.’

As for his being corrector of the preſs, read theſe words of Henry Stephens (27): ‘Quid verò dicturos M. illum Muſurum & Janum Laſcarin putamus, in quibus primis Græcia reviviſcere cœpit, & qui principes in pandendo nobis ad linguæ Græcæ adyta itinere fuerunt? quid, inquam, dicturos remur, ſi, quum ipſi tantum honoris arti typographicæ detule-

I omitted, I cannot tell how, a particular very well worth obſerving, which is, that he ‘ firſt of all diſcovered, or at leaſt brought again into uſe, the capital letters of the Greek alphabet, in which he printed in 1449 ſome moral ſentences, and other verſes which he dedicated to Peter de Medicis, with a long epiſtle dedicatory, wherein he acquaints him with his deſign, and the pains he had taken in tracing out the true figure of theſe great letters from the moſt antient medals and monuments of antiquity (d).

‘ rint, ut non indignam exiſtimarint cui ſuam operam navarent, fungentes munere correctorum (liceat enim de rebus typographicis typographicè loqui) eò rem deveniſſe videant, ut ſiquis, &c. —— What think you would Muſurus and Laſcaris ſay, our firſt maſters and introductors of the Greek language? What would they ſay, think you, if after having honoured the Printing art ſo far themſelves as not to think it beneath them to do the office of corrector of the preſs they had lived to ſee matters brought to that paſs, that if any one, &c.’ We may alſo add to this the words of Mr Chevillier (28): ‘ I believe Laſcaris was corrector of the preſs in the edition of Avicenna, printed at Lyons, in three volumes in folio, with the commentaries of James de Partibus, by John Trechſel, and John Cleym, in the year 1498, as I conjecture from the Epiſtle Dedicatory to John Ponceau, Phyſician to the king, which he prefixed to that book.’

[F] I muſt examine Gyraldus's relation.] It imports, that the family of Medicis being expelled Florence, Janus Laſcaris wandered about for ſome time, till Leo X, ſent for him to Rome, that after the death of this Pope he was ſent for into France by Francis I, who having made uſe of him in the fonndation of a college and library, deputed him to Venice, where he continued a long time; and that at laſt, after the death of Clement VII, he was perſuaded to come to Rome by the promiſes of Paul III, where he died ſoon after, leaving a ſon who was called Angelo (29). I obſerve here firſt a great omiſſion. Gyraldus ſays nothing of the embaſſy to Venice under Lewis XII. I further obſerve, that he ſuppoſes Francis I ſent Laſcaris to Venice, in the quality of Legatus (Embaſſador). I believe he is miſtaken. Note laſtly, that he did not know this learned Greek was at Rome in the year 1532, under the pontificate of Clement VII. See the twenty eighth letter of Bunel, wherein he ſays, that he ſaw John Laſcaris at Rome in that year (30).

LASICIUS (JOHN) a Poliſh gentleman (a), made himſelf known in the XVIth century by the productions of his pen [A]. Genebrard has given him a very indifferent character. He makes him a perfect Proteus, a weather-cock in matters of religion. ‘ This man, ſays he (b), favoured the Trinitarians about the year 1565: but ſoon after became a Calviniſt, and after this a Bohemian or Picard brother [B], ‘ and

[A] He made himſelf known by the productions of his pen.] It is ſaid in Geſner's Epitome (1), that he compoſed a book in his mother-tongue, wherein he learnedly and effectually conſuted the new Samoſatenians and Arians, and alſo wrote a treatiſe againſt their errors in Latin, addreſſed to Duditius. The Oxford Catalogue takes notice of his book de Diis Samogitarum, cæterorumque Sarmatarum & falſorum Chriſtianorum: item de Religione Armeniorum & de initio regiminis Stephani Batorii, at Baſil, 1615, in 4to. His Hiſtoria de ingreſſu Polonorum in Valachiam anno 1572, & Dantiſcanorum clades anno 1577, at Baſil, 1582. His veræ Religionis Apologia & falſæ Confutatio, printed at Spires, in 1582, with Collectio variorum Authorum de Ruſſorum, Muſcovitarum, & Tartarorum Religione, Sacrificiis, & Nuptiarum, ac Funerum ritu. This is the work Genebrard ſpeaks of. It is proper to take notice, that there is to be met with in it, a Latin tranſlation which Laſicius made of a manuſcript given by the great duke of Muſcovy, in the year 1570, to a Proteſtant divine, who accompanied the king of Poland's ambaſſadors (2). ‘ Qui (Johannes Rokyta) Anno Chriſti 1570. juſſu ſeniorum ſuorum, Sereniſſimi Regis Poloniæ Legatos in Moſcoviam comitatus, ipſis à ſacris fuit Concionibus. Hic cum ipſo Magno Moſcoviæ Duce, Baſilio (vocatus in arcem Moſcovienſem die 10 Maii) colloquium habuit, & in magna Procerum gentis ejus frequentiâ fidei ſuæ rationem reddidit. A quo etiam (die 18 Junii) Librum Ruthenicis characteribus (quorum illic uſus eſt) enarratum, accepit, quo ſumma Religionis Moſcoviticæ continetur. Qui liber à Domino Johanne Laſitio Latio donatus Spiræ Nemetum Anno 1582 typis editus eſt, una cum Reſponſionibus, quibus Errores Moſcovitarum deteguntur & refutantur. —— Who (John Rokyta) in the year 1570, was appointed to attend as chaplain to the king of Poland's ambaſſadors to Muſcovy. Here he had a conference with the great duke himſelf, Baſilius, being called into the caſtle of Muſcow, on the tenth of May, and gave an account of his faith before a large aſſembly of the grandees of that nation. From him he alſo received, on the eighteenth of June, a book written in Runic characters, which are there made uſe of, containing the ſum of the Muſcovite religion. Which book has been tranſlated into Latin by John Laſicius, and printed at Spires, in 1582, together with an anſwer in confutation of the Muſcovite errors.’ Regenvolſius has ſaid the ſame thing. ‘ Hanc fidei Confeſſionem, à ſe, mandato Principis Moſchi, conſcriptam, Rokita toti Senatui ipſius, eo præſente exhibuit. Tum Moſchus Dux Reſponſionem, ad hanc Rokitæ Confeſſionem, libro eleganter in quarto Ruthenicis literis ſcripto, & pretioſè tela auro textâ ornato, comprehenſam; ei in manus porrexit. Author hujus Hiſtoriæ, vidit librum hunc, in Bibliotheca eximii cujuſdam Patroni. Colloquium hoc; & Quæſtiones ultrò citroque inter Moſchovitarum Principem, & Rokitam Miniſtrum habitas, deſcripſit Latino idiomate, Joh. Laſicius, in Theologia Moſchovitica, Spiræ Nemetum, An. 1582 editâ: cum refutatione ſuperſtitionum Ruſſicarum, & Evangelicorum, atque ipſius Lutheri defenſione (3). —— Rokyta, at the command of the great duke of Muſcovy, drew up this confeſſion of faith, and, in his preſence, preſented it to the whole ſenate. Upon which that prince gave Rokita a book in quarto, elegantly written in the Runic character, and richly bound, containing an anſwer to his confeſſion. The author of this hiſtory ſaw the very book in the library of a certain eminent patron of learning. This conference, and the arguments which paſſed between the Muſcovite prince and Rokita the divine, have been publiſhed in Latin, by John Laſicius, in his Muſcovite Divinity, printed at Spires, in 1582; together with a confutation of the Muſcovite ſuperſtitions, and a defence of Lutheraniſm.’ In the following remark will be mentioned another work of Laſicius.

[B] A Bohemian, or Picard Brother.] The preface before his hiſtory of the Bohemian Brothers, informs us (4), that at firſt he embraced the reformation according to the Zuinglian opinion, upon the leſſer Poland, being reformed by ſome divines from Zurich; that afterwards having heard that the churches of the greater Poland, which had ſhaken off the yoke of Popery, had ſome of them received the confeſſion of Augsburg, and others that of Bohemia, he enquired very particularly into the reaſons of this difference; that he made a viſit to the greater Poland, and after that to Bohemia, Germany, and France, where he examined every thing with great exactneſs; that no doctrine, or confeſſion of faith, pleaſed him ſo much as that of the Bohemian brothers, and that finding this ſubject had never been yet treated of, he undertook the hiſtory of it; that he employed himſelf in it ſeveral years, and compoſed a work divided into eight parts, and intituled Origo, Progreſſus, Reſque tam proſperæ quam adverſæ nec non Mores, Inſtituta, Conſuetudineſque Fratrum Bohemicorum. —— The riſe, progreſs, proſperity, and adverſity, manners, inſtitutions, and cuſtoms, of the Bohemian brothers. That about the year 1585, he ſent it to the churches in Bohemia, and deſired

‘ and in 1582, in a book he printed at Spires on the religion of the Muſcovites (c), ‘ he declares himſelf a Lutheran. It is to be feared, that the weight of his ſins will ‘ be ſo great that he will next year turn Mahometan, and afterwards Atheiſt. To this tends what he obſerves in p. 16. of that book, that there are a great many va‘ riations in the Hebrew, Greek and Latin manuſcripts of the ſcriptures, the Heretics ‘ having expunged ſome things and corrupted, altered, and added others, which he ‘ proves from the fine teſtimonies of Eraſmus, Beza, Caſtalio, Francis Lucas, and ‘ Francis Junius. He is ſtrangely incenſed againſt thoſe who hold Mahomet to be ‘ Anti-chriſt, and appropriate to him the number 666 mentioned in the thirteenth chap‘ ter of the Revelations, He declares himſelf the defender of all ſorts of intemperance ‘ (d): at which thoſe who had once ſeen him would ceaſe to wonder, for his groſs bulk ‘ ſhews him born only for his belly, if he were the ſame I had ſome knowledge of at ‘ Paris, and whom I furniſhed with arguments againſt thoſe of the Trinitarians, about ‘ the year 1567.’ This is what Genebrard ſays; but it will deſerve very little credit, if we conſider with what ſevere calumnies, he treated thoſe who were not Catholics. Laſicius travelled very much, and had the character of envoy of Stephen Battori, king of Poland. He was living in the year 1599. Theſe laſt particulars will be proved in the remark [B].

deſired them to publiſh it, after having made ſuch alterations and additions as they ſhould judge neceſſary; that not finding his expectations anſwered, he ſent a more correct copy of his work, in 1599, to the baron Charles of Zerotan (5), humbly beſeeching him to make uſe of his authority and purſe, in printing that manuſcript; but that all this had no effect. LATINUS (JOHN) a Moor by birth, was brought over into Spain, a little boy, and ſerved in the family of the duke of Sueſſa (a) [A]. The happy genius which was obſerved in him procured him the liberty of being inſtructed together with his young maſter; by which means he grew ſo learned, that being enfranchiſed, he obtained of the archbiſhop of Granada, the maſterſhip of the grammar-ſchool, belonging to the church of Granada. He worthily diſcharged that office for the ſpace of twenty years and as he was no leſs eſteemed for his virtue than for his parts, he met with a very advantageous match [B]. He publiſhed ſeveral poems (b) [C]. Some ſay, that Clenard

Our Latinus's maſter was not named Mendoza. You will find in Aubertus Miræus (3) almoſt word for word, what Schottus ſays of this learned Ethiopian.

[B] He met with a very advantageous match.] He married Donna Anna de Carleval (4): ‘ Charus om‘ nibus propter ingenii ac morum dotes, matrimonio in‘ ſuper honeſtæ nec ignobilis fœminæ ſupra conditio‘ nem ornatus (5). —— He was ſo univerſally beloved ‘ for his learning and virtue, that a lady of a good ‘ family condeſcended to marry him.’ It is ſaid he was a handſome man, which is, perhaps, as rare a thing, according to the taſte of the Europeans, as to ſee a Moor teach the Latin tongue (6). ‘ Lu‘ dum hic (Granatæ) parentum memoria aperuit ‘ (quis credat?) Joannes Æthiops genere, Latinus ‘ hinc dictus, at præſtanti forma & Muſicæ ac Poë‘ ticæ in paucis peritus (7). —— In the memory of ‘ our fathers, John the Moor opened a ſchool here, ‘ (at Granada) from whence he was called Latinus, ‘ being very handſome in perſon, and ſomething ſkilled ‘ in Muſic and Poetry.’

[C] He publiſhed ſeveral poems.] One upon the battle of Lepanto, another on the death of Pius V, and a great number of epitaphs. Their titles are: Auſtriados libri II, ſive de victoria navali Joannis Auſtriaci ad Echinadas Inſulas. De obitu Pii V, ejuſque in Philippum regem ſtudio. De auguſta regalium corporum ex variis tumulis in unum regale templum Eſcurialis tranſlatione, atque illinc in Granatenſe Reginæ Joannæ, Epigrammatum, ſive Epitaphiorum libri II. a Grenade 1576.— The Auſtriad in two books; or, the Naval Victory of Don John of Auſtria, at Lepanto. Of the death of Pius V, and his affection for king Philip. Of the auguſt tranſlation of the royal bodies from their ſeveral ſepulchres, to the royal church of the Eſcurial, and from thence to queen Joan's church at Granada. Epigrams, or Epitaphs, in two books. At Granada, 1576. The inſcription, which I have inſerted in the firſt remark, is taken from this laſt book; and as the author obſerves, that he was then fifty eight years old (8), one might expect to conclude from hence, the year of his birth. A man who is in his fifty eighth year, in 1576, muſt have been born in 1518. But we muſt take care how we reaſon in this manner; for though Latinus's epitaphs and epigrams were publiſhed at Granada, in 1576, it does not follow that the inſcription we ſpeak of, was made in that year. This conſequence would not hold, though we were ſure he was then alive; but it will be much leſs concluſive, if we ſuppoſe he died in 1573, as his epitaph imports (9). This we may be certain of, that ſince he died in 1573, that inſcription could not be made after that year; and conſequently the author muſt be at leaſt fifty eight years old in that year, and could not be born after the year 1515. Nicolas Antonio would deſerve cenſure for not having mentioned, if he could have have done it, the year, in which Latinus ſaid he was fifty eight years old. I could wiſh, for the rarity of the thing, that our Latinus had found a place among Mr Baillet's Poets.

[D] Some ſay, that Clenard brought him from Ethiopia into Spain.] The author of the Academie des Sciences (10), tells us, that Clenard, departing from the court of Fez, 'was only followed by an Ethiopian, his diſciple, with whom arriving at Granada, 'in 1542, he wrote an elegant letter to the emperor Charles V, and died the ſame year, and left his 'Ethiopian diſciple (known by the name of John Latinus) ſo well inſtructed in learning, that he compoſed a fine Latin poem upon the victory . . . . . 'at Lepanto.' I have ſeveral reaſons to believe, that here are ſome falſities. I. Latinus ſays he was but a child, when he was brought from Ethiopia into Europe (11). This could not be true, if he came from Africa to Spain with Clenard, in 1542. He was then at leaſt twenty ſeven years old. II. He ſays, that from his childhood (12) he was educated and inſtructed with Gonzales Fernand de Corduba, his maſter, who at laſt gave him his liberty (13). Would he have ſpoken in this manner, if he had been indebted for all his learning to James Clenard, as Mr Bullart ſuppoſes? III. He ſays nothing which has the leaſt relation to Mr Bullart's account. My third obſervation perſuades me, that Aubertus Miræus is miſtaken in ſaying (14), 'Diſcipulum reliquit (Clenardus) Joannem Latinum 'Æthiopem (quod prodigii ſimile eſt) Rhetorem Illiberitanum, cujus Poëma exſtat panegyricum de navali Joh. Auſtriaci ad Echinadas Inſulas victoria.—— 'He (Clenard) left a diſciple, John Latinus, a Moor, '(which is almoſt a miracle) ſchoolmaſter at Granada, 'whoſe panegyrical poem on the naval victory of Don 'John of Auſtria, at Lepanto, is now extant.' Doubtleſs Mr Bullart was deceived by this paſſage of Aubertus Miræus; but he has added to it a fault of his own, in ſuppoſing that Latinus was brought into Europe by James Clenard, in the year 1542. His error probably proceeded from this. Clenard ſays (15), that being ſent to Braga to ſet up a ſchool there, he produced his three Mooriſh ſervants before his ſcholars, and commanded them in Latin to perform certain poſtures. Theſe Moors had learnt, by his family converſation, Latin enough to underſtand what he commanded them in that tongue. 'Erant mihi Servuli 'tres, quos ſupra (16) nominavi, non ſane periti 'Grammatici, verum domeſtica conſuetudine tantum 'conſecuti, ut me perciperent, quicquid dicerem, & 'contra Latine reſponderent, licet identidem peccantes in Priſcianum. Hos in ludum productos, dialogos agere juſſi, ſpectantibus diſcipulis, & cum eis 'multis de rebus ſermonem miſcebam, attentiſſimo auditorio, adeo miraculi loco fuit, quod Æthiopes loquerentur Latine. Heus, Dento, inquam, ſalta, &c.' From this ſtory it might eaſily be concluded, that John Latinus was a diſciple of this learned Grammarian.

[E] Moreri's faults are . . . . . very groſs.] I. It is not true that Gonzales Fernand de Corbuba made our Latinus a ſlave, when he was ſtill in his cradle. The inſcription abovementioned (17), clearly intimates, that he and Latinus were almoſt of the ſame age; and therefore Gonzales, whilſt he was in his cradle, muſt have made expeditions into Africa, or by ſea, if it were true, that he made Latinus a ſlave. I would fain know why Moreri did not faithfully tranſlate his originals. He had the book of Don Nicolas Antonio before his eyes; why was he not contented to ſay, that Latinus was a ſlave to Gonzales Fernand de Corduba? does this ſignify, that Gonzales himſelf had taken this Ethiopian, and afterwards (18) brought him into Spain? II. Latinus's employment at Granada was not meerly to teach the young ſcholars of the cathedral. He publickly taught the Latin tongue to all comers; which was the cuſtom of the ſchools of cathedral churches, as Mr Joli ſhews in one of his books. III. It is a great piece of ignorance to tell us of a poem, intituled Auſtriados (19). This can admit of no excuſe from the original, ſince Nicolas Antonio does not uſe the genitive caſe Auſtriados, without adding libros duos.

LAUDICE, ſiſter and wife of Mithridates, deſerves a place in the liſt of perſons of unhappy memory. Her huſband meditating a vaſt deſign, ſtole from his court in order to view incognito, with a very ſmall attendance, the ſituation of the places where he had determined to make war. Laudice hearing no news of him, fancied that he was dead, and would return no more; and inſtead of afflicting herſelf, gave herſelf up to the moſt filthy pleaſures. The return of her husband gave her great uneaſineſs; ſhe found it neceſſary to conceal her irregular conduct, and could contrive no better way of doing it, than by poiſoning Mithridates. She was preparing for it, but one of her ſervant-maids betrayed her, and diſcovered the whole affair. Mithridates made no ſcruple to put ſuch a wife to death (a). A modern author (b) falſly affirms, that this monarch was actually poiſoned by his wife; but that being accuſtomed to his antidote, he recovered, tho' not without difficulty. Thoſe who puzzle themſelves with what Juſtin ſays, that Laudice had lain in, in her husband's abſence [A], raiſe ſcruples out of nothing. I have ſpoken elſewhere (c), of another LAUDICE, ſiſter to this, and ſtill more wicked than ſhe. Juſtin is unjuſtly ſaid, to contradict himſelf in ſpeaking of theſe two women [B].

(c) In the article CAPPADOCIA, remark [I], num. 3, to à lineâ.

[A] Laudice had lain in, in her husband's abſence.] This lying-in was regular: Mithridates could not be offended at it; the computation of time allowed of his being father of the child which was born of Laudice in his abſence. What makes me ſay ſo is, that Juſtin obſerves, that this prince was congratulated at one and the ſame time, both for his return, and for the birth of a ſon (1). No body durſt have complemented him on a ſcandalous and notorious proof of his being a cuckold. Whence then, ſome will ask, came Laudice's uneaſineſs? probably ſhe was with child, or afraid of being ſo, from her having had commerce with her gallants after her lying-in. Here is the reaſon, that, to conceal her adulteries, ſhe endeavoured to deſtroy her husband. 'Laudice . . . . . cum periſſe 'eum crederet, in concubitus amicorum projecta, quaſi 'admiſſum facinus majore ſcelere tegere poſſet, venenum advenienti paravit (2). —— Laudice . . . . 'having given up herſelf to her gallants, upon a ſuppoſition of her husband's death, to conceal one crime 'by a greater, prepared to poiſon him on his return.'

[B] Juſtin is unjuſtly ſaid to contradict himſelf.] Freinſhemius charges him either with this, or with confounding hiſtory egregiouſly. Aut contradicit ſibi auctor, aut hiſtoriam mire confundit (3). His reaſon is, that Juſtin relates in other places: I. That (4) Laudice, the widow of Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, was killed by her ſubjects, for poiſoning five of her children. II. That (5) Laudice, widow of Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, was married to Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, whilſt her brother Mithridates was preparing to ſuccour her againſt the ſame Nicomedes, uſurper of Cappadocia, in prejudice of Ariarathes, ſon of the deceaſed king. This accuſation of Freinſhemius is without foundation; for Juſtin ſpeaks of two Laudice's queens of Cappadocia. The firſt had married one Ariarathes, who died in the war of Ariſtonicus, about the ſix hundred and twenty ſecond year of Rome. The ſecond was ſiſter to Mithridates, and wife of Ariarathes, who ſucceeded the former. Here is therefore neither contradiction, nor confuſion. Note, that Juſtin has been cenſured in ſome places where he is right, and paſſed over in ſilence, in a great many others, where he is wrong. The commentator, in uſum Delphini, has renewed Freinſhemius's accuſation.

LAUNOI (MATTHEW DE) one of the moſt violent Leaguers in France, had been ſeveral years miniſter of the Reformed church; but having committed adultery, and deſpairing of a relaxation of diſcipline on his behalf, he returned to the communion of Rome. I dare not affirm, what I have read in ſome famous authors, that he was a prieſt when he turned Proteſtant [A], but if he was not then one he certainly became ſuch, after his renouncing the communion of the Reformed. Though he had been branded at Sedan, for his adultery in the moſt ignominious manner [B], yet he was received with open arms by the Catholics. They made collections for him (a), they gave him a canonry in the cathedral of Soiſſons, and the cure of St Mederic at Paris (b). He made uſe of his tongue, his pen, and all the induſty he was maſter of, to foment the rebellion of the Pariſians (c); and made himſelf ſo conſiderable in the horrible faction of the ſixteen, that he preſided in all the aſſemblies which were held to conſult the death of Barnabas Briſſon, preſident in the parliament of Paris [C]. If he had not very narrowly eſcaped, he had kept company with thoſe whom the duke of Mayenne cauſed to be hanged for having promoted the execution of that great man (d). He retired into Flanders (e), where I believe he ſpent the reſt of his days. He publiſhed ſome books of controverſy, and among others one concerning the motives of his changing his religion [D], and an anſwer to the calumnies, he pretended the miniſters had ſpread againſt him. He is very weak in his anſwer to the accuſation of adultery [E]; and

[A] I dare not affirm . . : . . . that he was a prieſt when he turned Proteſtant.] Thuanus affirms it. ‘Matthæus Launæus, ſays he (1), ſacri Sueſſionum collegii Sodalis, olim ſacerdos, & poſtea ejerata majorum religione doctrinam proteſtantium amplexus, paſtoriſque officio diu inter eos functus, uxore etiam ducta, cujus cum propter egeſtatem ætate jam inclinata tæderet, errore recantato ad nos redierat, ſed incerta fide, quam mox ut ſe vere Catholicum approbaret, factioſis addixit. ——— Matthew Launoi, canon of the cathedral church of Soiſſons, formerly a prieſt, and afterwards renouncing the religion of his anceſtors, for that of the Proteſtants, having alſo married a wife, of whom he began to grow weary as he advanced into years, and became ſtraitened in his circumſtances, returned to us again, after having recanted his errors, and though at firſt not quite ſettled in his opinions, yet afterwards, to prove himſelf a true Catholic, he joined himſelf to the faction of the League.’ The ſame thing is repeated in the ninety fifth book (2), with a very conſiderable addition: for in enumerating the reaſons, which had induced this man to leave the Proteſtants, the puniſhment he had to fear, on his being convicted of adultery, is not forgotten. He returned into the pale of the church, ſays Thuanus; whether he repented of his errors, or was weary of his wife, or feared the puniſhments which the Proteſtants inflict on thoſe who were convicted of adultery. Rurſus ſeu pœnitentia ductus, ſive uxoris pertæſus, & adulterii pœnam, cujus convictus fuerat, metuens, ad ſacerdotium relicta uxore redierat (3). I ſhall by and by mention another paſſage in Thuanus, where the ſame things are partly repeated. I paſs by theſe words of Du Verdier Vau-Privas (4): ‘Matthew de Launoi, firſt a prieſt, afterwards a miniſter of the pretended Reformed religion, is now returned into the pale of the Chriſtian and Catholic church.’ Thuanus's authority is ſufficient to prove what I advance. Let us ſee whether there is any room to doubt that Matthew de Launoi was a prieſt when he turned Proteſtant. The ſcruple I make, is built upon the ſilence of the man himſelf upon an occaſion, where one would think he ought to have mentioned his prieſthood. ‘I do not regard, ſays he (5), what they ſay of my calling, before they drew me out of the boſom of the Chriſtian and Catholic church, and of my deſerting my former office. For I have been always in public office and authority ever ſince I finiſhed my ſtudies; and notwithſtanding my youth, which was then very raw, and far from maturity, I behaved myſelf with credit and honour, to the ſatisfaction of thoſe with whom I was concerned, till ſome miniſters, and others of their ſect, turned my head with their illuſions and dreams. And the eſteem they had for me was ſuch, that as ſoon as I was liſted in their party, which was in the year 1560, they forced me to accept of an employment among them, in which they were ſo haſty, as not to give me any time to conſider of it, they were ſo affraid of loſing me. Nay, they obliged me to make but one probation ſermon; and even, as ſoon as they heard me enter upon the ſubject, being content with my beginning, they ordered me to ſtop, and admitted me among them, to ſend me into Champagne.’

[B] He had been branded at Sedan, in the moſt ignominious manner.] The Memoirs of the League ſay (6), that being convicted of having got a couſin of his with child at Sedan, where he exerciſed the holy miniſtry, he was hanged there in effigy.

[C] He preſided in all the aſſemblies . . . . . which were held to conſult the death of Barnabas Briſſon, preſident in the parliament of Paris.] See the Chronologie Novenaire of Peter Victor Cayet (7), where you will find a more particular account than in theſe words of Thuanus: ‘Matthæus Launæus qui olim Presbyter, poſtea ejerata majorum religione Miniſter uxorem duxerat, ejuſque pertæſus ad ſacra redierat . . . . . . principem locum in iis conciliabulis ſemper tenuit (8). —— Matthew Launoi, who being firſt a prieſt, afterwards turned Proteſtant miniſter, and married a wife, of whom he grew tired, and returned to the church . . . . . . had always the chief hand in thoſe conſultations.’ This proof is ſufficient for my purpoſe.

[D] He publiſhed ſome books of controverſy, among others, one concerning the motives of his changing his religion.] It is intituled, The Declaration and Confutation of the falſe Suppoſitions and perverſe Applications of ſome texts of the holy Scriptures, which the miniſters make uſe of in theſe latter times to divide Chriſtendom; with an exhortation to the ſaid miniſters, to re-unite themſelves, and to bring their auditors to the Catholic, Apoſtolic, and Romiſh church, from which they ought not to have ſeparated . . . . by Matthew de Launoi, and Henry Pennetier, late miniſters of the pretended Reformed Religion, and at preſent returned into the pale of the Chriſtian and Catholic church: the whole digeſted, and divided into three books, by the ſaid de Launoi. The Epiſtle Dedicatory (9) to king Henry III, tells us, that theſe two miniſters met in the borough of Guines, in the re-conquered country, the firſt of June 1576. Pennetier being returned thither from England ſome time before, and the other newly come from Holland. It was there, ſay they, that they drew up this work, and reſolved to make an open abjuration of their hereſies.

[E] He is very weak in his anſwer to the accuſation of adultery] He owned himſelf a frail man, and liable to fall into that ſin (10). He does not confeſs the fault he is accuſed of; but alledges, in his juſtification, only ſome little cavils. ‘My accuſers, ſays he (11), are wrong as to the time for want of a good memory; and as his conduct in the time of the league made him appear to be a profligate man, no credit ought to be given to the ſtories that he publiſhed againſt the Proteſtants [F]. That ‘mory; for in 1574, I was in Holland. They involve themſelves in ſeveral inconſiſtencies, adds he, they ſay, it was a young woman, who had been intruſted with me, by honeſt people, and fearing God; and afterwards they ſay, ſhe was a ſervant maid. Now there is a great deal of difference between the one and the other. For when a young woman is given in truſt, this ſuppoſes ſhe is of a good family, and has wherewithal to live, ſo that ſhe is not a ſervant maid of ſix or ſeven livres a year. Beſides, they had a mind to aggravate this pretended fact: for it would be a greater crime to corrupt a young woman of a good family, intruſted to one's care, than if it was a meer ſervant maid, who hires herſelf for wages, to ſerve and ſtay as long as her ſervice is liked, or till ſome other occaſion makes her leave her place.’ This is but a ſorry defence: I have cited an author above (12), who ſays that Launoi got his own couſin with child. It was probably a young woman ſent to him during the perſecutions of France, for then ſeveral Proteſtants fled to Sedan. Now as Launoi was not very rich, and his refugee had not perhaps wherewithal to pay for her board, it is probable enough that by reaſon of her domeſtic ſervices, ſhe was to him inſtead of a ſervant maid; and ſo without any contradiction, ſome might ſay, that he had lain with his ſervant maid, and others that he had lain with a young woman, that was intruſted to his care.

Here is another pretended contradiction. ‘They ſay, that being convicted of the fact before the conſiſtory, I confeſſed it to three or four of them; they are uncertain as to the number (13). But they do not ſay how I was convicted: It was not, adds he (14), by being ſurprized in the fact, by the judge himſelf, attended with his ſerjeants, and others of his court. It was not by unexceptionable witneſſes, for people do not call witneſſes on ſuch occaſions. It was not by a violent preſumption; for if they had had any, they would have very much tranſgreſſed, according to their own diſcipline. A preſumption is grounded either upon the too great familiarity of the parties, or upon the woman's being with child. If they grounded their preſumption upon familiarity, they ſhould have given us notice of it, in order to preſerve us by good remonſtrances from falling into ſin: ſo that they would be greatly to blame, for having ſuffered the evil to run on, without interpoſing by a brotherly charity, or requiſite cenſures. If they grounded their preſumption upon the maid's being with child, it is not ſufficient to accuſe me, much leſs to condemn me. It would be a fine law, if a ſervant maid ſhould commit a folly in her maſter's houſe, and be got with child, that the maſter ſhould be guilty of it. What reaſon is there for that? Fathers and mothers cannot ſometimes preſerve their own daughters, though they keep them cloſe. How then ſhould a maſter be accountable for a ſervant maid's being with child, whom he cannot always have under his eye? It would be much better to be one's own ſervant. Such a preſumption therefore is of no force. But when they ſaw that young maid of a good family, with child, as they ſay, they ſhould have ſent for her, and examined who had got her with child, and then they had known the truth. But they forgot to do it; and therefore they cannot alledge a preſumption, without condemning themſelves: and after all, it would be of no force.’ It would be eaſy to ſhew the weakneſs of this defence, would one be at the pains; but the thing not deſerving it, I only ſay, that though he had put this maid out of the way, they might have had convincing proofs of her being with child; ſo that he could take no advantage of her not being confronted and interrogated.

The following pretended contradiction is not much better than the former. ‘They ſay, that I have been convicted before their conſiſtory, which according to them, was compoſed of ſeventeen miniſters, and thirteen elders, who make thirty perſons. Now they maintain, that I was convicted by that confeſſion, which, ſay they, I made before three or four: It was not therefore their conſiſtory; for there would be twenty ſix or twenty ſeven perſons wanting (15).’ A vain and childiſh cavil. It was not pretended that he had confeſſed his fault before the whole conſiſtory; but that without confeſſing it before this aſſembly, it had been proved upon him; and it was added, that he had confeſſed the charge in particular to three or four perſons.

He complains (16) ‘that they equally condemned them both of adultery, and to the ſame penalties. Now adultery, as diſtinguiſhed from fornication, is committed between, or by, married perſons; and yet they ſay, ſhe was a maid; ſhe did not therefore commit adultery in that ſenſe.’ This is a pitiful argument; for to commit adultery, properly ſpeaking, there is no need that both the parties ſhould be married, it is ſufficient that one of them be ſo.

The laſt thing he objects, is the reſpect of perſons (17): he pretends, that they had ſhewed great indulgence to the like faults; he names the perſons and places; and whether he was willing to find a greater conformity between the crime he was accuſed of, and that whereof he accuſed ſome of his brethren, or whether he had other reaſons, ſome ſervant maids appear almoſt always in his recriminations. He names a miniſter, whoſe name was prefixed to ſome fine books, and who was called in Holland the Schoon Predikant (18); if we may believe him, this handſome miniſter made himſelf formidable to his landladies, by his attempts upon their ſervant maids, and admirably made uſe of the maxim of a Roman Poet.

> Ne ſit ancillæ tibi amor pudori (19).
> Bluſh not to love an humble maid.

I ſhall obſerve in the following remark, that Launoi was not a man honeſt enough to injure the perſons he ſlandered.

THE INCONSISTENCY of prohibiting marriage, and yet permitting the attendance of young maid ſervants.

Let us make a little digreſſion. Either clergymen ſhould be permitted to marry, or forbidden to keep young ſervant maids; for the prodigious concubinage of prieſts, which hath ſcandalized the public for ſo many ages, owes it's original to the permiſſion of having women about them, to manage their houſes. The intention of the ſuperiors was, that they ſhould confine themſelves to the buſineſs of ſervant maids; but they eaſily ſuffered themſelves to be perſuaded to ſerve to ſome other purpoſe: the office of a concubine ſeemed ſo convenient to them on all accounts (20), that their maſters had not much trouble to bring them to it. Since Luther's reformation, the prieſts have by degrees, grown leſs ſcandalous; but ſtill at this day their maids, unleſs they be very old, are very much ſuſpected to ſerve them doubly. Generally ſpeaking, in all religions, if any leud buſineſs happens, which occaſions complaints againſt unmarried churchmen, it is almoſt always on account of their maids. The reaſon is plain: the temptations on both ſides, and the opportunities of ſinning, offer themſelves more readily and conveniently: and hence it is doubtleſs, that the eaſy caſuiſts do very much extenuate the ſin of a maid got with child by her maſter. The Latin of the lower age, furniſhes us with a term in this caſe, which is very expreſſive. At firſt, the word focaria was taken in a good ſenſe; it ſignified a woman or a maid, who ſerved in the houſe, and dreſſed her maſter's diet; but afterwards it was made uſe of only to ſignify the concubines of the clergy (21): the reaſon was, that moſt of their maids continued indeed to be their cooks, but beſides that alſo lay with their maſters. Let us conclude, that it ought to be a rule of diſcipline in all countries not to permit young unmarried clergymen to keep young maid ſervants.

[F] No credit ought to be given to the ſtories he has publiſhed againſt the Proteſtants.] Though we ſhould paſs over the horrible crimes he committed during the League, we ſhould have reaſon to charge him with forgery, in regard to many things he relates of the miniſters, as being very remote from probability. He ſays (22) that the miniſters who fled to Neufchattel in Swiſſerland, being reſolved to ruin a young man, who had preferred the ſtudy of Phyſic to that of Divinity, accuſed him of many falſe doctrines; but that one of the moſt famous amongſt them, oppoſed their ill deſign: that they continued however, to proſecute this this Phyſician: 'Some calling him a Sorcerer, others an Anabaptiſt, others an Atheiſt. Others ſaid to him. How? Dare you ſay, that you do not believe the doctrine of Mr Calvin, by whoſe mouth we all ſpeak? He anſwering, that Calvin was a man ſubject to error as well as others: they immediately cried out, O curſed Philoſophy! O execrable blaſphemy! For to ſpeak againſt Calvin's doctrine, and againſt the intention and will of theſe venerable doctors, is in their opinion to ſpeak againſt God, and lie againſt the Holy Ghoſt; and they make no conſcience of proſecuting a man for it to death, if they can come at him (23).' What he makes theſe miniſters ſay concerning Calvin (24) is ſo far from the ſpirit and maxims of the Reformed church, and ſo inconſiſtent with the ſtile of the Proteſtants, that there needs nothing more to convince us, that he himſelf forged, and that very groſly, the ſlanders which he publiſhed. So that it can be no prejudice to the memory of thoſe concerned, if I take the liberty of inſerting here the following ſcandalous ſtory. 'The eldeſt Capel had, a little before, plaid ſuch another mad trick to a lady of a good family, who coming to Sedan upon buſineſs, did not care to be known. However, his over curioſity made him ſo bold, as to uſe the name and authority of the duke and ducheſs of Bouillon, to get into the chamber of the ſame lady, and to ſee her. At the ſame time, he plaid another prank, which diſcovered the height of his leudneſs, as well as madneſs. For coming out of church, moved with an odd ſort of devotion, he took a young gentlewoman by the arm, who was very handſome and modeſt, and of an honourable family, and deſired leave to ſpeak one word to her. This being granted him, he whiſpered her in the ear, Madam, being charmed with your good qualities, as well of body as of mind, and eſpecially with your wit, I take the liberty to beg a favour of you; but I would not by any means be denied. The lady anſwering, that ſhe could grant nothing, before ſhe knew what he deſigned to aſk; he ſaid to her, I would beg one hour of amorous diverſion with you: we can eaſily meet in a place, where there ſhall be no body but you and I. The poor gentlewoman perfectly aſhamed and amazed at the inſtruction given her by this reformed Philoſopher, juſt coming from ſermon, ran in haſte to her mother, to whom ſhe declared the whole matter: which the mother, by way of complaint, told me the ſame day (25).'

[G]. That which relates to two pretended demoniacs is the moſt ridiculous.] This is the ſtory in ſhort. Matthew de Launoi was a celebrated miniſter in 1562. Some Merchants of the Low-Countries heard him preach with ſo much ſatisfaction at Aï in Champagne, that they detained him at their houſes, as he was preparing to go for England. They admired both his language and diligence, for he often preached in ſix different places within the ſpace of twenty four hours. They made him their miniſter at Tournay. Whilſt he was there, it was reported that the exorciſms of the Catholic church had delivered ſeveral people poſſeſſed by the devil. This diſpleaſed the Calviniſts: they feared their ſect would be decried, if their miniſters had not the gift of driving out devils, which was conſpicuous in the Apoſtles, and was ſtill to be ſeen among the Papiſts. They therefore ſuborned two perſons, a man and a woman, and engaged them to pretend to be demoniacs, for a certain ſum, and a penſion for life. Theſe two perſons plaid their part very well; and hereupon Matthew de Launoi, who knew nothing of this contrivance, was deſired to go and undertake their relief. He went, and his prayers and ſermons proved ſo effectual, that theſe two demoniacs, after a great many fetches, managed according to direction, declared that the devil was gone out of their bodies. The miracle was publiſhed in all places, and procured de Launoi a very great veneration. The cheat was diſcovered ſome time after; becauſe the two perſons who had played the farce, not receiving the promiſed reward, brought their action againſt the ſeducers. A Weaver, and a Rope maker acquainted de Launoi with this in Holland in the year 1574 (26). This was the motive of his converſion, if we believe the Franciſcan Sedulius, who has inſerted this ſtory at length in his anſwer to the Alcoran of the Franciſcans, printed in 1607 (27). He ſays, that Matthew de Launoi being ſtill alive at Bruſſels, and writing ſeveral books againſt the Calviniſts, could vouch the truth of it (28). Spondanus has inſerted the ſubſtance of this fine ſtory in his Annals (29). There is no need of ſhewing the abſurdity of it; ſince all the world knows, that the Proteſtants profeſſedly decry all the miracles of the latter ages, and maintain that they were by no means neceſſary to juſtify the reformation. Apply here what I have ſaid in the remark [T] of the article CALVIN.

LAUNOI (JOHN DE) in Latin Launoius, doctor of Divinity in the univerſity of Paris, was born in a little village of Normandy near Coutances. He performed his ſtudies in Philoſophy and Divinity at Paris with ſo great ſucceſs, that he became a formidable diſputant. He was admitted a prieſt and doctor of Divinity in the year 1636 [A], nor did he make any uſe of theſe two characters to get money, and beg benefices [B], he had no other aim but to become learned; and to this end, he continued

[A] He was made a prieſt and doctor of Divinity in the year 1636.] I have not followed Moreri, who affirms, that John de Launoi entered into holy orders in 1634, and took his doctor's degree in June the ſame year. My reaſon is this. In the elogy of this doctor it is ſaid that he began his courſe of Divinity in 1633, and made ſuch a progreſs in it in two years time, that he exceeded ſome perſons of great parts and learning, and was exceeded by no body. It is added that he was promoted the following year to the prieſthood, and to his doctor of Divinity's degree. Studium Theologicum ingreſſus eſt anno trigeſimo tertio ſupra milleſimum & ſexcenteſimum, illudque biennio integro ita percurrit, ut multos ingenio & eruditione præſtantes vinceret, & a nemine vinceretur. Ad ordinem ſacerdotalem anno inſequenti, & ad Theologiæ Magiſterium evectus (1) I thought it proper to place this following year, after the two years of his ſtudy of Divinity; for if it be put immediately after the year 1633, it would follow, that this doctor had ſtudied Divinity one year as a ſcholar, after he had been admitted doctor. I would not however in this claim any preference of Mr Moreri; for the author of the elogy did not perhaps pretend to much exactneſs in theſe chronological punctilios. Has he not ſaid (2), that after John de Launoi had ſpent five or ſix years in the ſtudy of Philoſophy and ſcholaſtic Divinity, he began his courſe of Divinity, and ſpent two years in it? Is this expreſſing ones ſelf according to the ſtrict rules of exactneſs. But however negligent he may have been, have preferred his authority to that of Moreri.

[B] . . . . nor did he make any uſe of theſe two characters to get money, and beg benefices.] This requires a remark; for a perſon exempt from avarice and ambition, is ſo rare to be found, even amongſt doctors of Divinity, that when we meet with one, the public ought to be particularly acquainted with it. Such examples ought to be conſecrated: all poſſible care ſhould be taken to do them juſtice: this will prove an excellent inſtruction to the public; for it ſhews that providence does not entirely deliver up mankind to corruption. I ſay then that John de Launoi expreſſed from his youth a great indifference for the things of this world; which excellent diſpoſition did not change, when he grew older; for he then gave up to his brothers and nephews all his pretenſions to his father's eſtate (3), and would never hearken to the advice of his friends, who put him upon aſking for prebends and livings. To get rid of their friendly ſollicitations, he declared to them that he found himſelf neither qualified for ſinging nor preaching, and that he would not enrich himſelf with the wealth of the church, whilſt he could not do her any conſiderable ſervices by the functions of his miniſtry. tinued to purſue his ſtudies with extreme induſtry. He did not content himſelf with reading all ſorts of books; but reſorted to the moſt learned divines [C], in order to conſult them upon all the difficulties he met with (a). He received the moſt conſiderable improvement from the learned converſations of Father Sirmond [D]. It was not for his own particular ſatisfaction, but for the uſe of the public, that he heaped up ſuch a vaſt treaſure of learning; for there are very few divines who have publiſhed a greater number of books [E]. He made no ſcruple to attack ſeveral falſe traditions [F], and was one of the ſtrongeſt ſupporters of the privileges of the Gallican church. He extended his criticiſms even to ſubjects of devotion: and ſome ſaints would ‘ rœciam præbendamve vacantem, eo nomine peteret ab eo, cui conferendæ illius munus incumbebat, reſpondit, ſe huic utrique officio parum aptum eſſe à natura, cùm per latera parum firma, perque vocem minimè canoram, neque verba apud populum facere, neque pſalmos hymnoſque decantare poſſet. How many people would be very eminent in learning, if the eager deſire of making their fortune did not continually divert them from their ſtudies? See what a poet ſays in regard to the impediments of his art.

I muſt not forget John de Launoi's will. The preface of it was very remarkable. After the common form, In the name of God, &c. it went on thus, I ſhall quickly make an end of this will, for I have but little wealth (6). Mr Menage has not mentioned all; it alſo gave the reaſon why the teſtator left but little wealth, that God had given him to underſtand that it was much harder for a Chriſtian to make a right uſe of riches, than to go without them (7). It is obſervable, that Mr de Launoi left more money behind him than he ever dreamed of his being found maſter of: an evident ſign of his little concern for riches. He never took the pains of counting his money: and ſometimes forgot where he had laid it. ‘ (8) Certum illum (9) fecit Launoius, plus penes ſe poſt obitum ſignatæ pecuniæ repertum iri, quàm præſtandis legatis requireretur; & revera longè plus repertum eſt, pluſque quam Launoius ipſe repertum iri crederet. Sed id tantum abeſt ut ei vitio verti poſſit; quin potiùs laudi duci debet, cùm illud omne quantumcunque fuerit, non avara manus aſſervaſſet uſquam, ſed contemptor opum animus domi projectum oblivioni penè dediſſet. —— Launoi aſſured him he would find more money at his death, than would pay the legacies he ſhould leave, and indeed there was a great deal more found, than even Lannoi conld have imagined himſelf worth. But this was ſo far from being a fault, that it was rather a virtue, ſince the whole ſum, how great ſoever, had been careleſsly thrown by out of contempt, and not heaped up out of avarice.’ We have here a proof that an indifference or extreme fondneſs for riches, may each produce the ſame effect: for there are ſome miſers who hoard up ſo much wealth, that they themſelves know not the extent of it (10).

[C] He reſorted to the moſt learned divines.] Nor was he contented with that; but conſulted, by way of letters, the learned men who lived in other parts of France, or in foreign countries (11); and when he went to Rome, it was not to ſee the antiquities, but to get acquaintance with the Litterati. Thoſe he moſt converſed with there, were Lucas Holſtenius, and Leo Allatius (12). ‘ Iter etiam ſuſcepit in Italiam, non quidem ut fluvios inſpiceret & maria, non ut urbes luſtraret, non ut vetera artium monumenta, novaſve ædificiorum moles mirabundus intueretur, ſed ut conſuetudine frueretur eruditorum (13).’

[D] He received the moſt conſiderable improvement from the learned converſation of Father Sirmond.] He propoſed his doubts to him; and was anſwered without heat or paſſion. That contentious way of diſputing about the ſciences, too common among the learned, was not the character of this Jeſuit. ‘ Suam ſeu percunctationem, ſeu ſententiam, de maximi momenti capitibus proponentem benigne audiebat perſpicaciſſimus & cordatiſſimus ſenex, mentem ei ſuam candide aperiebat, & cum eſſet ab omni quæ in ſcholis viget rixandi conſuetudine alienus, abſtinebat à contentione & pugna verborum, locoſque indicabat conciliorum aut patrum, quibus innixus ita ſentiret (14). —— This moſt humane and underſtanding old gentleman gave him leave to propoſe his doubts, and opinions on ſubjects of the greateſt moment, and then returned his own ſentiments with all imaginable candour, and being himſelf an enemy to noiſy methods of diſputing in ſchools, he, without making any words or controverſy, freely pointed to the councils or fathers whereon his ſentiments were founded.’ He readily diſcovered to his friend the authorities of the fathers and councils, upon which he grounded his opinions. Mr de Launoi examined them with great exactneſs, and went again to viſit Father Sirmond, who hearing him diſcourſe upon theſe matters, anſwered him; At firſt I underſtood theſe things better than you, but now you are much more maſter of them than I (15). No Jeſuit had a greater ſhare in his intimacy than de Launoi, which did not pleaſe the fraternity. ‘ Cum nullum haberet inter ſodales ſuos Sirmondus quocum fidentius loqueretur, de quo & ipſi nonnunquam conqueſti ſunt, crebrius inviſi vehementer optabat à Launoio cui nihil erat quod minus crederet quam ſibi (16). —— Sirmond having none of his own ſociety, ſo much in his confidence, which they would all ſometimes complain of, was extremely preſſing upon Launoi to viſit him the oftner, to whom he loved to communicate every thing he knew.’ The Menagiana has this paſſage. ‘ Father Sirmond ſaid of Mr de Launoi, that when he heard him ſay any thing that was good he went to write a book (17).’

[E] There are very few divines who have publiſhed a greater number of books.] See the catalogue of them in the hiſtory he publiſhed of the college of Navarre in 1677. His Bookſeller had often printed it by itſelf. The following nice remark ſeems to deſerve a place here. ‘ This (18) was his greateſt favourite of all his books, whether it was that he took pleaſure in this glorious teſtimony he had given the public, of his gratitude to that college of the faculty, which, he conſidered as his mother: or whether he was not altogether inſenſible of the pleaſure of ſeeing all his own works particularized in this book: For he had inſerted in it the catalogue of all his writings, which he choſe to do himſelf as well to make it more exact, as to explain more readily the titles, and ſubjects of his ſmalleſt books, and of all his letters in particular, wiſely judging, that any body elſe would be eaſily diſcouraged with their great number, and the large amplification of their titles (19).’

[F] He boldly attacked ſeveral falſe traditions.] As the arrival of Lazarus and Magdalen in Provence; the apoſtleſhip of Dionyſius the areopagite in Gaul; the cauſe of the retreat of St Bruno the founder of the Carthuſians; the viſion of Simon Stoch; the privileges of the Sabbatin bull. They whoſe intereſt it was to maintain thoſe opinions raiſed terrible out-cries againſt him. He was, according to them, an enemy to religion. ‘ Credi vix poteſt quantam initio invidiam his ſcriptis in ſe conflaverit; licet enim antiquam atque adeo genuinam traditionem propugnaret, ejuſque fidem, ut ipſe ſæpe ad locum Tertulliani alludens dicere ſolebat, ex temporibus aſſereret, tamen qui hiſtorias quas expungebat à teneris annis imbiberant, would have been ſtruck ont of the Kalendar, if his arguments had been admitted. It is worth obſerving what Guy Patin ſaid upon it [G]. It was a favourable ſubject for berant, quive illas credulæ plebi non ſine aliquo commodo ſuo ingerebant, eas ſibi eripi ægre patiebantur, nec qui id tentaſſet mitius incuſabant quam ſi ſirmiſſima religionis fundamenta convellere decreviſſet (20). ——— It is ſcarce poſſible to conceive what a load of envy theſe writings at firſt drew upon him: for tho' he was a defender of the antient, and conſequently the genuine, tradition, and as himſelf often uſed to ſay, in alluſion to a paſſage in Tertullian, vindicated it's authority from the times; yet they who had believed from their youth the legends he had expunged, or who found their account in impoſing them upon the credulity of the people, could not bear the loſs of them with any patience, but cried out as violently againſt all attempts of this kind, as if the moſt important fundamentals of religion had been attacked.' He was not in the leaſt affected with their clamours, but went on ſtill, and undeceived not only the learned, but alſo ſome of the vulgar. 'Vicit tamen inexpugnabili conſtantiâ Launoius hominum imperitorum, & malè feriatorum importunas inofficioſaſque querelas, & aniles eorum fabellas ita revicit, ut nullum jam patronum inveniant inter eos, qui aliquâ curâ veritatem indagant, multò pauciores quàm antea apud vulgum, & apud eos qui ne literas quidem norunt (21).' He vigorouſly attacked the Monks in two other points (22); for he demonſtrated the falſity of the pretended privileges, by virtue whereof they refuſed to acknowledge the juriſdiction of biſhops; and confuted the arguments on which they ground their claim to the adminiſtration of the ſacrament of penance. Here follows what the abbot de Marolles ſaid of him. 'He found the art of diſcovering the moſt hidden truths: and the lovers of them are as much pleaſed with him for it, as thoſe who are unqualified to diſcover or value them, are uneaſy at his having made ſuch glorious conqueſts. However they can reproach him with nothing: and it has not hitherto been poſſible for his adverſaries to convict him of the leaſt falſhood, or of one wrong inference from the teſtimonies of the writers concerning the points he has examined. It is true, what we have ſeen of him, is inconſiderable in compariſon of what we ought to expect from him, applying himſelf as he does to the moſt ſerious ſtudies upon important ſubjects: but the moſt learned will always benefit themſelves by the reading of his works, either by his method, or the certain diſcovery of truths, for which pure religion will have no leſs reaſon to glory, than infamous ſuperſtition to be concerned at it (23).

[G] It is worth obſerving what Guy Patin ſaid upon it.] 'I give you notice, that I have delivered a little packet to a young man of Lyons . . . . You will find in it, among others, Mr de Launoi's book, wherein he undertakes to prove, that there never was ſuch a ſaint as Renatus, nor any biſhop of Angers of that name. It is the ſame who has writ againſt Dionyſius the Areopagite, aſſerting that he never came into France; and againſt the ſcapulary of the Carmelites, and againſt Magdalen, pretending that ſhe never came into Province. He is a doctor of Divinity, a Norman, a man of a mean look, but learned, and eſpecially in eccleſiaſtical hiſtory. Some here call him a deſperate and damned ſpirit, whom all ſhould avoid; who turns every year a ſaint out of paradiſe, and it is to be feared will at laſt expel God himſelf. Yet hitherto no body has anſwered him. One of his friends told me that he had long been a penſioner in the college of the Jeſuits (24), who made uſe of him to approve their books; but that at laſt, they had diſcarded him, for refuſing to give his approbation to a new doctrine they had a mind to publiſh (25).' What follows, is curious; I have it from Mr Menage, and it is he who ſpeaks (26). Mr de Launoi, doctor of Divinity, of the faculty of Paris, pretends that ſeveral of our ſaints never exiſted: which occaſioned Mr Feramus to ſay of him *,

Addita qui faſtis Numina falſa doces.

In ſearch of truth, Launoi knows no reſtraint,
Nor ſpares his pen one Legendary ſaint.

I made this Greek epigram upon it,

Τὸν Λαυνοῖον ὁρᾷς, ὃς σύρφετον Οὐρανιώνων
Ῥίψε, ποδὸς τεταγὼν ἀπὸ βηλȣ̃ Θεσπεσίοιο.

Launoi kicks down the ſcoundrels from above,
As Vulcan once was ſerv'd by Homer's Jove.

They ſay this laſt verſe is taken out of Homer, ſpeaking of Jupiter who kicked Vulcan out of heaven. But that is the very beauty of my epigram; it would be ridiculous, were this verſe my own: And I dare ſay it is thought very pretty for that application, on which Mr Daillé, the father, who was particularly converſant with Homer, has often congratulated me. The abbot Faydit has not obſerved that it is only the laſt verſe which Mr Menage has borrowed from Homer: he has quoted part of the firſt, as if it was to be found in the Iliad; and which is worſe, he pretends that Jupiter turned out the whole rabble of the gods. His words are theſe (27). 'Rome could not without indignation bear that Mr de Launoi, as learned as he he was, ſhould uncanonize five or ſix unknown ſaints, who in the times of ignorance had been introduced into the Breviary; and that like Homer's Jupiter, who turned out the whole rabble of the gods, with one kick on the breech, from heaven to earth, this doctor ſhould with one daſh of his pen diſcard from the throne of glory ſome ſaints whom Rome had too haſtily placed there.

- - - - Ὃ ϖέργυτον ȣ̓ρανιώνων
Ῥίψε ϖόδος τεταγὼν ἀϖο Βήλȣ Θεσπεσίοιο (28).

'She has cried out againſt this attempt, as the moſt horrid ſacrilege. His books have been delivered up to the Inquiſition, not being able to drag the author thither. She has decried him as a man of a ſuſpected faith, and an enemy to the ſaints.' It is certain that Homer ſays no more than, that Jupiter taking Vulcan by the foot, threw him down from heaven (29). If Mr Menage ſaid in converſation the ſame thing as the abbot Faydit, we muſt conclude from it, that he had not conſidered matters ſo narrowly, as when he took pen in hand for the public, or that he flouriſhed on that adventure in order to make it more agreeable, and more capable of the parallel. However it be, here is a paſſage out of the continuation of the Menagiana, wherein Homer is made to ſay what he has not ſaid. '(30) Mr Godefroy the Hiſtoriographer going abroad very early in the morning on New-years-day, met in Harp-ſtreet Mr de Launoi, who was going to the Sorbonne. He accoſted him, and ſaluting him, ſaid, a good morrow and a happy new year to you, Sir; what ſaint will you diſcard from heaven this year! Mr de Launoi, ſurprized at this queſtion, anſwered him; I diſcard no true ſaints from heaven whom God and their merit have placed there; but ſuch as the ignorance and ſuperſtition of the people have undeſervedly introduced thither, and without the approbation of God, and of the learned. This anſwer was the occaſion of the epigram I made upon Mr de Launoi, wherein I compare him to Jupiter in Homer who cleared heaven of the whole rabble of falſe gods, who had crept in amongſt the true ones, and who giving them a kick on the breech threw them headlong from his throne, and down from the ſtars to the earth (31).'

If it was not for fear of making too many digreſſions, I would ſay that it were to be wiſhed that ſeveral learned men were ſuffered to do what Mr de Launoi has done. The ſham ſaints are no leſs multiplied than the pretenders to nobility; ſo that as princes from time to time iſſue out commiſſions of inquiry, in order to reduce the uſurpers of quality to their proper Plebeian ſtate, the clergy ſhould appoint ſome commiſſioners, as rigid as Boiſſeau (32), to examine the titles and patents of ſaintſhip. If the troops of the church triumphant ſhould come to muſter before honeſt commiſſaries, there would be found a great many Fagots, not amongſt the ſoldiers but amongſt the great officers, I mean among the ſaints who are daily invoked. The for the jocoſe humour of this Phyſician and it furniſhed ſo fruitful a ſource of pleaſantry that ſeveral other perſons diverted themſelves with relating merry ſtories on that ſubject [H]. It was difficult for this learned divine to write ſo many volumes agaiſt the maxims of the Pope's flatterers [I], and againſt the ſuperſtitions, and pretended immunities

The Kalender wants more to be reformed on that account, than with reſpect to the preceſſion of the equinoxes: and whereas a bare defalcation of ten days was ſufficient for this laſt reformation, the other would require a ſubſtraction by hundreds and thouſands. It is a long time that the year has been unable to afford a day for each ſaint; they muſt be heaped one upon another in the ſame places, ſo that we may now ſay with Juvenal,

> Talis ut eſt hodie, contentaque ſidera paucis
> Numinibus miſerum urgebant Atlanta minori
> Pondere (33).

> E'er gods grew numerous, and the heav'nly crowd,
> Preſs'd wretched Atlas with a lighter load.
> CREECH.

How many ſenators ſhould we find in the celeſtial court vitio creati (34), ſhould we proceed rigorouſly? See how many volumes the Acta ſanctorum already amount to? One might apply to them this common diſtich (35):

> Scripta giganteæ quorum ſub pondere molis
> Triſtior Encelado bibliopola gemit.

> And with Enceladus's torture groans.

I would have this underſtood, without prejudice to the eſteem which is due to their learned compilers.

I muſt even acknowledge, to their honour, that they reject a great many fables, and that their ſincerity expoſes them every day to the ſame complaints which were made againſt Mr de Launoi. See Father Papebroch's anſwer (36) to the Exhibitio Errorum of Sebaſtian of St Paul, a Carmelite; you will there find that this Jeſuit has caſhired many intruders out of the kalender, and that upon very ſolid reaſons. Theſe intruders are not ſaints of a modern, but very ancient date. Cardinal Beſſarion, ſeeing at Rome the canonization of ſome perſons, whoſe lives he thought none of the beſt, cried out, that theſe new ſaints made him call in queſtion the old ones. Aſſe che queſti ſanti moderni mi ſanno aſſai dubitare delli paſſati (37). But we may ſay, that there is infinitely more certainty in the modern, than in many of the antient ſaints. We cannot doubt but the former lived on earth; and we have almoſt demonſtrative proofs, that the latter never did. A witty man ſaid the other day, in good company, that if he was to addreſs to the ſaints, he had rather chuſe the new comers, Capiſtran, for inſtance, or Thomas de Villeneuve, than St Catherine, or St Alexis. See the remark of the article PEREZ (JOSEPH). I ſhall obſerve below (38), that the work of the Jeſuit Papebroch incurred the diſpleaſure of the Inquiſition.

A canon of Paſſaw, a good preacher, and profeſſor of divinity in the XVth Century, ſaid in one of his ſermons, that if there were as many holy-days as minutes, the year would not afford one for each ſaint, and he quotes Durandus, biſhop of Mande, who obſerves, that there are above five thouſand ſaints for every day. 'Tanta (inquit ille *) eſt Sanctorum numeroſitas, quod totum tempus anni non ſufficeret etiam ſi ſingulis horis, etiam ſingulis minutis, ageremus feſtum unius Sancti; deinde Durandum citat. Quia ſicut dicit (inquit) Guilhelmus in rationali pro quolibet die pluſquam quinque millia Sanctorum concurrerent (39).' The author, who quotes the ſermon of the German canon, adds, that All-Saints day was appointed to ſupply the want of days in the year, and to prevent the diſpleaſure of thoſe ſaints, who might be angry for having no honour paid them. 'Quocirca quum Pontificiorum Divorum tanta illis authoribus fere infinitio ſit, in ſupplementum cultus Sanctorum feſtum omnium Sanctorum excogitatum eſt. Quoniam humani cultus illos appetentes eſſe ſomniant, & in ſuos cultores prolixos, ne omiſſis & præteritis Divis Stomachandi ulla cauſa ſit, quod ſuo cultu orbentur: ſic omnibus minutis etiam & manipularibus Divis, & non ſolum Patriciis & majorum Gentium, hoc omnium Sanctorum feſto & Supplemento ſatisfactum eſſe putant. Atque hoc Guilhelmi illius Mimatenſis Epiſcopi eſt, quaſi ſalutari hoc pharmaco omnium divorum repulſæ & offenſæ placari debeant.' Durandi verba hæc ſunt. † Propter ipſorum inquit multutitudinem feſtare de illis ſpecialiter non valemus. Ergo ut antea idem ait propter omiſſorum (inquit) feſtorum ſuppletionem inſtitutum eſt feſtum omnium Sanctorum (40). —— 'Therefore ſince the ſaints of the Pope's canonization are grown infinite, All-Saints day is contrived as a ſupplementary worſhip of them. Becauſe, as they are ſuppoſed to be very fond of being worſhipped, and to have a particular regard for their votaries, that there may be no room left for any of them to reſent the not being taken notice of, this feaſt of All-Saints is eſteemed a ſupplementary worſhip, not only of the higher, but alſo of the lower, and every particular claſs of ſaints. And this, according to the ſame William Durandus, biſhop of Mande, is a ſort of expiatory commemoration, neceſſary to appeaſe all the ſaints who have not been particularly recorded. Theſe are his words. Their number is too great to allow of particular holidays for them; and therefore, as the ſame author has obſerved before, in order to ſupply the want of theſe (ſays he) the general feaſt of All-Saints was inſtituted.' Thoſe who make it their buſineſs to draw parallels, will not fail to remember, upon this occaſion, the precaution of the Athenians, who conſecrated an altar to the unknown gods (41), becauſe they were afraid of neglecting the worſhip of ſome revengeful deities, whoſe names and qualities they were ignorant of. They thought they had lately ſuffered for it; ſo that to play a ſure game (42), they reſolved to pay their homage even to the deities unknown to them. This was the way to forget none of the gods.

[H] He furniſhed ſo many pleaſant ſtories, that ſeveral other perſons diverted themſelves with relating merry ſtories on that ſubject.] Here is one of Mr de Vigneul-Marville: it is as good as that I have mentioned out of the Menagiana. 'Mr de Launoi was a terrible Critic, formidable both to heaven and earth: he has unſhrined more ſaints, than have been canonized by ten Popes. He ſuſpected the whole martyrology; and examined all the ſaints, one after another, as they do the quality in France. The curate of St Euſtachius in Paris, ſaid, "When I meet Dr de Launoi, I make a very low bow to him, and I ſpeak to him with my hat off, and with the greateſt reverence, for fear he ſhould take away my St Euſtachius, who has nothing to depend upon (43) (§ α)." Theſe laſt words are very true; and here is a paſſage of the Valeſiana, which confirms them. 'The life of St Euſtachius is likewiſe a heap of fables; and I am very much ſurprized that the largeſt pariſh of Paris ſhould have parted with the name of one of the moſt famous and illuſtrious martyrs we have, to take that of an unknown, and very ſuſpicious ſaint (44).' Mr Ancillon heard Mr Daillé ſay, 'that one day meeting him in Mr Cramoiſy's ſhop, a Bookſeller in Paris, they expreſſed a great friendſhip and eſteem for one another; and that as they parted, Mr de Launoi told him, Sir, I ſtrike every month one ſaint out of the Breviary, do you ſtrike an error out of it (45).' If Mr de Launoi ſpoke in that manner, it was only in jeſt; for the number of ſaints he pretended to degrade, will bear no compariſon with the months of his life. But he might, without any exaggeration, have affirmed the ſaints who are doubtful or fabulous, to be as numerous as the minutes of his long life. See the excellent Hiſtory of the Church, publiſhed by Mr Baſnage, in 1699, in two volumes in Folio. There (46) we find ſo many fabulous ſaints and martyrs degraded, that in compariſon of that ocean, Mr de Launoi's attempt is no more than a rivulet.

the evil, in confuting the immunities the Monks pretended to, he thought it neceſſary to lay down this important truth, that the Pope can do nothing againſt the canons of councils. He wrote ſeveral letters upon that ſubject, which have been ſo well approved in England, and thought ſo proper to mortify the Ultramontains, that they have been reprinted at Cambridge (47). He principally attacked Bellarmin; the following account is given of his conqueſt over this great champion of the Pope's. 'In eo verò adverſarium inter alios nactus eſt Cardinalem Robertum Bellarminum, qui abſurdiſſima quæque Romanæ curiæ placita defendenda ſuſceperat. Si quæ porro in eorum confirmationem deſumpta ex ſacris libris teſtimonia adduxit, clariſſimè demonſtravit Launoius, fuiſſe ea in pravum detorta ſenſum, & aliter intellecta quàm ea ſanctiſſimi quique patres intellexerint, à quorum ſenſu in exponendis Scripturis recedere, nihil aliud eſt quam fideliſſimos duces, & à Tridentina Synodo datos aſpernari, & in errores omnes ſeipſum conjicere. Si quos etiam canones aut patrum textus laudat Bellarminus, eos plerumque interpolatos oſtendit Launoius, & mala fide relatos. Sicque hominem armis Scripturæ & traditionis nudatum exponit, velut nutritum in philoſophica palæſtra tyronem, qui adversùs invictam caſtrorum aciem irrito ridendoque conatu digladiatur; & tela ab Ariſtotele deſumpta juveniliter vibrat (48). —— Upon this ſubject he found, among other adverſaries, cardinal Bellarmine, who had undertaken to defend the moſt abſurd maxims of the court of Rome. Launoi clearly demonſtrated, that the teſtimonies he had alledged out of ſcripture, in confirmation of them, were all miſ-interpreted, and taken in a quite different ſenſe from what all the Fathers had underſtood them in; the receding from whoſe authority in expounding the ſcriptures, was deſpiſing the moſt faithful guides, authorized by the council of Trent, and plunging head-long into all kinds of error. The quotations Bellarmine had made out of the canons and fathers, Launoi alſo proved to be interpolated and unfaithful. So that he ſtripped his adverſary of all his armour borrowed from ſcripture and tradition, and expoſed him naked, like a freſhman in the univerſity, ridiculouſly diſputing with a moſt able Profeſſor, and brandiſhing Ariſtotle's weapons with a childiſh hand.' Reiſerius, a Lutheran miniſter (49), publiſhed a book, in 1685, which, ſtrictly ſpeaking, is only an abſtract of our Doctor's Letters. He has put two titles to it, which are both to our purpoſe. The running-title is, Joh. Launoii Theol. Pariſ. Anti-Bellarminus. But the title prefixed to the book is, Johannes Launoyus Theologus & Sorboniſta Pariſienſis teſtis & confeſſor veritatis Evangelico-Catholicæ in potioribus fidei capitibus controverſis adverſus Robertum Bellarminum & alios quoſdam Sedis Romanæ Defenſores egregius & luculentus, nunc poſt obitum contra Chriſtianum Lupum Lovanienſem, Immanuelem à Schelſtrate Antverpienſem, Natalem Alexandrum Pariſienſem, Dominicum Galeſium, & Franciſcum Marcheſium Romanos, vindicatus. The author of this book pretends, that John de Launoi is a perſon fit to be put in the appendix to Illyricus's Catalogus teſtium veritatis. Mr Couſin has taken it in his head, a little too late, to ſpeak of this book of Reiſerus, in his Journal des Sçavans; the firſt mention he has made of it, is in the journal of the 30th of July, 1696, and in that of the 6th of Auguſt following. Theſe two extracts are very proper to acquaint us with Mr de Launoi's character.

[K] He was forbid holding aſſemblies in his chamber.] Nothing was more innocent than thoſe aſſemblies; the converſation run only upon learning; however he was told, that the king deſired they ſhould be diſcontinued (50). The archbiſhop of Paris was thought to be the author of that affair, and there were ſome who took occaſion from thence to ſpeak ill of him. Mr de Launoi neither took that liberty himſelf, nor would ſuffer this charge to be laid upon the archbiſhop in his preſence; though he could not forbear ſaying, that if the accuſation were juſt, he muſt be guilty of the greateſt ingratitude. Hos animorum motus utcunque ſedabat Launoius, reique acerbitatem, benigna ut poterat interpretatione leniebat. Abſtinebat ipſe ſemper ab omni atrocitate verborum, Archiepiſcopum nec incuſabat ipſe, nec incuſari ab aliis, carpive coram ſe patiebatur. Sed tamen cum vir eſſet candidiſſimi pectoris, diffiteri non poterat, quin ſi id præſtitiſſet Pariſienſis præſul, laboraret vehementer ingrati animi vitio, quo cætera omnia facile continentur (51).

[L] His Printer was brought into trouble.] This happened in the year 1675; he was printing his book concerning Simony, wherein, amongſt other things, he writes againſt the Annates, and confutes the Jeſuit Azorius, who wrote a book towards the end of the XVIth Century, to clear them of Simony. The copies of this work of Mr de Launoi, were ſeized at the Printer's; thoſe which could be found were carried away, and he was forbid ſelling the reſt; but for a fine of fifty livres, that prohibition was taken off (52).

[M] He had a book in the preſs during his laſt ſickneſs.] Let us ſee what Mr de Vizé (53) ſays of him. 'It may be ſaid, that he died in a manner with pen in hand; ſince the day before he corrected the proofs of a book he had written in defence of the king's intereſts. It is an anſwer to an Italian writer, who ſome time before had printed a treatiſe in oppoſition to the right of ſecular princes, concerning the impediments to matrimony. Mr de Launoi had before maintained the quite contrary doctrine in a book publiſhed in 1674, wherein the rights of the king, and of all ſecular princes, are ſo ſolidly eſtabliſhed, that this work may be looked upon as one of the moſt uſeful to the ſtate. It was anſwered in Italy, and as this anſwer took from ſecular princes their eſſential right, which they have to capacitate or incapacitate their ſubjects for contracting matrimony, this great man was not ſilent, but was taking care, when he died, of the impreſſion of what he had wrote to confute the errors of the Italian author. Thus all his time was employed, either for the church, or for his prince; and he may be called, not only the vindicator of the king's rights, but alſo the defender of the juſt authority of the biſhops, the deſtroyer of falſe privileges, and the aſſerter of the liberties of the Gallican church.' The author of Mr de Launoi's elogy, does not agree with the Mercure Gallant, with reſpect to the book which was then in the preſs. It was not, according to him, an apology for the right of princes over marriages, but an anſwer to Father Alexander. He tells us, that Mr de Launoi began the treatiſe concerning the right of princes, at the requeſt of cardinal Bentivoglio. Mr de Launoi being at Rome, when they were examining in France, whether the marriage of the duke of Orleans, brother to Lewis XIII, with the princeſs of Lorrain, was valid, met with cardinal Bentivoglio in the library of the Dominicans, and propoſed to him this argument. If princes have had the power to make laws concerning the obſtacles to marriage, they have it ſtill, unleſs it has been taken from them. But they have had it, and it cannot be proved that it has been taken from them. Therefore. The cardinal deſired Mr de Launoi to write upon this ſubject, and to explain this argument. See the margin (54). The book was ſmall at firſt, but before it was publiſhed, in 1674, it grew very large. Dominic Galeſius, biſhop of Ruvo, in the kingdom of Naples, wrote againſt it. Mr de Launoi had no ſooner read the book of that prelate, but he undertook to refute it; he had ſcarce finiſhed that confutation (55), but he undertook to anſwer Father Alexander (56). His anſwer was almoſt finiſhed, when he was ſeized with the diſtemper of which he died in a few days. This laſt work was already in the preſs.

compoſed for him was not permitted to be put upon his tomb [N]. I forgot to obſerve that he died at the Hôtel d' Etrée [O], the tenth of March 1678, being above ſeventy ſeven years of age (d). He was a man, to whom the public is greatly indebted. Had he only publiſhed the book De autoritate negantis Argumenti, he would have done great ſervice to the Republic of Letters; for he has given a thouſand fine hints in that book, to diſtinguiſh truth from falſhood in hiſtorical matters. He had diſputes with ſeveral, and among others with father Nicolai a Dominican [P] and Mr Thiers (e).

He drew upon him the whole order of St Dominic, for having ſo freely attacked the reputation of Thomas Aquinas. The marks of reſpect, which his prudence and gravity made him intermix with his cenſures, did not prevent the reſentment of the Dominicans; for after all it could not be diſſembled, but that the angelical doctor was guilty of great ignorance, or inſincerity, in the notation of ſeveral paſſages deſigned for the confutation of heterodoxy. Father Baron endeavoured to juſtify Thomas Aquinas but was not very ſucceſsful in his attempt. I ſhall take occaſion on this head to make ſeveral obſervations [Q]. Father Alexander laboured with much greater ſucceſs to ſhew, Hence it appears, that Mr de Vizé, and the elogiſt do not agree concerning the book which Mr de Launoi had in the preſs when he died.

[N] The epitaph which was compoſed for him, was not permitted to be put upon his tomb.] Mr de Launoi had made his will eleven years before he died, and he had deſired Mr Camus, firſt preſident in the court of aids, his old and intimate friend, to be his executor. Mr le Camus faithfully diſcharged that truſt, and deſired Mr le Clement, an ancient counſellor of the ſame court, to write an epitaph on the deceaſed (57). The Minimes having read and examined it, produced a letter from their general, ſignifying, that this epitaph could not be admitted, ſince it complimented de Launoi with having always maintained orthodoxy; and ſome time after they declared, that both the royal and eccleſiaſtical authorities had enjoined them not to ſuffer any inſcription in praiſe of Mr de Launoi. ‘ Ubi illam (inſcriptionem) expenderunt, attulerunt præpoſiti ſui generalis literas, quibus renunciabatur, nec probari nec recipi à ſe poſſe inſcriptionem, quâ Launoio laus defenſæ perpetuo veritatis, & optimæ famæ, maximæque venerationis apud probos quæſitæ tribuatur. Poſtea vetitum ſibi prædicarunt regia ſimul & ſacrâ auctoritate, ne ullum apicem in capella ſua extare ſinerent, quo Launoii nomen commendaretur (58).’ See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (59), and particularly a Letter to a prelate of the court of Rome, upon the decree of the Inquiſition of the ſeventh of December, 1690. I ſhall quote a paſſage out of it, which may be of uſe in the hiſtory of our doctor. The abbot, who wrote this letter, takes notice, that the court of Rome maintains it's rights with greater policy than the court of France: he obſerves, that the former recompenſes very magnificently thoſe that write in it's favour, but that the latter takes no notice of thoſe who aſſert the privileges of the Gallican church. ‘ However, ſays the author of that letter, if I might adviſe, poſterity ſhould know by ſome mark of honour, the eſteem which has been paid their merit, and the gratitude which has been ſhewn to their works. But you know how far this has been obſerved, with reſpect to one of your friends. We have not had a man of greater zeal for the doctrine of the clergy of France, nor more indefatigably ſtudious to illuſtrate and defend it, than honeſt Mr de Launoi, who beſides was remarkable for the ſtricteſt impartiality. What has been done to the honour of his memory? you very well know; they would not ſo much as ſuffer on his tomb, the few compliments his friends would have paid to his merit, and the ſervices he had done to the church of France. Nay, they did in a manner ſtop his mouth ſome years before he died, by forbidding him to continue certain conferences upon this ſubject in his houſe, where it may be truly ſaid, more were inſtructed to become defenders of our liberties, than in all other places beſide. Nay, it is a kind of miracle, that we have what he printed in his life-time, upon the ſuperiority of councils, and againſt the infallibility of Popes, and upon other ſubjects of this nature; and we owe it to his particular contrivance, which was to give it piece-meal in letters, which he wrote to different perſons, by that means avoiding the intolerable ſlavery of the cenſure of certain doctors of his time, without whoſe approbation, no book could be licenſed, and who ſeemed as if hired to put a ſtop to all good books, and to put their authors into deſpair.’

[O] He died at the Hôtel d'Etrée.] The Cardinal d'Etrée, when he was only biſhop of Laon, had in ſome meaſure ingroſſed Mr de Launoi to himſelf. See Mr de Marolles (60).

[P] He had a diſpute with ..... Father Nicolai a Dominican.] The Journal des Sçavans, mentions three works of this author. I. His two diſſertations De concilio plenario quod contra Donatiſtas baptiſmi quæſtionem definivit (61). II. His two diſſertations De Baptiſmi antiquo uſu (62). III. His book De Jejunii Chriſtiani & Chriſtianorum abſtinentiæ vero ac legitimo ritu juxta veterem Eccleſiæ univerſalis uſum (63). The firſt of thoſe three pieces is intirely againſt Mr de Launoi, who pretended that St Auguſtin meant the council of Arles, when he ſaid that the error of the Donatiſts about the nullity of the baptiſm of Heretics, was condemned in a general council. Mr de Launoi drew from thence a great many conſequences againſt the Ultramontains. The ſecond book of the Dominican does not concern him; it is a work of which the Proteſtants of France took advantage, becauſe it contains a formal condemnation of thoſe who force Infidels to be baptized. The third work of this Monk, is againſt Mr de Laucoi. Here is a paſſage out of the continuation of the Menagiana. ‘ I once told Mr de Launoi, that he had offended all the Jacobins by his writing againſt Father Nicolai, and that all of them would write againſt him. He anſwered me unluckily. I fear their penknife more than their pen (64).’

To give a ſmall ſpecimen of the judgment which the Monks formed of the genius of this Sorbonne doctor, I ſhall recite a few lines of Father Baron. ‘ Quiſquis hominem privatim, ſeu publicis ſcriptis intimius noverit, etiam ex amiciſſimis, non abnuet meum de illo judicium, aut verius votum. Optandum plane, ne mores ingenuos corrupiſſet nimio ſuarum cogitationum amore, & alios jure, vel injuriâ carpendi, in naturam inductâ conſuetudine. ſhew, that Thomas Aquinas is the true author of the ſum of Divinity, which is aſcribed fuerit effatum illud medicorum, malum bene poſitum ne moveto. Plura enim ab heroicis Temporibus communi piorum opinione recepta, quæ nihil Fidei adverſa, pietati etiam opportuna, auſus eſt, longe debilioribus, quam niterentur argumentis laceſſere; nullo alio operæ pretio quam ex ſumma moroſitate comparati ſibi nominis, & juſtis poſſeſſoribus, ſaltem ex probabili opinione juris plerumque inique erepti (69). ——— Whoever has had any intimate acquaintance, either with his perſon, or writings, even the beſt friend he has, muſt join with me in my judgment, or rather wiſh, concerning him. It were much to be wiſhed, that a too great fondneſs for his own notions, and an ill habit, which was grown natural to him, of cenſuring others right or wrong, had not ſo far corrupted his great parts. From whence aroſe this miſchief at leaſt, to mention no more, that he ſeems to have been ambitious of a great, rather than of a good, name, and deſirous of eclipſing men of ſuperior learning, without having ſufficiently at heart that maxim of the Phyſicians, which a wiſe Divine will never forget, alter not a wrong method which has ſucceeded right. For he has had the aſſurance to attack ſome traditions generally received by the faithful ever ſince the primitive times, which, without contradicting their creed, were even ſubſervient to their piety, and this he has done on far ſlenderer grounds, than thoſe on which they were founded; purely for the ſake of getting himſelf a name by his great cenſoriouſneſs, and taking away that of others, who are much better intituled to it, at leaſt according to the moſt likely opinion.' In the next leaf he oppoſes the character of Thomas Aquinas to that of this Sorboniſt, and declares that Thomas would have made a ſcruple of conſcience, and been aſhamed of thoſe things, which Mr de Launoi gloried in. The angelical doctor, adds he, would never have diſturbed the French in their belief, that St Dionyſius the Areopagite was their firſt apoſtle; he would never have robbed the inhabitants of Provence, of the glory they claim from the arrrival of St Magdalen; nor the Carmelites of their deſcent from Elias, and of the ſcapulary of Simon Stoch, nor the monaſteries of their exemptions. He had better things to write; and even tho' he had met with ſome doubts, and a want of probability in theſe matters, he would have let them alone, and paid a due reſpect to thoſe traditions which promote piety, without doing prejudice to religion. ' Habebat meliora ſcribenda (Divus Thomas) & ſubodoratus etiam, ut erat emunctæ naris, aliquid incerti, aut minus veriſimilis, ex medicorum præcepto, malum bene poſitum noluiſſet primus movere: atque iſta longâ traditione rata & firma, quæ nihil obſunt fidei, proſunt etiam pietati, in diſputationem revocare, credidiſſet pertinere ad illius generis quæſtiones ab Apoſtolo damnatas, quæ lites generant, non ædificationem (70). ——— Diſputes of this kind, he would have referred to thoſe condemned by the apoſtle, which produce ſtrife and not edification.' If all the circumſtances ſet forth by this Jacobin were true, there is no doubt but John de Launoi was deſervedly condemned, as one, who, to make himſelf talked off, and to ſatisfy his ill nature, would oppoſe many general opinions, which had obtained time out of mind, to the advancement of piety, without detriment to faith, and were grounded upon proofs of infinitely more weight than his objections. This laſt circumſtance alone would be ſufficient to condemn an author, let his motives on other accounts be ever ſo juſt; for, undoubtedly, a long poſſeſſion deſerves ſo much reſpect, as to oblige us to maintain it, every thing elſe being equal. But if it be juſt to maintain it, when it's title is not inferior to the pretenſions of the innovators; how much muſt it be more ſo, to forbear all attempts to overthrow it, when it's reaſons are by far the ſtrongeſt? But this is not the caſe of our Sorbonne doctor: the traditions he oppoſes, have no good title, and his arguments againſt them are unanſwerable. Now in this caſe, it is plain, there is all the right in the world to bring the moſt general and antient opinions to a trial, eſpecially when their falſity keeps up a criminal devotion. I deſire it may be obſerved, that the reaſonings of this doctor were of ſuch force, as to undeceive abundance of people: but yet the abuſes have not been removed: things remain ſtill upon the ſame foot in Provence, and elſewhere.

A REFLEXION upon the unſucceſsfulneſs of Launoi's labours.

They tell you ſtill the ſame ſtories they told your anceſtors, and you ſee there the ſame worſhip, and the ſame ceremonies. This proves the difference there is betwixt private perſons and the public. Particular people are moſt of them one time or other undeceived, and yet the practice of the public remains the ſame. Cicero ſays there was not an old woman ſo ſilly as to give credit to the ſtories, which were formerly believed concerning hell; and he makes uſe of this remark to prove that fabulous traditions vaniſh away in time, but that true doctrines, and ſuch as are grounded upon the nature of things, are confirmed by age, and that this was the cauſe of the long continuance and increaſe of the worſhip of the gods. ' Videmus cæteras opiniones fictas, atque vanas diuturnitate extabuiſſe. Quis enim Hippocentaurum fuiſſe, aut Chimæram putat? quæve anus tam excors inveniri poteſt, quæ illa, quæ quondam credebantur, apud inferos portenta extimeſcat? Opinionum enim commenta delet dies, naturæ judicia confirmat. Itaque & in noſtro populo, & in cæteris, Deorum cultus, religionumque ſanctitates exiſtunt in dies majores, atque meliores (71).' Juvenal alſo complains, that the antient doctrine concerning hell, was no longer believed.

Eſſe aliquos Maneis, & ſubterranea regna,
Et contum & Stygio ranas in gurgite nigras,
Atque una tranſire vadum tot millia cymba,
Nec pueri credunt, niſi qui nondum ære lavantur.
Sed tu vera puta (72).

Ghoſts, Stygian lakes, and frogs with croaking note,
And Charon wafting ſouls in leaky boat,
Are now thought fables, to fright fools conceiv'd,
Or children, and by children ſcarce believ'd.
Yet give thou credit. TATE.

Thus you ſee a great change in the opinions of private perſons, and yet the public worſhip was ſtill the ſame, both in Juvenal's and Cicero's time. There were ſtill the ſame feaſts, proceſſions, and ſacrifices, not only in honour of the celeſtial gods, but alſo in honour of Pluto and Proſerpine, and the other infernal deities. This ſort of inconſtancy on one hand, and conſtancy on the other, will always be more or leſs obſervable. Some doctors of quicker ſight, and greater courage than their brethren, will undeceive abundance of private perſons, and yet cauſe no change in the public ceremonies. The ritual will laſt longer than the faith on which it was built. Too many people will find it their intereſt to maintain it, and will be induſtrious enough to ſucceed, though they can give no better reaſons for it, than thoſe alledged to Cotta in Cicero's book before cited. Among other things they urged to him the apparitions of ſome deities; and to prove the truth of theſe apparitions, they alledged the foundation of ſome temples, a decree of the ſenate, a proverb. I expected ſome arguments, replies he, and you bring only popular ſtories. ' Tum Lucilius: An tibi, inquit, fabellæ videntur? Nonne ab A. Poſthumio ædem Caſtori & Polluci in foro dedicatam, nonne S. C. de Vatieno vides? Nam de Sagrâ, Græcorum etiam eſt vulgare proverbium; qui quæ affirmant, certiora eſſe dicunt, quàm illa quæ apud Sagram. His igitur auctoribus nonne debes moveri? Tum Cotta, Rumoribus, inquit, mecum pugnas, Balbe: ego autem à te rationes requiro (73). —— To this Lucilius: What can you eſteem theſe things fables? Do not you ſee a temple in the Forum dedicated to Caſtor and Pollux by A. Poſthumius, and a decree of the ſenate concerning Vatienus? And as to Sagra, the Greeks have a common proverb among them, who when they would aſſert a thing, ſay it is more certain than any thing in Sagra. Are not theſe authorities therefore ſufficient to convince you? To which Cotta: O Balbus, ſays he, you fight me with popular ſtories; but I expect you will give me reaſons.' Mr de Launoi might have made uſe of the ſame anſwer, and of ſeveral others; but as I have already ſaid, there were too many people intereſted in oppoſing the innovation, and maintaining the common tradition. It looks as if they had well weighed the conſequences of the principle which Cicero has put into the mouth of one of his ſpeakers: I mean that they ſeem to have learned how to prove the truth of a tradition, from it's ſtanding the teſt of time, and maintaining it's ground for ſo many ages. It is laid down in Cicero, that an opinion ill-grounded can never grow old (74). 'Quid 'enim eſt hoc illo evidentius? quod niſi cognitum, 'comprehenſumque animis haberemus, non tam ſtabilis 'opinio permaneret, nec confirmaretur diuturnitate 'temporis, nec unâ cum ſæculis ætatibuſque hominum inveterare potuiſſet. Etenim videmus cæteras 'opiniones fictas, &c (75). —— For what can be more 'certain than this? which if it had not been fully 'known and underſtood, could never have prevailed ſo 'long, as an eſtabliſhed opinion, nor been confirmed by 'length of time, and grown old, together with the 'ſeveral ages and ſucceſſions of men. For we ſee other 'opinions which are falſe, &c.' Doubtleſs, the monks are led by ſome weightier motive than what this argument ſupplies, to oppoſe John de Launoi, and thoſe like him. Note, by the by, that the argument drawn from antiquity, is made uſe of in Cicero to prove a falſity, for it is there alledged to maintain the reality and exiſtence of the falſe gods of Paganiſm. It is therefore a principle which may lead into error; and yet the maxim, Opinionum commenta delet dies, might have been long ſince urged againſt the falſe worſhip of the antient Greeks and Romans, ſince there has been no country for many ages, wherein their religion, their Jupiter and their Juno, their Venus and their Neptune, &c. are acknowledged and adored. And thus their cauſe is loſt when once it is ſuppoſed, that, ſooner or later, time will deſtroy falſe doctrines. You may pleaſe to obſerve, that this principle can never be admitted as a certain proof, without firſt determining the duration ſufficient to diſtinguiſh truth from error. If a thouſand years ſuffice, every opinion which is a thouſand years old is true; but if no time be fixed, it is in vain to conclude, that a doctrine which has laſted four thouſand years muſt be taken for certain: no body knows what is to come, or whether the fifth millenary may not put a period to what has reſiſted the four preceding ones. A thought of Horace is applicable to this ſubject.

I have one thing farther to obſerve. There is no likelihood that thoſe who follow the ſteps of John de Launoi can do any ſervice whilſt things are only carried on by way of a literary diſpute. The patrons of falſe devotion will never recede; they find their account too much not to abate an ace, and they are powerful enough to ſecure themſelves from any violence. The court of Rome will ſecond and ſupport them. The Romiſh church ſeems to have adopted the religion of the god Terminus of the Roman republic. This god never yielded a tittle, no not to Jupiter himſelf: which was a ſign, ſaid they, that the Roman people ſhould never recede, nor yield an inch of ground to their enemies (77). If any Pope ſhould be willing to ſacrifice ſomething to the reunion of the Schiſmatics, ſome inſignificant devotions, ſome ſuperannuated traditions, he might apprehend as great a murmur againſt him, as the Heathens made againſt the ſcandalous peace of the emperor Jovian (78). The Jeſuits, with all their power, have not been able to hinder the Inquiſition of Toledo from condemning ſeveral volumes of the Acta Sanctorum; and it is certain that ſtorm was raiſed only by the ſollicitations of the Carmelites, and other Monks, who were angry with Father Papebroch, and his aſſiſtants, for having rejected ſeveral acts, and old traditions, as apocryphal. They are to be commended for having merited this thunder-ſtroke, and will do well to deſerve others. The character of a Capaneus (79) in this reſpect would be a very good one,

But by theſe ſort of encounters with the inquiſitors, they will render themſelves unſerviceable with reſpect to the reformation of public abuſes; their criticiſms, were they much more ſevere, could be of no farther uſe than for the inſtruction of private perſons. The diſeaſe is paſt cure. You ſee Father Mabillon has laid down ſome very good rules concerning the worſhip of ſome ſaints, and the judgment to be made of relics (81). What did he get by it? he was anſwered, Phyſician, heal thy ſelf. Reform firſt the worſhip paid, in ſome houſes of your order of St Benedict, to ſaints as dubious as any. He was told of the injury he did to the church, and the advantage he gave the Proteſtants (82). Is not this ſhutting the door againſt all his good deſigns? Mr Thiers ſets up againſt falſe relics, he examines where the bodies of the martyrs lie, he publiſhes ſome diſſertations upon the holy Tear of Vendôme, and upon St Firmin. All this is loſt labour. The king's council ſuppreſſed his book about St Firmin, as the biſhop of Amiens had condemned a letter, which he had publiſhed upon the ſame queſtion. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (83), and the third part of the Bibliotheca volante. The fruits of a diſcreet zeal are deſtroyed in the bud. They build upon this principle, that it is dangerous to abrogate old cuſtoms, that boundaries ought not to be removed, and that, according to the old proverb, we ſhould leave the minſter where we find it (84). The proſperity of the Chriſtian Rome, juſt like that of the Pagan Rome, is founded upon the preſervation of antient rites (85). Conſecrations muſt be complied with, religion will allow no alteration in them. Sed illa mutari vetat religio, & conſecratis utendum eſt (86). In our days, ſaid a ſub-prior of St Antony, let us beware of innovations (87).

Thoſe who will not be at the pains of reading it, but ſhall only conſider the following quotation, will eaſily perceive that our doctor was never ſo groſsly abuſed. 'Infruniti vir ingenii Joannes Launoyus, cui nihil adeo ſacrum fuit, 'quod non fœdarit ſcriptione aliqua petulanti ac pluſquam cenſoria. [S] I ſhall mention the judgment paſſed on him by Mr de Vigneul-Marville.] ' Whatever eſteem I have ' for Mr de Launoi, it muſt be confeſſed, that he ' had the predominant fault of critics, which is to obſerve no meaſure, and to defend the worſt cauſes ' with obſtinacy. His books of Extream-Unction, ' and of Ariſtotle's fortune, and ſome others, are good ' pieces; but it may ſaid in general, that this doctor ' in all his writings ſhews much more learning than ' judgment and good reaſoning. Commonly the ' principal ſubject is not what he handles beſt; but ' it is in incidental matters that he is ſo admirable, ' by which he frequently deceives the unattentive ' reader (90).'

The author of the Journal des Sçavans, has affirmed (91), that Mr de Launoi ' can be charged with ' nothing leſs juſtly than defending bad cauſes with ' obſtinacy. His particular character was to love truth ' above all things, to ſeek it without any prejudice, ' and freely to communicate it, when he had found it, ' &c.' Mr de Vigneul-Marville has anſwered (92) that ' there are two ways of loving truth; the one is to ' love it for it's ſake, the other, to love it in regard ' to oneſelf. . . . .' That St Auguſtin loved it for it's own ſake . . . . . ' that it is quite otherwiſe with ' the generality of critics, who only love truth either ' for the glory it gives to thoſe who firſt diſcover it; ' or which is more commonly the caſe, out of a ' capricious humour getting an aſcendant over them.' ' I will not ſay, continues he, that Mr de Launoi ' was one of thoſe adventurers, who go in queſt of ' truth, as knights errants formerly did of noble exploits. But then it muſt be confeſſed that a great ' many very learned men did ſometimes look upon ' him as a critic who overſhot himſelf, and did not ' always diſcover the truth he was ſo fond of. This ' will readily appear by caſting an eye on the learned, who have attacked him, or wrote ſevere replies ' to him.' One might have ſeen him covered with the duſt of his daily combats, and with the bruiſes that he had received in the fight (93). Nay, this author adds, that in Mr Arnauld's opinion he was not always orthodox: he declared himſelf too freely for a Divine ſo much inferiour to St Auguſtin, of which the Proteſtants of the Arminian party, pretended to take great advantage. This gives us to underſtand that he did not approve the hypotheſis of St Auguſtin about Predeſtination; but his opinion concerning that doctrine will be much better underſtood from the preface of a treatiſe which is not yet publiſhed; Mr Simon has inſerted it in one of his letters (94), and informs us that Dr de Launoi in that work condemns the opinion of St Auguſtin. This letter is not very advantageous to the doctor, and gives us a very mean notion of his learning. See the Journal des Sçavans of the fourteenth of November 1701, pag. 722, Dutch edit. and the Journal of Trevoux, of Auguſt 1703, pag 1313, edit. of France. The Journal of Trevoux of January 1704, article I, ſpeaks of a defence of St Auguſtin by Father Daniel againſt the diſſertation aſcribed to Mr de Launoi.

LAURENS (ANDREW DU) in Latin Laurentius, profeſſor of Phyſic in the univerſity of Montpellier [A], chancellor of the ſame univerſity, and firſt Phyſician to Henry IV, died the ſixteenth of Auguſt 1609, as we learn from Guy Patin (a), with ſome other particulars, which are mentioned in Moreri's Dictionary, and which I therefore will not repeat. I content myſelf with ſupplying the defects left in that Dictionary. No particular mention is there made of the writings of Andrew du Laurens. I ſhall therefore obſerve that he publiſhed ſeveral, which were very much eſteemed, particularly his Anatomy [B], which has paſſed a great many editions, and was dedicated by him

(a) Patin, Letter XXXI, pag. m. 142, of the firſt Tome. See alſo the twenty ſeventh Letter, pag. 117.

[A] Profeſſor of Phyſic in the univerſity of Montpellier.] It is remarkable that before he was allow- to act as profeſſor, he was obliged to paſs thro' all his exerciſes again in order to take his doctor's decree a ſecond time. ' Cum Regio diplomate Monſpelii Medi ' cinam publicè docendi munus obtinuiſſet, admitti tamen non potuit, donec iterum factus fuiſſet primò ' Med. Baccalaureus, deindè Licentiatus, tandemque ' Doctor, & toties iterum de Medicina reſpondiſſet, ' quoties in Academia ex illius inſtituto opus fuit (1) ' ——— Altho' he had obtained the king's grant of ' the Phyſic profeſſorſhip, yet he could not be admitted ' till he was again made firſt Batchelor of Phyſic, ' then licentiate, and laſtly doctor, and had gone quite ' thro' all the diſputations required by the conſtitutions ' of that univerſity.' Riolanus confirms this. The Sieur du Laurens, ſays he (2), being a doctor of Avignon, was obliged to wait at Montpellier, and there read a lecture, and commence doctor over again, as one but newly admitted.

Patin was undoubtedly not acquainted with this particular, which he would certainly otherwiſe have mentioned with the following remark. ' Du Laurens . . . . . ' came to court with the counteſs of Tonnere, by ' recommendation he was made one of the king's four ' Phyſicians, and Regius profeſſor at Montpellier, a' gainſt the laws and ſtatutes of that univerſity, by an ' arrêt of privy-counſel, which he had much ado to ' get verified at Toulouſe (3).' Note that he founded a phyſic garden near one of the gates of Montpellier, where he placed this inſcription, Argus eſto non Briaræus. —— Prefer the eyes of Argus to the arms of Briareus (4).

[B] He publiſhed ſeveral pieces which were much eſteemed, particularly his Anatomy.] It was re-printed at Paris in folio in 1600, and at Francfort alſo in folio, the ſame year. Theſe two editions were followed by three others at Francfort, in 8vo, in 1602, 1615, and 1627. It is intituled, Hiſtoria Anatomica humani Corporis & ſingularum ejus partium, multis controverſiis & obſervationibus novis illuſtrata (5). —— The Anatomical Hiſtory of the Human Body, and all it's parts, illuſtrated with many new controverſies and obſervations. The word novis ſhews that the Paris edition was not the firſt. It followed that of Lyons in 1593, in 8vo, which is not half ſo large. I have ſeen two French tranſlations of the Paris edition; one by Francis Sizé and printed at Paris, in 1610, in 8vo: the other by Theophilus Gelée Phyſician at Dieppe, and printed at Paris in folio in 1613, together with ſeveral other pieces of du Laurens (6), tranſlated by the ſame hand, or which had been before publiſhed in French by the author himſelf (7), or which had been collected from his lectures read publickly to the Chirurgeons in the univerſity of Montpellier, in the years 1587, 1588. Theſe laſt pieces are on the gout the leproſy, and the ſmall pox. All the French pieces juſt mentioned have alſo appeared in Latin; they may be

him to Henry IV, in 1599. It is a miſtake to ſay he improved by his converſation with Aquapendente [C]. His country has not been rightly mentioned in Lindenius renovatus [D]. ANTONY DU LAURENS, his youngeſt brother, was an advocate in the king's council, and died in 1647, at eighty three years of age. He married Anne Robert, the daughter of Anne Robert the advocate, who was living in 1662 be ſeen in Tom. II, of Laurentius's works, publiſhed at Francfort in 1621, in folio, with the Annotationes in artem parvam Galeni, & Conſilia Medica. The piece on Criſes had been printed ſeparately in Latin at Francfort in 1596, and 1606, in 8vo (8). Lindenius renovatus takes no notice of the Latin edition of Laurentius's works publiſhed at Paris in two volumes in 4to, in 1627, by Guy Patin, author of the Latin tranſlation of ſome pieces written by Laurentius in his mother tongue.

The French tranſlation of the Anatomy, printed at Paris in 8vo in 1610, has no figures, but that of Gelée, in folio. The Printer gives this among other reaſons, for his ſuppreſſing them, that Laurentius ordered them to ‘ be added only to oblige ſome particular readers, not that he judged them neceſſary, but rather conducing to divert than inſtruct. Beſides, he himſelf declares, that he left the Printer of the Latin edition to take the figures from thoſe to be met with among common Anatomiſts, ſuch as thoſe of Paré and Guillemeau, Chirurgeons to our Moſt Chriſtian kings, or of Charles Stephens doctor of Phyſic in the ſame univerſity, which are in every bodies hands: ſo that if there be any faults in his figures, he deſires they may be imputed to the Painter and Engraver, and ſays, he has explained himſelf ſufficiently in his Anatomy, ſo as to need no aſſiſtance from figures; nothing further being required than a view of the annual diſſections, without which it is impoſſible to become a perfect Anatomiſt (9).’ Theſe particulars relating to the hiſtory of that work of du Laurens, I thought the reader would not be ſorry to find here.

I muſt add, that altho' this Phyſician was an excellent Anatomiſt, yet he could not help leaving room for criticiſing. Read the following words: ‘ All that is contained in the queſtions of Laurentius relates only to that part of Anatomy, which is truly phyſiological. In his Anatomy he has committed great errors, not ſuch as Collado and Laurembergius have taken notice of, which are in his queſtions, but in facts, and in the text of his Anatomical Hiſtory; which is ſo plainly proved, that every one who is the leaſt skilled in Anatomy muſt own he is not to be defended (10).’

This Callado, or rather Colladon, has carried his cenſure too far; for he pretends that there is nothing at all good in Laurentius's Anatomy. John Sperlingen profeſſor of Phyſic at Wittemberg has animadverted on this exceſſive paſſion. ‘ Hæc & plura ejuſmodi Collado, ſays he, quæ non hic ſaltem, ſed ubique contra Laurentium magno fervore ſcriptitat. Ubi ita ſe gerit, ut oculati videant omnes, non tam amore veritatis quam antiquitatis cordato huic contradixiſſe viro. Sed non abjicienda nova omnia, aliàs & ipſe hic Colladonis liber è medio tollendus & è bibliothecis foret exterminandus. Quem tamen multa bona, multa acutè excogitata continere, non imus inficias. Interim etiam non omnia in Laurentio falſa, ſed plurima vera, plurima non abſque inſigni legentium commodo ſcripta ſunt. Fallit Collado, cum inquit: Laurentii Anatome tota mendis ſcatet, ut de eâ verè Prophetæ querimoniam poſſis queri, omnis princeps ægrotat, à vertice ad plantam pedis, & non eſt in corpore toto ſanitas: adeò omnes libri partes ineluibilibus errorum maculis imbutæ ſunt, ut neſcio, quâ creta aut cimolia abſtergi purgarique poſſint. Fallit & cum ſcribit: Docere vis, quæ non intelligis, quomodo id præſtabis? Non per te ſanè, non enim potes dare, quod non habes, ſed κατὰ συμβεβηκὸς, inſtar duræ & ſtupidæ cotis, acutum reddere quæ ferrum valet, exſors ipſa ſecandi. Non facies ſanè tuorum librorum lectores doctiores, imò ſi tibi fidant indoctiores: ſed tum deprehenſâ doctrinæ tuæ falſitate juſto perciti zelo, veræ & genuinæ medicinæ auxiliatrices manus afferent, præmium clarioris ſcientiæ eruncatis tuis ex ſuo aliorumque animis erroribus pernicioſiſſimis metent. Ne quid nimis, Collado! Amicè tractandi publici boni cauſa qui laborant. Nævos ſi habent, & tegendi, & detegendi illi. Errare humanum ſed errata ſtylo atroci & lingua virulenta notare, ac è muſca elephantem facere inhumanum (11). —— Theſe and a great many more of the ſame kind, which Colladon not only here, but every where elſe, objects againſt Laurentius with great heat. Diſcovering to all attentive readers by ſuch behaviour, that he has contradicted this judicious author, more out of love to antiquity than truth. But all new things are not to be rejected, otherwiſe this very book of Colladon's muſt be ſelf-condemned, and baniſhed from all libraries, which yet, we do not deny, contains many good and ſhrewd obſervations. Nor at the ſame time is all that Laurentius has written falſe; there are a great many things true, a great many by which the reader may be very much improved. Colladon deceives us when he ſays: Laurentius's Anatomy abounds every where with errors, that we may apply to it the complaint of the prophet, every prince is ſick, from the crown of the head to the ſole of the foot, and there is no health in the whole body: all parts of his books are ſo full of ſpots of ſo deep a dye, that no Fullers-earth in nature can never take out. He alſo deceives us when he writes: you undertake to teach, what you yourſelf do not underſtand. But how is this to be done? Not by your own inſtruction, for you cannot give, what you have not, but by accident, like a hard and ſtupid whetſtone, which can give an edge to ſteel, tho' it has none of it's own. Your books will never make the readers wiſer, but on the contrary, if they credit you, more ignorant; till by diſcovering the falſity of your doctrine, they become influenced with a proper zeal to go over to the ſide of the true and genuine Phyſic, they obtain the prize of perfect ſcience, by eradicating out of their own and others minds your moſt pernicious errors. You harp, Colladon, too much on this ſtring! They who labour for the public good, ought to be kindly treated. If they have any faults, they ought to be corrected, but not expoſed. To commit errors is natural, but to magnify them, and cenſure them, in a harſh ſtyle, and rude language, is unnatural.

[C] It is a miſtake to ſay he improved by his converſation with Aquapendente.] We ſhall clear up this from an extract of a letter of Guy Patin. Mr Hofman (12) . . . . remarks ſomewhere that Laurentius has publiſhed a diſcovery in Anatomy, which he would never have thought of, if he had not learned it from Fabricius Aquapendente, at whoſe table he eat for ſome years. But this is very falſe; for Laurentius never ſtudied any where but at Paris under Duretus ſeven years . . . . So that he never was at Padua, as I am very well aſſured by being Phyſician for theſe ‘ twenty three years laſt paſt, to the family of Meſſieurs du Laurence, who are both counſellors, and one of them maſter of Requeſts, whoſe father was the younger brother of Andrew Laurentius, and died not above ten years ago of a quartan ague, at eighty ſeven years of age, from whom I had the opportunity of meeting with all the information I could deſire (13).

[D] His country has not been rightly mentioned in Lindenius renovatus.] The words of the author of that book are Natus in Academia Monſpelienſi (14), that is born in the univerſity of Montpellier. This expreſſion would be improper, even tho' the mother of Laurentius had been delivered of him in a college of Montpellier. But I am in doubt whether he was at all born in Montpellier. The author (15) quoted by Freherus affirms it. And it is no concluſive argument to the contrary, that he had a brother (16) born at Arles, for it is no extraordinary thing, that the children of the ſame father ſhould be born in two different places. We muſt wait therefore for a clearer proof of this point, as alſo of theſe words in Lindenius renovatus, obiit in patria, which mean that Laurentius ended his days at Montpellier; but in the mean time I have ſome ſuſpicion that he was born at Arles, ſince Guy Patin has intituled him Arelatenſis in his edition publiſhed in 1627.

LAURENTIO (NICHOLAS), commonly called Cola di Rienzo, was, in the XIVth century, one of thoſe men whom the providence of God makes uſe of, from time to time, as a ſort of theatre, whereon is exhibited to view a repreſentation of the viciſſitudes and uncertainties of human life [A]. He was the ſon of a mean Vintner, and a Laundreſs. His application to ſtudy in his youth, and the natural ſtrength of his parts, made him very eminent. He became exceedingly eloquent, and had by heart all the fine paſſages of Cicero, Livy, Julius Cæſar, Valerius Maximus, and Seneca. He was extremely fond of antient inſcriptions, and underſtood the reading of them perfectly well. He obtained a Notary's place, which was at that time ſo well eſteemed, that gentlemen did not think it below them to execute it. The commiſſaries of the ſeveral diſtricts of Rome having deputed him to Pope Clement VI, who reſided at Avignon, he harangued him ſo eloquently that he gained the eſteem and favour of that Pontif, and the admiration of his court. This encouraged him to declame againſt the great lords of Rome, who oppreſſed the citizens. Cardinal John Colonna reſented it; but having better conſidered the matter, he deſiſted from doing him ill offices with the Pope. Laurentio grew ſtill hotter and hotter againſt thoſe petty tyrants of Rome; and one day he harangued in the Capitol with ſo much freedom againſt them, that he received, as ſoon as he had done, two boxes on the ear. One was from a lord of the houſe of Colonna, who was then chamberlain of Rome, and the other from Thomas Fortifiocca, ſecretary to the ſenate. He diſſembled the matter, and continued ſtill to harangue in the Capitol, and in ſeveral churches, and to deviſe emblems, all tending to ſhew the ill adminiſtration of juſtice. The perſons concerned took this for ſport, eſpecially when they ſaw that his orations were mixed with jeſts, and that he threatened ſome of them with capital puniſhment. In all likelihood they thought that he could do them no prejudice by reaſon of his extravagances, but they were miſtaken: for taking advantage of Stephen Colonna's abſence, who was marched out of Rome with his ſoldiers, to bring in proviviſions, he aſſembled the people, harangued them, made laws, expelled all the grandees out of the city, aſſumed the the power of judicature, and was declared tribune auguſt, and deliverer of the people in 1346. The faction of the exiles was incapable of withſtanding him, by reaſon of the little union there was among them; ſo that he diſpoſed of all things at his pleaſure, and ſaw himſelf at the head of a new Roman republic, in whoſe name he wrote to other ſtates, to the emperor, and to the Pope himſelf. The better to confirm his authority, he condemned a great many people to death, and among others, he cauſed Martin de Porto, one of the petty tyrants of Rome, to be hanged. He received embaſſies from ſeveral princes and republics, and boldly ſummoned the Pope to come and reſide at Rome, with the college of cardinals. He was ſo ſucceſsful in the war he undertook againſt the faction of the nobles, that he ſurpreſſed it intirely. But then he became like moſt of thoſe, who make inſurrections under the fair pretence of liberty. It is not the tyranny they hate, but the tyrants; they cannot bear, that any ſhould exerciſe the ſovereign power but themſelves. Laurentio had no ſooner overthrown the tyranny of others, but he became a tyrant himſelf; upon which he was treated, as he treated others. He was forced to make his eſcape, and they hanged him in effigy at Rome as a traytor. After concealing himſelf for ſome time, he went to the emperor, who permitted him, but without adviſing him to it, to go and pay his duty to the Pope. He was at firſt ill received, but after ſome months impriſonment, he followed the Pope's legate to Rome. He there raiſed his party to ſuch a heighth a heighth as to be juſt ready to commence war again with the Colonna's: but his ſeverity to the people, and his exactions, rendered him ſo odious, that they mutinied againſt him. He thought his eloquence would calm that tempeſt, as it had many others; but he was miſtaken: for notwithſtanding his ſhewing himſelf to the people, and haranguing them at his windows, they ſet fire to his palace. He attempted to eſcape in a beggar's habit, and was almoſt out of danger, when a certain little man diſcovered him. Another run him through the body with a ſword. They gave him a thouſand wounds; they dragged him through the ſtreets, and hung him up by the feet (a). He was two days in that ſituation, after which the Jews burnt his corps in the fields (b). LAZZARELLI (N.), a native of Gubio in Italy, was a very good poet. He was ſome time auditor, or judge in the Rota of Macerata, and afterwards dedicated himſelf to the church, and became a prieſt, and provoſt of Mirandola. He died in 1694, above eighty years of age. He publiſhed a book intituled la Cicceide, which has ſomething in it very ſingular. It is a collection of ſonnets, and of ſome other kinds of Poetry, in which he cruelly abuſes one Arrighini (a), a native of Lucca, who had been his colleague in the Rota of Macerata. He treats him as a perſon wholly compoſed of genitals (b). His verſification is wonderfully eaſy, natural, and fluent: his imagination ſurprizingly fruitful in fine and lively thoughts; but the ſubject is ſo obſcene, and treated with ſo much malice, and ſometimes prophaneneſs, as may juſtly give offence. The preface of his book contains ſome apologies which I ſhall mention [B].

(a) The author of ſome pieces, and particularly of a volume di conſigli criminali to which he prefixed a print of himſelf. See page 204 of the Cicceide.

(b) It is an expreſſion of Balzac's See the Chevræana, pag. 276 of the ſecond part. Holland Edit.

[A] A book intituled la Cicceide hath ſomething very curious in it.] I have only ſeen the ſecond edition of it (1), publiſhed in 1692. This is the whole title; la Cicceide legitima: in queſta ſeconda impreſſione ordinatamente diſpoſta, notabilmente accreſciuta, e fedelmente rincontrata con gli Originali dell' Autore. It contains two parts: the firſt called le Teſticolate, the ſecond le Sghinazzate. The perſon reflected upon in that work, is deſcribed by the name of Don Ciccio. Note, that Ciccio is a word the Neapolitans make uſe of, to ſignify Franceſco. The Romans inſtead of Ciccio ſay Cecco. The chief deſign of the author is to prove, that Don Ciccio is a Coglione. All the 318 ſonnets, which compoſe the firſt part of the Cicceide, terminate in that. It is the center of the ſphere of it's activity; I believe the ſecond part will make up the complement of the number 360, which is the common diviſion of a circle. There is nothing wanting in that ſphere of ſlander; it has all it's degrees, and they all terminate in the ſame point. Lazzarelli, with whatſoever he begins always ends with the Coglioneria of Don Ciccio. This is the burthen of all his ſongs. This is going too far, even beyond what Voiture could do in complimenting the great prince, to whom he wrote, You who are a true Cæſar in wit and learning, a Cæſar in diligence, vigilance, and courage, & per omnes caſus Cæſar, you have deceived the opinion, &c (2). Our poet turns his Ciccio on all ſides, and ſhews him every way, and makes a Coglione of him per omnes caſus. He traces him from the moment of his conception to his death, and goes ſtill farther; for he jeſts upon his coffin, his burial, his epitaph, &c. He purſues him as far as Charon's boat, and engages he will be ferried over gratis; and even that he may go over without being ferried. He ſuppoſes Charon ſpeaking to him thus:

Per varios caſus, per tot diſcrimina rerum (3),

E' privilegio a pari tuoi conceſſo
Il poter ſenza imbarco, e pagamento
Havere a l'altro margine l'acceſſo;
Mentre un tondo C.... gonſio di vento
Galleggiando leggier, può da sè ſteſſo
Andar di là dal fiume a ſalvamento (4).

He left out of the ſecond edition the ſonnets which had been judged the moſt prophane, and had occaſioned the putting his book into the Index. They concerned Ciccio's baptiſm, confirmation, extreamunction and ſome other tickliſh ſubjects. I have a manuſcript copy of them, and am adviſed to inſert one here at leaſt; that they who cannot ſee the Cicceide, a peice but little known on this ſide of the Alps, may form an idea of Lazzarelli's genius. I have pitched upon the ſonnet concerning extreamunction (5).

Da la febre, da l'aſma, e da l'uſcita,
Don Ciccio ritrovavaſi ammalato
E già ridotto in ſi cattivo ſtato
Che'l fean vicino all' ultima partita.

[B] The preface of his book contains ſome apologies, which I ſhall juſt mention.] It ſeems to have been made by one of the author's friends, who proteſts, that he was very ſorry for the firſt impreſſion of this book, and that he had much ado to conſent to the ſecond, though it was in a better condition. His ſcruples were grounded upon ſome alluſions to the ceremonies of the church, and upon the oppoſition, that might be found between the duties of charity, and a ſlandering book. He adds, that this book is only a heap of flaſhes of wit, and a poetical rapture, notwithſtanding which the writer is really orthodox; that he ſubmits all thoſe compoſures to the cenſure of his ſuperiors, and that he deteſts whatever they ſhall judge blamable; that he hopes from the reader's equity, a juſt diſtinction between witty conceits, and an intention of offending; and laſtly, that though he writes ſomewhat licentiouſly, his actions are unblameable. This is only an imperfect account of his apology, and therefore I ſhall ſet down his own words (6). 'E à dire il vero è 'l'uno, e l'altro degli accennati motivi ſon degni di 'un animo, che profeſſa eſattamente i dettami del 'Chriſtianeſimo, nel quale ſi pregia l'Autore di vivere, 'proteſtando, che queſti ſuoi componimenti ſono un

LELAND (JOHN), a native of London, ſo induſtriouſly applied himſelf to the ſearch of the Engliſh antiquities, and was thought ſo qualified to ſucceed in it, that king Henry VIII gave him a very good penſion, and the title of his Antiquary. That employment began and ended with him. That he might well diſcharge the duties of it, he went through all the counties of England, he examined all the ruins of old monuments, he peruſed the manuſcripts of convents and colleges; and having ſpent ſix years in his travels, and collected as many memoirs as was poſſible, he undertook ſeveral conſiderable works [A]: but he had not time to finiſh them, nor even to forward them. The court did not pay him the ſtipend that was due to him; and whether for this, or ſome other reaſons, he fell into a deep melancholy, which diſtracted him [B]. He died in that ſad condition. His manuſcripts are in the Bodleian library. They are undigeſted materials [C], that ſhew however his great capacity. But it is more clearly known by a book to which he put his laſt hand [D], and which deſerves to be printed (a). Camden has been accuſed of having made great uſe of Leland's manuſcripts (b). Dr Smith has confuted that accuſation.

I ought not to omit, that he ſtudied at Paris under Sylvius; that he began in 1534 to travel in ſearch of the Britiſh antiquities; that he abjured the church of Rome ſome time before his death, and that he died the eighteenth of April 1552 (c).

This petition, intituled Strena, was publiſhed by Bale (1).

[B] He fell into a deep melancholy, which diſtracted him.] Let us make uſe of Dr Smith's nervous expreſſions. ' Proh triſtes rerum humanarum vices! proh viri optimi deplorandam infeliciſſimamque ſortem! non enim multo poſtquam fidem quod ſuſceperat præſtandi quaſi ſignatis tabellis obſtrinxiſſet, ſive operis promiſſi difficultatibus deterritus, ſive immenſis laboribus ſatigatus fractuſque, ſive dolore nimio & malancholiâ, quod fructum induſtriæ juſtæque expectationi parem nondum percepiſſet, fortè oppreſſus, ſive quacunque aliâ de causâ, abalienatæ mentis, nullis, è Religione & Philoſophiâ, nullis è Medicinâ petitis remediis ad priſtinum ſanumque ſtatum revocandæ, ægritudinem perpeſſus eſt; vaſtâ interim obſervationum, quas in Adverſaria ſine ordine & properante calamo, prout ipſi occurriſſent, congeſſerat, mole relicta (2). ——— Sad viciſſitude of human affairs! deplorable and wretched condition of the beſt of men! for, not long after he had obliged himſelf, as it were under his hand, to perform what he had undertaken, whether deterred by the difficuities of the promiſed work, or tired and broken with immenſe labours, whether perhaps oppreſſed with too much grief, and melancholy, becauſe he had not found a reward equal to his induſtry and juſt expectation, or from what other cauſe ſoever, he ſuffered the loſs of his ſenſes, not to be reſtored by any remedies fetched from Religion, Philoſophy, or Medicine; in the mean time, leaving behind him a vaſt heap of obſervations, which he had thrown together in his Adverſaria, without order, and with a haſty pen, juſt as they occurred to him.'

' Quantus vero fuerit Lelandus, ſi non ex editis opuſculis Collectaneis, ſaltem ex eximio opere (quod perfectum reliquit) de Scriptoribus illuſtribus Britannicis, quod in publicam lucem exeat, digniſſimo, colligere licet (5). —— How great a man Leland was, may be collected, if not from his miſcellaneous works, which are publiſhed, at leaſt from that excellent treatiſe, (which he left perfect) concerning the famous Engliſh authors; a treatiſe moſt worthy to ſee the light.' And that one may judge of the piece by the pattern, he gives us Leland's collections about Simon Stoch. Dr Smith tranſcribed this article to ſend it to the Jeſuit Papebroch, the compiler of the Acta Sanctorum. The Catalogue of the Bodleian Library gives the titles of ſome of Leland's printed works. Mr Teſſier (6) ſhould have acquainted the public, that the book De illuſtribus Britanniæ Scriptoribus; de Academiis Britannicis; de Typographia, &c. Which he aſcribes to John Leland, is not printed. I fear he has put Typographia inſtead of Topographia, which will occaſion Leland's being placed among the authors, who have written concerning Printing.

LEMNIUS (Lævinus), a famous Phyſician, was born at Ziric-Zee in Zeland, the twentieth of May 1505 . . . . One of his principal works is that de occultis Naturæ Miraculis [A]. WILLIAM LEMNIUS, his ſon, practiſed Phyſic with ſuch ſucceſs, that Erric, king of Sweden, ſent for him to his court, and made him his firſt Phyſician (a). He was ſo faithful to that prince, that he was impriſoned, and put to death, in 1568, when Erric was dethroned (b).

[A] One of his principal works is that de occultis Naturæ Miraculis.] It has been printed I know not how often. Several editions are mentioned in Lindenius renovatus (1); but nothing is there ſaid of the firſt, which was that of Antwerp, apud Guilielmum Simonem, 1559, in 8vo. The work at that time conſiſted but of two books: it was dedicated by the author to Matthias Gallomontanus ab Heeſuwiick, apud Metelliburgum Antiſtes. The ſecond edition at Antwerp, for Plantin, 1564, in 8vo, contains four books, and was dedicated by the author to Erric, king of Sweden. The preface informs us, that Lemnius propoſed to add two books more to theſe four.

LEMNOS, an iſle in the Ægean ſea near Thrace, and mount Athos [A], was famous upon ſeveral accounts. It was thus called from the great goddeſs, who was named Lemnos, and had maids ſacrificed to her (a). The Sinti, a people of Thrace, were the firſt that inhabited it (b). It had but two cities, one of which was called Hepheſtia, and the other Myrina (c). It's labyrinth was one of the four buildings of that kind mentioned by the Antients [B]. It's towns are Hephæſtia and Myrina, ‘ into whoſe forum, at the Soliſtice, Athos throws it's ‘ ſhadow.*’ You ſee in theſe words of Pliny, that the diſtance from mount Athos, to the iſle of Lemnos, was eighty ſeven thouſand paces. Solinus takes but one thouſand from it (2). This does not agree with the obſervations of Belon, an eye witneſs, and conſequently more to be credited than Pliny. Theſe are his words. ‘ The iſle is more extended in length than ‘ in breadth, from eaſt to weſt, ſo that when the ſun ‘ is going to ſet, the ſhadow of mount Athos, which ‘ is more than eight leagues beyond it, falls upon the ‘ port, and over a point of the iſle, on the left ſide ‘ of Lemnos: a thing which we obſerved the twelfth ‘ day of June. For mount Athos is ſo high, that ‘ though the ſun was not very low, yet the ſhadow ‘ touched the left angle of the iſle (3).’ This teſtimony is ſufficient to convince us, that the antients had reaſon to ſay, that the ſhadow of this mountain reached the iſle of Lemnos; but that they did not well know the meaſure of that extent. It would be a diſtance of about thirty five French leagues (4), if we computed it by Pliny's eighty ſeven miles. What abatements muſt we make, ſince Belon ſays only ſomething above eight leagues? The following paſſage ſhews, that Plutarch was in the ſame error with Pliny. ‘ I know well, that neither ‘ you nor I have ever been in Lemnos; yet we have ‘ often heard that Iambic verſe, ſo frequent in every ‘ one's month,

The cow in Lemnos planted hide.

‘ for the ſhadow of that mountain falls, it ſeems, ‘ on the image of a brazen heifer, which is in Lemnos, extending itſelf in length over the ſea, not leſs ‘ than ſeven hundred ſtadia; not that the mountain, ‘ which makes the ſhadow, is of that height as to ‘ cauſe it; but becauſe the diſtance of the light renders the ſhadows of bodies manifoldly greater than ‘ the bodies themſelves (5).’ The ſeven hundred ſtadia of Plutarch, are 87500 paces: ſo that he made the diſtance ſtill greater than Pliny and Solinus. Apollonius makes it equal to the ſpace that a ſhip can ſail from break of day till noon. Salmaſius proves, that according to the common eſtimation of the antient Geographers, this ſignifies 250 ſtadia (6), whence we may infer, that Apollonius leſſens the diſtance above half, which the others reckon between mount Athos, and the iſle of Lemnos, and yet that he ſuppoſes it much greater, than Belon found it; for eight French leagues makes only 160 ſtadia. Note, that Apollonius obſerves, that the ſhadow of mount Athos reached as far as the city of Myrina.

Ἠεὶ δὲ νισσομένοισιν Ἄθω ἀνέτελλε κολώνη
Θρηϊκίη, ἣ τόσσον ἀπόπροθι Λῆμνον ἐοῦσαν,
Ὅσσον ἐς ἔνδιον κεν ἐΰστολος ὁλκὰς ἀνύσσαι,
Ἀκροτάτῃ κορυφῇ σκιάει, καὶ ἐσάχρι μυρίνης.

Cæterum dubia luce pergentibus aperiebatur Athonis umbo
Thracius, qui Lemnum, licet tantum diſtantem,
Quantum inſtructior oneraria conficiat in meridiem,
Extantiſſimo inumbrat faſtigio, vel Myrinam uſque (7).

As by the doubtful light they ſteer'd their courſe,
The Thracian Athos open'd to their view;
Whoſe lofty ſummit throws a diſtant ſhade
Far as Myrina, in fam'd Lemnos' iſle, Whoſe ſhores the ſpeedieſt veſſel ſcarce can reach,
'Ere that the ſun has finiſh'd half his race.

Salmaſius (8) quotes Stephanus Byzantius (9), to ſhew, that, according to Pliny and Solinus, the ſhadow of mount Athos, could not have reached the iſle of Lemnos: he objects againſt them, that, according to that writer, the ſhadow did not reach above 300 ſtadia; but he would have more ſollidly confuted them, and many others, by Peter Belon's teſtimony.

[B] It's labyrinth was one of the four buildings of that kind, mentioned by the antients.] The three others were that of Egypt, that of the iſle of Crete, and that which king Porſenna cauſed to be built in Tuſcany. Here ſollows a paſſage out of Pliny (10). ‘ De Ægyptio & Cretico Labyrinthis, ſatis dictum eſt. ‘ Lemnius ſimilis illis, columnis tantum centum quinquaginta mirabilior fuit: quarum in officina turbines ‘ ita librati pependerunt, ut puero circumagente tornarentur. Architecti illum fecere Zmilus & Rholus, ‘ & Theodorus indigena. Exſtantque adhuc reliquiæ ‘ ejus, cum Cretici Italicique nulla veſtigia exſtent.’ That is to ſay, according to Du Pinet's verſion, ‘ ſo ‘ much for the labyrinths of Egypt and Candy. That ‘ of Stalimene * was the ſame, except that it had an ‘ hundred and forty marble pillars more than the ‘ others, which were all turned with that eaſe, that ‘ one perſon could turn the lathe in which they were ‘ made, ſo finely poliſhed were the irons and axes that ‘ ſuſtained them. Moreover, it is ſaid, that Zmilus, ‘ Rholus, and Theodorus, which were of the ſaid iſle, ‘ made this labyrinth, of which there are ſome remains; and yet we cannot find the leaſt footſtep of ‘ that of Candy or of Tuſcany.’ This tranſlator ſuppoſes, that the three Architects of this labyrinth, were Lemnians; but the original affirms this only of Theodorus, who is, perhaps, the ſame who wrote a book concerning a temple of Juno (11).

[C] Vulcan . . . . . fell into this iſland, where he . . . . . . ſet up a forge.] Some authors ſay, that Jupiter threw him head-long, and that if the Lemnians had not received him in their arms, he would have loſt his life (12). But he himſelf ſays in Homer, that Juno threw him down, and that Eurynome and Thetis, the daughters of Oceanus, caught him, and prevented his being killed (13). He ſays in another place of the Iliad (14), that Jupiter took him by the foot, and threw him out of heaven, and that having been a whole day in coming down, he fell into the iſle of Lemnos at ſun-ſetting, that he was almoſt dead, and that the inhabitants took him up. Perhaps it will be ſaid, that Homer ſhould have been more careful not to contradict himſelf; but what he ſays implies no contradiction; he only relates two different adventures. Valerius Flaccus ſuppoſes, that Vulcan fell upon the ſhore of Lemnos, and that the inhabitants hearing his voice, ran to him, and gave him all manner of aſſiſtance, ſo that he had ever ſince a great affection for that iſland.

—— jam ſummis Vulcania ſurgit

Ignipotens; nec te Furiis & crimine matrum
Terra, fugæ meritique piget meminiſſe prioris.
Tempore quo primùm fremitus inſurgere opertos
Cœlicolûm, & regni ſenſit novitate tumentes
Jupiter; ætheriæ nec ſtare ſilentia pacis:
Junonem volucri primam ſuſpendit Olympo,
Horrendum chaos oſtendens, pœnamque baratri.
Mox etiam pavidæ tentantem vincula matris
Solvere, prærupti Vulcanum vertice cœli
Devolvit: ruit ille polo, noctemque diemque
Turbinis in morem; Lemni cum litore tandem Inſonuit: vox inde repens ut perculit urbem,
Acclivem ſcopulo inveniunt, miſerentque foventque
Alternos ægro cunctantem poplite greſſus.
Hinc reduci, ſuperas poſtquam pater annuit arces,

Vulcanian Lemnos riſes from the waves,
By thee, through numerous, varied, toils, bewail'd,
God of the fire: nor irks it thee, O land,
To keep in mind his flight, and former merit:
What time rebellion ſhook the throne of Jove,
And broke the peace of the ætherial court:
The ſire of gods, firſt, from Olympus' height
Suſpended Juno, to her frighted view
Diſcloſing chaos, and th' infernal pains.
Next Vulcan, who, with filial piety,
Strove to unloſe his trembling mother's chains,
He ſeiz'd, and hurl'd from heaven: in giddy whirls,
Both night and day, he fell, till Lemnos iſle
Receiv'd the panting god; whom, when his voice
Had reach'd the neighbouring town, the Lemnians found
Reclin'd againſt a rock: with pity ſtruck,
They kind refreſhment lend, to eaſe the god,
Lam'd by the rapid fall. The grateful deity,
Reſtor'd to heaven, and reconcil'd to Jove,
Favours the Lemnian iſle, equal in fame
To Lipare, or Ætna's burning hill.

Homer ſays that Lemnos was the beloved country of Vulcan.

Εἴσατ' ἴμεν ἐς Λῆμνον ἐϋκτίμενον πτολίεθρον,
Ἡ οἱ γαιάων πολὺ φιλτάτη ἐστὶν ἁπασέων.

Simulabt ſe iterum in Lemnum pulchrè fabricatum oppidum,
Quod illi terrarum multò chariſſimum eſt omnium (16).

Here follows a thing, which ſhews, that the moſt fabulous traditions will laſt a long time. Belon, who travelled in Turkey in the year 1548, informs us, 'that there is no inhabitant of the iſle of Lemnos, 'but knows ſomething of Vulcan's hiſtory; and as 'the little children of the iſle of Corſula will tell 'you the hiſtory of the Dolphin, as if it was a new 'thing; ſo every body in the iſle of Lemnos, relates 'the adventures of Vulcan, but in a different man'ner. For ſome ſay, that he and his horſe broke 'their thighs by their fall, and that he was imme'diately cured by the virtue of the earth on which 'he fell (17).'

[D] The place where he fell was very remarkable for a kind of earth, which had great virtues. It cured Philoctetes who was bit by a ſerpent.] Philoſtratus mentions a particular very different from the common tradition. He ſays, that Philoctetes was not tormented in the iſle of Lemnos, with the long pains that were ſo much talked of. 'That brave man, 'adds he (18), was immediately cured by the earth 'of Lemnos, which is taken from the very place on 'which Vulcan fell from heaven; for it has the virtue 'of curing all ſorts of violent and furious diſtempers, 'and of ſtopping all bloody fluxes; but it cures not 'the biting of ſerpents, except that of the Hydra.' I ſhall ſet down ſome particulars taken from Peter Belon's obſervations, who travelled in that country towards the middle of the XVIth century. 'The 'antients, ſays he (19), had a kind of earth, which 'was accounted an excellent remedy for ſeveral di'ſtempers, and which at this day is as much uſed as 'ever. The Latins call it Terra Lemnia, or Terra Sigillata. It is ſuch a rarity, that embaſſadors, at 'their return from Turkey, do commonly take ſome 'along with them, to make a preſent of it to perſons 'of quality. It is good, among other things, for the 'plague, and for all manner of defluxions. There is 'ſome to be had at the Druggiſts, that goes by the 'name of Terra Sagillata, but is generally ſophiſtica'ted. The iſle of Lemnos is the only country where 'it is to be found.' He gives (20) the figure of ſeveral ſeals that are made uſe of to mark that earth, and adds (21), that all the 'ſeamen of a bark that came 'from Lemnos to Conſtantinople, aſſured him, that it 'was impoſſible to get any, but from the under-baſha 'of the iſland; and that if we had a mind to ſee it, 'ſuch as it is naturally, the only way was to go thi'ther; for the inhabitants are forbidden, upon pain of 'death, to export any. Moreover, they told me, 'that if any of the inhabitants ſhould ſell a ſmall 'cake of it, or was diſcovered to have any in his 'houſe, without the governor's knowledge, he would 'be ſeverely fined; for none is allowed to diſtribute 'it but the under-baſha, who rents the iſland, and 'pays a tribute to the Turk.' He got ſome body to carry him to the place out of which the earth is taken, and ſaw nothing but a ſloping hole (22), that was ſtopped, and he could never get it opened; for they never opened it but once a year, viz. on the ſixth of Auguſt, which they do with great preparations and ceremonies. 'This earth (Belon goes on) (23) ſhews 'how much ceremonies inhance the value of things 'that are vile and inconſiderable in themſelves; for 'though the earth I ſpeak of, has a great virtue, yet 'if it was ſo common that any one might be allowed 'to go and fetch ſome, it would be ſlighted. So that 'if any other vein of earth, like that of Cochino, had 'been found in ſome other part of that iſland, I do 'not queſtion but that the Greeks would ſcruple to uſe 'it, unleſs the Caloiers were preſent at the digging of 'it, and performed the uſual ceremonies; and if they 'had ſome like that of Cochino, they would hardly 'uſe or diſtribute it to others, if it had not been dug 'on the ſixth day of Auguſt; thinking that part of it's

Troy, was mightily ſung by the Poets [E]. Some other reaſons occaſioned the fiction I have mentioned concerning Vulcan; for it was ſaid that in former times flames frequently broke out of the earth in the iſland of Lemnos [F], particularly on the top of mount it's virtue proceeds from the ceremonies that are practiſed upon ſuch an occaſion: nay, they would be apt to believe it has no virtue, unleſs they themſelves ſaw it dug up.' Nothing can be more judicious than theſe obſervations of Belon; and he alledges the two following examples. The Iris grows very plentifully in the mountains of Macedonia, and was to be had ‘ at a cheap rate; yet it was thought, that no body ſhould be allowed to gather it, but ſuch as were chaſt, and that the earth was to be watered three months before with holy water, in order to pacify it. Beſides, ſeveral other ſuperſtitions were to be practiſed, which have been deſcribed by Theophraſtus (24).' He proceeds to the antient ceremonies which concerned the earth of Lemnos. ‘ In the time of Dioſcorides, who wrote before Galen, it was an uſual thing to mix the blood of a he-goat with the earth, in order to make cakes of it. You muſt know, that ſome ceremonies were uſually performed in the killing of goats conſecrated to Venus, who, as the fables have it, produced an ill ſmell, like that of goats, in the women of Lemnos. Whereupon their husbands having expreſſed a diſlike of them, all the women, with a common conſent, killed all the men of the iſland. Which was the reaſon why the prieſteſs ſealed thoſe cakes with a ſeal on which was the figure of a goat, and therefore they were called Sphragida ægos, which ſignifies a goat's ſeal . . . . Galen being deſirous to know the truth of what was ſaid concerning that earth, as he came from Troy, (at that time called Alexandria, a Roman colony) in his way to Rome, paſſed by Lemnos, and inquired whether it was ſtill an uſual thing among the inhabitants to mix the blood of a goat with the earth before it was ſealed. But being in the very place I am ſpeaking of, he found that ſuch a practice was grown out of uſe. He gives an account of what was performed, when he was there, and ſays, that a prieſteſs threw here and there ſome wheat and barley upon the ground, and uſed ſome other ceremonies according to the cuſtom of the country, and then filled a cart with earth, and had it carried with her into the town of Hephæſtia. Galen ſays this and much more which we ſhall not recite for brevity ſake (25).' As for the modern ceremonies, he tells us what had been confirmed to him by above ſix hundred men, who had ſeen them celebrated all their life-time. ‘ The moſt eminent perſons of the iſland, both Turks and Greeks, with their prieſts and caloiers, meet together. The Greeks go to the little chapel called Sotira, and after the celebration of a maſs, according to the way of the Greeks, attended with prayers, they and the Turks go up the hill, which is only two bow ſhot diſtant from the chapel; and get the earth dug up by fifty or threeſcore men, till they have diſcovered the vein, and when they come to it, the Greeks fill ſmall ſacks with it, and give them to the under-baſha or vayvode, and when they have taken out as much of it as there is occaſion for, the ſame diggers immediately cover the earth. The under-baſha ſends the greateſt part of that which has been dug out, to the Grand Seignor at Conſtantinople, and ſells the remaining part to the Merchants . . . . Thoſe, who are preſent at the digging of it, may take a ſmall quantity of it for their own uſe, but dare not ſell it. The Turks are leſs ſcrupulous than the Greeks, and many other nations: they permit the Chriſtian Greeks to ſay their prayers upon the earth ſealed, in their preſence, and they themſelves join with them. And if what I have been told by the oldeſt inhabitants be true, this cuſtom of pitching only upon one day in the year, was introduced amongſt them, when the Venetians were maſters of Lemnos, and of the iſles of the Ægean ſea (26).' Stephen Albacarius, who was ſent into the iſle of Lemnos by Busbequius, on purpoſe to be informed of all theſe things, was more lucky than Belon; for he aſſiſted at the ceremonies. See the relation he gave of it to that illuſtrious embaſſador. See alſo Egeo redivivo, ò ſia chorographia dell' Archipelago of Francis Placentia, profeſſor of Geography at Modena (27).

Pliny (28) is very particular in his account of the Terra Sigillata of Lemnos; but he takes it to be a kind of vermillion, and confounds it with a red chalk which was dug up in the ſame iſland. See Salmaſius (29). You will find ſeveral particulars in the third chapter of the third book of Lewis Gyon's ſecond volume.

[E] The diſagreeable ſtay of Philoctetes in the iſle of Lemnos . . . was ſung by the Poets.] Some ſay that the Grecians ſent him thither, becauſe the prieſts of Vulcan were skilled in curing the bitings of ſerpents. ‘ Neque multo poſt Philoctetа cum paucis ubi curaretur in Lemnum inſulam mittitur, namque in ea ſacri Vulcani antiſtites inhabitare ab accolis dicebantur ſoliti mederi adverſum venena hujuſmodi (30).' He was left there till the ſiege of Troy was over, and he bore very impatiently the diſmal condition he was in.

- - - Non te, Pœantia proles,

Nor thee, great chief, whom Pœas' conſort bore,
Our guilt had left expos'd on Lemnos' ſhore:
Who now, in ſecret caverns hid, do'ſt groan,
Whilſt pitying rocks re-eccho to thy moan.
There do'ſt thou vent on curſ'd Ulyſſes' head
Dire imprecations, which the gods ſucceed.
Behold the wretched Philoctetes there,
Leader with us, and partner of the war,
Whoſe hands Alcides' fatal arrows bear;
Worn with diſeaſe, on birds thoſe ſhafts employ,
Which heav'n has deſtin'd for the fall of Troy.

The tragic Poets diſplayed all their eloquence upon this ſubject. Read theſe words of Cicero (32): ‘ Turpe putandum eſt non dico dolere (nam id quidem eſt interdum neceſſe) ſed ſaxum illud Lemnium clamore Philocteteo funeſtare.

Quod ejulatu, queſtu, gemitu, fremitibus
Reſonando mutum flebiles voces refert.

groans,
Tho' mute itſelf, ſtill utters mournful ſounds.

See alſo Sophocles, in the tragedy intituled Philoctetes.

[F] Flames frequently broke out of the earth in the iſle of Lemnos.] Euſtathius mentions this as the reaſon, why the antients feigned that Vulcan fell into that iſland. Ὅτι πῦρ ἐκεῖ γῆθεν ἀνεδίδοτό ποτε αὐτόματον. Quia olim ibi è terra erumpebat ſpontaneus ignis (33). The Scholiaſt upon Lycophron, quoting Hellanicus's book concerning the foundation of Chios, tells us, that the firſt invention of fire and arms, was owing to a thunder-bolt that fell upon a tree in the iſle of Lemnos. This he ſays, upon ſome words of Lycophron, in which fire is called Lemnian (34). What has been ſaid of mount Moſychlus, is much the ſame with what has been reported of mount Ætna. See Heſychius and Nicander, and the Scholiaſt upon the latter, with the verſes he quotes out of Antimachus (35); and do not forget theſe words of Seneca.

mount Moſychlus. Two maſſacres were committed in that iſland, which gave occaſion to ſome proverbs (f). I have mentioned the firſt of theſe two maſſacres, in the article HYPSIPYLE; and that country had in time been wholly diſpeopled by it, if the Argonauts had not prevented it. The women had killed all the men, and had no mind to receive the firſt comers; for hearing that a ſhip was about to land upon their coaſt, they took up arms, and ran to the ſhore, fully reſolved to oppoſe the invaſion (g); but when they came to know that theſe foreigners were not the Thracians their enemies, and that it was a ſhip of the Argonauts, they ſhewed them all manner of kindneſs, and declared to thoſe brave men, that they might land in their country, provided they would take an oath to lie with them [G]. They accepted the condition, and were ſo

At this rate they might well ſay, that Vulcan had his forges in the iſle of Lemnos. Ἐν τῇ Λήμνῳ τὰ τοῦ Ἡφαίστου ἐργαστήρια. In Lemno Vulcani fabriles Officinæ (37).

[G] Provided they took an oath to lie with them.] This particular being contrary to the decorum, which the Poets uſually obſerve, I ought to produce a proof for it in the very words of my author; and therefore I ſhall ſet down this Greek paſſage: Αἰσχύλος ἐν ὑψιπύλῃ ἐν ὅπλοις φησὶν αὐτὰς ἐπελθούσας χειμαζομένοις τοῖς Ἀργοναύταις, μέχρις οὗ ὅρκον ἔλαβον παρ' αὐτῶν ἀποϐᾶσι μιγήσεσθαι αὐταῖς. Σοφοκλῆς δὲ ἐν Λημνίαις καὶ μάχην ἰσχυρὰν αὐτὰς συνάψαι φησίν (38). The meaning of thoſe words, is, that the women of Lemnos took up arms, and continued to threaten the Argonauts, diſtreſſed by a ſtorm, till they ſwore that they would lie with them. Euripides ſays thoſe women fought with a great deal of bravery. This ſtory will hardly be credited by thoſe, who do not well weigh the circumſtances; but if we conſider on the one hand, that theſe women had deſtroyed all the men of that iſland, and on the other, that they reſolved upon ſuch a maſſacre, becauſe their husbands not being able to endure their ill ſmells, applied themſelves to other women, whom they made their concubines (39), the thing will appear highly probable. Nor can it be a wonder, that theſe women ſhould have been ſo forward in their advances, and that the Argonauts ſhould have diſcovered ſo little tenderneſs and galantry. The warlike equipage, and martial look of theſe women, were no inticing things. The cruel havock they had made of their fathers, husbands, ſons, and brothers, did certainly raiſe an abhorrence for them. Beſides the conſideration of the reaſon, why they had committed ſuch a ſlaughter, muſt needs have been an obſtacle to the love of the Argonauts; for they committed that horrid crime, becauſe their husbands grew out of conceit with them by reaſon of their ſmell, which proceeded from their breath; but ſome ſay it proceeded from their arm-pits, which we call to ſmell rammiſh. Lactantius, upon the fifth book of Statius's Thebaid, follows this opinion, for he calls this ſmell of the Lemniades, hircinum odorem. Dion Chryſoſtom ſays likewiſe to the ſame purpoſe in his thirty third oration. Λημνίων ταῖς γυναιξὶ, τὴν Ἀφροδίτην ὀργισθεῖσαν λέγουσι διαφθεῖραι τὰς μασχάλας. As it is ſaid that Venus being exaſperated againſt the women of Lemnos, infected their arm-pits (40). All things duly conſidered, one may eaſily perceive, that the antients did not tranſgreſs the rules of probability, when they ſuppoſed, that the companions of Jaſon had much ado to promiſe on the ſhoar of Lemnos, what they would have asked and offered in other places. The women who came to a parley with them, deſerved to be told what was ſaid by Catullus againſt one Rufus, who wondered that all the women he met with proved cruel.

 Aut admirari deſine, quur fugiunt (41).

Wonder not, Rufus, that thy fancied charms
Draw not a ſingle woman to thy arms.
By dint of dreſs the bus'neſs is not done;
A lady's favours are not that way won:
Nor, tho' the diamond ſparkles in her eyes,
Will that ſecure the meditated prize.
Wicked report does thy ſucceſs betray;
Beneath thy arm-pits lurks the goat, they ſay:
What woman, by a taſte ſo wretched led,
Wou'd take the ſtinking brute into her bed?
Or kill the ſtench, that greets their noſtrils thence,
Or wonder not, the ladies take offence.

Horace alledged a like reaſon to a woman, who complained that he was unkind to her.

Quid tibi vis mulier nigris digniſſima barris?
 Munera cur mihi, quidve tabellas
Mittis, nec firmo juveni, neque naris obeſæ?
 Namque ſagacius unus odoror,
Polypus, an gravis hirſutis cubet hircus in alis,
 Quàm canis acer, ubi lateat ſus.
Quis ſudor vietis, & quàm malus undique membris
 Creſcit odor, cum &c (42).

Woman, no more .... worthy an Æthiop's bed!
 Preſents, and letters, ſend no more,
 I am not what I was before,
To a whore's arms by youthful vigour led.

My noſe diſcovers latent ſtinks too well;
 No dog finds more ſagaciouſly
 Where haunts the briſly boar, than I
A Polypus, or fœtid arm-pits ſmell, &c.

Some there are who attentively conſidering theſe circumſtances, will judge perhaps, that the rules of probability had been better purſued, if the ſame conduct had been aſcribed to the Argonauts, which Auguſtus obſerved, when Fulvia propoſing to him peace or war (43), he choſe the latter. But it is certain, that probability has been ſufficiently guarded in the epiſode of Lemnos, the choice that the Argonauts made, being the more natural. Their ſhip lay in the road, and had been ſhattered by a tempeſt: they had occaſion for a port in Lemnos, and there was a neceſſity of their landing. This they could not do without fighting; and they had already experienced the valour of theſe women; who had fought couragiouſly, and had not been worſted. They muſt either renew the attack, or retreat, or take an oath that they would grant theſe women all they deſired. The retreat was ſcandalous, whether before the deciſion of a ſecond battle; or after a freſh attempt, as unſucceſsful as the former. What can be hoped from the expedition to Colchos, might all Greece ſay, when our heroes are baffled at the iſle of Lemnos, repulſed by ſilly women, and forced to fly? The tempeſt deſtroyed their hopes of any good ſucceſs in caſe of a ſecond battle. All then that remained, ſo well pleaſed with the performance of it, that it ſeemed as if they had entirely forgot their expedition to Colchos: but Hercules, who kept on board the ſhip, upbraided them with their giving themſelves over to their pleaſures, and obliged them to re-imbark [H]. Some pretend, that they paſſed two or three years a-ſhoar with the women of Lemnos, and that the iſland was by this means re-peopled. The other maſſacre deſtroyed all the children begot by thoſe of Lemnos, on their Athenian concubines [I]. I ſpeak mained, was to the ſubmit to neceſſity of the oath demanded. And perhaps, they thought that the cauſe of the averſion of the Lemnians was over, or in a great meaſure abated; and whatever might happen, they could quickly free themſelves from the ungrateful yoke, ſince nothing in particular was enjoyned them as to time or any other circumſtance. Theſe might be the conſiderations that obliged them to ſwear, and we muſt not believe they went upon equivocations, or mental reſervations, or upon the right which diſpenſes with an oath taken by force, & metu cadente in conſtantem virum. We ſhall ſee in the following remark, that they kept their promiſe very well.

[H] Hercules who kept aboard his ſhip, upbraided them . . . . and obliged them to re-imbark.] There is ſome room to wonder, that being ſo much given to the love of women as he was, he ſhould not divert himſelf, as well as the reſt, in the iſland of Lemnos; for though the Lemnian dames, for reaſons already mentioned, were none of the moſt tempting; yet we ſee no reaſon why he ſhould be nicer than the reſt of his companions. The oath they exacted, ſay you, carried ſome ſuſpicion with it, and ſince they could not think bare promiſes a ſufficient tye, he concluded they had an extreme miſtruſt of their own charms, and that ſomething was in the wind which he could not well gueſs at; in ſhort that it was not worth while to go a-ſhore. But once more, why ſhould he be ſo much more ſqueamiſh than the reſt, he who had as amorous a conſtitution as the beſt of them? I own I am at a loſs what to anſwer to this difficulty, and ſhall therefore take up with the bare matter of fact. Apollonius declares, that ‘ Hercules never would ſet foot in the iſland, but kept conſtantly aboard the ſhip Argos, that he might have a right ‘ to reprove his companions, who ſuffered themſelves ‘ to be drawn away by the careſſes of the Lemnian ‘ women, and never once thought of purſuing their ‘ enterprize; which he did with ſo much the more ‘ freedom, as he himſelf was not liable to the ſame ‘ imputation (44).’ Valerius Flaccus repreſents theſe young heroes ſo intent upon ſolacing the widows of Lemnos, that they think no more of re-embarking. They quite forget themſelves in the iſland; the game pleaſes them, and Hercules is forced to drag them thence by dint of reproach, and to ſpeak very ſeverely to Jaſon, chief of the enterprize.

Urbe ſedent læti Minyæ, viduiſque vacantes
Indulgent thalamis; nimboſque educere luxu;
Diſſimulant; donec reſides Tyrinthius Heros
Non tulit; ipſe rati invigilans atque integer; urbis
Invidiſſe deos tantum maris æquor adortis,
Deſertaſque domos, fraudataque tempore ſegni
Vota patrum; quid & ipſe viris cunctantibus aſſit?
O miſeri, &c. (45).

The joyfull Minyæ in the town remain,
Indulging in the Lemnian widows beds:
And now no more they think to quit the iſle,
Nor hear the winds, that call them to embark.
Their amorous ſtay with grief the hero ſaw,
Himſelf unhurt, and watching to depart:
Then ſtrives their ſleeping virtue to awake,
With thoughts of their own land, deſerted,
And their fond parents vows for their return,
Cheated by their delay; then chides them thus,
O wretched men, &c.

I obſerved in another place (46) that the beſt prize had fallen to Jaſon's ſhare; the queen of the iſland fell in love with him, and gave him the tendereſt marks of her eſteem. The remonſtrance of Hercules awaked theſe heroes: they re-imbarked without ſhewing any regard to the tears of their Lemnian ladies (47). Ovid (48) ſuppoſes that they tarried two whole years with them, but Apollonius informs us that their ſtay was much ſhorter, and this indeed is more likely, for had they paſſed two whole years in theſe delights there had been no need of ſtriking the lyre of Orpheus to draw them away, that powerful lyre, which the ſtones themſelves obeyed (49). Now it was found neceſſary to have recourſe to this machine, elſe they never had been able to tear themſelves from their wives of Lemnos.

Ἄλλῃ δ' ἄλλος ἔμικτο, καὶ ἐκλελάθοντο πορείης,
Εἰ μὴ ἀποτροπίοις ἐνοπαῖς θελξίφρονι θυμῷ
Ἡμετέρῳ θελχθέντες ἔβαν ποτὶ νῆα μέλαιναν,
Εἰρεσίην ποθέοντες, ἐπεμνήσαντο δὲ μόχθου,

Aliæque alius commiſcebatur, & obliti fuiſſent itineris ſui,
Niſi quidem revocatoriis monitis, ſuavique cantu
Noſtro perſuaſi, deſcendiſſent ad navem nigram,
Remigationem deſiderantes, recordatique fuiſſent laboris (50).

Immers'd in pleaſures, they had quite forgot
Th' intended expedition, had not I
By friendly admonition, and the ſound
Of my harmonious lyre, perſuaded them
Again to ſail, and reaſſume their toil.

Let us note an error of Barthius. He ſays, Ovid makes the Argonauts ſtay three years in this iſland, and thus he proves it (51): ‘ Sic enim ipſum penes ‘ Iaſoni ſcribit bona noſtra Hypſipyla.

Tertia meſſis erat, cum tu dare vela coactus,
Impleſti lacrymis talia verba tuis

‘ —— For thus our Hypſipyle writes to Jaſon;

'Twas the third harveſt, when compell'd to ſail,
Weeping, you thus beſpoke me . . . .

If he had taken notice of the foregoing verſe (52), he would have only ſaid two years; and this ſhews us how much it concerns writers not to run too faſt, but patiently examine what goes before, and what follows the places they deſign to allege. Three harveſts do not ſignify three years; they lie almoſt within the compaſs of two, as three ſundays within the compaſs of two weeks.

[I] The other maſſacre was that of all the children begot by thoſe of Lemnos on their Athenian concubines.] To give a juſt comment on this article, I muſt take notice (53), that the Athenians having expelled the Pelaſgi out of Attica, gave them the country which lies at the foot of the mountain Hymeſſus for a habitation (54). This was in recompence of the pains the Pelaſgi had taken in building the walls of the citadel of Athens. They cultivated the country which had been aſſigned them with ſo much induſtry, that of the worſt land thereabouts they ſoon made it the beſt. And this was the reaſon why the Athenians expelled them. The hiſtorian Hecatæus aſſigns no other reaſon for it. But they themſelves would never own this injuſtice; they pretended that their children of both ſexes (55) going to fetch water from the nine fountains, had a horrible affront put upon them by the Pelaſgi, who not content with that inſult, had made preparations for an irruption, and were convicted of it. The Athenians maintained that they might juſtly have put them to death, and that they had ſhew-

I ſpeak of it in one of the remarks. This iſland was very much infeſted with graſhoppers, and for that reaſon each inhabitant was taxed to kill a certain number of them, and they worſhipped the birds which deſtroyed them [K]. Great reſpect was paid here to Bacchus, and to Diana, but none to Venus [L], who, on her part, had never ſhewed

ed a great deal of clemency in having only expelled them. The Pelaſgi withdrew into ſeveral countries, and particularly into the iſland of Lemnos. They watched an opportunity to revenge themſelves; and as they knew the time of the Athenian feſtivals, they laid an ambuſh for the women of Athens, who were celebrating the feaſt of Diana at Brauron, carried off a great number of them, and afterwards made them their concubines. They had a great many children by them whom they brought up in the language and manners of Athens. Theſe children grew proud, and diſdained to keep company with thoſe that were born of Lemnian mothers; and if any of them happened to quarrel with another child who was a Pelaſgian by father and mother, they went in a body to his aſſiſtance, and affected a ſuperiority in every kind of reſpect. The Pelaſgi obſerving this, concluded that ſuch baſtards who knew from the very cradle how to form leagues againſt the legitimate children, and pretended to maſter them, might prove very dangerous one day. They therefore ſlew them all; and ſome time after they ſlew their Athenian concubines too. This tranſaction was followed by a notable ſterility, which extended equally to their wives, and to their fields, and to their flocks. They applied themſelves for relief to the oracle: Apollo ordered them to make all the ſatisfaction to the Athenians that they ſhould demand. They went to Athens and declared their readineſs and good intention; but when a country was demanded of them reſembling a table which was laid in the Prytaneum, and ſpread with all manner of good things they anſwered, we will comply, when a ſhip ſhall ſail in twenty four hours from your conntry to ours, by a north-wind. They thought they had promiſed nothing conſidering the ſituation of Athens with reſpect to Lemnos. Miltiades ſeveral years after ſeized on the Thracian Cherſonneſus, from whence he ſet ſail to Lemnos, and declared to the inhabitants that the condition of their promiſe was accompliſhed, and conſequently they were obliged to leave the country. The Hepheſtians obeyed, but the Myrinians reſiſted, alledging that the Cherſonneſus was not Attica. Miltiades beſieged them, and forced them to ſurrender. This is the account of Herodotus (56). His narrative is not altogether like that of Cornelius Nepos, with reſpect to the conqueſt of the iſle of Lemnos; for the latter (57) ſuppoſes that Miltiades before he ſubdued the Cherſonneſus, adreſſed himſelf to the Lemnians, ſummoning them to retreat voluntarily elſewhere, and that they made him the anſwer above mentioned; that having conquered the Cherſonneſus, he returned to Lemnos, and demanded the performance of the agreement, and that the Lemnians not daring to reſiſt him, yielded up the iſland. Cornelius Nepos calls them Carians, and not Pelaſgi. It appears from ſeveral places of Thucydides that the inhabitants of Lemnos, wereon the Athenian ſide, in the Peloponneſian war. They had then the ſame language and the ſame laws as the Athenians (58).

Note, that Herodotus obſerves that a Lemnian action among the Greeks, imported a crying ſin, on account of the maſſacre of the Athenian concubines, &c. and the barbarouſneſs with which the Lemnian women diſpatched their husbands, without ſparing even king Thoas. This is the true ſenſe of this hiſtorian's words, and it is without reaſon that a learned critic has found faults in them (59). Verba Herodoti, ubi de Thoante ſermo eſt, omnino mendoſa ſunt. Ενταῦθα ἔδοξέ σφισι κτείνειν τοὺς παῖδας τοὺς ἐκ τῶν Ἀττικεῶν γυναικῶν. Ἀπὸ τούτου δὲ τοῦ ἔργου καὶ τοῦ προτέρου τούτου τὸ ἐργάσαντο αἱ γυναῖκες, τοὺς ἅμα Θόαντι ἄνδρας σφετέρους ἀποκτείνασαι, νενόμισαι ἀνὰ τὴν Ἑλλάδα τὰ σχέτλια ἔργα μάντα Λήμνια καλέεσθαι (60). Nemo enim de Thoante hoc tradidit. Igitur duæ voces, ἅμα Θόαντι, aut gloſſemata ſunt, aut corrupta eſt prior, & legendum, παρὰ Θόαντος. Barthius does not explain his thought clearly: for we know not what he means by theſe words, Nemo de Thoante hoc tradidit. Does he mean that no body has ſaid that the Lemnian women, favoured or aſſiſted by Thoas, rid themſelves of their husbands? But this is not Herodotus's meaning. Does he mean that all authors agree that Thoas was not killed, and that therefore there is a fault in this paſſage of Herodotus, if it is pretended that he is here included in the number of the Lemnians killed by the women? But in this caſe he is miſtaken; ſince there are authors who ſay that the women underſtanding that Hypſipyle had not killed her Father Thoas, they made ſo diligent ſearch that they found him and killed him (61).

Eraſmus has committed ſome faults in abridging Herodotus's narration: he ſays (62) in the firſt place, that the Lemnians carryed off the Athenian women during the celebration of Minerva's feaſt at Brauron. He ſhould have ſaid Diana inſtead of Minerva. II. He adds, that the Athenian concubines would not ſuffer their ſons to marry the legitimate daughters of the Lemnians; Herodotus does not ſay ſo, but ſuppoſes theſe baſtards were killed before they were marriageable. Eraſmus's third fault is his affirming that after this maſſacre the Lemnians were afflicted with barrenneſs, peſtilence, and many other evils. Herodotus mentions only the barrenneſs of the earth, and of the women (63). IV. Eraſmus moſt falſly imputes to him the ſaying that theſe evils were partly the cauſe of the proverb Lemnia Mala. V. And that the other cauſe of it's origine, was, that the Lemnian women not able to bear the ſtench of their husbands, killed them all by the aſſiſtance of Thoas. It is true Herodotus occaſionally touches as one of the reaſons of the proverb, the ſlaughter theſe women made; but he does not ſay that their husbands ſtunk, and he affirms that Thoas was no more ſpared than the reſt. Benedictus in his Paraphraſe of Pindar, is groſly miſtaken, for inſtead of ſaying that the Lemnians were diſguſted at the ill ſmells of their wives, he affirms the women were incommoded with the ill ſmell of their husbands (64). This fault has not been corrected in the Oxford edition of Pindar 1698. The ſcholiaſt from whom Benedictus had taken a paſſage (65) not long before might have preſerved him from falling into Eraſmus's ſnare, Mr Moreri falls into it headlong, tho' he has not copied all the faults of this learned man. He has only catched at a very few facts which he met with in his Adages. The Pelaſgi, ſays he (66), forced away the women of Athens, and had children by them, whom they afterwards killed, obſerving they had inclinations contrary to theirs. And the women killed their husbands by the aſſiſtance of Thoas. Every one ſees that this is aſſigning the reaſon, in too indefinite and unlikely a manner, which induced the Lemnians to kill their baſtards. And plainly telling us that the action of theſe women ſucceeded the maſſacre of theſe baſtards; as extravagant a falſity as the pretended aſſiſtance of Thoas.

[L] Great reſpect was paid here to Bacchus and Diana, but none to Venus.] Thoas king of Lemnos was the ſon of Bacchus and Ariadne (70); no wonder any kindneſs to this country: A very great affront had been put upon her in this iſland of Lemnos; for here it was that Vulcan expoſed her linked with the god Mars (b); and here he gave all the gods the pleaſure of ſeeing her ſurprized in the fact. Homer is of another opinion; he lays the ſcene of this adventure in heaven (i). The Perſians conquered this iſland in the reign of Darius the ſon of Hyſtaſpes, and placed a governor over it, who treated the people inhumanly (k). Miltiades ſubdued it a long time after (l). Herodotus tells a ſtory on this occaſion, which is not eaſily reconciled with that of Plutarch [M]. Ubbo Emmius aſſures us, that the Amazons reigned in that iſland before the deſcendants of the Argonauts inhabited it (m). I ſhould be glad to know in what good author he had met with this. I find in Vitruvius, that the Romans beſtowed the revenues of it on the Athenians (n). If what Strabo wrote concerning it, had been preſerved to us, I do not doubt but we ſhould have found in him ſeveral curious particulars; but that part of this excellent Geographer's book, is loſt to us, and yet Mr Moreri (o) cites him as an author, who ſpeaks of it in a particular manner. Lemnos is at this day called Stalimene. The Turks beſieged it in the year 1475, and were obliged to raiſe the ſiege. It was on this occaſion, that a maid, called Marulla, manifeſted then that the worſhip of Bacchus ſhould be well eſtabliſhed in this iſland. It was in a temple of this god that Hypſipyle concealed her father in the night of the maſſacre (71). Strabo informs us that the myſteries of Samothrace, and thoſe of Lemnos, had a pretty great conformity with the ceremonies the Bacchantes obſerved (72). For the reſt, this iſland was ſo fruitful in wine, that this alone might make it conſidered as a country conſecrated to that god. Quintus Calaber calls it ἀμπελόεσσαν, vitibus abundantem (73). - - - fruitful in vines. Our travellers, ſay it ſtill deſerves this epithet (74). As for the worſhip of Diana I ſhall content myſelf with pointing out the place where Plutarch tells us, that the Lemnians, being driven out of their iſland, carried about with them the image of Diana, which they had taken at Brauron (75). I ſhall obſerve alſo, that they ſtamped the figure of this goddeſs upon their Terra ſigillata. See Salmaſius, in his exercitationes Plinianæ in Solinum, pag. 1156. All the authors who ſpeak of the rage of the Lemnian women againſt their husbands, obſerve, that the bad ſmell, which rendered them ſo inſufferable, was an effect of Venus's anger, who ſaw herſelf neglected and deſpiſed in this iſland. See Apollodorus (76), Hyginus (77), Apollonius's Scholiaſt (78), &c. We have ſtill an error to cenſure in Barthius. He believes, that, in after-times, the Lemnians conſecrated an image of Venus, which was one of the moſt exquiſite ſtatues of antiquity. 'Venerem 'etiam Lemniam, ſays he (79), inter pulcherrima ſimulacra cultam poſtea diſcimus ex Luciani Imaginibus. Item Lemniam Minervam, à Lemniis, dedicatam, quod omnium fuerit Phidiæ operum elaboratiſſimum, Pauſaniæ Atticis. —— We learn from Lucian's Images, that the Lemnian Venus was afterwards 'worſhipped among the moſt beautiful images: likewiſe from Pauſanias's Attics, that the Lemnians 'worſhipped a Lemnian Minerva, the moſt elaborate of 'all Phidias's performances.' He has reaſon to ſay, that the Minerva which was Phidias's maſter-piece, was dedicated by the Lemnians. Pauſanias ſays, that for that reaſon ſhe had the ſirname Lemnian. See the 28th chapter of his firſt book; but Barthius is wrong, in diſtinguiſhing it from the image which Lucian mentions, and pretending that Lucian has ſpoken of a Lemnian Venus. He had indeed mentioned a Minerva ſo named. This cannot be diſputed, if we obſerve the remark he has made, that this was the moſt excellent piece of Phidias, and that to which he put his name (80).

[M] Herodotus tells a ſtory on this occaſion, which is not eaſily reconciled with Plutarch.] This laſt author ſays, that the Tyrrhenians, having ſeized the iſles of Lemnos and Imbros, ſtole away the Athenian women from Brauron, and had children by them. This race was expelled theſe iſlands by the Athenians, who looked upon them as half barbarous. This race ſet ſail towards Pelopenneſus, and landing at Tenarus, did good ſervices to the Lacedæmonians in the war with the Heilotes, and obtained in recompence the privileges of citizens, and the liberty of marrying into the families of Lacedæmon, but not the privilege of bearing public offices, or being admitted into councils. This excluſion made theſe people ſuſpected of a deſign to embroil the ſtate; and upon this their perſons were ſecured, and they were kept in cloſe confinement, till proofs were found out to convict them of the conſpiracy. Their wives obtaining leave to viſit them, changed habits with the men, by which means they got away, and left them in their ſtead. Having ſeized mount Taigetus, they joined with the Heilotes, and became ſo formidable to Lacedæmon, that it was thought proper to capitulate with them. Their wives were reſtored; and they had money and ſhips given them, and a promiſe of owning them as relations, and as a colony of Sparta, wherever they ſhould ſettle themſelves. They accepted the conditions, and ſome went and ſettled at Melos, others at Crete. The latter, after ſeveral battles, made themſelves maſters of Lyctus, and ſome other towns, and hence the inhabitants of Lyctus pretended, that by the mother's ſide they were related to the Athenians, and looked on themſelves as a colony of Lacedæmon (81). This is Plutarch's account. Thoſe whom he calls Tyrrhenians, and a little after Pelaſgi, are the very ſame whom Herodotus calls Pelaſgi. Theſe two names belong to the ſame people (82), and it muſt not be imagined, that the authors who have ſaid that the iſle of Lemnos was inhabited by the Tyrrhenians (83), differ from thoſe who ſay it was poſſeſſed by the Pelaſgi; ſo far then there is no difference between Herodotus and Plutarch: but when the latter affirms, that the poſterity of the Athenian women carried off from Brauron by the Tyrrhenians, who had ſettled in the iſles of Lemnos and Imbros, were expelled thoſe iſles by the Athenians, he contradicts Herodotus, who pretends, that the Lemnians themſelves deſtroyed all the children begot by them upon the Athenian women. Theſe two hiſtorians differ widely in point of time. The one (84) will have Miltiades expel the Lemnians, the other makes that expulſion much more antient, at leaſt confounds what he ought to diſtinguiſh. The hiſtory of theſe women, who procured the liberty of their husbands, relates to a time, in Herodotus, much earlier than Miltiades, and has not the circumſtances which are mentioned by Plutarch.

This is Herodotus's account (85). The inhabitants of Lemnos, who were deſcended from the Argonauts, were expelled this iſland by the Pelaſgi, who forced away the Athenian women from Brauron. They retired to the country of the Lacedæmonians, and informed them, that they were the poſterity of the Argonauts, and that being driven out of their country, they returned to their anceſtors, and begged leave to live among them. The Lacedæmonians remembering that Caſtor and Pollux had been in Jaſon's expedition, gave theſe fugitives a kind reception, allowed them lands, and incorporated them into their tribes. Theſe refugees contracted new marriages, having firſt parted with the wives they had brought from the iſle of Lemnos, to ſome of their neighbours. It was not long before they grew proud, would domineer, and became guilty of every ill action. They were impriſoned, and their death reſolved on, but the wives ſaved them by changing habits, as I mentioned before. The deſign was ſtill continued, of putting them to death, but Theras, who was preparing to found a colony, interceeded for them, and promiſed to take them away with him, and prevent any further danger. His requeſt was granted. Moſt of them diſperſed themſelves, the reſt followed Theras, who LENTULUS (Scipio) was a Neapolitan who forſook the Romiſh church and embraced the Reformed religion in the XVIth century. He was miniſter of Chiavenne, in the country of the Griſons, and he employed his pen in the defence of an edict which the Griſon leagues made in 1570, againſt the ſectaries (a) [A]. They failed not to attack this edict, with the arguments for toleration, which the Reformed themſelves alledged againſt the Roman Catholics, in the perſecuting countries: But our Lentulus anſwered theſe reaſons. He is the author of an Italian grammar, printed at Geneva in 1568 (b).

I add, that he preached ſometimes at Ferrara, before the ducheſs Renata of France (c); that he was afterward miniſter of the church of St John, in the vale of Luzerne (d); that he anſwered a book of the Jeſuit Poſſevin, who had been ſent to that place on the foot of a converter, in the year 1560 [B]; that he found himſelf greatly expoſed to the caprice

[A] He employed his pen in defence of an edict . . . . . . againſt the ſectaries.] The epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque mentions this work of Lentulus, as a piece that was never printed. Ejuſdem liber de jure Magiſtratuum in puniendis hereticis, quo Sylvii cujuſdam Epiſtolam hæreticis patrocinantem refutat nondum editus. This you will find in the 744th page of that epitome, Zurich edition, 1583. At laſt the book was printed at Geneva, by John le Preux, in 1592, in 8vo. This is the title: Reſponſio orthodoxa pro edicto Illuſtriſſimorum D. D. trium fœderum Rhetiæ, adverſus hæreticos, & alios Eccleſiarum Rheticarum perturbatores promulgato; in qua de Magiſtratûs authoritate & officio in coercendis hæreticis, ex verbo Dei diſputatur. I know ſome perſons, who, having read in the Catalogue of the Bodleian Library, that Lentulus's apology for the edict of the Griſon leagues, was printed in 1502, over-ſtrained their imagination, to find what ſect this could be, which gave occaſion to that edict among the Griſons, in the beginning of the XVIth Century. They turned over many books, and even conſulted thoſe who had libraries, and who exhauſted themſelves in conjectures. At laſt, the true date of the edition was diſcovered, and a new inſtance given of the confuſions, into which the faults of the preſs caſt authors, on thouſands of occaſions. Mr Voëtius obſerves, that the Sectaries proſcribed by the edict of the Griſon leagues, were Arians, or ſomething worſe; and that Lentulus gave the particulars of their blaſphemies in his preface (1). He obſerves alſo (2), that Lentulus's orthodox anſwer, pro edicto, &c. confuted the complaints publiſhed by an anonymous author, in 1570, againſt the edict of the Griſons, and that it came out in 1573. This is very different from what is found in Geſner's epitome.

[B] He anſwered a book of the Jeſuit Poſſevin, who had been ſent to that place on the foot of a converter, in the year 1560.] Poſſevin had entered himſelf in the ſociety of the Jeſuits but a few months before, being then twenty ſix years of age (3). Therefore I am not ſurprized, that the Hiſtorian, who furniſhes me with what I am going to ſay, did not give him that title. The Pope having ſignified to the duke of Savoy, that it was neceſſary to uſe force, in order to convert the Heretics of the vallies of Piedmont, it was reſolved in his highneſs's council, to comply with the Pope's deſire: ' But that, to keep up ſome ſhew of ' proceeding regularly, ſome perſon, qualified to convince the accuſed of their errors, ſhould be once ' more ſent into the vallies, and according to the ſucceſs of this, to take the neceſſary meaſures: and for ' this buſineſs they made choice of Anthony Pouſſevin, ' commander of St Anthony de Foſſano (4), a man of ' great reputation among them, but who made it appear by his actions, he was not the man they took ' him for. His highneſs gave him his letters-patents, ' of the ſeventh of July, which declared him ſent ' to eſtabliſh preachers of Chriſtian doctrine in his dominions, and particularly in his vallies of Piedmont, ' with the neceſſary proviſions for their maintenance. ' Commanding, for this end, all, in eccleſiaſtical, or ſecular, office, ſyndics, communities, and, in general, all ' his ſubjects, to afford him all the neceſſary aſſiſtance ' for the execution of his ſaid commiſſion (5). This ' man, leaving Nice, where his highneſs was, went ' directly to Cavour . . . . . and having cauſed the ' people to be aſſembled in the principal church of ' the town, he mounted the pulpit, read for his text ' his letters of commiſſion, explained them by enlarging and exaggerating what he pretended he was ' going to do in the neighbouring vallies, to convince ' and confound the miniſters, to drive them away, to ' eſtabliſh in their room thoſe that ſhould preach up ' the Pope, to prove that the maſs was good, to make ' all the inhabitants of thoſe vallies go to it, and to ' denounce extermination concluded againſt all thoſe, ' who would not obey his orders (6).' He went and did the ſame thing at Bubiano, in the valley of Luſerne, and at Luſerne, ' the capital of the valley ' . . . . . and ordered the leaders of the Reformed ' to attend him the twenty ſixth of July.' He came to the aſſembly, ' aſſiſted by a great number of the ' nobility, magiſtrates, and other principal men of his ' religion, where he laid before them the reaſons of ' his coming, and ordered the letters of his commiſſion to be read: afterwards he ordered to be read ' the letters and petitions, which the Reformed had ' written to his highneſs and his council, which he ' had brought back with him, and demanded of them, ' Whether they owned the ſending ſuch writings, and ' whether they would obſerve what they had promiſed ' in them? They anſwered, Yes (7).' He alledged ſome reaſons to prove the Maſs: the miniſters having propoſed to him their difficulties, ' he fell into exclamations, caprice and perſecution of Caſtrocaro, who commanded in the vallies of Piedmont; that this obliged him to look out for another reſidence in 1565, and that he retired to Chiavenna, in the country of the Griſons, where he continued the exerciſe of his miniſtry to his death (e). His Apology for the Edict, which the Griſons had publiſhed againſt the Heretics, ought not to ſurprize any one, on pretence that he had been formerly perſecuted himſelf; for nothing is more common than to ſee perſons, who have fled for their religion, ringing the alarm againſt the ſects.

'mations, and abuſive language, with unbounded rage; at which thoſe who attended him appeared very much grieved and aſhamed, ſeeing that one of ſuch great reputation among them, could not produce any one reaſon in defence of their religion, nor any thing to convince the other party of error, and beſides had ſhewed himſelf ſo immoderate and abuſive. As for him, coming a little to himſelf, he ſaid, that he was not come to diſpute with the miniſters, but to drive them away, and eſtabliſh other preachers in their room, according to his commiſſion; and without hearing, or anſwering any thing elſe, he ordered M. Anthony Malingre, Notary of Bagnol, to draw up, in form, his command to the ſyndics and communities, and in their perſons to all the other inhabitants of the ſaid places reſpectively, to drive all the Lutheran miniſters away, who preached there, without any more hearing them in public, or private, and beſides to receive and hear the preachers, whom he ſhould ſettle among them, as ſoon as the miniſters ſhould be gone, and to provide them a fit habitation and maintenance, under the penalties contained in his highneſs's edicts, ordering them to report to him the reſult of their deliberation in three days (8).' The ſyndics gave in their anſwer to him, to which he replied, 'the fifth of Auguſt, by a long letter, telling them, That his commiſſion tacitly implied authority to drive away the paſtors, becauſe he was commanded to eſtabliſh other preachers, which he could not do, whilſt the miniſters continued there, who would always be contradicting what his preachers ſaid and did. His letter was enlarged with ſtrong exhortations to the Reformed to return to the church of Rome, with many promiſes to thoſe who did it voluntarily, and without ſtaying till they were compelled to it. He joined to this letter another writing, by which he endeavoured partly to repair the breach he had made in his reputation, in the aſſembly of the twenty ſixth of July: for he had collected ſome few paſſages of holy ſcripture, and a few more of the doctors of the antient church, in proof of ſome parts of the maſs, and alſo of the practice of celibacy among the clergy: but Scipio Lentulus, a Neopolitan, paſtor of the church of St John, wrote a learned anſwer to him, which was ſoon after printed: in which he ſhews Poſſevin's ignorance in the arguments he produced, and how widely the new Romiſh church, in ſuch things, erred from the right way (9).'

'The moſt reverend Poſſevin (the very greateſt men of his party adorn him with this title) ſeeing that he could not repair the breaches made in his reputation, neither by his writings, nor his words, addreſſing himſelf to thoſe, who knew how to anſwer him, he entirely left them, and went and diſcharged his indignation on the poor faithful, ſcattered and diſperſed among the Papiſts at the very bottom of the vallies, and eſpecially at Campillon and Fenil. He impriſoned their perſons, and plundered the effects of the ſaid Reformed. . . . The greateſt part of them fled: but thoſe, who ſuffered themſelves to be taken, were ill uſed. Some were ſo weak as to abjure the Proteſtant religion in the church of Campillon, on the fifth of Auguſt, in preſence of all the aforeſaid, who cauſed acts to be drawn up of it with great ſolemnity: then they ſet them free, and reſtored to them their plundered effects, of whom the better part returned afterwards to the right way (10). . . . . The month of Auguſt was almoſt wholly taken up in ſuch extortions . . . . Pouſſevin returned to the duke's court, the beginning of September, and, by his injurious and calumnious reports, cauſed a reſolution to be taken, to proceed againſt the Reformed of the vallies, by force of arms (11).'

LEO I, ſirnamed the Great, took poſſeſſion of the papacy, the tenth of May, 440. He was a man of great abilities and courage, a great maſter of Eloquence, and well ſkilled in affairs. Nor did he want opportunities of diſcovering his great talents: he found exerciſe enough for them, from the Hereſies he had to engage, and the ravages committed in the Roman empire. His zeal againſt the Manicheans, the Priſcillianiſts, Pelagians, Neſtorians, and Eutychians, was wonderfully ſeconded by the penal laws of the emperors, executed with great ſeverity. He did not diſapprove the extending them, even to the effuſion of blood [A]. His deputation to Attila, produced very good effect [B]: But the miracle which is added to it, is a meer fable

[A] He did not diſapprove the extending them even to the effuſion of blood.] You will quickly have the proof of this in a paſſage of Mr Maimbourg. It relates to the capital puniſhment inflicted on Priſcillian, and ſeveral of his followers, and the exile to which many others were condemned, which Sulpitius Severus highly diſapproved, as a thing of moſt pernicious example. 'Becauſe he believed nothing like it had been ſeen before. As to the point of baniſhment, no body can deny but he is in the wrong. For all the world knows that Conſtantine baniſhed the biſhops who refuſed to ſubſcribe the condemnation of Arius; that he puniſhed alſo with exile, as did the other emperors after him. As to the penalty of death, it is true it had not hitherto been inflicted on Heretics; not but this ſeverity may be very juſtly exerciſed againſt them, as in aftertimes it frequently has. And not to ſpeak of thoſe who have proved in their writings, that it was not only lawful, but very expedient, to treat Heretics after this manner, we need only ſee what St Leo has written upon it, when giving the neceſſary orders (as we ſhall cite him by and by) to act in Spain againſt the hereſy of Priſcillian, he praiſes Maximus for an action of this kind, and ſays *, That the rigour and ſeverity of his juſtice againſt that Hereſiarch, and his diſciples, whom this prince put to death, was a great aſſiſtance to the clemency of the church. For though the church contents itſelf with that lenity of judgment, which the biſhops exerciſe according to the canons, againſt obſtinate Heretics, and admits of no bloody executions, it is however much aided and ſupported by the ſevere conſtitutions of the emperors, ſince the fear of ſo rigorous a puniſhment ſometimes makes Heretics have recourſe to the ſpiritual remedy, to cure the mortal diſeaſe of their hereſy, by a ſincere converſion (1).'

[B] His deputation to Attila, produced a very good effect.] As this is one of the fineſt paſſages in the life of this Pope, it deſerves to be a little enlarged on in this place. Attila had made himſelf maſter of Aquileia, and almoſt reduced it to aſhes: He had ravaged all upon his march from Aquileia to Pavia and Milan. He had made himſelf maſter of theſe two great cities, and had treated them as he had the reſt, laying them both in rubbiſh . . . . . (2). So many diſmal meſſages arriving upon the back of one another at Rome, cauſed a great conſternation there (3). The ſenate was aſſembled to deliberate whether the emperor ſhould quit Italy, as Ætius adviſed him: they could not reſolve what courſe to take. 'To defend Rome, in the condition it was, againſt that innumerable multitude of Barbarians, fable [C]. His eloquence had not the ſame ſucceſs with king Giſeric, nor yet was it

‘ ans, ſeemed utterly impoſſible, to forſake it, and fly, and ſeek a ſanctuary ſomewhere elſe, was the laſt diſgrace to an emperor, who ought rather to die honourably, than live after ſo ſhameful a piece of cowardice. What then muſt be done? A medium was found between theſe two extreams, which was, to ſend an honourable embaſſy to Attila, to obtain peace of him, upon any tolerable conditions. This being reſolved on, it was thought that no one could better acquit himſelf of that employment, than the holy Pope Leo, to whom the ſtrength of his parts, his conſummate prudence, his addreſs, virtue, learning, and eloquence, joined with the dignity of ſovereign Pontiff, which rendered him venerable to all the world, had acquired the reputation of being univerſally acknowledged the greateſt man of his time. The emperor therefore conjured him to accept this employment, which he moſt willingly did to ſave the capital city of the empire, and the holy ſee, from the invaſion of the Barbarians. To honour the embaſſy, and the Pope, at the head of it, he had for his aſſiſtants two of the greateſt men of the empire, Avienus and Trigetius, one of which had been conſul, and the other prefect of Rome. Some ſenators were added to them, among whom was the father of Caſſiodorus, who, carried away by a filial affection in one of his epiſtles †, where he ſpeaks like an Orator, in making the encomium of his father, aſcribes to him all the honour, and effect of this important embaſſy. But in his chronicle, where he ſpeaks like an Hiſtorian, he unſays it again, and gives the whole glory to St Leo, as all other authors before him do (4).’ Attila gave a favourable reception to this embaſſy (5), ‘ in the neighbourhood of Mantua, not far from the place where the river Mincio diſcharges itſelf into the Po (6): and as ſavage as this prince was, he paid all kind of honours to the Pope. He favourably heard his ſpeech, which he ordered to be interpreted, and found it ſo fine and judicious, ſo forcible and moving; that this Attila, this ſcourge of God, this enemy of mankind, whoſe ſight alone ſtruck a terror into the moſt undaunted, and his very name made all the earth to tremble, was immediately ſoftened; of a ravening wolf, as he was before, he became gentle as a lamb, and immediately granted him the peace he deſired: and that without exacting any grievous conditions, promiſing inviolably to obſerve it on his part; after which turning his courſe, he marched back beyond the Danube, from whence he returned no more (7).’

[C] The miracle whith is added to it, is a meer fable.] If I alledged the authority of a Proteſtant writer, I ſhould ſtartle the tender minds of the Romiſh communion; wherefore I chooſe to cite a man who lived a long time among the Jeſuits, and is inclined to nothing leſs than favouring the Non-Catholics. His words are theſe (8).

‘ I know what is commonly ſaid to make the thing more wonderful, that Attila's captains aſking him the reaſon of his having honoured this Pope ſo far as to obey him in all his commands, this prince anſwered them trembling, that all the time Leo was ſpeaking, he ſaw a venerable old man ſtand by his ſide, who holding a naked ſword in his hand, threatened to kill him, unleſs he granted all that the Pope deſired. But I am obliged to ſay that one may diſpenſe with the believing any thing of it without being thought incredulous; indeed this viſion is not to be found in the Breviary of Paris, ſince our learned archbiſhop Francis de Harlay has reſtored it to it's genuine ſtate; having taken great care to retrench all that was apocryphal, or very uncertain in it; and to inſert for the leſſons, the fineſt pieces of the fathers, ſuch as are beſt ſuited to the ſubject, and to the feaſt which is celebrated. I ſhall boldly ſay then, that we may, without ſcruple, be of their opinion who do not give credit to this apparition: for antient authors, as Jornandes, Theophanes, Suidas, count Marcellinus, Caſſiodorus, Anaſtaſius, and others who have written of this embaſſy of St Leo, not to mention St Proſper who was then at Rome, and has related all the circumſtances of it, and St Leo himſelf who mentions it in one of his ſermons ⸸, ſay nothing of this viſion, which they would not have ſuppreſſed if it had been true. Very far from it; inſtead of attributing this condeſcenſion of Attila to the fear he had of this apparition, and this menacing ſword, they unanimouſly agree that it was an effect of the majeſtic preſence, and perſuaſive eloquence of St Leo, which ſoftened and ſubdued the heart of this Barbarian; and the holy Pope, who was far from glorying in it, declares it ought to be aſcribed, not to the influence of the ſtars, as ſome of the prophane would have it, but to the infinite mercy of God alone ‡ who ſuffered himſelf to be intreated by the interceſſion of his ſaints, and thereupon vouchſafed to ſoften and change the hearts of the Barbarians. Here is nothing in all this that intimates this viſion. That which has made it current of late, is it's being found in the hiſtory called Miſcella, which is falſely aſcribed to Paul the Deacon. But beſide that the antient editions of this compiler have it not, which ſhews it was added at pleaſure, without proof, or authority; beſide that this hiſtory contains many other palpable falſities, the apparition is mentioned in it only upon an uncertain report, in theſe terms Ferunt poſt diſceſſum Pontificis interrogatum eſſe Attilam à ſuis, &c. It is ſaid that after the departure of the Pope, Attila being aſked by his attendents, &c. I have reaſon therefore to ſay that we are at liberty to reject this viſion, and that we ought not to ſeek a further miracle in it, than what St Leo himſelf performed, in ſoftening and changing by his eloquence the heart of the moſt fierce and moſt formidable of all men; to ſuch a degree, that he obtained from him, on the ſpot, and without any conditions, a peace, and a promiſe to depart out of Italy. What is moſt remarkable herein, is, that this great man, who turned the hearts of theſe barbarous Infidels, with ſo much eaſe, ſhould be unable to do as much by his letters, with reſpect to Heretics.’ Theſe laſt words afford the hiſtorian a happy tranſition.

[D] His eloquence had not the ſame ſucceſs with king Giſeric, nor yet was it wholly fruitleſs.] The empreſs Eudoxia, Valentinian's widow, had been obliged to marry Maximus, who uſurped the throne after having cauſed Valentinian to be aſſaſſinated. This Maximus had the impudence to tell Eudoxia, that the paſſion he had to enjoy her, was the only motive which induced him to deſtroy the emperor. Eudoxia, enraged at ſo villanous a declaration . . . . . ſent ſecretly one of her chief confidents to Carthage, to Giſeric king of the Vandals, who had made himſelf maſter of Africa, conjuring him by all the powerfulleſt motives ſhe could ſuggeſt, eſpecially by the eaſineſs of the enterprize, all being defenſeleſs at Rome as in full peace, to come with all expedition, and revenge the death of Valentinian, his ally, and deliver her from her oppreſſion under the tyranny of the moſt cruel, and villanous man alive (9). This Barbarian king, who had then in the port of Carthage a good naval force, failed not to lay hold of the opportunity; he embarked his forces, and landed in Italy without the leaſt oppoſition; he advanced towards Rome, and had the pleaſure, without ever drawing his ſword, to ſee the city ſurrender at diſcretion, all the gates being thrown open to him (10). ‘ Then it was that St Leo ſeeing his poor flock expoſed to the fury of theſe wild beaſts, like the good ſhepherd who lays down his life for his ſheep, went forth and addreſſed himſelf to this Vandal and Arian king, whom he knew to be the mortal enemy of the Catholics, and eſpecially of the biſhops, on whom he had diſcharged all his fury in Africa, treating them with a barbarous cruelty, in a much more inhuman manner than any others. Nevertheleſs this cruel man, who was juſt ready to enter Rome, reſolved to deſtroy all with fire and ſword, ſtopped ſhort, at the ſight of this admirable Pontiff: and as if that auguſt and ſaint-like majeſty which ſhone in his face, had changed, all at once, the tyger's heart within him, into that of a reaſonable man, he paid him all the honour that was owing to the head of the church. He patiently heard all he had to ſay; and if his eloquence did not then work the ſame miracle that it wrought before upon Attila, in cauſing him to return from whence he came, yet it performed three others of a very remarkable nature. For it was ſo perſuaſive as to obtain a promiſe, that neither the inhabitants ſhould be put to the ſword, their houſes fired, nor the three principal churches prophaned, to wit the Conſtantian, that of St Peter it wholly fruitleſs [D]. They who ſay he cut off his own hand [E], on having felt ſome irregular motions whilſt a woman kiſſed it, and add that he recovered it by the ardency of his prayers, vent two falſities. The beſt edition of his works is that of Father Queſnel (a). Some of the books aſcribed to him in that edition, are attributed by other authors to St Proſper [F]. A learned diſpute has been ſtarted upon this matter. A famous miniſter has a little embaraſſed himſelf by placing the Epocha of Antichriſt in the pontificate of St Leo [G]. This Pope died in 461.

in the Vatican, and that of St Paul without the walls. He kept his word: and having given Rome to be plundered by his ſoldiers for fourteen days together, he returned in his ſhips laden with ſpoils, and with rich priſoners, to be ſet to ranſom; among whom was the empreſs Eudoxia, and the princeſſes Eudocia and Plæcidia, her two daughters, whom he treated perfectly like a generous man.’

[E] Some ſay that he cut off his own hand,] It is ſaid that a devout and handſome woman, was, according to cuſtom, admitted on Eaſter-day to kiſs this Pope's hand: he perceived I know not what emotions which ſavoured too much of fleſh and blood, and thought himſelf obliged to obey the precept of Jeſus Chriſt in the rigor of the letter. If thy hand offend thee cut it off (11). But being by this mutilation, rendered incapable of ſaying maſs any more, there aroſe a murmuring among the people, which made him earneſtly beg of God the reſtitution of his hand; it was granted him; and from that time, ſay they, the cuſtom of kiſſing the Pope's hand was changed into that of kiſſing his feet. Others ſay, that St Leo cut off his hand under the reproaches of his conſcience, for having conferred holy orders on an undeſerving perſon. ‘ Cùm autem ſanctus Leo eam ob cauſam ſacrificare deſiiſſet, idque in populo Romano murmur non leve excitaret, impetravit à Deo ardentiſſimis precibus, ut manus abſciſſa ſibi reſtitueretur. Ex eo tamen tempore, abolito uſu manibus Pontificis oſcula figendi, inductus eſt uſus figendi oſculum pedibus. Scribunt hæc de ſancto Leone varii, ac nominatim Sabellicus, l. 5. Andreas Eborenſis, tit. de Caſtitate, ac Majolus, lib. i. de irregularit. c. 14. n. 4. qui addit aliquos aſſerere, contigiſſe ut ſanctus Leo manum ſibi abſcinderet, actus ſancto erga ſe odio, ob male impoſitas alicui manus, & præcipitem indigni hominis initiationem (12). —— But when St Leo ceaſed, upon that account, to perform ſacred functions, and the people of Rome began to murmur greatly at it, he obtained of God by the moſt ardent prayers, that his hand, which had been cut off, might be reſtored. From that time, the cuſtom of kiſſing the Pope's hands being aboliſhed, the practice of kiſſing his feet was introduced. Several authors give this account of St Leo; particularly Sabellicus, in his fifth book; Andreas Eborenſis in his ſection of Chaſtity; and Majolus in his firſt book concerning Irregularity, ch. 14. n. 4. who adds, that ſome aſſert, St Leo cut off his own hand, through an holy deteſtation of himſelf, for having raſhly conferred orders on an unworthy perſon.’ The author from whom I take theſe words baniſhes this ſtory to the land of fables, and obſerves that the cuſtom of kiſſing the Pope's hand on Eaſter-day, has not been interrupted to either ſex: and as to the ſcruple about the ordination raſhly conferred, he gives this account of the origin of it (13): ‘ Quod ad eos attinet qui hanc narrationem referunt ad manus indigno appoſitas, videntur adducti ad hanc fabellam de ſancto Leone confingendam, ex lectione revelationis ex Moſcho deſcriptæ capite 149 Prati ſpiritualis. Quod ſcilicet ſancto Leone pro peccatis ſuis ferventer precato, apparuerit ei B. Petrus, dicens exoraſſe ſe ei omnium erratorum veniam, ſalva diſcuſſione peccatorum, ſi quæ fuiſſent ab eo admiſſa ob indignorum ordinationem. At aliud eſt quod hac revelatione continetur, aliud quod habet fabuloſa calumnia quam retulimus. —— As for thoſe, who refer this narrative to his conferring orders on an unworthy perſon, they ſeem to have been led to this fiction concerning St Leo, by reading the revelation deſcribed out of Moſchus, in his Spiritual Meadow, ch. 149. To wit, that St Leo having prayed fervently for his ſins, St Peter appeared to him, telling him, that he had obtained for him pardon of all errors, except that of ordaining unworthy perſons. But the fabulous calumny, we have related, differs from what is contained in this revelation.’

Some ſay that the hand which Leo cut off, to extinguiſh a laſcivious flame, ut libidinis ignem reſtingueret (14), was reſtored him by virtue of a picture of the holy virgin (15), and that this picture was of St Luke's painting. St Antonine and many others relate this, and yet Baronius can hardly believe it (16).

[F] Some of the books aſcribed to him, are attributed by other authors to St Proſper.] Father Queſnel pretends that the two books concerning the calling of the Gentiles; the letter to Demetriades, and the chapters concerning grace and free-will, are not St Proſper's, as is commonly believed, but St Leo's. See the book (17) intituled, De veris Operibus SS. Patrum Leonis Magni & Proſperi Aquitani, Diſſertationes criticæ, quibus Capitula de Gratia, &c. Epiſtolam ad Demetriadem, nec non duos de Vocatione omnium Gentium libros Leoni nuper adſcriptos abjudicat, & Proſpero poſtliminio reſtituit Joſephus Antelmius, Presbyter, & Canonicus Eccleſiæ Forojulienſis. The abbot Antelmi has ſtrongly oppoſed this pretenſion, and maintained that St Proſper is the true author of the ſermons which go under St Leo's name. What is obſervable in this diſpute, is, that both parties alledge the conformity of ſtile; one to prove that theſe works are St Leo's, the other, that they are not his but St Proſper's (18). The pains the abbot Antelmi has been at, on this occaſion, is very remarkable: he has made tables in two columns, in which he compares ſeveral paſſages of St Proſper, taken from the books which are confeſſedly his, with other paſſages out of thoſe which are diſputed, and ſhews a great conformity betwixt the reſpective places of one and the other. Theſe parallels, with regard to St Leo's ſermons, ſhew us a way of ſpeaking ſo peculiar, expreſſions, and turns ſo ſtudied and ſo compoſed, that it ſeems impoſſible they ſhould be conceived but by one and the ſame perſon (19). All this hinders not Mr du Pin's ſaying that the abbot Anthelmi's ſyſtem upon the ſermons which bear the name of St Leo, ſeems to him chimerical, and that the proofs he brings are extreamly weak (20). Nay Mr du Pin denies the conformity of ſtile, alledged by Mr Antelmi, and the conſequence he would draw from it. ‘ If ſome perſon would be at the pains of comparing the paſſages alledged by him, he muſt find that there is no conformity of ſtile betwixt the two authors, though we meet with the ſame words in both. And beſides, though there ſhould be ſome ſmall reſemblance of ſtile between St Proſper's writings and thoſe of St Leo, ſhould not we have more reaſon to ſay that St Proſper had imitated his maſter, whom he often heard diſcourſe, and preach, whoſe ſermons he had read, and perhaps copied to preſerve them in ſcrinio Romanæ Eccleſiæ, ſuppoſing he was notary of the church of Rome (21).’ Here is a fact which confirms ſome reflexions in the dialogues on the chimerical cabal (22).’ See the article ERASMUS (23), and that of JULIUS II (24).

[G] A famous miniſter has a little embarraſſed himſelf, by placing the epocha of Antichriſt in the pontificate of St Leo.] He is going to be driven much farther. ‘ According to him, idolatry in the days of St Leo was great enough in the church to make it an Antichriſtian church, and Leo himſelf Antichriſt, and yet the ſame miniſter had wrote the following words in his thirteenth letter of this year. Whilſt Antichriſt was little, he did not deſtroy the eſſence of the church. Leo . . . . and ſome of his ſucceſſors were good men, as far as goodneſs and piety are conſiſtent with an exceſſive ambition. It is certain alſo, that in his time the church was engaged VERY FAR IN THE IDOLATRY of creature worſhip, which is one of the characters of Antichriſtianiſm: and though theſe evils were not yet extream, nor ſuch as might have DAMNED the perſon of Leo, who had otherwiſe good qualities; yet they were enough to begin Antichriſtianiſm. You ſee then that a man is not damned though he be an idolater, and not only an idolater, but even engaged very far in the idolatry of creature-worſhip. If a man be not of the number of the ſaints, and tho' we muſt raſe St Leo out of this catalogue, he may at leaſt be of the number of good men; and the ſin of idolatry is not ſo extreme as that he ſhall forfeit ſalvation by it. Let us urge this matter farther. We have proved in the book of Variations and elſewhere †, from the expreſs words of St John ‡, that the beaſt and Antichriſt have blaſphemed and been idolatrous from their birth, and during the whole courſe of the 1260 days of their continuance. The miniſter would fain have diſſembled this, that he might not be obliged to charge theſe crimes on the times and perſon of St Leo, St Simplicius, St Gelaſius, and other holy Popes of the Vth century: but at laſt he is forced to ſpeak it out ‡. It is certain, ſays he, that all the characters of the beaſt commenced from that time. The Gentiles or Pagans began in the days of Leo to trample the church of God under foot: for Paganiſm which is the worſhip of creatures entered into it. Then began the blaſphemy againſt God and his ſaints; for to take from God his true worſhip, to give it to the creature, is blaſpheming againſt God. Thus you ſee Antichriſtian blaſphemy and idolatry eſtabliſhed under St Leo; he himſelf could not be exempt from it ſince he was the very Antichriſt; and indeed it is certain, that he honoured relics, and aſked the aſſiſtance of the prayers of the ſaints no leſs than others. Here then we find not only an idolater, but the head of the Antichriſtian idolatry in the number of the elect, and that idolatry hinders not ſalvation (25).’ As this is a diſpute between private perſons, and not a controverſy upon the general doctrines of two communions, I may be allowed to ſay that the perplexed author made the beſt choice he could in humane prudence; which was to be ſilent: he would not even ſeem to know that his confuſion had been expoſed to the eyes of the public.

LEO X, elected Pope the eleventh of March 1513, was called John de Medicis. He had been honoured with a cardinal's hat at fourteen years of age by Pope Innocent VIII, and a long time after, with the dignity of legate by Pope Julius II. He diſcharged the functions of it in the army which was beaten by the French near Ravenna in the year 1512. Here he was taken priſoner; and during his confinement he made a wonderful experiment of the force of ſuperſtition, even over the minds of common ſoldiers [A]. It is thought that nothing contributed more to his elevation to the Popedom, than the wounds he had received in the combats of Venus [B]. His expences were exceſſive on the day of his coronation [C]; and he led a life little ſuitable

[A] He made a wonderful experiment of the force of ſuperſtition, even over the minds of ſoldiers.] The ſoldiers who had vanquiſhed him expreſſed ſo great a veneration for him, that they humbly begged pardon for their victory, beſeeched him to give them abſolution, and promiſed never to bear arms more againſt the Pope. This I learn from cardinal Palavicino after his having obſerved, that, in contempt of the royal authority, the Milaneſe looked upon the cardinals of the aſſembly of Piſa with averſion. In Milano con vilipenſione dell' autorità Reale furon ricevuti non come Cardinali, Grado riveritiſſimo nella Chriſtianità, mà come huomini peſtiferi e ſcelerati, e comete di ſciagura ne' paeſi dove giugneſſero. Anzi, non oſtante che i Franceſi riportaſſono la memorabil vittoria di Ravenna, e conduceſſero prigione à Milano il Cardinal Giovanni de' Medici Legato dell' Eſercito pontificio, che poi aſſunto al Pontificato preſe il nome di Leon Decimo; non ſi tennero i ſoldati vincitori dall' andare con incredibil frequenza à venerar come Legato del Vicario di Chriſto il lor prigioniero; ricevendone l' aſſoluzione ch'egli havea podeſtà di dar loro per haver combattuto contro alla Chieſa, con promeſſione d'aſtenerſene per innanzi (1).

[B] Nothing contributed more to his elevation to the Popedom, than the wounds he had received in the combats of Venus.] I have ſo often given the reaſon why I chooſe rather to cite Catholic than Proteſtant writers on ſuch occaſions, that without further preamble, I ſhall here produce the words of a French hiſtorian, and a bitter enemy to the Proteſtants (2). ‘Three months had not paſſed ſince the return of cardinal de Medicis to Florence, when the death of Pope Julius II, obliged him to leave that town and go to Rome. He was carried in a horſe litter by reaſon of an impoſthume in thoſe parts, which modeſty will not allow us to name, and travelled ſo ſlowly, that the Pope's obſequies were over, and the conclave ſitting, when he arrived there, ... (3). The conclave had not ended ſo ſoon as it did, the young and old cardinals perſiſting in contrary opinions with equal obſtinacy, if an odd accident had not brought them to agree. The cardinal de Medicis being extreamly hurried by the number of viſits he made every night to the cardinals of his faction, his ulcer broke and the matter which came from it, ſent forth ſuch a ſtench, that all the cells which were ſeparated only by ſlight partitions, were perfectly poiſoned by it. The old cardinals, whoſe conſtitutions were leſs capable of bearing the malignancy of a corrupted air, conſulted the Phyſicians of the conclave, to know what they ſhould do; theſe Phyſicians who had ſeen cardinal de Medicis, and judged of his ſtate more by the ill humours which flowed from his body, than by that ſtrength of nature which drove them out, anſwered, being firſt gained by the promiſes of Bibiana, that cardinal de Medicis had not a month to live. Their paſſing this ſentence of death upon him was the cauſe of his being choſen Pope, the old cardinals who thought to out-wit the young, agreeing to give them a ſatisfaction, which could not as they preſumed, laſt very long. They waited upon them and let them know, that they at laſt yielded to their obſtinacy, on condition they would remember to do the like for them another time. Thus cardinal de Medicis was elected Pope, upon a falſe information, being not full thirty ſix years old; and as joy is one of the moſt ſovereign remedies, he ſoon recovered ſo perfect a ſtate of health, that the old cardinals had occaſion to repent of their being over credulous.’ Not to conceal any thing, I am obliged to acquaint my reader, that Paul Jovius does not place this ulcer in the place where Varillas does; but in the fundament (4) which would not ſuppoſe a diſgraceful cauſe: and with the ſame ſincerity I add, that this Pope aſcended the throne with a great reputation of chaſtity, if we believe Guicciardin (5), and was reckoned very continent from his youth, if we credit Paul Jovius. ‘Conſtat tamen eum, quod à primâ adoleſcentia opinione omnium ſummam continentiæ laudem fuiſſet adeptus, non importuna quædam pudicitiæ, caſtitatique præſidia quæſiviſſe; quando nequaquam priſtinæ vitæ more tam multis delicatiſque obſoniis uteretur (6). —— It is certain however, that having gained a great reputation for continency from his youth, he ſought out no very troubleſome guardians of his chaſtity and modeſty; ſince he did not eat ſo luxuriouſly, as formerly.’ Whence we muſt conclude that the Papal dignity was that which ruined Leo the tenth's good morals: he grew vicious when he ſhould have grown virtuous; and laſtly, I obſerve, that the ſenſe in which I alledge Varillas's words, and which Mr Seckendorf gives them (7) is gathered only from conſequences, and ſuch as do not neceſſarily follow from them.

[C] His expences were exceſſive on the day of his coronation.] He would be crowned upon the ſame day on which he loſt the battle of Ravenna, and his liberty, the year before, and rode the ſame Turkiſh horſe which he rode on the day of that battle; he ranſomed him from the French; and as he loved him mightily, he had him very carefully kept, and pampered to an extream old age. Vectus eſt etiam in pompa illo eodem equo Thracio in quo ad Ravennam captus fuerat, quem ab hoſtibus pecunia redemptum ita adamavit, ut poſtea uſque ad extremam ſenectutem ſumma cum indulgentia alendum curarit (8). And as his head was filled with the magnificences of antient Rome, and the triumphal days of the antient conſuls, he endeavoured to revive thoſe fine ſhews, and was ſo well ſerved in this deſign, that ſince the irruption of the Goths, there never was ſeen in Rome any thing more magnificent than his coronation. See the deſcription of it in Paul Jovius (9). He agrees with Guicciardin (10), that the expence of it amounted to an hundred thouſand ducats. Father Gretſer cenſures Mr du Pleſſis for ſaying it coſt a million, nec mitius agit Pleſſæus cum Leone X. quem die coronationis ſuæ decies centena aureorum millia, hoc eſt ut vulgo loquimur millionem conſumpſiſſe ſcribit (11). This is found in the Latin edition which Father Gretſer made uſe of. But in the French edition which I uſe, Mr du Pleſſis Mornai mentions only the hundred thouſand ducats of Guicciardin.

[D] He led a life . . . . . . wholly voluptuous.] Paul Jovius cannot be accuſed of being too ſparing of his incenſe to Leo X; but on the other hand, it muſt be owned, he explains himſelf clearly enough upon the vices of this Pope, not to leave an intelligent reader in ſuſpence: The pleaſures, ſays he, into which he too frequently plunged himſelf, and the leud actions objected to him, tarniſhed the luſtre of his virtues. He adds, that a temper more eaſy and complaiſant, than vicious, caſt him into this precipice, having about him ſuch people, as inſtead of admoniſhing him of his duty, only talked to him of diverſions. The original is more nervous than the abſtract I give of it and therefore I ſhall deliver it in Paul Jovius's words. ‘Has præclaras liberalis excelſique animi virtutes, cum nimia ſæpe vita luxuria, tum objectæ libidines obſcurabant: ita tamen, ut jucunditate blandæ faciliſque naturæ potius, ac regia quadam licentia, quàm certo depravati animi judicio in ea vitia prolabi videretur, quum frequenti blandientium turba cubiculi fores obſeſſæ paucos admitterent, qui alioqui docilis verecundique hominis ſolutos mores cohiberent, amicorum optimis ad ea conniventibus, ac libenter ſeſe illecebrarum miniſtris immiſcentibus, ne gratiam apud ſummos principes in lubrico poſitam in diſcrimen adducerent, ſi ingratum auribus potentium reprehenſionis officium honeſtatis atque benevolentiæ ſpecie ſuſcepiſſent. Verùm hominem hilaritati humaniſque ſenſibus facile ſervientem mirum in modum incitabant plerique Cardinales opibus ætateque florentes, qui illuſtri loco nati, ac liberaliter educati, regio luxu vitam in venationibus, conviviis, atque ſpectaculis libentiſſimè traducebant (12).’ A little after he owns, that this Pope was charged with the crime of Sodomy (13): ‘Non caruit etiam infamia quòd parum honeſtè nonnullos è cubiculariis (erant enim è tota Italia nobiliſſimi) adamare, & cum his tenerius atque liberè jocari videretur. Sed quis, vel optimus atque ſanctiſſimus princeps in hac maledicentiſſima aula lividorum aculeos vitavit? & quis ex adverſo tam malignè improbus ac invidiæ tabe conſumptus, ut vera demum poſſet objectare, noctium ſecreta ſcrutatus eſt? —— He was reflected upon likewiſe for ſhamefully intriguing, and uſing great freedoms with the pages of his bed-chamber, who were the flower of all Italy. But what prince, tho' the beſt and moſt holy, ever eſcaped the ſting of envy in this cenſorious court? and who, on the other hand was ſo malicious, and envious, as to ſearch out what paſſed in the night, that he might have foundation for cenſure?’ I omit what is told us of the luxury of his table, and the buffoonries acted at it. ‘Mire quoque favit Pogio ſeni, Pogii hiſtorici filio itemque Moro nobili à gulæ intemperantia, articularibus doloribus diſtorto, & Brandino equiti, Marianoque ſannioni cucullato facetiſſimis helluonibus, & in omni genere popinalium delitiarum eruditiſſimis . . . . . . Verum feſtiviſſimis eorum facetiis, ſalſiſque & perurbanis ſcommatibus magis quam ullis palati lenociniis oblectabatur (14).’ I have touched upon this in the article of HADRIAN VI (15), Leo the tenth's ſucceſſor, and reformer of his luxury, as we are going to ſee. ‘The other day the equerries, of the deceaſed Pope Leo, deputed one of their number, and ſent him to the Pope to ſpeak to him in behalf of them all: the Pope inquired how many they were in the retinue of Leo; he anſwered, an hundred. Adrian ſigning himſelf with the ſign of the croſs, as aſtoniſhed at ſuch a ſuperfluity, ſaid, that four were enough for him, but that he was content that twelve ſhould be placed upon the liſt, ſince ſo many were neceſſary to exceed the number of thoſe which the cardinals kept. In ſhort, it's the common opinion that this Pope will be a good husband, and caſh-keeper for the church, which is in truth very neceſſary, conſidering the prodigality of his predeceſſor.’ This is what we find in a letter of Jerome Negro written from Rome the firſt of September 1522, it is inſerted in Ruſcelli's collection, tranſlated by Belleforeſt.

[E] It is ſaid his eye at hunting was ſurprizingly quick.] This we ſhall ſpeak of after having taken notice of Leo the tenth's violent paſſion for hunting. He was wonderfully pleaſed with it; he underſtood and obſerved the laws of it much better than thoſe of the goſpel, and he could not bear any one ſhould diſturb his ſport; he had no mercy on thoſe, who through imprudence, or otherwiſe, occaſioned the eſcape of the game. He gave them all manner of ill language. He was ſo much out of humour when the chace did not ſucceed, that no body durſt then aſk him a favour; but tranſported with joy, if it ended luckily; and theſe were the favourable moments (16) for obtaining whatever was deſired of him. Paul Jovius relates this very elegantly. ‘Venationibus & aucupiis nobilioribus adeò perdite ſtudebat, ut ſpurciſſimas ſæpe tempeſtates inſalubreſque ventos, & frequentia manſionum ac itinerum incommoda obſtinatè contemneret . . . . (17) In venando autem ſicuti præcepta artis ad normam exactioris diſciplinæ patientiſſimè obſervare erat ſolitus, ita ſeveritatem aſperè admodum vir alioqui leniſſimus ſemper exercuit; in eos præſertim, qui petulanti diſcurſu aut vocibus temerè editis improviſa feris effugia præbuiſſent: ita ut claros ſæpe viros acerbiſſimis contumeliis oneraret. At ſi quando imperitia, vel fortuito errore hominum, aut feris ſubtiliore aliquo inſperatæ fugæ compendio ſervatis, vel iis denſo in nemore contumacius latentibus infeliciter venaretur, incredibile eſt quali vultus animique habitu dolorem iracundiamque præferret. Propterea amici familiares ea temporis momenta provocandæ liberalitati maxime adverſa ſedulo devitabant: quando aliàs ſecundum opimam venationem, ac præſertim vario ac inſigni labore aliquo nobilem, maxima beneficia incredibili benignitate collocaret (18). —— He was ſo fond of hunting and fowling, that he obſtinately deſpiſed the fouleſt ſtorms, unwholeſome winds, and all the inconveniences of journeying . . . . But in hunting, as he was moſt exact in obſerving the rules of the art, ſo he exerciſed the greateſt ſeverity, tho' otherwiſe of the mildeſt diſpoſition, eſpecially towards thoſe, who, by their raſh noiſe and clamour, gave the game an opportunity to eſcape; inſomuch that he often bitterly chid men of diſtinction. But if it happened, either thro' unskilifullneſs, or miſtake, or that the game unexpectedly made it's eſcape, or could not be rouzed, that he was unſucceſsful in hunting, it is incredible what grief and anger he diſcovered in his countenance and temper. Therefore his intimates never asked any favours of him at that unlucky time: whereas, when his hunting was ſucceſsful, or remarkable for the variety and uncommonneſs of the toil, he beſtowed the greateſt favours with incredible liberality.’

As to his ſight, here is a paſſage which I take from a book of the Sieur des Accords (19). ‘Pope Leo having cauſed theſe numeral letters to be written, to ſignify the year of his Pontificate, they were thus interpreted, M CCCC LX. Multi Cardinales cæci crearunt cæcum Leonem decimum. Now I muſt ſay, by the way, that I do not know why he ſhould be called blind ſince by the help of glaſſes he could ſee hawks, vultures, and eagles, at the higheſt ſoar; but on the other hand, whenever he read, he clapped the paper to his noſe, and even then could hardly diſtinguiſh a letter; as Lucius Gauricus informs us, in his Schematibus Celeſtibus. Which puts me in mind of a certain honeſt curate who cannot read the church books of the faireſt character, without ſpectacles, and yet ſhall diſtinguiſh the ſmalleſt dice, and is never to be put upon.’ Paul Jovius confirms this but in part; for he ſays, that Leo read the ſmalleſt print with great eaſe, when he

he had been taught by preceptors (a), who inſtructed him thoroughly in the Belles Lettres, he loved and protected men of wit and learning. He favoured the poets in a particular manner, and that without preſerving always the gravity which his character required [F]. This appeared on ſeveral occaſions, and even in the privileges he granted he brought the paper near his eye. 'Subtrahebant magna ex parte oris ſuavitatem, obeſæ malæ & oculi extantes, convolutique & hebetes, verum ſi ad pupillam inſpicienda propius admoveret, ſupra fidem acutiſſimi: ſupplices enim libellos, vel minutiſſimis literis, & crebris ſyllabarum compendiis properanter exaratos celerrimè & diſtinctiſſimè lectitabat: admota autem criſtallo concava, oculorum aciem in venationibus & aucupiis adeò latè extendere erat ſolitus, ut non modo ſpaciis & finibus, ſed ipſa etiam diſcernendi felicitate cunctos anteiret (20). ——— What took off greatly from the ſweetneſs of his countenance, was, his puffed cheeks, and his eyes, which were prominent, rowling, and dim, but moſt ſharp, when he brought any thing very near to the pupil: for he read very faſt and diſtinctly petitions written in the ſmalleſt characters, and with frequent abbreviations: and, by the uſe of a concave glaſs, he ſo extended, the ſight of his eyes, in hunting, that he excelled every one, not only in ſpace and bounds, but even in the happineſs of diſcerning.' I have juſt conſulted Luke Gauric's book, that des Accords cites, and do not find he ſays, that Leo X. could not ſee when he clapt the paper cloſe to his noſe. Let us cite Gauric, and admire the impertinence of his attributing to the planets the different qualities of the right and left eye of this Pope. 'Sol cum ſtellis nebuloſis, oculi dextri aciem penitus hebetavit cum multis lineis tranſverſis. Luna in ſexta cœli ſtatione ſub Geminorum aſteriſmo ad Martis tetragonam radiationem defluens, oculi quoque ſiniſtri lucem impediebat, adeo quidem quod nec legere, neque aliquid intueri poterat abſque conſpicillo magno cryſtallino, non autem illius aciem prorſus deſiderabat, quoniam ſalutaris Stella Jovis, Lunam trigonica radiatione intuebatur, & ita literas lectitabat naſo proximiores & oculo, ſed cum illo vitreo ocello ſuſpiciebat Accipitres, Aquilas, Aſtures, altius volitantes, & longe melius quam alii venatores, ibatque ſæpius ad venationes Leporum, Caprearum ſilveſtrium, & Vulpium, illaſque optime conſpiciebat, quæ à canibus leporariis & moloſſis capiebantur (21). —— The ſun, with nebulous ſtars, entirely dim'd the ſight of his right eye, with many tranſverſe lines. The moon, in the ſixth houſe, in Gemini, applying to the quartil of Mars, impaired likewiſe, the ſight of his left eye, inſomuch that he could read nothing without a large cryſtal glaſs; yet he did not wholly want the ſight of it, becauſe the ſalutary ſtar Jupiter was in trine to the moon; and thus he read letters by bringing them near his noſe and eyes; and, by the help of a cryſtal glaſs, he diſtinguiſhed hawks and eagles, in their higheſt flight, much better than other ſportſmen; beſides, he often hunted hares, goats, and foxes, and had a clear ſight of them, when caught by the hounds or maſtives.'

[F] He favoured the poets . . . . without preſerving the gravity which his character required.] The pleaſures he allowed himſelf with them, ſometimes degenerated into buffoonry. Quernus, who had been ſolemnly crowned, and promoted to the honour of Poet Laureat, was little better than a merry-andrew. He uſed to come to Leo the tenth's dinner, and eat at the window, the morſels which were conveyed to him from hand to hand. They gave him the Popes wine plentifully, but upon condition, that he would make extempore verſes on the ſubjects that were given him. He was obliged at leaſt to furniſh a diſtich; and if he failed, or if his verſes were good for nothing he was condemned to drink a great deal of water with his wine (22). 'Fuit diu inter inſtrumenta eruditæ voluptatis longe gratiſſimus, quum cœnante Leone porrectis de manu ſemeſis obſoniis, ſtans in feneſtra veſceretur, & de principis lagena perpotando, ſubitaria carmina factitaret; ea demum lege, ut perſcripto argumento bina ſaltem carmina ad menſam, tributi nomine ſolverentur, & in pœnam ſterili vel inepto longe dilutiſſime foret perbibendum (23).' Sometimes alſo the Pope made extempore verſes with his arch-poet, which ſet all the company a laughing. What want of gravity was this! 'Ab hac autem opulentia hilarique ſagina, vehementem incidit in podagram; ſic ut belliſſimè ad riſum evenerit, quum de ſe canere juſſus, in hunc hexametrum erupiſſet;

Archipoëta facit verſus pro mille poëtis,

'Et demum hæſitaret, inexpectatus Princeps hoc pentametro perargute reſponderit;

Et pro mille aliis Archipoëta bibit.

'Tum verò aſtantibus obortus eſt riſus: & demum multo maximus, quum Quernus ſtupens & interritus, hoc tertium non inepte carmen induxiſſet:

Porrige, quod faciat mihi carmina docta Falernum.

'Idque Leo repente mutuatus à Virgilio, ſubdiderit,

Hoc etiam enervat, debilitatque pedes (24).

'—— This high feeding brought on him a ſevere gout; during which he would be very merry with his Poet Laureat; who, being ordered to make verſes on himſelf, broke out into this line;

The Laureat for a thouſand Poets writes;

'and ſtopping ſhort, the Pope unexpectedly and wittily ſubjoined this line;

And for a thouſand more the Laureat drinks.

'Upon which the company laughed, and afterwards exceſſively, when Quernus undauntedly, and aptly enough, repeated this third line;

Give me Falernian, to inſpire my muſe;

'To which Leo, borrowing from Virgil, immediately added;

This alſo weakens and unnerves the feet.

One day a Poet preſented him with ſome Latin verſes in rhime; the Pope, to divert himſelf, gave him no other recompence than an extempore flight, containing an equal number of verſes in the ſame rhymes. The Poet, vexed to ſee that Leo gave him nothing, returned the following diſtich:

Si tibi pro numeris numeros fortuna dediſſet,
Non eſſet capiti tanta corona tuo.

Had fortune thus thy verſe with verſe repaid,
The tripple crown had not adorn'd thy head.

Hereupon the Pope extended to him his uſual liberality (25). By this we may ſee, that he turned every thing to his diverſion. But here is a paſſage that clearly diſcovers the buffooning ſpirit, which then reigned in the Pope's palace. A man having ſomething to aſk of Leo X, and finding himſelf amuſed for ſeveral days with ungrateful delays, which made him deſpair of being introduced, bethought himſelf of this ſtratagem. He acquainted Leo's great chamberlain, that he had the admirableſt verſes to ſhew the Pope, that ever were made. The chamberlain, tranſported with joy, goes immediately to the Pope, and tells him, he had light on the very top of fools, and the fitteſt thing alive . . . . . to divert him. It was the way of Leo's courtiers, to find out ſuch as were half crazy, and compleat the diſorder of their brains, for the diverſion of the head of the church (26). But they were the cullies of the pretended Poet I ſpeak of. For when he was admitted to the Pope's preſence, he let him know the true reaſon which induced him to counterfeit a crack-brained Poet, and declared his real buſineſs. They who underſtand Latin, will read this with more ſatiſfaction, in the words of granted to Arioſto's poems (b). In a word, let us ſay, that ſcholars and buffooons, equally ſhared his friendſhip [G]. He had not the ſame reliſh for Theological ſtudies [H]. I will not vouch the ſtory which is told, viz. that he once ridiculed the whole Chriſtian doctrine as a mere fable [I]. He had the induſtry to ruine the council of Nicius Erythræus. ‘Hoc hominum ridicule inſanientium, genere non minimum delectabatur Leo X. Pontifex Max. cujus Gnathones, quos circa ſe habebat, dabant operam ut eos, quibus levis mens eſſet, ad inſaniam adigerent, ſeque eos eſſe, qui non eſſent, arbitrarentur. In quo mirabiliter luſus eſt à quodam, cui petenti aditum conveniendi non dabat: qui cùm multos dies expectaſſet, atque omnes ad Pontificem allegationes difficiles, omnes aditus arduos intercluſoſque videret, ſeducto Pontificii cubiculi præfecto in aurem dixit, ſe eſſe poëtam, ſolum præter cæteros, qui ſua vellet carmina Pontifici tradere, quibus lectis obſtupeſceret, horreret, ad incredibilem admirationem efferretur. Quo ille audito, ventis atque avibus ocius advolavit in Leonis cubiculum, atque hilaritate lætitiaque redundans, Invenimus, inquit, perfectæ inſaniæ hominem, qui tibi voluptati maximæ erit. At ille ſine mora intromiſſus, ex illis ſe integumentis ſimulationis evolvit, cauſam, cur inſaniam ſimulaſſet, aperuit, negotium, quod volebat, expoſuit. Itaque ille deridiculo eos habuit, quibus ludendus tradebatur (27).’ Was it keeping the decorum of the Papacy to expedite a Bull ſo favourable to the poems of Arioſto? cardinal Hippolyto d'Eſt, to whom the Orlando Furioſo of this Poet was dedicated, judged very well of it, when he asked the author, Meſſer Lodoïco dove Diavolo havete pigliato tante coionerie, — Where the devil could you find ſo many fooleries? Leo X. was infinitely more debonaire to this author. ‘Almoſt at the ſame time that he thundered his anathema's againſt Martin Luther, he was not aſhamed to publiſh a Bull in favour of the prophane poems of Lewis Arioſto, threatening thoſe with excommunication who found fault with them, or hindred the profit of the Printer (28).’ We ſhall ſee elſewhere (29) that he was a great admirer of burleſque pieces.

[G] Scholars and buffoons equally ſhared his friendſhip.] The Hiſtorian, Peter Matthieu, having ſaid, that Leo X loved buffoons, as much as the learnedſt men in Italy, and changed his humour from one extream to another (30), alledges theſe words of Peter Aretin. ‘E beato colui che e pazzo e ne la pazzia ſua compiace ad altri e a ſe ſteſſo. Certamente Leone hebbe una natura da' ſtremo à eſtremo, e non ſaria opra da ogniuno il giudicare chi piu gli dilettaſſe, o la vertu de i dotti, o le ciancie de i buffoni, e di cio fa fede il ſuo haver dato à l'una e à l'altra ſpecie eſſaltando tanto queſti quanto quegli. ——— He is happy who is a fool, and in his folly pleaſes both others and himſelf. Certainly Leo was, in extremes, and it would be a difficult matter to judge which pleaſed him beſt, the ſcience of the learned, or the jeſts of the buffoons, and this appears by his favour to theſe two ſorts of men, praiſing the one as much as the other.’ Peter Matthieu, who ſo often cites the ſame Aretin, took much more pains than Mr Menage (31).

[H] He had not the ſame reliſh for Theological ſtudies.] Cardinal Palavicino could not deny it; he honeſtly confeſſes, that Leo X valued thoſe more, who underſtood Mythology, the antient Poets, and profane learning, than thoſe who underſtood Divinity, and Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. His words, which are more frank, and have leſs of the biaſs than uſual, are theſe. ‘Gli oppone il Soave, ch'egli haveſſe maggior notizia di lettere profane che ſacre ed appartenenti alla religione: nel che io non gli contradico. Havendo Leone ricevuto da Dio un ingegno capaciſſimo e ſingolarmente ſtudioſo; ed appena uſcito dalla fanciullezza veggendoſi poſto nel ſupremo Senato della Chieſa; mancò al ſuo debito con traſcurar nella letteratura una parte non ſolamente la più nobile, mà la più proporzionata al ſuo Grado. E s'accrebbe tal mancamento quando in età di trentaſett'anni coſtituito Preſidente e Maeſtro della religione, non ſolo continuò di donarſi tutto alle curioſità degli ſtudii profani; mà nella Reggia della medeſima religione con maggior cura chiamò coloro à cui foſſer note le favole della Grecia e le delizie de' Poeti, che l'Iſtorie della Chieſa, e la dottrina de' Padri. Non laſciò ei veramente di rimunerar la Scholaſtica Theologia, onorandola con la Porpora in Tommaſo di Vio, in Egidio da Viterbo, e in Adriano Florenzio ſuo Succeſſore, e coll' ufficio di Maeſtro del Sacro Palazzo in Silveſtro da Prierio; le cui penne illuſtrarono immortalmente quella ſacra diſciplina. Mà nè co' Theologi uſò di converſare come co' Poeti: ne promoſſe l'erudizione ſacra come la profana; laſciando la Chieſa in quella ſcarſezza in cui la trovò di perſone che dopo l'infelice ignoranza di molti ſecoli rauvivaſſero la prima, come ſi rauvivava già la ſeconda (32). ——— Father Paul objects, that he was better acquainted with prophane letters, than with ſacred or religious learning; which I do not deny. God had endowed Leo with a great genius, and a ſingular induſtry; and being yet but a youth, he ſaw himſelf placed in the ſupreme ſenate of the church, but he neglected that part of literature, not only the moſt noble, but moſt ſuitable, to his ſtation; and this neglect increaſed, when, at the age of thirty ſeven years, being appointed head and maſter of religion, he not only continued to give himſelf up to the curioſity of prophane ſtudies; but for the regulating of the ſaid religion, did rather call to him thoſe who were acquainted with the fables of Greece, and the delights of the Poets, than thoſe who knew the hiſtory of the church, and the doctrine of the Fathers. He nevertheleſs favoured ſcholaſtic Divinity, in honouring with the purple Tommaſo di Vio, Ægidio da Viterbo, and Adriano Florenzio, his ſucceſſor, and in appointing Silveſter da Prierio, maſter of the ſacred palace; who, by their writings, have acquired an immortal glory, in illuſtrating that ſacred ſcience. But he did not converſe with the Divines, as he did with the Poets; nor encouraged the ſacred erudition, as the prophane; leaving the church in the ſame want, he found her, of learned men, who, after the unhappy ignorance of many ages, ſhould revive the former as they did the latter.’ It were to be wiſhed, that theſe two Hiſtorians always agreed ſo well.

[I] He ridiculed the whole Chriſtian doctrine, as a meer fable (§ α).] The tradition is, that ſecretary Bembo alledging ſomething from the goſpel, he anſwered him, it is well known of old, how profitable this fable of Jeſus Chriſt has been to us. Quantum nobis noſtriſque ea de Chriſto fabula profuerit ſatis eſt omnibus ſeculis notum. This ſtory is found in the Myſtery of Iniquity (33), and in abundance of other books: but ſtill without being ſupported by citations, or having any other foundation than the authority of Bale: ſo that three or four hundred authors, more or leſs, who have ſaid this, copying one another, ought to be reduced to Bale's ſingle teſtimony; a teſtimony manifeſtly exceptionable, ſince he wrote in open war againſt the Pope, and againſt the whole Romiſh church. No tribunal in the world would receive the depoſitions of ſuch a witneſs, ſwearing that he has ſeen or heard ſo and ſo, for when once the perſon appears to be his enemy againſt whom he depoſes, the challenges of the accuſed party are declared valid. Since books of controverſy then are pieces which the parties produce in a ſuit pleaded before the public, it is certain that the teſtimony of a Proteſtant diſputant, upon a fact which reflects upon the Pope, or the teſtimony of a Popiſh diſputant, on a fact reflecting on the Reformers, ought to be reckoned as nothing. The public, which is judge of the proceſs, ought to reject all theſe teſtimonies, and have no more regard to them, than to things which never happened. Private perſons are permitted, if once perſuaded of the probity of Bale, to believe what he affirms; but they ought to keep their perſuaſion to themſelves, and not produce it to public view, as a juridical proof againſt their adverſaries; which, in my opinion, is a thing not ſufficiently obſerved.

[(§ α) It was under the pontificate of Leo X, that Ulric de Hutten publiſhed his dialogue, intituled Trias Romana. Now ſee how he ſpeaks in that ingenious ſatire againſt the court of Rome: ‘Tria, VADISCUS ait, pauciſſimi Romæ credunt, animarum immortalitatem, communionem Sanctorum, & infernorum pœnas. council, which the emperor and the king of France had ſet up againſt Julius II, and he made the council of Lateran triumph; for he obtained of Lewis XII, all the ſubmiſſions he could deſire (c). He formed leagues againſt her, and took that affair ſo

They tell another ſtory, which lies open to the ſame battery as the former. It is ſaid, that Leo hearing two men diſpute, one whereof denied, and the other affirmed, the immortality of the ſoul, pronounced, that the affirmative ſeemed true, but that the negative was more proper to give a man a chearful countenance. ‘ Leonis X. Papæ dictum refert (Lutherus) qui audita diſputatione in qua unus immortalitatem animæ defendebat, alter oppugnabat, dixerit, tu quidem vera videris dicere, ſed adverſarii tui oratio facit bonum vultum, id eſt lætiorem mentem (Ital. buona cera) ex Epicuri ſcilicet ſententia.’ Luther is the man who ſays this (34). We may, if we pleaſe, believe he ſpoke truth, but we ought not to alledge his teſtimony; he is a perſon at war with the Pope; he is an enemy perſecuted and anathematized; the judicial practice requires, that his teſtimony ſhould be rejected, and even his oath not admitted; he ought either to prove what he ſays, or ſay nothing. A famous profeſſor of Divinity at Zurich, relates this ſtory, upon the teſtimony of a book (35), as exceptionable as Luther himſelf. ‘ Qualis fuerit Leo . . . . conſtabit . . . . . ſi de ejus . . . . . . impietate & atheiſmo nonnihil attexuerimus. Ille ſcilicet ὁμόψηφος Joannis XXIV. animam in corporis domicilio ſic inſinuatam ſtatuentis, ut extra illum carcerem non duret; juſſit aliquando (uti Recuſat. Synod. Trid. par. 2. cauſ. 8. pag. 266. comprobatum videre eſt) perſonatos Philoſophos duos, ceu moriones ex adverſo ad menſam aſſiſtere; quos animi gratia de immortalitate animæ diſputantes audiret; alterum qui affirmaret, & qui impugnaret, alterum. Cumque finita diſputatione judicium in arbitrium Pontificis hi rejicerent; ille ſic definita ſententia controverſiam diremit: Etſi tu, inquit ad affirmantem, pulchras & bonas rationes habeas; tamen ego ſententiam hujus, negantis, probo, ceu firmiorem, & quæ faciat bonum vultum (36). —— The character of Leo will appear, if I add ſomething concerning his impiety and atheiſm. This Pope, being of the ſame opinion with John XXIV, who laid it down, that the ſoul could not exiſt ſeparately from the body, gave orders one day (as may be ſeen in Recuſat. Synod. Trid. par. 2. cauſ. 8. pag. 266.) for two perſonated Philoſophers to ſtand oppoſite to each other, like buffoons, at a table, and to diſpute in his preſence concerning the immortality of the ſoul, the one to maintain it, the other to oppoſe it. The deciſion of the diſpute being referred to the Pope, he gave this ſentence, Though you, ſaid he to the affirmer, have fine and good reaſons, yet I approve this man's (the denyer's) opinion, as the better grounded, and more plauſible.’ He afterwards relates the anſwer, that it is pretended he made Bembus; and as he well perceived that things of this nature want to be proved by the teſtimony of Catholic authors, ſee how he orders it; he alledges the nephew of the famous count of Mirandola. ‘ Et ne ab hæreticis hæc conficta clamitent οἱ ἐξ ἐναντίας, ejus rei αὐτόπτην & αὐτήκοον (37) teſtem damus, qui & ſcire debebat, & cauſam cur mentiretur non habebat, Johannis Pici, Mirandulani Comitis nepotem ex fratre minimè degenerem, qui in illo Piſani & Lateranenſis Conſilii conflictu, quæſtionem tractans, utrùm Concilia vel Pontifices errare poſſint, inter alia de Leone hoc loquens: Meminimus, inquit, Pontificem creditum & adoratum, qui nullum Deum credens, omne infidelitatis (ἀθεότητος) culmen excederet: peſſimaque ejus opera in coëmendo Pontificatu, in omnigenis ſceleribus exercendis, id ipſum teſtabatur: ſed & peſſima quoque dicta confirmabant. Namque faſſum eum affirmabatur domeſticis quibuſdam, nullum ſe Deum aliquando, etiam dum Pontificiam Sedem teneret, crediſſe, quæ ejus verba libro de fide & ordine credendi, theorem. 4. pag. 259, 260. legere eſt (38). —— Aud that the adverſaries may not cry out, that theſe things are the fiction of Heretics, I give you an eye and ear-witneſs of the thing, who both ought to know, and had no reaſon to tell a lye; I mean the nephew of John Picus, count of Mirandola, who, in that conflict of the council of Piſa and Lateran, treating of the queſtion, whether councils or Popes can err, and, among other things, ſpeaking of Leo, ſays as follows: I remember a Pope believed and adored, who himſelf not believing a God, went beyond the utmoſt pitch of Atheiſm: which not only his vile actions, ſuch as buying the Popedom, and being guilty of all manner of wickedneſs, but his very words, confirmed the truth of. For it was affirmed, that he confeſſed to ſome of his domeſtics, even while he ſate in the Papal chair, that he diſbelieved the exiſtence of God: which words of his you may read in the book de fide & ordine credendi, theorem. 4. pag. 259, 260.’ It will, perhaps, not be unacceptable to find here more at large, John Francis Picus's account. ‘ Treating alſo the queſtion, whether councils or Popes may err, which, from his own notion, may be eaſily decided, ſince he pre-ſuppoſes that they may ſwerve from the holy ſcriptures, he tells us that ſeveral councils have actually erred, ſeveral Popes fallen into Hereſy: it often happening, that he who was looked on as ſupream head of the church, either did not rightfully preſide, or was not capable of ſo doing: for, ſays he, I. Hiſtory informs us, that a woman was made Pope; and I remember, that in our age a learned man, approved in his morals, and dignified with honours in his order, pronounced, though not publickly, that he who was reckoned Pope, was not ſuch, becauſe he had exerciſed the Pope's office before he was elected by two parts in three of the cardinals, againſt the laws of the church, which decree, that ſuch a man, not only is not Pope, but is even abſolutely unqualified, and incapacitated for the office, as being under an anathema. II. We remember alſo another choſen and adored as Pope, who yet, in the opinion of many great men, neither was, nor could be ſo, becauſe he did not believe a God, and was arrived at the higheſt degree of Infidelity, which he teſtified by his moſt wicked actions, having bought the Popedom and exerciſed in it all manner of iniquity, and even confirmed it by his moſt deteſtable ſayings; for it was affirmed, that he confeſſed to ſome of his domeſtics, that at the very time he poſſeſſed the pontifical ſee, he did not believe a God. III. We have heard of another, who declared to one of his friends, when alive, that he did not believe the immortality of the ſoul; but being dead, he appeared to him, as he was awake, and declared, that he experienced an immortality, being condemned to eternal fire by the juſt judgment of God (39).’ Mr Du Pleſſis thought that the firſt of theſe three things related to Julius II, and the ſecond to Leo X. Coëffeteau (40) only anſwered, that Du Pleſſis entering into the conſcience of all mankind, had made this application without proof or judgment; but Gretſer anſwered better: he ſhewed that none of theſe three things concerned Leo X. Since John Francis Picus's book was printed in the pontificate of Julius II (41). Mr Rivet acquieſced in this cenſure: theſe are his words. ‘ As to the application made by our author to Julius II, and Leo X, of what he ſaid of ſome Popes, that many great men did not look upon them as ſuch, for the reaſons he gives, it matters not at bottom, to whom the packet is addreſſed, provided it is certain, that it is to the Popes, of one of which he ſays, that it was maintained, he believed no God, that he was at the utmoſt degree of Infidelity, and even declared, that he did not believe a God. If you will exempt Leo X (of whom poſſibly he might not have ſpoke, becauſe he dedicated his books to Julius, unleſs he enlarged them afterwards, as is uſually done) yet it cannot be denied as to Alexander VI.’ There was in him, ſays Guicciardin *, neither truth, nor faith, nor religion.

ſo much to heart, that having received the news of the misfortunes of the French, he died, it is ſaid, of meer joy (d) [K]. Not but there are writers who affirm he was poiſoned. He did not always behave in a manner agreeable to the emperor Maximilian [L]. The ſordid traffic to which he reduced the diſtribution of indulgences [M], gave birth to Luther's Reformation, as every body knows. Some ſay, he ſpoke honourably of this reformer in the beginning [N]. I do not find, that Guicciardin gion. This is what Mr Rivet ſays (42). Note, that Simony, or the purchaſing the Popedom, is not imputable to Leo X, if we believe Guicciardin (43).

If Mr Heidegger, who had ſo good a memory, had remembered this, he would not have believed, that John Francis Picus was a witneſs of the impieties of Leo X. His miſtake may and ought to ſerve for a leſſon to many others. Let us conclude, that the duty of a good judge permits not to give ſentence againſt this Pope, while we have no ſtronger depoſitions. We ſhall ſee in the other remarks (44), whether his apologiſts reaſon right.

[K] Having received the news of the misfortunes of the French, he died, it is ſaid, of meer joy.] ‘ Having rekindled the war between the emperor Charles and the king of France, in order to drive the French out of Italy, the news was brought him, at one of his country ſeats, called Maliagno, of the taking of Milan, and Parma from them, which gave him ſuch an exceſs of joy, that he was ſeized with a ſlight fever that very night, of which he died a few days after (45).’ Theſe are Mr Du Pleſſis's words. All Hiſtorians agree, that Leo X received this good news with a wonderful ſatisfaction, but I do not find many who ſay, that this pleaſure cauſed his death; and though they ſhould affirm it, I ſhould not believe it; for they who die of joy, die ſuddenly, oppreſſed, according to all appearance, by too great an effuſion of blood into the ventricles of the heart. If the firſt impreſſions of a violent joy be withſtood, as was done by the Pope, a man is better afterwards, inſtead of being ſeized with a dangerous fever when other reaſons do not occaſion it. John Creſpin's account ſeems much more probable, who ſuppoſes that Leo the tenth's death was ſudden, but not of that ſudden kind which is occaſioned by an exceſs of joy. ‘ Hearing that the French were beaten at Milan by the emperor's forces, and driven out of Italy, which indeed was not done without his help: as he was drinking and making merry, and wonderfully rejoiced at the news, it is ſaid that he ſuddenly gave up the Ghoſt, he who believed neither a heaven nor hell after this life (46).’ Sannazar's diſtich (47), alledged by this author, favours the ſuppoſition of ſudden death; but yet it is certain, that the diſtemper Leo died of, laſted ſome days (48). Famien Strada has given two relations of this Pope's death (49), one in Livy's ſtile, the other after the way of Tacitus. They are fine and well wrought.

I muſt here obſerve a blunder of Guicciardin's tranſlator. ‘ News came, ſays he, that Pope Leo died, the firſt day of December, a ſudden death. For having received in his Villa of Magliano, where he often went to divert himſelf, the news of the taking of Milan, he fell into ſuch an exceſſive joy, that that very night he was ſeized with a ſlight fever; and being carried to Rome the day after, though the Phyſicians at firſt made light of his diſtemper, he died within a few days, not without ſuſpicion of being poiſoned (as was ſaid) by Barnabas Maleſpina, his chamberlain, who was appointed to give him his drink (50).’ What an abſurdity is it to ſay almoſt in the ſame period, that a man died a ſudden death, and that he died of a ſmall fever, ſlighted at firſt by the Phyſicians. Guicciardin was not capable of ſuch a blunder, he did not ſay this death was ſudden (51), nor has he connected the Pope's great joy with the fever (52), as the cauſe with it's effect. This connexion is more than a poetical licence of the tranſlator. Note, by the way, what cloſe regard is to be had to the words of the original, when we would faithfully tranſlate.

[L] He did not always behave in a manner agreeable to the emperor Maximilian.] He had conceived good hopes of Leo X, but when he was informed of this Pope's correſpondence with the French, he ſaid, ‘ If this Pope had not deceived me, he would have been the only Pope, whoſe honeſty I ſhould have had reaſon to commend (53).’

[M] The ſordid traffic to which he reduced the diſtribution of indulgences.] They made of it a kind of monopoly, and indulgences were let out to farm; the commiſſioners appointed for the collection of the ſums, bought their commiſſions of the Pope, after which they ſtuck at no kind of exaction, and obſerved decorum ſo little, that the powers for releaſing ſouls out of Purgatory were played for in the taverns, as we are aſſured by Guicciardin, ‘ Haveva ſparſo per tutto il mondo, ſenza diſtintione di tempi e di luoghi, indulgentie ampliſſime, non ſolo per poter giovare conceſſe quelli, che ancora ſono nella vita preſente, ma con facultà di potere oltra queſto liberare l'anime de' defunti dalle pene del Purgatorio: lequali, perche era notorio che ſi concedevano ſolamente per eſtorquere danari da gli huomini; & eſſendo eſſercitate imprudentemente da Commiſſarii deputati a queſta eſattione, la più parte de' quali comperava dalla Corte la facultà di eſſercitare; haveva concitato in molti luoghi indignatione, e ſcandalo aſſai, e ſpecialmente nella Germania, dove a molti de' miniſtri era veduto vendere per poco prezzo, ò giocarſi ſu le taverne la facultà del liberare l'anime de' morti dal Purgatorio (54). —— He has diſperſed all over the world, without any regard to time or place, indulgences, not only for this life, but to deliver the ſouls of the dead from the pains of Purgatory: which as it was notorious they were only granted to pick peoples pockets, and were levied by commiſſioners, who for the moſt part were appointed by the court of Rome, occaſioned in ſeveral places, great indignation and ſcandal, eſpecially in Germany, where they ſold them for a trifle, and the power of delivering a ſoul from Purgatory was played for at hazard in taverns.’ The diſcontent of the people grew greater, when it was known to what uſe theſe ſums were deſigned: almoſt all the money that was raiſed by them in Germany, being converted to the uſe of the Pope's ſiſter.

[N] Some ſay he ſpoke honourably of this great reformer in the beginning.] This particular had hardly been known, if Colomiés had not mentioned it: Mr de Seckendorf (55) learnt it from him, being told by a counſellor of Spires, that it was to be found in Colomiés's Opuſcula, the paſſage is this. ‘ Mr Voſſius having told me that he remembered, he had read in Bandel's Tragical Hiſtories, an elogy given to Luther by Pope Leo X; I went immediately into his library, where turning over the hiſtories of this author, ſee what I found in the preface to the twenty fifth novel of the third part. Nel principio che la Setta Lutherana comincio à germogliare, eſſendo di brigata molti Gentilhuomini, ne l'hora del meriggio, in caſa del noſtro virtuoſo Signor L. Scipione Attellano, è di varie coſe raggionandoſi, furono alcuni che non poco biaſimarono Leone X Pontefice, che ne i principii non ſi metteſſe remedio, à l'hora che Frate Silveſtro Prierio, Maeſtro del ſacro Palazzo, gli moſtrò alcuni puncti d'hereſia che Fra Martino Lutero haveva ſparſo per l'opera, la quale de le Indulgentie haveva intitolata; percioche imprudentemente riſpoſe, che Fra Martino haveva un belliſſimo ingegno, e che coteſte erano invidie Frateſche. —— When the Lutheran ſect began to appear, ſeveral gentlemen being in the houſe of our worthy Scipione Attellano, and diſcourſing about divers things, ſome of them very much blamed Pope Leo X, for not having taken timely care, when Silveſter Pierio maſter of the ſacred palace, ſhewed him ſome heretical doctrines which Frier Martin Luther had vented in his book concerning Indulgences; but indiſcreetly anſwered that Frier Martin had a fine genius, and that theſe ſurmiſes were monkiſh jealouſies. Words which Sleidan would not have failed placing in the front of his hiſtory, if he had known them (56).’

[O] I do not find that Guicciardin abuſes this Pope ſo much as Mr Varillas inſinuates.] This author wrote a great many books againſt the houſe of Auſtria, which would have been printed perhaps, if Mr Colbert had not repreſented, after the Pyrenean treaty, that it would look ill to diſoblige the Spaniards by allowing the impreſſion of ſo many injurious volumes. We have ſeen the plan of this great work, in a book called La Politique de la Maiſon d'Auſtriche (The Politics of the houſe of Auſtria). The author ſets out by a kind of apology for the liberty he has taken in touching the vices of princes. ‘I only, ſays he (57), imitate the ſtile, and copy the reverſe of the picture, which Livy has given of Hannibal †, and I have even come ſo much ſhort of others in this point, that no perſon of what condition ſoever is found ſo ill treated in my book, as Pope Leo X is, in the elogy which Guicciardin has made of him ⸸, and for which he has no where been cenſured as I can find ‡.’ It is manifeſt this elogy of Leo X is here alledged as a very ſatirical piece, otherwiſe it would be abſurd to propoſe this inſtance. Now it is certain there is nothing in Guicciardin that anſwers this idea. The twelfth book cited by Mr Varillas is leſs to his purpoſe than the two following. It is in the thirteenth book, that we find the deſcription of the trade of indulgences, as we have ſeen above, and in the fourteenth the cenſure of this Pope's extravagant expences, and his inclination to the diverſions of Muſic and Farces (58). ‘Egli per natura dedito all'ocio, & a' piaceri, & hora per la troppa licenza, e grandezza alieno ſopra modo dalle facende, immerſo ad udire tutto'l giorno muſiche, facetie, e buffoni *, inclinato ancora troppo più che l'honeſta a piaceri; pareva doveſſe eſſere totalmente alieno dalle guerre. —— He naturally loved an idle and voluptuous life, and now being exalted to that high ſtation he was averſe to affairs, the whole day being ſpent in hearing Muſic, jeſts, and buffoonries, and being exceſſively given to his pleaſures; it was thought he would be intirely averſe to the war.’ Laſtly, we find in the ſame book a general judgment on the conduct of this Pope; it is mixed with praiſes and cenſures, and can neither be reckoned ſatirical, nor even diſreſpectful. Theſe are Guicciardin's words. ‘Principe nel quale erano degne di laude, e di vituperio molte coſe, e che ingannò aſſai l'eſpettatione, che quando fu aſſunto al Ponteficato s'haveva di lui; concioſia ch' e'riuſciſſe di maggior prudenza, ma di molto minore bonta di quello ch'era giudicato da tutti (59). —— A prince who was endowed with ſeveral good and bad qualities, and deceived the expectation they had of him when he was raiſed to the Papal chair; for he ſhewed more wiſdom, but leſs goodneſs than was expected by the world.’ When this hiſtorian ſpeaks of Leo the tenth's election, he does it in a manner very much to the glory of this Pope. He owns he was free from Simony, and all other evil ſuſpicions, and that the reputation of the elected cardinal, ſtood very well in point of morality. ‘Senti di queſta elettione quaſi tutta la Chriſtianità, grandiſſimo piacere, perſuadendoſi univerſalmente gli huomini che haveſſe a eſſere rariſſimo Pontefice, per la chiara memoria del valore paterno, e per la fama che riſonava per tutto della ſua liberalità, e benignità, ſtimato caſto e di perfetti coſtumi, e ſperandoſi che a eſſenpio del padre haveſſe a eſſere amatore de letterati, e di tutti gli ingegni illuſtri: laqnale eſpettatione accreſceva l'eſſere ſtata fatta l'elettione candidamente ſenza ſimonia, ò ſoſpetto di macula alcuna (60). —— This election was exceedingly acceptable to almoſt all Chriſtendom, every body being perſuaded that he would prove an excellent Pope, from the illuſtrious memory of his father's valour, from the general opinion the world had of his liberality, humanity, chaſtity, and good morals, and hoping that in imitation of his father he would be a lover of the literati, and of all illuſtrious men: which expectation was increaſed, becauſe his election was made without Simony, or ſuſpicion of any unfair dealing.’ See in the remark [R] the contradiction Varillas falls into.

[P] Paul Jovius's apology to me ſeems trifling.] The methods this author takes to juſtify Leo X, may be reduced to four. I. He pretends that it was not from a vicious nature, but a gentle, eaſy, and magnificent temper, that this Pope, beſet by a voluptuous crew, engaged a little too far in pleaſures (61). This is but a poor excuſe: there are a great many proſtitutes, who may be juſtified upon this principle. They are not naturally wicked, brutal, and cruel; a great ſtock of good-nature, eaſy temper, and complaiſance, makes them fall into the ſnare of the tempter. I ſhall by the way, obſerve, that Politian has ſaid wonders of Leo X. This he did in a letter he wrote to Pope Innocent VIII, when this youth was made a cardinal. ‘Ita natus & factus, ita altus atque educatus, ita denique eruditus atque inſtitutus hic eſt, ut nemini ſecundus ingenio, nec æqualibus induſtria, nec preceptoribus literatura, neque gravitate ſenibus conceſſerit. Nativa in eo probitas, & genuina: diligentia quoque parentis ita impenſe culta eſt, ut ex illius ore non modo non verbum dictu fœdius, ſed ne levius quidem unquam aut etiam licentius exciderit. Non actio, non geſtus, non inceſſus in illo notatus: non aliud poſtremo quod in deteriorem partem conſpiceretur. Sic in viridi ætate cana maturitas, ut qui loquentem ſenes audiant, proavitam in eo, nos paternam certe indolem agnoſcamus. Cultum pietatis & religionis pene etiam cum lacte nutricis exſuxit: etiam tum ab incunabilis ſacra meditatus officia (62). —— This young man is ſo formed by nature and education, that, being inferior to none in genius, he neither yields to his equals in induſtry, nor his teachers in learning, nor old men in gravity. He is naturally honeſt; and ſo ſtrictly educated, that he never lets fall an immodeſt, or even a light, expreſſion. He does not diſtinguiſh himſelf by his action, geſture, or gait, or by any thing elſe that may give an ill impreſſion of him. Though a young man, his judgment is ſo mature, that even the old reſpect him as a father. He ſucked in piety and religion even with his nurſe's milk, preparing himſelf for the ſacred office even from his cradle.’ Paul Jovius ſays in the ſecond place, that if Leo be compared with his predeceſſors, he will be found very chaſt. ‘Si aliqua ex parte eo nomine ſugillari inclyta virtus potuit, Leo certè cum ſuperiorum principum fama comparatus æſtimatione rectiſſima continentiæ laudem feret (63).’ This excuſe is no better than the former. III. He ſays, that this Pope having had a good reputation as to continence, precautioned himſelf afterwards againſt the attacks of impurity, by renouncing high food, and by regular faſtings. ‘Conſtat tamen eum, quod à prima adoleſcentia opinione omnium ſummam continentiæ laudem fuiſſet adeptus, non importuna quædam pudicitiæ caſtitatique præſidia quæſiviſſe: quando nequaquam priſtinæ vitæ more tam multis delicatiſque obſoniis uteretur: Itemque animo verè pudico die Mercurii carnes non edere, die autem Veneris nihil guſtare præter legumen & olera, ac die demum Saturni cœna penitus abſtinere, incorrupta lege inſtituiſſet (64). —— It is certain however, that, having gained a great reputation for continency from his youth, he ſought out no very troubleſome guardians of his chaſtity and modeſty; ſince he did not eat ſo luxuriouſly as formerly: for on Wedneſdays he eat no fleſh, and on Fridays only pulſe and herbs, and on Saturdays faſted all day; and this way of life he religiouſly obſerved.’ This is better than all the reſt. IV. Laſtly, he ſays, that we ought to make a great difference betwixt the vices, which belong to a ſovereign as ſuch, and thoſe which belong to him as a man. And he alledges the emperor Trajan ſo beloved of the Roman people, that it was the height of their wiſhes that the ſucceeding emperors ſhould reign as well as he; and yet no one was ignorant of the ſodomy and drunkenneſs of Trajan. His meaning is, that Leo the tenth's vices were not repugnant to the qualities of a good ſovereign, but to thoſe of a good Chriſtian only, and therefore the irregularities of his youth ought to be pardoned, ſince they did not hinder his being a good prince. ‘Alia principis, alia hominis eſſe vitia quis neſcit? hæc uni privata conditione quum noceant, etiam aliquibus fortaſſe proſunt; illa verò ab dira poteſtate, & luctum & calamitatem univerſis mortalibus apportant: idque veriſſimum eſſe conſtat præclaro quondam populi Romani teſtimonio, qui neminem ſibi principem Trajano meliorem exoptavit, ought to be reckoned an Atheiſt (e). The other apologiſts have not ſucceeded much better [Q]. There is no need of confuting Mr Varillas, but by himſelf. I ſhall produce

'exoptavit, quanquam eum illicitæ libidinis ac ebrietatis cenſura notaſſet. Sed demus aliquid humanitati Leonis, uti in ſumma licentia fervidæ ætatis ac proſperæ valetudinis æſtum ægerrimè ſuſtinenti, poſtquam in magnis ſalutaribuſque virtutibus optimi atque benefici cognomentum facile meruerit (65).'

Generally ſpeaking, this author's maxim is true: it is very poſſible for a prince to be an honeſt man, and at the ſame time but a poor king; that is, a king, who cannot maintain the vigour of the laws, nor remedy the diſorders of the ſtate, On the other hand, it is very poſſible for a prince to be an ill obſerver of thoſe rules of morality, which preſcribe the duties of private perſons, and yet be a good king, that is, a king, who maintains order in his ſtate, and wiſely diſtributes puniſhments and rewards, without being burdenſome to his people, by impoſts, and pecuniary edicts. But it is very rare, that a voluptuous and prodigal prince, ſuch as Leo X was, is a good prince; to ſupply his expences, he muſt be burdenſome to his ſubjects, and commonly he diſtributes his favours, according to the humour of the miniſters of his pleaſures, and conſequently to unworthy perſons, whoſe evil adminiſtration he has not time to puniſh, being too much taken up with his pleaſures, to allow the functions of royalty that application which they demand. It were eaſy to ſhew, that Leo the tenth's ſubjects were ſufficiently loaded. Beſides, it is not conſidered, that Leo's principal dignity was of a ſacred and eccleſiaſtical nature. So that to know whether he diſcharged his duty, the great queſtion is not, whether he has done what his temporal dignity demanded, it being impoſſible to juſtify him, without ſhewing, that he diligently acquitted the duties of his other dignity, that is, obſerved the precepts of the Goſpel, and omitted nothing to recommend the practice of them to others. This was his principal function, and here his apologiſt is forced to forſake him. 'In his vero quæ rem divinam reſpicerent nequaquam ſecunda fama prægravari eſt viſus. Nam indulgentias vetera Pontificum ad parandam pecuniam inſtrumenta adeo plene atque affluenter provinciis dedit, ut fidem ſacroſanctæ poteſtatis elevare videretur (66). —— As to divine matters, his character has ſuffered not a little: for he was ſo laviſh of indulgences (thoſe old inſtruments, by which the Popes get money) that he ſeems to have leſſened the credit of the holy authority.'

A Reflexion on the uniting the ſpiritual and temporal authority in one perſon.

I muſt upon this occaſion ſay, that this blending the temporal with the eccleſiaſtical authority, in the ſame perſon, is generally the ruin of the evangelical ſpirit. This combination had place among the Pagans, and was not unſerviceable to the temporal good of religion.

Rex Anius Rex idem hominum Phœbique ſacerdos (67).

Anius, at once a king, and Phœbus' prieſt.

It has remarkably ſerved the ſame ends in Chriſtianity; but has produced an extreme corruption of manners. The eccleſiaſtical character ought to prevail, and be predominant, ſince the other dignity is only an acceſſory; and yet it is almoſt always ſwallowed up by it's colleague. The joining theſe two together, is like the joining a dead carcaſe to a living body; a fatal conjunction, where the dead communicates it's ſtench to the living body, and receives no vital influence from it.

Componens manibuſque manus, atque oribus ora,
(Tormenti genus) & ſanie, tabeque fluentes
Complexu in miſero, longa ſic morte necabat (68).

The living to the dead the tyrant join'd,
With hands to hands, and mouth to mouth, confin'd,
There, ſmear'd with blood and putrid gore, to lie,
And in the dire embrace to groan, and die.

The world, the fleſh, the weak part draws after it the reſolutions, and the concluſions, juſt as in a ſyllogiſm, the weakeſt of the premiſes, is the rule of the conſequence (69). The author of the Critique Génèrale (70) mentioning the diſtinction, between a Pope ſpeaking ex Cathedra, and the ſame Pope, ſpeaking in another manner, has related the witty ſaying of a peaſant in the electorate of Cologne. I had a long time thought, that this witty ſaying was preſerved only by tradition, but I was miſtaken. It has been printed in grave books for above an age. Duaren has inſerted it in one of his books (71), and copied it from Fulgoſius (72). Here is the whole ſtory; it is true, that an elector of Cologne is not expreſsly named in it. 'There goes a pleaſant ſtory of a German husbandman, who being at work in his field, ſaw his biſhop paſs by, attended by a train more becoming a prince, than one who calls himſelf the ſucceſſor or deputy of an apoſtle; being highly ſcandalized at it, he could not forbear laughing, and laughed ſo loud, that the reverend gentleman would needs know the reaſon of it. The husbandman anſwered in his natural way, that is, as a true and plain perſon; I laugh when I think of St Peter and St Paul, and ſee you in ſuch an equipage. How is that, ſaid the biſhop? Do you aſk how, ſays the clown? Why they were ill adviſed to walk alone on foot throughout the world, when they were the heads of the Chriſtian church, and lieutenants of Jeſus Chriſt, the king of kings, and thou, who art only our biſhop, go ſo well mounted, and have ſuch warlike attendance, that thou reſembleſt more a prince, than a paſtor of the church. To this his reverence replied, but my friend, thou doſt not conſider, that I am both a count and a baron, as well as thy biſhop. At which the ruſtic laughed more than before; and the biſhop aſking him the reaſon of it, he anſwered, yea Sir, when the count and baron, which you ſay you are, ſhall be in hell, where will the biſhop be? This confounded the right reverend, who proceeded on his journey without anſwering a word (73).'

[Q] The other apologiſts have not ſucceeded much better.] Let us ſay a word or two concerning the manner that ſome authors have endeavoured to juſtify Leo X, with reſpect to irreligion. Coëffeteau (74) only alledges theſe words of Onuphrius Panvinius (75). Erat rerum divinarum diligens obſervator. - - - He was a diligent obſerver of religious ceremonies. Rivetus (76) replies, that there 'are many profane, and many Atheiſts, who exactly obſerve the ceremonies to conceal their impiety under theſe leaves, who amongſt friends ſay, they do it ad morem, non ad rem, legibus juſtæ, non diis gratæ. Sannazar, who makes him die without receiving the ſacraments, becauſe he had ſold them before, does not repreſent him ſuch as Onuphrius would paint him to us.' Note that Sannazar does not pretend, that Leo refuſed the ſacraments. If this Pope did not communicate, &c. on his death-bed, it was becauſe of his delirium. James Gretſer, beſides Panvinius's words, alledges Leo the tenth's Bull, againſt Luther. Bulla qua Leo Lutheri errores damnat immanem hanc Pſeudologiam perſpicuè redarguit (77). - - - - - The Bull, by which Leo condemns the errors of Luther, plainly confutes this falſehood. This is pitiful; for though this Pope had had no religion, he would however have followed the ordinary ſtile in his Bull, and have expreſſed great zeal againſt a Heretic, who diſputed with him an authority on which all his temporal happineſs depended. Palavicino (78), endeavouring to anſwer the reproach which Father Paul caſt upon this Pope, of having no regard for religion (79), does three things; he alledges 1. Politian's teſtimony (80); 2. The faſts of the Pope. 3. The majeſty and good grace, with which Leo celebrated maſs. The ſecond of theſe three, if the fact be really ſo, as Paul Jovius has related it (81), is in my opinion, a good proof of religion, when we well conſider the circumſtances. The firſt ſignifies nothing, for children to a certain age, are firmly perſuaded of the truth of the leſſons of their catechiſt, and raiſe no objections againſt them. If they become irreligious, it is when they are their own maſters, and corrupt themſelves by a bad converſation, or by a wrong way of philoſophizing. The laſt thing is rather a talent of the body produce a long paſſage from his Anecdotes, containing in ſhort a pretty juſt character of Leo X [R], from whence I deſire my reader to fill up what is wanting in the body of this article. Mr Varillas is alſo miſtaken with reſpect to Paul Jovius [S].

Men of letters, of what religion or nation ſoever are bound to praiſe and bleſs the memory of this Pope, for the care he took to recover the manuſcripts of the antients; he ſpared neither pains nor coſt in ſearching for them, and procuring very good editions. I have two anecdote letters, which are a proof of this [T], and which the reader body, than a ſign of the perſuaſion of the ſoul. Let us ſee what Paul Jovius ſays. ‘ Sacra confecit, ſingulaque ceremoniarum obivit munia ſingulari cum majeſtate, ut non falſo nemo ſuperiorum Pontificum eo auguſtius & decentius ſacrificaſſe diceretur (82). He performed religious ceremonies with a majeſty and decency beyond any of the Popes his predeceſſors.’ It is very probable, that Onuphrius means no more when he ſays, he was rerum divinarum diligens obſervator, & ſacris ceremoniis deditus. A proof of religion abſolutely equivocal.

[R] I ſhall produce a long paſſage from his Anecdotes, containing in ſhort a pretty juſt character of Leo X.] We find it in the preface of this book, and is as follows. ‘ Guicciardin . . . repreſents * this Pope as an accompliſhed model of modern policy, and the greateſt ſtateſman of his age. He ſets him above king Ferdinand the Catholic, and makes him triumph in his youth over all the artifices of this old uſurper. It is to him he attributes the ſecret of getting all his deſigns ſeconded by the councils of Spain, whether they would or no. After having eſtabliſhed theſe wonderful principles, there are no ſhining virtues, but what heighten the picture of Leo X. He forms at twelve years of age, when he was made cardinal, thoſe vaſt projects, which he executed afterwards, when he was exalted to the chair of St Peter. He negotiates with the ſtates of Venice to ſave the ruins of his houſe, which had not power to withſtand the fortune of our Charles VIII. He changed not his reſolution upon ſeeing his brother loſt in the paſſing of a river. He had no other thoughts than the educating the only ſon which this brother had left in the cradle; upon which he returns to Rome, where his intrigues recommended him to the favour of Pope Julius II, and occaſioned his being choſen legate in the army deſigned to drive the French out of Italy. He is taken priſoner at the battle of Ravenna, but makes his eſcape in an unlucky juncture for him, Julius happening juſt then to die: he enters into the conclave, where he takes ſuch advantage of the caprice of the young cardinals, who were obſtinately bent on making a Pope of their own age, that he procured their votes in favour of himſelf. He joins with the Spaniards, and manages their friendſhip, as long as it is uſeful towards re-eſtabliſhing his family in the principal functions of the magiſtracy of Florence; but as ſoon as fortune turns her back upon them, and he finds they are not inclined to ſee him uſurp the duchy of Urbino, and inveſt his nephew with it, he treats with the French upon that condition; he draws up the famous Concordat, in which he baffles the ſtratagems and long experience of the chancellor Du Prat; he careſſes Francis I, as long as that king is in a condition of doing him ſervice; but no ſooner obtains of him all he deſired, but he quits him to reconcile himſelf with Charles V. He projects a new league with him, to re-eſtabliſh the Sforza's in the duchy of Milan. He ſucceeds in it better than he expected, and conceives a joy on the news of his ſucceſs, which occaſioned his death.’

[S] Mr Varillas is miſtaken with reſpect to Paul Jovius.] This hiſtorian, if we believe Mr Varillas, has not ſo much written a hiſtory as an invective with reſpect to Leo X. ‘ Paul Jovius, ſays he (83), repreſents him as a violent man, who would carry every thing by main force. He aſcribes to him the ſame warlike humour, as his predeceſſor Julius II had; he makes him even before his exaltation conceive a diſdainful contempt for the reſt of the ſacred college, founded on an imaginary precedency of the houſe of Medicis, before all the reſt in Italy; he makes him carry on this contempt to all ſplendid actions, and even the moſt auguſt ceremonies. He takes him to be the ſource and ground of the obſtinate war againſt the duke of Urbino, and the other quarrels which happened through the whole courſe of his Pontificate. In a word, he will have vanity, but an haughty and ſhocking vanity to have been his ſtrongeſt paſſion. If you deſire to know how Paul Jovius came to penetrate ſo far into the ſoul of Pope Leo, as to be able to pronounce ſuch a deciſive judgment, he anſwers himſelf before-hand, that he had been the creature of this Pope; that it was he who made him quit the profeſſion of Phyſic, and the pretenſions to a chair at Padua, to engage in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate; who made him biſhop of Como, and choſe him for his confident and aſſiſtant, in the councils wherein the moſt important and ſecret reſolutions were taken; who engaged him to write the hiſtory of his time, who employed his good offices for him in France and Spain, that authentic pieces might be communicated to him, ſuch as were neceſſary for the perfecting his work; and who diſcovered himſelf to him without reſerve, in frequent and familiar converſations.’ Our preceeding remarks ſhew, that Paul Jovius does not conceal the faults of Leo X, but it is certain, that the vice of which Mr Varillas ſpeaks, is that of all others, which Paul Jovius the leaſt imputes to him; it is even true that he attributes to him the contrary virtue. ‘ Pontifex, ſays he (84), cujus mite ingenium facilemque naturam in ſpecimen cæterarum virtutum omnes illo tempore laudabant, clementius agendum ſibi . . . . exiſtimavit. —— The Pope, whoſe mild temper and eaſy diſpoſition were at that time univerſally extolled, as a ſpecimen of his other virtues, thought he ought to ſhew a little clemency.’ This author was never biſhop of Como; nor did he obtain the epiſcopal dignity from Leo X, but Clement VII (85). This intimate confidence, and admiſſion into the moſt ſecret councils, ſeems to me a romantic fiction, I have not found the leaſt footſteps of it in the writings of Paul Jovius.

[T] I have two anecdote letters which are a proof of it.] They were communicated to me by Mr de Seidel privy-counſellor to his Pruſſian majeſty; he has inherited a very fine library of his father's, and hath conſiderably increaſed it, eſpecially with ſcarce books, and manuſcripts; he brought ſeveral from Greece, in a journey he made thither, and he very well deſerves ſuch a treaſure; for he is a learned man, and takes a great deal of pleaſure in favouring the ſciences. The copy he was pleaſed to ſend me of theſe two letters of Leo X, is faithful and exact, he has the originals by him, written in Sadolet's own hand. I ſhall obſerve, by the by, that they have printed in the Nova literaria Maris Baltici & Septentrionis (86), for the month of November 1699, a letter written on a ſubject of the ſame nature to his Daniſh majeſty, by Leo X, the eighth of November 1517. Mine are as follow:

* In the twelve firſt articles of his hiſtory.

(83) Preface to the Anecdotes of Florence. He cites Paul Jovius in his book, and the particular elogy of Leo X. Two unexact citations; for the general hiſtory of Paul Jovius comprehends ſeveral books; and he has not wrote a particular elogy on this Pope; but the hiſtory of his Life.

LEO PP. X.

Venerable Brother, Health and Apoſtolical Benediction. We ſend our beloved ſon John Heytmers de Zonvelben, eccleſiaſtic of the dioceſe of Liege, commiſſary of the Apoſtolical ſee to the illuſtrious nations of Germany, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, and Gothland, to ſearch for valuable and ancient books that have been loſt through the injury of time, in which buſineſs we ſpare no expence, only that, as we have determined from the very beginning of our Pontificate, ſolely with a deſign to promote the honour and glory of the moſt high, we may, by God's aſſiſtance, cheriſh, promote, and ſerve famous men of all ſorts, eſpecially the learned. We have been informed, that, of the ſaid ancient books, there are not a few, in poſſeſſion of your fraternity, or in the places ſubject to your juriſdiction, eſpecially relating to the Roman hiſtory. Wherefore, intending to procure the publication of as many ſuch books as can come to our hands, for the common good of all learned men, we affectionately exhort your fraternity and earneſtly entreat you in the Lord, that, if you ever propoſe to do a grateful action, you would tranſmit to us as ſoon as poſſible fair and correct copies of all thoſe books, or which we rather wiſh, the books themſelves, which ſhall be returned you, as ſoon as tranſcribed here, according to an obligation drawn up by our apoſtolical chamber, or ſuch as the ſaid John our commiſſary, bearer of theſe preſents, ſufficiently inſtructed for that purpoſe, ſhall think fit to be drawn up in the name of the ſaid chamber. And becauſe the ſaid John has promiſed in a ſhort time to give us the thirty third book of Livy, of the Macedonian war, we have commiſſioned him to give it into your fraternity's hands, to be tranſmitted as ſoon as poſſible by a faithful meſſenger, to us, or our beloved ſon Philip Beroaldus, Librarian of our apoſtolical palace. But becauſe we have ordered to be paid, here in the city, to the ſaid John, a certain ſum of money, and are indebted to him a certain quantity, for expences already made and to be made, we will, and authorize, and command your fraternity, after he ſhall have received the ſaid book of Livy, to pay, or cauſe to be paid, to the ſaid John 147 gold ducats of the chamber, out of the money ariſing from indulgences granted through thoſe provinces, in favour of the royal Fabric of the prince of the Apoſtles; which ſum we will allow in the accounts between your fraternity and the apoſtolical chamber, as at preſent we do allow, and order to be allowed. You are likewiſe to aſſiſt the ſaid John with ſafe Conducts, Letters, and Aids, and help him, thro' your provinces, in coming at books, and, if occaſion be, engage your word for him, that the books ſhall be returned within a certain time, and ſent back to their places. Which if your fraternity ſhall do, as we are fully perſuaded you will, you will acquire a great reputation among learned men, and perform a thing the moſt acceptable to us. Given at Rome, at St Peter's under the fiſherman's ring, November 26. 1517. in the fifth year of our Pontificate.

JA SADOLET.

This is the firſt of the two letters; here is the ſecond. There is ſomething in it, which may incline us to think, that the entire hiſtory of Livy was then in being. Mr de Seidel has been credibily informed, that it is believed that a canon of Magdeburg, who was one of the miniſters of ſtate to the marquis Joachim Frederic, adminiſtator of that archbiſhopric, took an advantage vantage of the confuſion things were then in, and carried away ſeveral manuſcripts out of the public library, particularly this Livy, to enrich his own. His heirs preſerved it, but they concealed the manuſcripts, becauſe they had come unjuſtly by them. At laſt the whole was deſtroyed, when the town was pillaged in the year 1631.

Dilecti filii (87) Salutem & Apoſtolicam benedictionem. Rettulit nobis dilectus filius Joannes Heytmers de Zonvelben Clericus Leodienſis diœceſeos quem nuper pro inquirendis antiquis libris, qui deſiderantur ad inclitas nationes Germaniæ, Daniæ, Norvegiæ, Suetiæ & Gothiæ noſtrum & Apoſtolicæ ſedis ſpecialem nuncium & Commiſſarium deſtinavimus, a quodam, quem ipſe ad id ſubſtituerat, accepiſſe literas, quibus ei ſignificat in veſtra Bibliotheca reperiſſe Codicem antiquum, in quo omnes Decades Titi Livii ſunt deſcriptæ, impetraſſeque a vobis illas poſſe exſcribere cum originalem codicem habere fas non fuerit. Laudamus profecto veſtram humanitatem & erga ſedem Apoſtolicam obedientiam. Verum, dilecti filii, fuit nobis ab ipſo uſque Pontificatus noſtri initio animus, Viros quovis virtutis genere exornatos, præſertim literatos, quantum cum DEO poſſumus, extollere ac juvare. Ea de cauſa hujuſcemodi antiquos & deſideratos libros, quotquot recipere poſſumus, prius per viros doctiſſimos, quorum copia DEI munere in noſtra hodie eſt curia, corrigi facimus, deinde noſtra impenſa ad communem eruditorum utilitatem diligentiſſime imprimi curamus. Sed ſi ipſos originales libros non habeamus, noſtra intentio non plane adimpletur, quia hi libri, viſis tantum exemplis, correcti in lucem exire non poſſunt. Mandavimus in Camera noſtra Apoſtolica ſufficientem præſtare cautionem de reſtituendis hujuſcemodi libris integris & illæſis eorum Dominis, quam primum hic erunt exſcripti, & dictus Joannes, quem iterum ad præmiſſa Commiſſarium deputavimus, habet ad eandem Cameram ſufficiens mandatum, illam obligandi ad reſtitutionem prædictam, modo & forma quibus ei videbitur. Tantum ad commodum & utilitatem Virorum eruditorum tendimus; De quo etiam dilecti filii Abbas & Conventus Monaſterii Corvienſis Ordinis S. Benedicti Padebornenſis diœceſeos noſtri locupletiſſimi poſſunt eſſe teſtes, ex quorum Bibliotheca cum primi quinque libri Hiſtoriæ Auguſtæ Cornelii Taciti qui deſiderabantur, furto ſubtracti fuiſſent illique per multas manus ad noſtras tandem perveniſſent, nos recognitos prius eoſdem quinque libros & correctos a Viris prædictis literatis in noſtra Curia exſiſtentibus, cum aliis Cornelii, prædicti operibus, quæ extabant noſtro ſumptu imprimi fecimus. Deinde vero, re comperta, unum ex voluminibus dicti Cornelii, ut præmittitur, correctum & impreſſum, ac etiam non inordinate ligatum, ad dictos Abbatem & Conventum Monaſterii Corwienſis remiſimus, quod in eorum Bibliotheca loco ſubſtracti reponere poſſent. Et ut cognoſcerent ex ea ſubtractione potius eis commodum quam incommodum ortum, miſimus eiſdem pro Eccleſia Monaſterii eorum indulgentiam perpetuam. Quocirca vos & veſtrum quemlibet, ea demum qua poſſumus affectione in virtute ſanctæ obedientiæ monemus, hortamur, & ſincera in Domino caritate requirimus, ut ſi nobis rem gratam facere unquam animo proponitis, eundem Joannem in dictam veſtram Bibliothecam intromittatis, & exinde tam dictum codicem Livii, quam alios qui ei videbuntur per eum ad nos tranſmitti permittatis, illos

LEO PP. X.

Beloved Sons, Health and Apoſtolical Benediction. Our beloved ſon John Heytmers de Zonvelben, eccleſiaſtic of the dioceſe of Liege, whom we lately appointed ſpecial Nuntio and commiſſary from us, and the Apoſtolical See, to the illuſtrious nations of Germany, Denmark, Sweden, and Gothland, to ſearch after ancient books, has informed us, that he has received letters from a certain perſon, whom he had appointed for that purpoſe, in which he acquaints him, that he had found in your library an ancient book, containing all the decads of Livy, and that he had obtained your leave to tranſcribe them, not being allowed to have the original book. We commend your humanity and obedience to the Apoſtolical See. But, my beloved ſons we reſolved, from the very beginning of our Pontificate, to promote and favour, with God's aſſiſtance, all men of merit, eſpecially learned men. With this view, we procure theſe kind of antient books, ſo much wanted, as many as can come to our hands, to be firſt corrected by very learned men, of which there are many, by the gift of God, in our court, and afterwards to be carefully printed, for the common benefit of the learned. But if we have not the original books themſelves, our deſign will not be fully anſwered, becauſe theſe books, the copies only being ſeen, cannot be publiſhed correctly. We have given orders in our apoſtolical chamber, that a ſufficient ſecurity be given, that theſe books ſhall be reſtored whole and uninjured to their owners, as ſoon as they ſhall have been here tranſcribed, and the ſaid John, whom we have again deputed as commiſſary for the aforeſaid purpoſe, has a ſufficient order to the ſame chamber, to oblige it to the ſaid reſtitution, in the manner and form he ſhall think proper. We only aim at the benefit and advantage of learned men. Of which our beloved ſons, the abbot and convent of the monaſtery of Corvey, of the order of St Benedict of Paderborn, are ample witneſſes; out of whoſe library when the five firſt books of the Roman hiſtory of Cornelius Tacitus were ſtolen, and through many hands came at laſt into ours, we took care to have them firſt corrected by the aforeſaid learned men reſiding in our court, and were at the expence of printing them with the reſt of the works, which were extant, of the ſaid Tacitus. Afterwards, the matter being diſcovered, we ſent one of the volumes of the ſaid Tacitus, corrected, printed, and handſomely bound, to the ſaid abbot and monaſtery of Corvey, to be placed in their library in the room of that, which was ſtolen. And that they might know, that this theft turned rather to their advantage than diſadvantage, we ſent them a perpetual indulgence for the church of their monaſtery. Wherefore, with the utmoſt affection, and in virtue of holy obedience, we exhort, and, with ſincere charity in the lord, require you and any of you, that if you ever intend to oblige us, ye would admit the ſaid John into your library, and ſuffer him to tranſmit to us from thence both the ſaid book of Livy and others, that he ſhall think proper, which ſhall be

JA. SADOLET.

LEON (Aloisio, or Lewis de) in Latin Legionenſis, profeſſor of Divinity in the univerſity of Salamanca (a), ſon of a gentleman of Caſtile, entered into the order of the Hermits of St Auguſtin the twenty ninth of January 1549 (b). He underſtood Greek and Hebrew well, and diſcovered a great deal of dexterity in explaining the holy ſcripture in his lectures. In 1588, he drew up the rules of the bare-footed monks, who began to appear under the name of Recollects. He was made vicar-general of the order, and provincial, the twenty ſecond of Auguſt 1591, and he died the day after [A] at Madrid, at ſixty four years of age. He had heen engaged in a very troubleſome affair before the tribunal of the Inquiſition; but he had extricated himſelf with honour, after ſome years captivity (c) [B]. I doubt not that this occaſioned an explanation that he made of a verſe in Solomon's Song [C]. His Latin Commentary on that book of Scripture was printed at Salamanca in the year 1589 (d). He publiſhed it likewiſe in Spaniſh (e). There are ſome other books of his writing [D], which have made it wiſhed that the reſt of his works were publiſhed (f).

[A] He was made vicar-general and provincial the twenty ſecond of Auguſt 1591, and died the next day.] For all this they ſay, that he governed the province well, and that he gave riſe to a more ſtrict obſervance. ‘ Vicarii Generalis officio, & Provincialis munere 1591. 22. Auguſti honoratus, Provinciam laudabiliter rexit, arctioriſque vitæ initium fuit . . . . . Obiit . . . . . altero ab electionis die in Provincialem (1).’ Who could imagine an author ſhould be capable of ſuch a narrative as this? I know not whether Elſſius did not mean, that Lewis de Leon had been ſome years vicar general of the order, but that he was made provincial only the day before his death. By this we ſhould eaſily underſtand, that this Auguſtin diſcharged his office very worthily: but Elſſius's narrative will however be very defective.

[B] He had been engaged in a very troubleſome affair before the tribunal of the Inquiſition; but he had extricated himſelf with honour after ſome years captivity.] Let us quote an apologiſt of the archbiſhop of Sebaſte (2). ‘ Father Aloyſio de Leon an Auguſtin, ... Profeſſor of Scripture at Salamanca, was near five years a priſoner in the Inquiſition of Spain. But having at laſt found an equitable judge, he came out innocent, was re-eſtabliſhed in his office, and entered Salamanca in triumph, which covered his unjuſt cenſurers with confuſion.’ Elſſius makes the impriſonment of this Salamanca profeſſor laſt but two years, and he takes a pleaſure in deſcribing the circumſtances of his glorious re-eſtabliſhment. ‘ Edidit Heroicum ſpecimen præclaræ patientiæ, & magni animi indicium. Cum enim aliquorum invidia S. Inquiſitioni delatus ſimulque conſtrictus, ejuſdem carceribus biennium integrum detentus fuiſſet, tandem infracti animi vir, publico triumpho, cum palma & laurea educitur, ac veſte candida, in ſignum innocentiæ, amictus, præcone præeunte, deducitur, priſtiniſque honoribus, titulis, ac Profeſſioni Theologicæ reſtituitur. Primam vero lectionem, poſt tenebras, ut auſpicabatur, pleno conceſſu ad novitatem evocato, inquit: Dicebamus heſterna die (3). —— He gave an heroic inſtance of patience and fortitude. For being accuſed by ſome envious perſons to the Inquiſition, and impriſoned two whole years, this brave man was at laſt brought out in public triumph, dreſſed in white, as a ſymbol of his innocence, and preceded by an herald; and was reſtored to his former honours, titles, and Divinity-profeſſorſhip. The firſt lecture he read after his impriſonment, before a numerous audience, he began thus: We ſaid yeſterday.’

[C] His impriſonment occaſioned an explanation which he made of a verſe of Solomon's Song.] I ſpeak of the verſe, in which the ſpouſe ſays: The watchmen that went about the city found me, they ſmote me, they wounded me; the keepers of the walls took away my vail from me *. Aloiſio de Leon pretends, that the ſpouſe ſpeaks thus in the perſon of good Chriſtians perſecuted by the eccleſiaſtical powers (4). He obſerves, that theſe kind of vexations are proofs the moſt hard and difficult to be ſupported, and which God often reſerves for the moſt perfect. ‘ It may perhaps be thought ſtrange, adds he, that the ſpouſe always meets with the watchmen in her way, from whom ſhe not only receives no aſſiſtance, but even receives injuries and bad treatment. Is it to be believed, that thoſe who are appointed to preſide over the faithful, and who govern the churches of God (for they are to watch the city and it's walls) inſtead of affording them the leaſt ſuccour, often afflict and perſecute good men, and thoſe who love God moſt? Yet this is what all that follows in this divine ſong obliges me to believe. And certainly, as there is nothing better, nothing more uſeful to ſalvation, than good biſhops, who faithfully diſcharge the duties of their ſacred miniſtry, on the contrary unjuſt and wicked paſtors, who make the authority, they have received, to govern the people of God, ſubſervient to their deſigns and intereſts, are hurtful to all in general, and principally to the beſt men, and the greateſt ſaints, and are good for nothing but to ruin them. There has always been a great number of theſe paſtors in the church, and it is to them, that this verſe of the Canticles, which I explain, is to be applied.’ He ſays ſeveral other things in the ſame ſtrain, and more home: they may be ſeen in French in the work that I quote (5). I would fain know whether any commentator, well ſatisfied with his biſhop, and who has always been of the ſtrongeſt party, has explained in the ſame manner theſe words of Solomon's Song. Perſecution ſharpens the wit, and makes a man wonderfully clear-ſighted in diſcovering the myſtic ſenſe.

[D] There are ſome other books of his writing.] A treatiſe printed at Salamanca in 1590, de utriuſque agni typici ac veri immolationis legitimo tempore, in which he maintains, that the Paſcal lamb was ſlain the fourteenth of the moon (6), and that Jesus Christ, who conformed himſelf to this practice in celebrating the Paſſover, was crucified on that ſame day (7). A treatiſe de probæ matriſfamilias officio; another de divinis Nominibus (8). A commentary on the twenty ſixth Pſalm (9). Note, that this writer is one of thoſe, who apply to Mahomet the predictions of the Apoſtles concerning Antichriſt (10).

LEON (Peter Cieça de), author of a Hiſtory of Peru. He left Spain, his native country, at thirteen years of age, to go into America, where he ſojourned ſeventeen years (a). He ſaw there ſo many curious things, that he reſolved to give an account of them. I ſhall mention ſome of them if it be only to ſhew the injuſtice of thoſe who pretend that the Chriſtians firſt taught the people of America to be wicked [A]. This cannot be ſaid without a great many reſtrictions, poſſibly in ſome countries of this new world, the ſtupid and ſimple inhabitants might honeſtly and frugally have followed the laws of nature, and learned deceitfulneſs and debauchery by their commerce with the Chriſtians; but, generally ſpeaking, the corruption of the Americans was ſo brutal and enormous, that we cannot ſufficiently deteſt it. The deſign

[A] I ſhall mention ſome of them, if it be only to ſhew the injuſtice of thoſe who pretend, that it was the Chriſtians firſt taught the people of America to be wicked.] He ſays, that the grandees in the valley of Nora, endeavoured to take from their enemies, as many women as they could, that they lay with them, and fed the children they had by them, very delicately to the age of twelve or thirteen; when finding them well fatted, they killed and eat them. This among them, was reckoned a moſt delicious banquet (1). Let us hear what treatment the inhabitants of this country gave their priſoners of war. They reduced them to the condition of ſlaves, they obliged them to marry, and eat all the children that were the fruit of thoſe marriages, and afterwards eat the ſlaves themſelves, when they were no longer able to beget children. 'Mangiavano i figlivoli de quei ſchiavi, & poi mangiavano gli iſteſſi ſchiavi quando erano tanto vecchi, che non potevano generare (2).' The firſt time the Spaniards entered this valley, a lord called Nabonuco, came in a friendly manner to ſee them, attended by ſome women; night being come, two of them did lie at full length, on a carpet, another laid herſelf a-croſs to ſerve as a pillow to Nabonuco, while the two others ſerved him for a mattras. He laid himſelf along upon the two firſt, and taking another woman by the hand, who was very handſome, was asked what he deſigned to do with her; he anſwered, he deſigned to eat her, and alſo to feed upon a child which ſhe had (3). The author obſerves, that in the country of Quito, the women tilled the ground, and took care of the harveſts; and that the men employ themſelves only in ſpinning, and houſe-keeping (4). They worſhipped the ſun in Peru, and one of the principal acts of adoration, was the offering him ſix teeth, which the votaries had pulled out of their heads (5). There were ſeveral provinces in that country, where the ideas of honour, as to chaſtity, were wholly extinguiſhed. One of their diverſions was ſinging the brave actions of their anceſtors; this they did dancing to the ſound of a drum, and drinking till they were drunk; then they took out the woman they liked beſt, and enjoyed her, and no body found any fault with it. 'Alcuni pigliano quelle donne, che gli piacciono, & condottele in certe caſe, Sfuocano con quelle la lor luſſuria, non ſe lo recando a biaſmo, perche non conoſcono qual dona ſi conſerva con la verecondia, ne tengono conto di honore, e manco riguardano al mondo (6).' Thus we ſee what we are to think of thoſe who ſpeak ſo much of the good morals of the Americans, and pretend, we have taught theſe nations to be wicked, ſince we carried the light of the goſpel among them. The moſt debauched Spaniards had never ſeen in their own country, what they ſaw in the new-found-world, women running after them in furious tranſports of luſt, and provided with ſome uncommon philtres to heighten the pleaſure. Here follows ſome Italian lines upon it. 'Nell' Iſtorie del l'Indie narra Amerigo Veſpucci d'eſſer capitato ad una certa coſta, dove trovò femmine di tanta libidine, che come ſpiritate correvano dietro a' ſuoi marinari, perche uſaſſero con eſſo loro; e dice, che havevano un ſugo di non ſo che erba, col quale bagnando le parti genitali de gli huomini, non ſolo cagionano, ut citius, ac ſæpius erigerent, ſed etiam quod eorum penis in inſolitam excreſceret magnitudinem: il che piaceva loro mirabilmente (7).'

Here is ſomething ſtill worſe. The author informs us, that in the province of Carthagena, the men look on the bride's having her maidenhead, as a fault, and refuſe to conſummate the marriage, till ſhe has been well cleanſed of that ſpot, by her relations, or by her friends. In ſome places they leave this good office to be performed by the mother; but for fear of deceit they will have the operation done in the preſence of witneſſes. 'In certe parti della provincia Cartagena, quando maritano le figlivole, & che la ſpoſa deve andare a marito, la madre della giovane in preſentia d'alcuni ſuoi parenti le toglie la virginità con le dita, ſi che riputavano, che fuſſe piu honoro mandarla à marito coſi corrotta, che con la ſua virginità. Ma tra queſti coſtumi uſati da loro, era miglior di alcune terre, che i parenti, ò amici toglievano la virginità alla giovane & con queſta conditione, la maritavano, & il marito la riceveva (8).' Diodorus Siculus, aſcribes the ſame humour to the iſles which we at preſent call Majorca and Minorca (9). He affirms, that in the celebration of their marriages, the husband did not enjoy the bride till all the relations and friends, who were invited to the wedding-feaſt, had enjoyed her round, each according to the rank which his age gave him (10). It is very ſtrange, that a nation ſo laſcivious (11), ſhould be ſo little jealous; for, generally ſpeaking, the more people are inclined to this brutal pleaſure, the more ſubject they are to jealouſy. Witneſs the Turks and Moors. The latter are the fartheſt in the world from this humour of the Americans of the province of Carthagena: there is nothing they inſiſt on in the bride ſo much, as that ſhe ſhould have her maidenhead, and if they are not well convinced the day after the marriage, that they have had it, they ſend her back to her parents. See Maroc's Voyages, publiſhed by Mr de St Olon, in the year 1694. There lives a people on the borders of the Red-Sea, who are jealous, to a degree of phrenzy, they are not ſatisfied, unleſs precautions are taken, from the very cradle, which oblige the bridegroom to begin by a kind of chirurgical operation. Cardinal Bembo's Latin will let us into the meaning of this. 'Aliis poſt hos relictis populis, mare rubrum ingreſſi, complures nigrorum item & bonorum hominum, ac bello fortium civitates adierunt: qui natis ſtatim fœminis naturam conſuunt, quoad urinæ exitus ne impediatur: eaſque cum adoleverint, ſic conſutas in matrimonium collocant; ut ſponſi prima cura ſit conglutinatas atque coalitas puellæ oras ferro interſcendere: tanto in honore apud homines barbaros eſt non ambigua ducendis uxoribus virginitas (12). —— Paſſing by other people after theſe, and entring the Red-Sea, they touched at ſeveral towns inhabited by blacks, but men of virtue, and brave in war: who, immediately upon the birth of a female child, ſow up nature, ſo as only to leave a paſſage for the urine, and, when they grow up, give them thus ſowed up in marriage; ſo that the husband's firſt care is to cut a paſſage with an inſtrument; ſo careful are theſe Barbarians to be ſure of a maiden-head, when they marry.' How can man be ſubject to follies ſo diametrically oppoſite!

Let us return to the Americans. The moſt part remove the grievances themſelves, which their married ſtate might be ſubject to, if the women contracted came maids to the nuptial bed. One would think they were reſolved to truſt only to themſelves; they leave nothing to do for the relations or friends, I mean, that before ever they ſpeak of contract, or marriage, they do all they have a mind to with thoſe they afterwards marry. 'Si maritavano alla foggia de i lor vicini: & odo dire, che alcuni, o la maggior parte, prima chè ſi maritino, togliono la virginità à quelle, che s'haveano da maritare, meſcolandoſi con quelle luſſurioſamente (13).' For the reſt, this contempt of virginity is not the general taſte of the Americans. There are ſeveral American nations, where the huſbands require it; but the greateſt part do not find it, they come too late. 'La maggior parte de gli Indiani ſi maritano con le figlivole & ſorelle d'altri, ſenza ordine, & pochi trovano le mogli vergini (14).' What the author obſerves concerning Sodomy, is horrid; it was openly and publickly practiſed. 'Non oſtante c'haveſſino molte donne belliſſime, tuttavia (ſi come da loro inteſi) uſavano publicamente il triſto vicio della ſodomia, & anco ſe ne vantavano alla ſcoperta (15).' There were even temples in which it was committed as a pious action (16); an abomination unknown to the Paganiſm of antient Greece, though the proſtitution of women, in honour of the gods, was very common. I have not obſerved in Cieça, that there were any nations in this new world, who did not cover their ſecret parts; but other relations poſitively affirm it, and with this very ſtrange circumſtance, that thoſe of the female ſex, who had their virginity, ſign of our Cieça was to give an entire Hiſtory of Peru, in four parts (b): we do not know whether he finiſhed them all; but his firſt part was printed at Seville in the year 1553. He began it in 1541, and finiſhed it in 1550 (c). He was at Lima, the capital of the kingdom of Peru, when he put the laſt hand to it, and was then thirty two years of age (d). This book has been tranſlated into Italian [B].

virginity, concealed nothing, and only thoſe who had loſt it, covered their natural parts. 'Hiſpanis ulteriora tentantibus, terra eſt objecta, continens paulo minus decies centena millia paſſuum ab Hiſpaniola protenſa meridiem verſus: atque in ea populi ſub rege bellum cum finitimis gerente occurrerunt: quorum fœminæ virum paſſæ nullam partem corporis, præter muliebria, virgines ne illam quidem tegebant (17).' This is very ſurprizing, ſince the laws of decency are every where more relax for married women than for maids.

Note, that this aſtoniſhing corruption, which had extinguiſhed the laws of humanity and modeſty, and had ſunk theſe people into the cruelty and ferocity of canibals, and the moſt monſtrous laſciviouſneſs, had not extinguiſhed or ſtifled the ideas of religion. They believed the immortality of the ſoul: this appears by all their funeral ceremonies (18); they adored the ſun (19), they believed a creator of all things (20), they offered ſacrifices to their idols, and even ſpared not human blood in them (21). The author obſerves over and over, that they worſhip the devil; but it is under the notion of a being extreamly powerful, and which, notwithſtanding it's wickedneſs, has ſomething in him of the divine nature. 'Indiani di Tacunga credono l'immortalità dell' anima, quanto intendiamo da loro, & che vi ſia un Creatore del tutto. Conſiderando la grandezza del cielo, il muovimento del Sole, della Luna, & altre coſe maraviglioſe, quantunque acciecati dal Demonio, credono, che eſſo habbia poſſanza in ogni coſa. Benche alcuni conoſcendo le ſue malvagità, & come è ſempre buggiardo, & gli tratta peſſimamente, lo hanno in odio, ma pur l'ubbidiſcono per timore, credendo, che ſia in lui qualche Deità (22). —— The Indians of Tacunga believe the immortality of the ſoul, as they ſay, and that there is a creator of all things. Conſidering the vaſt extent of the heavens, the motion of the ſun, the moon, and other wonderful things, though blinded by the devil, they believe that he has power over all things. Some, knowing his malice, and that he is always a lier, and uſes them very ill, hate him; yet they obey him out of fear, believing that there is ſomething divine in him.' He obſerves, that the prieſts live a holy life, and are much reſpected (23).

[B] That book has been tranſlated into Italian.] Nicolas Antonio (24) obſerves, that the Spaniſh edition of Seville, 1553, in folio, was followed the year after, by that of Antwerp, in 8vo, and by an Italian edition of Rome, 1555, in 8vo. He ſays, that Auguſtin de Gravaliz is the author of the Italian verſion. I add, that it was printed at Venice, appreſſo Giordano Ziletti, in the year 1557, in 8vo. This is the edition I make uſe of, and the name of the Printer in the title, but I find in the laſt page theſe words: In Vinegia, appreſſo Domenico de Farri, ad inſtantia di M. Andrea Arrivabene MDLVI. Nicolas Antonio did not know of this edition. He ſays, that the other parts of this hiſtory were impatiently expected (25).

LEON (Gonsalez Pontius de), was of Seville, and lived in the XVIth century. He reſided at Rome in the year 1585, and he there publiſhed, in Latin, an Anſwer (a) to a book, which a Proteſtant of Germany, named Leonhart Waramund, had written in defence of Gebhard Truchſes, archbiſhop of Cologne. He was very warm in this Anſwer; and, according to the practice of thoſe times, he loaded his adverſary with a thouſand reproaches. He does not write ill in Latin for a Spaniard [A], and he does not want learning.

[A] He does not write ill in Latin for a Spaniard.] I will not ſay, that there have been no Spaniards, who have underſtood the Latin language very well, and have uſed it with purity and eloquence. My meaning is that generally the writers of that nation, are too negligent in that reſpect. Some of them even diſregard the Orthography, and put an v for a u, and a y for an i. I will give this inſtance of it. 'Cujus (rei maritimæ) itidem polytica tractatio, diſpoſitio, & Archiguvernatio à Magno Philippo noſtro Hiſpaniarum Rege..... tuæ ſolicitudini & prudentiæ emandata prædicatur.' Theſe are the words of the licentiate John Baptiſt de Urquiola & Elorriaga, in a preliminary epiſtle of a treatiſe of Civil-law (1), printed in 1663 (2), and dedicated to Don Franciſco Ramos del Manzano. He always writes Lypſius inſtead of Lipſius.

LEONCLAVIUS (John), one of the moſt learned men of the XVIth century, was born in Weſtphalia, and was a gentleman. He ſpent near two years in the court of the duke of Savoy, on the affairs of Lazarus Suendius (a); and afterwards travelled a long time in the retinue of baron Zerotini. He lived alſo ſome ſome years in the family of the baron of Kiltz. He had been invited to Heidelberg, to be Greek profeſſor; but the death of prince Caſimir made that invitation uſeleſs (b). During his ſtay in Turkey, he collected excellent materials for the compoſing the Ottoman Hiſtory; and it is to him the public is indebted for the beſt accounts we have of that empire [A]. He had joined to the knowledge of the learned tongues, that of the Civil-Law,

[A] The public is indebted to him for the beſt accounts we have of that empire.] Hear what Thuanus ſays of him. 'Juris Romani Græcique conſultiſſimo, & rerum Turcicarum apprime perito; ad quas linguæ ipſius Byzantina peregrinatione comparatam cognitionem, exactam ultimæ hiſtoriæ Græcæ lectionem, & acre ac admirandum judicium attulit, quod non ſolum ſcriptis ab ipſo dum viveret publicatis, ſed in iis quæ poſt mortem ejus edita ſunt, elucet. —— He was thoroughly converſant in the Greek and Roman law, and particularly skilled in Turkiſh affairs, to the ſtudy of which he brought a knowledge of the language itſelf, acquired by travelling to Conſtantinople, an exact reading of the later Greek hiſtory, and an acute and wonderful judgment; which appears not only from the works he publiſhed in his life-time, but alſo from thoſe, which came out after his death.' Leonclavius has written Hiſtoriæ Muſlimanicæ Turcarum libri 18. Apologetici duo, prior eſt libitinarius index Oſmanidarum; poſterior continet epiſtolas de rebus Turcicis. Commonefactio de præſenti rerum Turcicarum ſtatu. Annales Turcici cum ſupplemento, & pandectis hiſtoriæ Turcicæ (1). This laſt work is properly the tranſlation of a book written by the Turks themſelves; I mean of the Turkiſh annals, which Jerome Beck of Leopoldſdorf, Ferdinand's embaſſador, brought from Conſtantinople in 1551. Ferdinand cauſed them to be tranſlated in High-Dutch, by John Spigelius (2), and afterwards Leonclavius tranſlated them into Latin (3).

[B] The tranſlation of the Baſilica.] I mean, the Abridgment of the Baſilica: his work is intituled Verſio & Notæ ad Synopſim LX Librorum Baſilicon, ſeu univerſi Juris Romani, & ad Novellas Imperatorum. It was printed at Baſil in the year 1575. Melchior Adam ſpeaks thus of it (4): ‘ Evulgavit cum annotationibus ſexaginta librorum βασιλικῶν, hoc eſt univerſi Juris Romani auctoritate principum Romanorum in Græcam linguam traducti, Eclogam ſive Synopſim ante non viſam: item Novellarum antea non publicatarum librum. —— He publiſhed ſixty books of βασίλικα, that is of the Univerſal Roman Law, tranſlated, by the authority of the Roman emperors, into the Greek tongue; an Eclogue or Synopſis never before ſeen; likewiſe a book of Novels, never before publiſhed.’ Mr Teiſſier muſt give me leave to obſerve, that his manner of reciting this title may miſlead the reader: he has alſo publiſhed, ſays he (5), ſexaginta libros βασιλικῶν, Eclogam ſive Synopſim, & Novellas cum notis. This is mentioning the Baſilica intire, and another book intituled Ecloga ſive Synopſis, and conſequently multiplying and confounding things. The ſame author citing Melchior Adam affirms, that Scaliger calls Leonclavius the moſt learned Civilian of his time, and ſets him even above the great Cujas (6). Melchior Adam ſays not a word of it; and beſides what we find in Leonclavius's praiſe in the Scaligerana, is much beneath this character. ‘ Leunclavius has written the beſt concerning the Turks.’ ‘ Leunclavius fuit Weſtphalus, ſed non Barbarus: bene intellexit Græca Conſtantinopolitana & inferioris ævi, omnia ejus ſcripta ſunt utilia, imo neceſſaria; Græca Juriſconſultorum intellexit, ſed Autorum Veterum non intellexit, ut H. Stephanus, qui paulo ante obitum multa ſcripſit ad me contra Leunclavii editionem Xenophontis. Leunclavius habebat ſcorta ſecum. Cluſius eum novit famliariſſimè (7). —— Leunclavius was a Weſtphalian, but not a Barbarian: he well underſtood the Conſtantinopolitan Greek affairs, and thoſe of the laſt age of the empire: all his works are uſeful, nay neceſſary: he underſtood the Greek of the Civilians, but not of the antient authors, as Henry Stephens, did, who, a little before his death, wrote many things to me againſt Leunclavius's edition of Xenophon. Leunclavius kept miſtreſſes: Cluſius was intimately acquainted with him.’ Thus ſpeaks the ſecond Scaligerana. Leonclavius's learning is more praiſed in it than his morals, ſince we are here informed that he kept whores in his houſe. Let us not forget his Jus Græco-Romanum (8) in two volumes in folio, and his Notæ ad Paratitla ſeu ad Collectionem Conſtitutionum Eccleſiaſticarum (9) in 8vo.

[C] His other verſions were eſteemed, though the critics have pretended to find many faults in him.] ‘ He is one of the moſt famous tranſlators, that Germany ever produced. He has given us the verſion of Xenophon reviſed three times; that of Zoſimus; of the annals of Conſtantine Manaſſes; of thoſe of Michael Glycas; of the abridgment of the ſixty books of the Baſilica; and of ſeveral works of St Gregory Nazianzen . . . . . . He has alſo corrected Xylander's Verſions of Dion, and that of Chalcondyle by Clauſar (10).’ Mr Baillet, whoſe words theſe are, informs us alſo of the praiſes, Mr Huet has given this tranſlator. They are very advantageous. The notes on Zozimus, in the Engliſh edition, 1679, do not give ſuch an idea of this man's capacity. Henry Stephens ſeverely criticized his tranſlation of Xenophon (11), and was expoſed to ſeveral complaints of his adverſary. Mr Baillet mentions this diſpute; this is what Melchior Adam tells us of it. ‘ Litem tamen ei ſuper iſta interpretatione Xenophontea criticam & Grammaticam movit Henricus Stephanus, vir & typographus clariſſimus, edita in ejus errores inſignes inquiſitione autoſchediaſtica. Contra & Leonclavius de Stephano conqueritur, quod contra fidem datam, & præter officium viri boni, Xenophontis à ſe Latine redditi exemplar, ſicut & Zoſimi, detinuerit. Et faſſus eſt Stephanus, accepiſſe ſe illam Xenophontis verſionem ab annis circiter octodecim: poſt tredecim aut quatuordecim amplius annis ſibi non viſam, ſed cum è ſua ſuppellectile libraria, militum incuria, belli tempore aliquot libri incendio periiſſent: neſciviſſe, an in illorum numero Xenophon à Leonclavio verſus, fuiſſet. Tandem, interjecto anni amplius ſpacio, librum inventum fuiſſe, ſitu obſitum, & membrana craſſa, qua involutus erat, conſervatum (12). —— Henry Stephens, a famous Printer, had a critical and grammatical controverſy with him about that interpretation of Xenophon, and publiſhed extemporaneous remarks on his egregious blunders. Leonclavius, on the other ſide, complains of Stephens, for detaining, contrary to promiſe, and the duty of a good man, the copy of his tranſlation of Xenophon, as alſo of Zoſimus. And Stephens owned, that he had received that tranſlation eighteen years before; that after thirteen, or fourteen, years at moſt, he ſaw it no more; but that, during the war, when ſome books of his library, through the careleſſneſs of the ſoldiers, were burnt, Leonclavius's tranſlation of Xenophon, for ought he knew, might be among them. That at laſt, in a little more than a year's time, the book was found, mouldy, and preſerved by the thick parchment, in which it was bound.’

[D] What he publiſhed of Cæſarius, put James de Billy into a violent paſſion.] Leonclavius publiſhed four dialogues (13) of Cæſarius, brother to St Gregory Nazianzen, which he had tranſlated into Latin. It is diſputed whether this work ought to be aſcribed to Cæſarius. Father Labbé has referred that inquiry to another time. ‘ Plura, ſays he (14), adverſus Leunclavium primum eorum (dialogorum) editorem declamavit Jacobus Billius Prunæus præfatione in decimam orationem ſancti Nazianzeni, quæ alias expendemus accuratius.’ Lambecius (15) eſpouſes Leonclavius warmly againſt James de Billy's invectives.

[A] Sobriety, chaſtity, and an averſion to avarice, were the diſtinguiſhing virtues of his life.] If he had not been of a gay humour, and ſmiling countenance, he might have paſſed for a true Stoic. He eat little, ſlept little, abſtained from wine and women; all diſhes were alike to him; he took without choice whatever food was ſet before him, and could hardly diſtinguiſh one piece of money from another: ‘ Cibi & vini maxime abſtinens, ſomnique minimi, præſertim verò Veneris continentiſſimus, uſque adeò mollioris vitæ voluptates abdicavit, ut pecunias, luxuriæ inſtrumenta, nec agnita quidem monetæ nota contemneret; oblatum, & nulla delectum cura cibum caperet; nec unquam de fortuna quereretur. . . . . . eum hercle perfectum Stoicum putaſſes, niſi honeſto ori liberalis hilaritas affuiſſet (1).’

[B] It was to this great purity of manners that he attributed the vigorous health he enjoyed.] This Paul Jovius tells us as from his own mouth. ‘ Quum ego aliquando comiter ab eo peterem, ut ingenuè proferret, quonam arcano artis uteretur, ut tanto corporis atque animi vigore vitia ſenectutis eluderet: vividum, inquit, ingenium merit muſt needs have been illuſtrious, ſince the two Scaligers mention him with commendation [D]. I queſtion whether we are to believe what one of them ſays, that Leonicenus being afflicted with the Falling-ſickneſs in his youth, was ſo weary of his life, that he had like to have laid violent hands on himſelf [E]. This able Phyſician wrote ſeveral good books [F] ; and was a very good Poet [G]. He died in 1524. He ſet up for a great critic on Pliny, which did not pleaſe his diſciple Calcagninus, whoſe words ingenium perpetua, Jovi, vitæ innocentia, ſalubre verò corpus, hilari frugalitatis præſidio facilè tuemur (2). —— When I once courteouſly intreated him, ingenuouſly to tell me, by what ſecret art he preſerved his health both of body and mind, and eſcaped the inconveniencies of old age; Jovius, ſaid he, we eaſily preſerve the mind's health, by a perpetual innocence of life, and that of the body, by the chearful defence of temperance.' He had been ſaying (3), that Leonicenus, at ninety years of age, had all his ſenſes perfect, and a very ſtrong memory ; that he walked without a ſtick, and did not ſtoop, though very tall. Obſerve well, that a virtuous life has not always the effect, which Leonicenus aſcribes to it. There are thoſe, who might diſpute the crown of chaſtity and ſobriety with him, and whoſe conſcience was as clear as his, whoſe days notwithſtanding have been few and evil, they lived but a ſhort while, and yet were often ſick.

We will add to Paul Jovius another witneſs. I have read a paſſage in Melchior Adam, by which one might gather, that Leonicenus had told Paul Langius, his diſciple, that he took the chaſtity of his youth to be the cauſe of his long life. ‘ Audivit in Italia (Joannes Langius) . . . . . Nicolaum Leonicenum, Dioſcoridis illuſtratorem : qui annum ætatis attigit nonageſimum ſextum, cùm ampliùs ſexaginta annos Ferrariæ docuiſſet. Hic dixit, ſe viridi vegetâque uti ſenectâ, quia caſtam juventutem virili ætati tradidiſſet : ediditque opuſculum, in quo omnibus ægris ſalutem & vitam reſtitui conciliarique poſſe docuit (4). —— John Langius heard, in Italy, Nicolas Leonicenus, the interpreter of Dioſcorides, who was ninety years old, having taught ſixty years at Ferrara. This Phyſician ſaid, that he enjoyed a ſtrong and healthy old age, becauſe he had lived chaſtly in his youth, and publiſhed a book, in which he taught, that health and life might be reſtored to all ſorts of ſick perſons.' You ſee in this paſſage, that he was the author of a book wherein he maintained, that all kind of diſtempers were curable. Undoubtedly he excepted that of old age, at leaſt acknowledged this diſeaſe incurable. He had the experience of it ; for obſerve what Langius, an eye-witneſs, ſays of him. ‘ Ferrariam igitur venimus, ubi Leonicenum, elegantioris medicinæ illuſtratorem, edentulum fere, & jam ex ſenio maraſmo tabeſcentem, convenimus : quem ſenile ætatis ejus decus reveriti, perplexis de erroribus Plinii problematibus obtundere nolebamus (5). —— We arrived at Ferrara, where we met with Leonicenus, the improver of the more elegant practice of Phyſic, almoſt toothleſs, and wearing away with old age, whom, out of reverence for the dignity of his years, we would not diſturb, by propoſing difficult problems of Pliny to him.' The letter, in which Langius ſays this, is without date : and therefore we cannot judge by it, whether Paul Jovius is miſtaken as to the vigour he aſcribes to old Leonicenus.

[C] He lived ninety ſix years.] Naudæus is miſtaken, when he makes him live above a century. I ſhall give his own words, becauſe they contain ſome other very curious particulars. ‘ Hippocrates, Galenus, Avenzoar, Leonicenus, cogitate vos quantum tempore, loco, vivendi ratione inter ſe diſcrepantes, hoc uno vitæ termino plane conveniunt, quem omnes ultra centeſimum annum protraxêre (6). —— Hippocrates, Galen, Avenzoar, Leonicenus, though differing in time, place, and manner of living, yet agree in their term of life, which each protracted to above an hundred years.'

[D] The two Scaligers mention him with commendation.] See in what terms , ‘ (7) Leonicenus à patre ſemper imprimis commendatus, & Medicorum ſui temporis facile princeps judicatus. —— Leonicenus was particularly commended by Scaliger the father, and eſteemed by him the greateſt Phyſician of his time.' Thus ſays the father : let us now hear the ſon. ‘ De eo viro non niſi honorificè prædicare debemus, vel eo nomine quod primus Philoſophiam & Medicinam ipſam cum humanioribus literis conjunxit. Primus enim ille nos docuit, homines qui ſine bonis literis Medicinam tractant, eſſe ſimiles iis qui in alieno foro litigant (8). —— We ought never to ſpeak of this man without reſpect, if it were but for this reaſon, that he was the firſt, who united Philoſophy and Medicine with polite learning. For he firſt taught us, that men, who, without learning, apply themſelves to medicine, are like thoſe, who go to law at a ſtrange bar.'

[E] . . . . one of them ſays, that Leonicenus being afflicted with the Falling-ſickneſs in his youth, was ſo weary of life, that he had like to have laid violent hands on himſelf.] ‘ Mirum præterea, continues he, accepi de viro. A pueritia, imo à cunabulis ipſis, ad 30 annum morbo comitiali adeo tentabatur, ut cum ad ſe redierat, pertæſus vitæ pene ſibi manus afferret. Sed poſt trigeſimum annum plane eo malo defunctus, omnibus membrorum ac ſenſuum officiis integer, nulla morbi ſuſpicione ad 94 annum pervenit. Et ſi bene memini, triduo antequam decederet è vita, operam dederat lectioni. —— I have heard a ſtrange particular of this man. He was ſo troubled from his youth, nay even from his cradle, to his thirtieth year, with the Falling-ſickneſs, that, when he came to himſelf, he was ſo tired with life, as almoſt to lay violent hands on himſelf. But after his thirtieth year, being entirely free from that diſtemper, and having all his limbs and ſenſes entire, he reached his ninety fourth year, without ſuſpicion of any diſeaſe : and, if I remember right, he read lectures but three days before he died.' Here is a condition to be envied ; not becauſe Leonicenus lived ninety ſix years ; that alone was a poor thing, and rather a curſe than a bleſſing ; but becauſe he had preſerved to this old age the uſe of his underſtanding, his memory and his ſenſes, and that his laſt ſickneſs was very ſhort (9).

[F] Leonicenus wrote ſeveral good books.] The tranſlation of ſeveral tracts of Galen, of Hippocrates's Aphoriſms, and Ariſtotle's firſt book De partibus animalium. De Plinii & plurium aliorum Medicorum in medicina erroribus. De tribus doctrinis ordinatis ſecundum Galeni ſententiam. De formativa virtute. De dipſade & pluribus aliis ſerpentibus. Quædam de herbis & fructibus, animalibus, metallis. De morbo Gallico, ſive Neapolitano. Contra ſuarum tranſlationum obtrectatores apologia. A book intituled Antiſophiſta, which made Paulus Jovius ſay (10), that ‘ nemo errores Sophiſtarum importuna garrulitate cuncta fœdantium eloquentius atque validius confutavit (11) (quàm Leonicenus). —— No one has more eloquently and forcibly confuted the errors of the Sophiſts, who ſpoil every thing by their impertinent garrulity, than Leonicenus.' He tranſlated into Italian, Dion's Hiſtory, and Lucian's dialogues, to oblige Hercules, duke of Ferrara, who did not underſtand Latin (12). I forgot his treatiſe De vipera, againſt which Rhodiginus tells us, a learned man has written (13). ‘ Nec me fallit ex eruditioribus quemdam edito etiam libello Maraſſum à vipera diſparaſſe, quo Nicolai Leoniceni viri undecunque ſcientiſſimi (14) placita uberius de hujus animalis natura convellat.

[G] He was a very good Poet.] This Giraldi aſſures us. ‘ Erat & Leonicenus merito inter poëtas collocandus, nam cùm ſenex optimos verſus faceret, & interdum è Græco in Latinum transferret, tum in juvenili ſua ætate non modo meditatos argutè & doctè compoſuit, ſed etiam ut ſæpè mihi memorare ſolitus fuit, ex tempore & impræmeditata carmina cecinit (15). —— Leonicenus might deſervedly have been ranked among the Poets ; for, both in his old age, he made excellent verſes, and ſometimes tranſlated out of Greek into Latin, and alſo in his youth he not only compoſed ingeniouſly and learnedly, but even, as he often told me, repeated verſes extempore.' words I ſhall cite [H]. They are much to the honour of Leonicenus.

He did not apply himſelf to the practice of Phyſic; and being aſked the reaſon, he anſwered, that he did more ſervice to the public by teaching other Phyſicians, than if he himſelf made viſits to the ſick (c).

When I ſaid that he was born at Vicenza, I followed the herd of writers; but I ſhould have ſhewn their error. They have not underſtood the meaning of the epithet Vicentinus which he gives himſelf: it ſignifies only that he was born in the Vicentine. The place of his birth is called Lunigo in Italian (d) and Leonicum in Latin: this is the reaſon why he took the ſirname Leonicenus.

For in that century, which produced ſo many great men, the Hermolaus's, Politians, Picus's, Merula's, and Domitius's, he died the laſt, at almoſt an hundred years of age, and, which may ſeem ſtrange, with all his ſenſes perfect. He wrote many things, tranſlated many things out of the Greek, and revived many things in Phyſic, which had been loſt. He was perpetually at variance with barbarous Phyſicians: he alſo cenſured Pliny too ſeverely, from which undertaking I in vain diſſuaded him. Laſtly, what happens to but a few, he lived to ſee his own poſterity: his death greatly afflicted me, upon a private, as well as a public, account; for he had been my tutor, and I foreſaw the loſs the Latin language, and learning, would ſuffer by his death.*’

LEONIN (Elbert or Engelbert), in Flemiſh de Leew, a native of the iſle of Bommel in Guelderland, was one of the ableſt Civilians of the XVIth century, and verſed in ſtate affairs. He ſtudied firſt in his native country, then at Utrecht, afterwards at Emmeric, and laſtly at Louvain. He did not confine himſelf to the ſtudy of the Belles Lettres in this laſt town, under the learned Peter Nannius, but alſo applied himſelf to the Civil-Law, and became a Licentiate in that faculty in 1547. He afterwards went to Arras to learn the French tongue, returned to Louvain at the year's end, and married a daughter of the firſt profeſſor of the Civil-Law [A]. A profeſſor's chair of the Canon-Law becoming vacant on the ſecond day of his marriage, he was promoted to it. He diſcharged that office worthily, and grew famous as well by his lectures, as by his anſwers to ſeveral Law caſes ſent him from all parts of Europe. He ſucceeded Gabriel Mudæus firſt profeſſor of Civil-Law in 1560, and from that time ſaw his reputation daily increaſe; inſomuch that the great lords and magiſtrates of the Low-Countries did conſult and honour him. Even thoſe who were at variance among themſelves, agreed in intruſting him with their moſt ſecret affairs and differences, and refuſed not his arbitration, tho' the obſtinacy of their hatred rendered ineffectual his endeavours to reconcile them. He had the honour to be intimately beloved by the prince of Orange; and this was one reaſon, why he would never re-ingage in the party of the king of Spain, after he had once embraced that of the lords and provinces aſſociated in defence of their liberty. I ſhall give his other reaſons below [B]. He was choſen chancellor of Guelderland

[A] He married at Louvain, a daughter of the firſt profeſſor of the Civil-Law.] Her name was Barbara de Haze (1). If her huſband deſerved the ſirname Longolius on account of his tallneſs (2), ſhe deſerved a particular ſirname on account of her long life. Valerius Andreas tells us, ſhe lived fifty two years with her huſband, and thirty ſix a widow (3). She was twelve at leaſt when ſhe married. Add theſe numbers together, and they will make an entire century. There will be no error in the calculation, though there is in Valerius Andreas's way of reckoning: according to him we muſt allow at leaſt a year between the licence and the marriage of Leonin: the licence was taken out in 1547: Leonin muſt be married then in the year 1548, now he died in 1598. How then can it be ſaid that he lived fifty two years with his wife? all this I know appears from his epitaph (4); but we ought to conclude from it, that he married Barbara de Haze, in 1546, and Valerius Andreas is to be blamed for not ſeeing his falſe computation.

[B] I ſhall give his other reaſons below.] We find in him a rare example of conſtancy, for being once ingaged with the States, he unalterably continued the ſame courſe to his death, though a zeal for religion did not tie him to them. It is no extraordinary thing to ſee people die in the party they have eſpouſed at the beginning of a faction or revolution; but if the train of ſuch an enterprize has been long and perplexed, one while favourable, another diſadvantageous, you commonly ſee the ſame perſons quit and re-eſpouſe three or four times the ſame party, and it is a meer chance if, ſometimes, they end as they begin. Death ſeizes them, when they are returned to their firſt ſtarting place: ſome years more would have cauſed them to repair perhaps to the oppoſite ſtandard. The ſureſt way of preventing change, is either to embrace, out of an ardent zeal for religion, the revolting party, or ſo to irritate one's prince, as to leave no room for confiding in the amneſty promiſed; nothing of all this was the cauſe of Leonin's conſtancy, which was very long and without interruption. What then were his motives? they were theſe. He enjoyed the intimacy and particular friendſhip of the prince of Orange. This made him ſuſpected by the royaliſts and by the king himſelf. They believed he was an accomplice in the rebellion; this however, ſays he, was a falſhood (5), but he did not think fit to truſt thoſe who falſely ſuſpected him. Beſides he was a counſellor of ſtate to the new republic, he had been truſted in the greateſt affairs: he thought therefore it would be perfidious to reveal them to the other party, as he muſt have done, if he had changed ſides (6). Beſides he was of Solon's opinion, that in civil wars, an honeſt man ought to embrace the weakeſt ſide, and the moſt expoſed to danger. ‘Sed & Solonis dictum, inquit, ac conſilium ob oculos habebam, quod bonus vir in civilibus diſſenſionibus partem eligere debeat inferiorem, & magis periculoſam (7).’ A man muſt be a thorough Philoſopher land after the departure of archduke Matthias in 1581. He was one of the embaſſadors of the States to the king of France after the death of the prince of Orange in 1584, he made a ſpeech at the audience they had of Henry III (a), and in the conferences concerning the offer of the ſovereignty. He harangued at the Hague, in the name of the ſame States, the earl of Leiceſter, whom the queen of England had given them for governor. He inſinuated himſelf into the good graces of this earl, and the other Engliſh lords, and adviſed them to exerciſe their authority with moderation; but contrary counſels prevailed. ſopher, to give ſuch advice, and much more ſo to follow it. But how comes it, that Solon did not adviſe to adhere to the reaſonable ſide? I believe we may anſwer for him, that each of the contending parties, in a republic, pretend the public good, and that with ſuch a train of objections, and anſwers, that private perſons cannot eaſily diſtinguiſh the right from the wrong. What remains then, but to engage in the leaſt powerful faction? It is not ſo hard to diſtinguiſh it. It ought to be preferred not only becauſe it is generous to aſſiſt the weak againſt the ſtrong, but becauſe the temptation to commit acts of injuſtice is greater in the prevailing, than in the weaker faction. You will ſay that the latter would not be more moderate than the other, if it had equal power. I grant it; but as long as inability deprives it of occaſions to tyrannize, you ought to balance and avoid being an abettor of violences. If it becomes uppermoſt, quit it, for fear it ſhould draw you into oppreſſive methods in it's turn. This, by the by, and on occaſion of Solon's maxim, and with the corrective I have joined to it, viz. that at the bottom, you know not who is right and who is wrong.

[C] He behaved ſomewhat too freely on the ſubject of religion.] He would have religion reduced to a great ſimplicity, and all left to the judgment of God and the angels, that exceeds the reach of human underſtanding. We ought, ſays he, to admire and adore the Deity rather than define it. Let us baniſh from the republic ſubtile diſputations. 'Ego ſimplicem religionem amplectendam ſemper prædicavi, & etiam 'nunc prædico, prorſus divina & humani ingenii captum excedentia, divinitati & ſecreto Dei atque Angelorum judicio relinquens: honorandam potiùs & 'admirandam divinitatem quàm definiendam judicavi. 'Enixè laboravi, ut nimiùm ſubtiles diſputationes è 'Republica ejicerentur, de quo memini in Oratione ad 'Ordines habita, quæ poſt primam Centuriam Conſiliorum meorum impreſſa eſt (8). —— I always declared for ſimplicity in religion, and now alſo declare 'for it, leaving divine things, and ſuch as exceed human comprehenſion, to the Deity, and the ſecret judgment of God and angels: I have thought the Divinity 'ought to be honoured and admired, rather than defined. I have laboured hard to baniſh from the commonwealth ſubtle diſputations; which I mention in an 'oration delivered before the States, and which is printed 'after the firſt century of my Conſilia.' St Aldegonde found him amiable in all reſpects, except that he had too great an averſion to Theological ſubjects: you are ſhipwrecked, ſays he, writing to him, on thoſe maxims, do no injury, live honeſtly, &c. To me this looks like making the labours of the prophets and apoſtles quite uſeleſs. 'Elbertus Leoninus, Haggeus Albada, 'aliique inter proceres religioni reformatæ nunquam nomen dederant. Ille honeſtate civili contentus, religionem omnem ſuſque deque habebat: uti eum ipſi 'graphicè deſcripſit Phil. Marnixius in ſelect. Epiſt. 'Belgarum centur. 2. ep. 44.' "Nihil enim eſt in te "quod non ſit ſuaviſſimum, ſi hoc unum demas, quod "nimium es atheologus. Dum enim tuis illis formulis, quid dico formulis? imo oraculis, Neminem lædere, honeſtè vivere, aliiſque tanquam ſcopulis inhæreſcis, videris mihi Apoſtolorum omnium ac Prophetarum laborem omnem propè inanem ducere (9)." '—— Elbert Leonin, Haggai Albada, and others among the nobles, never embraced the Reformed Religion. The former, ſatisfied with civil honeſty, eſteemed all religions alike; as Phil. Marnixius, in ſelect. 'Epiſt. The two firſt (10) beginning with public affairs, grew old in a retreat, But the third called from the obſcurity of his cloſet to the acquaintance of great men, ſpent the reſt of his life in public employments. He ſpeaks of our Leoninus, and ſays he was a man, who derived from nature, what the precepts of the old Philoſophers aimed at; he was in a manner free from paſſion, he followed the republican party, not through intereſt or prejudice, but becauſe he found himſelf engaged in it. 'Elbertus 'Leoninus in umbra ſtudiorum quondam educatus, & 'ante pacem Gandavenſem regiarum partium miniſter, 'tunc ſummus Geldriæ juridicus conſiliis publicis immoriebatur, homo natura conſecutus, quo veterum 'magiſtrorum præcepta nituntur, ut affectu pene omni vacaret, adeo quidem, ut partes quoque non ſtudio 'ullo, ſed quia ſic invenerat, ſequeretur (11).'

LEONTIUM, an Athenian courtezan, made herſelf famous, firſt by her leudneſs, and next by her application to the ſtudy of Philoſophy. The ſecond of theſe would have repaired the diſgrace of the firſt, if Leontium had renounced her amorous intrigues, when ſhe betook herſelf to Philoſophy; but it is ſaid ſhe abated nothing of her pleaſures; and that becoming Epicurus's diſciple, ſhe proſtituted herſelf to all the ſcholars of that Philoſopher. It is ſaid too that he himſelf came in for a ſhare, and that he made no ſecret of it (a). They who pretend that the ſlanders raiſed on his morals, are a malicious impoſture of his enemies, do not own there paſſed any thing diſhoneſt betwixt him and Leontium; but they cannot deny that he has expreſſed a deal of friendſhip for her in his letters (b). This they can grant without leaving room for ill conſequences. She was either the wife or the concubine of Metrodorus, and had a ſon by him, whom Epicurus in his laſt will recommended to his executors. This furniſhes us with a proof

Some take her for the ſame Leontium, who was miſtreſs to the Poet Hermeſianax [A]. It is more certain that ſhe applied herſelf in good earneſt to Philoſophy [B], and even became an author [C]. Note, that her Metrodorus was one of the chief diſciples of Epicurus. She had a daughter, who carried herſelf very ill, and died a violent death, as we ſhall ſee below [D].

I know not from whence Ludovicus Vives borrowed the reaſon he gives why ſhe wrote a book againſt Theophraſtus. He pretends ſhe did it becauſe that Philoſopher had publiſhed ſeveral good things relating to marriage [E].

[A] Some take her for the ſame Leontium, who was miſtreſs to Hermeſianax.] Athenæus (1) ſpeaks of this miſtreſs, and even produces ſeveral verſes, taken from the third book of the elegies, which Hermeſianax had wrote in praiſe of Leontium. Mr Menage (2) is of opinion, that ſhe is the ſame with Epicurus's good friend; and therefore cenſures Voſſius for placing (3) Hermeſianax in the number of the Poets, whoſe age is unknown. This Poet's verſes, preſerved by Athenæus, contain a long liſt of amorous perſons, and it is probable the whole work turned on that ſubject; for Antoninus Liberalis (4) has taken from the ſecond book of theſe elegies a love hiſtory. Parthenias has taken from the ſame Poet the fifth and twenty ſecond of his ſtories. As to the twenty ſecond, he cites Hermeſianax in general, but as to the fifth, he cites him thus Ἑρμησιάναξ Λέοντι. It is evident, that we muſt read Λεοντίῳ, and not Λέοντι (5). Mr Menage adds that Hermeſianax writ an excellent poem upon his native city Colophon, mentioned by Pauſanias (6). Doubtleſs Voſſius miſled Mr Menage by theſe words; ‘ Hermeſianax Colophonius, poëta Elegiacus de patria Colophone egregium carmen condidit, ut ex Pauſania cognoſcere eſt (7).’ Pauſanias leaves no room for aſcribing ſuch a performance to him. He only ſays he does not believe Hermeſianax was alive, when Lyſimachus deſtroyed the city of Colophon; for, adds he, Hermeſianax would certainly have lamented the ruin of this city in ſome part of his poems. Ὡς Φοίνικα ἰάμβων ποιητὴν Κολοφώνιον, θρηνῆσαι τὴν ἅλωσιν. Ἑρμησιάναξ δὲ ὁ τὰ ἐλεγεῖα γράψας οὐκ ἔτι (ἐμοὶ δοκεῖν) περιῆν· πάντα γάρ που καὶ αὐτὸς ἂν ἐπὶ ἁλούσῃ Κολοφῶνι ὠδύρατο. Phœnix Colophonius ïamborum ſcriptor eam exciſionem deploravit; nam Hermeſianacta qui elegos ſcripſit, ad illud uſque tempus ſuperſtitem fuiſſe non crediderim, neque enim is in aliqua carminum ſuorum parte exciſam Colophonem non defleſſet (8). You ſee he had been ſpeaking of the Poet Phœnix, a native of Colophon, who had written lamenting verſes on that ſubject. We may collect from this paſſage of Pauſanias, that Hermeſianax was cotemporary with Epicurus, and therefore Chronology may very well allow them both to have loved the ſame Leontium. Pauſanias would not have expreſſed himſelf as he did, if this elegiac Poet had preceded Epicurus many years. Note, that this Lyſimachus, who deſtroyed Colophon, is one of thoſe who ſhared the conqueſts of Alexander.

[B] She applied her ſelf in earneſt to Philoſophy.] Hence it was that the Painter Theodorus drew her in a meditating poſture. Leontium Epicuri cogitantem (9).

[C] She became an author.] She wrote againſt Theophraſtus, who was one of the ſtrongeſt pillars of Ariſtotle's ſect, and the ornament of his age. Cicero tells us, that this book was very politely written. ‘ Non modo Epicurus, ſays he (10), & Metrodorus, & Hermachus contra Pythagoram, Platonem, Empedoclemque dixerunt, ſed meretricula etiam Leontium contra Theophraſtum ſcribere auſa eſt, ſcito quidem illa ſermone & Attico, ſed tamen tantum Epicuri hortus habuerit licentiæ, & ſoletis queri.’ Theſe laſt words have exerciſed the critics; they conſtrue them ſeveral ways, and I queſtion whether any of them has hit on the right; however, we know the drift of the author. He would exaggerate the licentiouſneſs of Epicurus's ſchool; and the better to effect this, he alledges the boldneſs of Leontium, a leud woman who durſt write againſt Theophraſtus. But Cicero, as great an Orator as he was, has not been ſo happy as Pliny, in giving a lively idea of the indignity he conceived in Leontium's enterprize. We learn from Pliny, that this woman's boldneſs occaſioned a proverb, the meaning of which was, that there was no remedy but a rope, if men of the greateſt parts were inſulted at this rate. ‘ Ceu vero neſciam adverſus Theophraſtum, hominem in eloquentia tantum ut nomen divinum inde invenerit; ſcripſiſſe etiam feminam & proverbium inde natum ſuſpendio arborem eligendi (11).’

[D] She had a daughter, who . . . died a violent death as we ſhall ſee.] She was called Danaë; in point of gallantry ſhe followed her mother's ſteps, but I do not know whether ever ſhe troubled her head with Philoſophy. Athenæus ſays nothing of it, and he is the only author, from whom I learn any thing of her. He ſays (12) ſhe took up the profeſſion of a courtezan, and became concubine to Sophron, governor of Epheſus. She inſinuated herſelf alſo into the favour of Laodice, even ſo far as to be her oracle and confident. Underſtanding that Laodice deſigned to put Sophron to death, ſhe made a ſign to him to retire. He underſtood the danger of which ſhe gave him notice; and pretended to have forgotten ſomething, without which he could not anſwer to the point, upon which he was examined. He obtained time to recollect himſelf, but he appeared no more, and eſcaped by night to Corinth. Laodice had no ſooner diſcovered, that Danaë was the cauſe of his eſcape, but ſhe condemned her to the precipice; Danaë knowing her death unavoidable, was haughty enough not to anſwer to Laodice's queſtions; but ſhe was not ſilent, when ſhe went to the place of execution; ſhe dropt a moſt inſolent murmur againſt providence. It is not without reaſon, ſaid ſhe, that ſeveral perſons deſpiſe the gods; the only recompence they give me for ſaving the life of my huſband, is a precipice: whilſt Laodice, who has murthered her's, enjoys great honours. Ἀπαγομένην δὲ ἐπὶ τὸν κρημνὸν εἶπειν, ὡς δικαίως οἱ πολλοὶ καταφρονοῦσι τοῦ θείου, ὅτε ἐγὼ τὸν γενόμενόν μοι ἄνδρα σώσασα, τοιαύτην χάριτα παρὰ τοῦ δαιμονίου λαμβάνω. Λαοδίκη δὲ τὸν ἴδιον ἀποκτείνασα, τηλικαύτης τιμῆς ἀξιοῦται. Cum ad præcipitium duceretur, dixiſſe, a multis non injuria Deos contemni. Nam quod, inquit, virum meum ſervavi, hanc mihi gratiam Dii rependunt; quod autem Laodice maritum ſuum interfecerit, in maximo honore eſt (13).

[E] Vives pretends, that ſhe wrote her book againſt Theophraſtus, becauſe that Philoſopher had publiſhed ſeveral good things relating to marriage.] It is probable ſuch pieces would diſpleaſe a woman, who was never married, and entertained gallants; but this probability would not excuſe Ludovicus Vives, if, without having read the fact in any author worthy of credit, he gave it for certain, as he does in theſe words: ‘ Novum malis non eſt, odiſſe bene monentes: ſed in hoc ipſo materiæ genere Theophraſtus, quum de conjugio graviſſime multa ſcripſiſſet, meretrices in ſe concitavit: & proſiliit Leontium, Metrodori Concubina, quæ adverſus tantum & facundia & ſapientia virum, librum ſine mente, ſine fronte evomeret (14). It is no new thing for the vitious to hate thoſe who give good advice: hence Theophraſtus, having wrote many excellent things concerning matrimony, brought the harlots upon him; one of whom, Leontium, the concubine of Metrodorus, wrote a fooliſh and impudent book againſt that eloquent and wiſe author.’ This particular is neither remarked by Cicero, nor by Pliny, when they ſpeak of the book, which Leontium publiſhed againſt Theophraſtus (15). For this reaſon it ſhould not have been advanced without a good authority. This is infinitely leſs neceſſary with reſpect to facts, which we meet with every where. I will obſerve by the way, that the French tranſlation of this work of Vives, by Anthony Tiron, and by order of Plantin, in 1579, does not contain this paſſage, nor ſeveral others. This ſurprizes me; for I ſuppoſe the occaſion of theſe omiſſions was, that Plantin did not make uſe of the editions, which Vives had reviſed and enlarged.

LEONTIUS.

LEONTIUS, an Athenian Philoſopher towards the end of the IVth century, had a daughter whom he inſtructed in the ſciences, and made her very learned. Perceiving alſo, that ſhe no leſs diſtinguiſhed herſelf by the advantages of the body, than by the talents of the mind, he believed her learning and her beauty might very well ſerve her for a fortune. For this reaſon he left her nothing in his will, dividing all he had between his two ſons. This injuſtice of Leontius, was the occaſion of her coming to the empire; for ſhe it was, who under the name of Athenais, appeared ſo amiable to the emperor Theodoſius, and the princeſs Pulcheria, that Theodoſius married her. The ſuit ſhe commenced againſt her brothers, on account of her father's will, obliged her to implore Pulcheria's protection; and hence came her good fortune (a). Father Garaſſe has given a wrong account of this [A]. Conſult the diſſertation which I cite (b).

(b) Sebaſt. Kortholtus de puellis Poëtriis, pag. 12, & ſeq.

[A] Father Garaſſe has given a wrong account of this.] God ſeems to act, ſays he (1), ‘as formerly did the Philoſopher Leontius, who having three daughters, one of exquiſite beauty, and the two others much deformed, left no fortune to the firſt, but only her beauty, ſaying, ſhe was the beſt provided for, as in effect ſhe was, for her beauty made her an empreſs, and gave all his eſtate to the other two, ſaying, that with all that, they would have enough to do to find husbands; for as to lands which are of themſelves beautiful, good and fruitful, God gives them no other dowry, &c.’ All the authors, who ſpeak of Athenais, give her two brothers, and not two ſiſters, ſo that it is an inſufferable licentiouſneſs in a modern author, not only to change brothers into ſiſters, but to make them frightfully ugly, and put diſobliging words into their father's mouth.

LEOVITIUS (CYPRIAN)

LEOVITIUS (Cyprian), a famous Aſtronomer, was born in Bohemia. He pretended to Aſtrological predictions, but had no ſucceſs in them. Bodin has cenſured him ſeverely [A]. Lewis Guyon, copying Bodin as a true plagiary, knew not how to make uſe of what he ſtole [B]; but he tells a ſtory pleaſant enough about the fright Leovitius put people in by his falſe prediction of the end of the world [C]. This great Aſtrologer

[A] Bodin has cenſured ſeverely.] His words are theſe (1). ‘Leovitius had foretold as a certainty, that the emperor Maximilian ſhould be monarch of all Europe, to puniſh the tyranny of the other princes . . . . . which is not yet come to paſs, and there is no great likelihood it ever will. But he did not foretel what happened a year after this prophecy, that Sultan Solyman ſhould beſiege and force the ſtrongeſt place of the empire, nay of Europe (2), in the ſight of the emperor and Imperial army, without the leaſt oppoſition. . . . . It is very ſtrange, that Leovitius ſhould ſee nothing of the great changes which have happened in his three neighbouring kingdoms; how could he foreknow the end of the world, which has not been revealed to the angels? The only reaſon he gives is this, that the religion of Jeſus Chriſt, and the world, muſt end under the watery triplicity, ſince Jeſus Chriſt was born under it; hereby ſuppoſing a ſecond deluge; which is no leſs impious than ignorant, whether we follow the maxims of Aſtrologers, who agree, that no planet ever ruined it's own houſe: Now it is certain, that Jupiter is in Piſces in the great conjunction of the year MDLXXXIII, and LXXXIV, and that the conjunction of theſe two planets is always amicable: or whether we take the authority of Plato in Timæus, and that of the Hebrews, who ſay, that the diſſolution of the world is cauſed ſucceſſively, firſt by water, and afterwards by fire.’ Add to this paſſage, that of the 554th page (3), where we ſee, that this Aſtrologer had preciſely fixed the end of the world to the year 1584. ‘Since he has ſo poſitively aſſerted it, that it cannot be any ways doubted, why would he calculate Ephemerides for thirty years after the end of the world?’ This is a queſtion which Bodin (4) asks with a great deal of reaſon. But this ſuppoſes, that Leovitius's Ephemerides extended to the year 1614. Yet Geſner's Epitome, Thuanus (5), and ſeveral others, affirm, that they reached only to the year 1606. They were printed at Augsburg in 1557. As to his Prognoſticon in viginti annos, it was printed in 1564, and tranſlated into French the year following. This is the book Bodin means, when he charges Leovitius with ignorance about the taking of Sigeth.

[B] Lewis Guyon, copying Bodin . . . . . did not know how to make uſe of what he ſtole from him.] The twenty third chapter of Guyon's third book (6), contains ſcarce any thing but what is taken from Bodin, both as to the facts as well as the expreſſions, and yet Bodin is not ſo much as once named by him. Beſides, Lewis Guyon makes a very ill uſe of Bodin's obſervations; I will give but one inſtance of it. Leovitius (7) had foretold, ſays he (8), as a certainty, that Maximilian the emperor ſhould be univerſal monarch of Europe, to chaſtiſe the tyranny of other princes . . . . . . which is not yet come to paſs, and there is no great likelihood it ever will. Theſe are Bodin's expreſs words; they were good ſenſe in the original; but they are abſurd in the tranſcriber; for, when Guyon made uſe of them, Maximilian the emperor had been a long time dead (9). Was it not ſmartly ſaid then, that there was no great likelihood he ſhould ever be univerſal monarch of Europe? Bodin, who uſed theſe words in his French edition, becauſe Maximilian was then alive, took care to leave them out in the Latin edition which he was preparing (10), after this emperor's death.

[C] Guyon tells a pleaſant ſtory about the fright Leovitius put people in by his prediction of the end of the world.] Let us make uſe of Lewis Guyon's words. ‘In the year 1584, a rumour was ſpread almoſt throughout Chriſtendom, that the world ſhould certainly be at an end that year: all the Aſtrological mathematicians had affirmed it in their Almanacks, and many curates and preachers told it to their congregations; which put the people into ſuch a fear, that multitudes received the holy ſacrament, having firſt faſted and confeſſed their ſins. In ſome boroughs of this country, and of the Marche, which I forbear to name, the people even made their wills, and I, happening to be by, let them underſtand, that, if all periſhed, there would be none to inherit; and beſides, that all their goods muſt periſh too. Pantagruel made the ſame remonſtrance to Panurge, who, being toſſed at ſea in a dreadful ſtorm, and ſeeing the danger which he had not been uſed to, deſpaired of eſcaping, and inſtead of labouring like the reſt, to cut down the maſts, lower the ſails, and throw the lading over-board, talked only of making his will, and roared and ſwore for pen, ink, and paper; but Pantagruel reproved him, telling him, either we ſhall all periſh, or all be ſaved; if all periſh, who ſhall carry your will to your relations? If all are ſaved, your will ſignifies nothing. At the ſame time, the poor ignorant people kept ſolemn faſts month after month, and gave great part of their goods to the prieſts, in order to prolong the time of the great and laſt judgment. This opinion proceeded from Cyprian Leovitius, a German (11).’ Here is an author, who inſinuates, that the prieſts artfully kept up this terror, on purpoſe to procure to themſelves gifts; they fiſhed in troubled water; they know how to make their advantage of every thing. I like his obſervation on the contradiction the people fell into. They firmly believed the end of the world, and yet made their wills; what an abſurdity is this? I wonder Mr Petit (12) could mention two or three predictions predictions of this nature, made by Stoffler and Regiomontanus, and forget this of our Leovitius.

A man of a great deal of wit and learning, and a profeſſor in the Mathematics, has lately communicated to me an extract he has made of a book of this Aſtronomer. I make no alteration in his letter. ‘I have met with a ſmall book in 4to, of Leowicz's, De conjunctionibus magnis inſignioribus ſuperiorum planetarum, &c. in quarta monarchia cum eorumdem effectuum hiſtorica expoſitione. He obſerves the conjunctions of Saturn and Jupiter from our Savour's time, and a little before, to the year 1564, and adds ſome particulars from hiſtory, which he pretends had a relation to the circumſtances of theſe great conjunctions. He afterwards makes his prognoſtics and predictions for the following years, to the year 1584. Here, and every where elſe in the book, he finds a thouſand great events, with which he honours the eclipſes, comets, and conjunctions; a notion unworthy a perſon of good ſenſe. Laſtly, he foretells the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in Piſces, in May 1583, and the conjunction of almoſt all the planets in Aries, about the latter end of March, and the beginning of April 1584, attended with an eclipſe of the Sun in the twentieth degree of Taurus: he doubts not but all this will bring on a comet, and the comet produce the end of the world, at the end of the watery, and the beginning of the fiery Trigon. He gives an admirable reaſon for it, which has been contradicted by experience. The world, ſays he, began by the conjunction in the fiery Trigon, therefore it will end by the watery Trigon, I anſwer, 1. Nego antecedens. 2. Nego conſequentiam. This is not all; the year 1584, or, at lateſt, the year 1588, is the end of the watery Trigon, therefore the world will end at that time; for it were not worth while to wait 800 years more for another watery Trigon, and the entire revolution; beſides that the world at that rate would laſt near 6400 years, which is manifeſtly againſt the prophecy, quod cum prophetia manifeſte pugnat, &c.’

[D] He died at Lawingen.] It is a town of Swabia upon the Danube. Leovitius made it his ordinary abode. Here Tycho Brahe made him a viſit in 1569, and had much diſcourſe with him at table about Aſtronomy (13). Thuanus is miſtaſten as to the town Leovicius died in: he ſays it was at Augſburg (14).

LERI (JOHN DE), a Proteſtant miniſter was of Burgundy (a). He was a ſtudent at Geneva, when he heard that Villegagnon deſired ſome paſtors might be ſent him to Braſil. He made that voyage with the two miniſters, which the church of Geneva ſent thither in 1556. They arrived at the iſle of Coligni under the tropic of Capricorn, in March 1557. Leri left that country, with ſome others, the fourth of January 1558, and arrived at the port of Blavet, in May the ſame year (b). He wrote a relation, or account of this voyage [A], which has been commended by Thuanus (c), and Leſcarbot has inſerted the abſtract of it in his Hiſtory of New France. He was admitted miniſter after his return from America. I cannot juſtly tell where he exerciſed his miniſtry, but I know he was at Sancerre, when that town was taken, in 1573. He publiſhed a relation of this ſiege, and the cruel famine the beſieged underwent. The mareſchal de la Châtre gave him a paſs to go where he pleaſed, even before the capitulation was ſigned (d). He went to Bern, and met with a good reception from Mounſieur de Coligni, ſon to the admiral, for which he expreſſed his thanks, by dedicating to him the relation of his voyage to Braſil. I have not yet been able to diſcover the reſt of his adventures. La Croix du Maine has committed three faults [B].

I have ſeen his memorable hiſtory of the town of Sancerre. It was printed in 8vo, in the year 1574, and contains 253 pages. The abridgment, which was publiſhed in Latin at Heidelberg, apud Joannem Mareſchallum, in 1576, contains but 50 pages in octavo.

[A] He wrote a relation of this voyage.] The account he gave of this country, made his friends deſire him to publiſh a book on this ſubject. He finiſhed it in the year 1563, and gave his manuſcript to a friend who ſent it back to him by ſome perſons from whom it was taken at one of the gates of Lyons. Not being able to recover it, and giving it for loſt, he ſet about compoſing it anew, and loſt it a ſecond time; for, eſcaping from Charité, upon the Loire, and making the beſt of his way to get into Sancerre, at the time of the maſſacre of St Bartholomew, he left all his books and papers expoſed to the pillage. Yet he recovered his firſt work at Lions, in 1576, at a time when he leaſt expected it, and publiſhed it the year following (1). There were ſeveral editions of it. I make uſe of the third, which is that of the year 1594, for the heirs of Euſtachius Vignon. I have cited many things from it in this Dictionary (2). One obſervation, which this author makes, has been much taken notice of (3); viz, that, in regard of what is called religion among other nations, it may confidently be affirmed, that thoſe poor ſavages have none, and not only ſo, but that, if there be a nation, which lives without God in the world, it is truly this (4). The miniſter Peter Richier confeſſes as much in a letter he wrote from this country. He expreſſes in it his concern to ſee no likelihood that theſe people will ever be converted to the goſpel, ſince they are not only ignorant of the difference between vice and virtue, but even of the exiſtence of a God. ‘Bonum à malo non ſecernunt; denique vitia quæ natura in cæteris gentibus naturaliter arguit, loco virtutis habent. Saltem vitiorum turpitudinem non agnoſcunt, adeo ut hac in re à brutis parum differant. Cæterum quod omnium perniciociſſimum eſt latet eos an ſit Deus, tantum abeſt ut legem ejus obſervent, vel potentiam & bonitatem ejus mirentur: quo fit ut prorſus ſit nobis adempta ſpes lucrifaciendi eos Chriſto: quod ut omnium eſt graviſſimum, ita inter cætera maxime ægri ferimus (5).’ But, adds he, it will be objected, that they are a Tabula raſa, which will eaſily receive a tincture of the goſpel, as having no contrary impreſſions. To this he gives no other anſwer, than that the difference of language is a great obſtacle, and that the interpreters, they muſt employ, were Papiſts. ‘Audio quidem qui mox objiciet eos tabulam raſam eſſe quæ facile ſuis poſſit depingi coloribus, quod nativo hujuſmodi colorum ſplendori nihil habeat contrarium. Sed norit ille quantum impediat Idiomatum diverſitas. Adde quod deſunt nobis interpretes qui Domino ſint fideles (6).’

LESBOS.

LESBOS, an iſland of the Ægean ſea, near the Helleſpont, and the continent of Aſia, was famous for it's good wines (a), it's marble (b), the fertility of it's ſoil, the illuſtrious men it had produced [A], and for many other things. Cadmus, or Cadmilus, one of the Cabiri, inhabited it, and there became the father of Prylis, who was an extraordinary ſoothſayer, and very ill affected to the Trojans (c). It held the ſeventh place among the great iſlands of the Mediterranean ſea [B]. The Greeks, under the conduct of Graus, great-grandſon of Oreſtes, the ſon of Agamemnon, ſettled a colony there (d), which grew ſo flouriſhing, that this colony, and the city of Cumæ, were looked on as the metropolis of all the Greek colonies, which made up Æolia, and were in all about thirty in number (e). Panſanias pretends, that Penthilus, ſon of Oreſtes, was he that made himſelf maſter of the iſland of Leſbos (f). It had gone under ſeveral names: Pliny mentions ſix (g), and yet omits that of Iſſa, which Strabo (h) and Heſychius have both obſerved. It had nine conſiderable towns; but in Strabo's and Pliny's time, there ſcarce remained four, namely, Methymne, Ereſus, Pyrrha, and Mitylene (i). The Leſbians forſook the Athenian intereſt in the Peloponneſian war, and were rigorouſly puniſhed for it. The ſentence, which condemned to death all the males of Mitylene, above the age of ſixteen, was very near being executed; but, by good fortune, the counter-order of the Athenians arrived when they were preparing themſelves for that ſlaughter. Thucydides gives a very particular account of it (k). Some aſcribe to the Leſbians an invention of ſo abominable a nature, that we want words to expreſs it [C]. Few people have mentioned the oracle of this iſland [D]. It is called at preſent

[A] It was famous for the illuſtrious men it had produced.] Pittacus, one of the ſeven wiſe men, the poet Alceus, the famous Sappho, the Rhetorician Diophanes, the Hiſtorian Theophanes, were natives of Mitylene, as alſo Potamon, Lesbocles, and Crinagoras. Ereſus was the birth-place of Theophraſtus and of Phanias, the diſciples of Ariſtotle. The Muſician Arion, whoſe adventure is ſo celebrated, was of Methymne. Amongſt the famous Leſbians are alſo reckoned the Hiſtorian Hellanicus, Terpander the Muſician, and Callias, the interpreter of Alceus and Sappho's verſes (1). This is the catalogue Strabo has left us. The poet Leſches is omitted in it, who was author of a ſmall Iliad, and a native of Lesbos (2).

[B] It held the ſeventh place amongſt the great iſlands of the Mediterranean ſea.] Conſult Mr Bochart (3), who produces on this ſubject the teſtimonies of a great many writers. This gives him ground to derive the word Lesbos from the Phenician; for he finds, that this word ſignifies, ad ſeptimam (ſubintellige) inſulam: and ſuppoſes, that at firſt the Phenicians gave this name to a town in the iſland, and afterwards to the iſland itſelf. He proves by the authority of Stephanus Byzantinus, that Lesbos, one of the five towns of the iſland, was the reaſon of the iſland's being called Lesbos. His conjuctures are learned and refined; but methinks the Phenicians needed more time to diſcover, that this was the ſeventh of the large iſlands of the Mediterranean. Such a knowledge ſuppoſes voyages and compariſons between Sicily, Sardinia, and the other iſlands, which make up this pleiad, or ſeptenary number, and we do not find that they, who ſeek new countries or habitations, and ſettle in them, wait any conſiderable time before they give names to them. Mr Bochart does not alledge the words of Lycophron, which teach us, that Cadmus lived in this iſland. He owns, this Cadmus is not the Phenician; but Mercury, one of the Cabiri. Let us produce Lycophron's paſſage:

It is plain, the Poet ſpeaks of a Cadmus different from Europa's brother, and that he means Mercury by this name; for he makes him the grandſon of Atlas, and father of Prylis. The commentary of Iſaac Tzetzes informs us (5), that Lycophron, in this place, uſes the word Cadmus, by an abbreviation, inſtead of Cadmilus, which he had made uſe of in the 162d verſe, and which is the name the Bœotians gave the god Mercury (6). It tells us alſo, that Mercury had a ſon called Prylis, by the nymph Iſſa, who, being gained by Palamedes's preſents, foretold to the Greeks, when they landed at the iſland of Lesbos, that a wooden-horſe ſhould be the engine, by which they ſhould ſubdue the city of Troy.

[C] Some aſcribe to the Lesbians an invention of ſo abominable a nature &c.] I ſhall not only forbear deſcribing it in any words of our own language, but even avoid repeating in Latin, what very grave writers have ſaid to make part of it underſtood. However, ſince the great Eraſmus thought it allowable to inſert in his collection of Adages, that amongſt the reſt, which aroſe from their abomination, I may be permitted to copy ſome paſſages of his reſearches. ‘Aiunt ‘ſays he (7), turpitudinem quæ per os peragitur, fel‘lationis opinor, aut irrumationis, primum a Lesbiis ‘authoribus fuiſſe profectam, & apud illos primum ‘omnium fæminam tale quiddam paſſam eſſe. In‘terpres hujus rei teſtem citat Theopompum in U‘lyſſe . . . & Stratidem in Troilo.’ By Interpres he underſtands Ariſtophanes's ſcholiaſt upon theſe words of the comedy, called Veſpæ, μέλλουσαν ἤδη λεσβιεῖν τοὺς ξυμπότας, quæ combibones jam ſuos contaminet. I do not think he has hit upon Ariſtophanes's thought with reſpect to theſe words: Δοκεῖς δέ μοι καὶ λάβδα κατὰ τοὺς Λεσβίους, mihi at videre labda juxta Lesbios (8). The ſenſe he gives them ſeems cold and forced. Nor is it any wonder he has ſucceeded no better upon this paſſage, ſince Mr le Fevre of Saumur explains it two ways, and that rather by conjecture, than by any piece of learning proper to explain it. ‘Alludit, ſays he (9), ‘ad ſœditatem Lesbiam. [Tanta mihi prurigine vi‘deris correpta ut vel medium virum glubere, tenta ‘viri vorare poſſis] fortaſſe id etiam eo dictum eſt ‘quod eam divaricatis cruribus decumbentem vide‘ret.’ Galen has mentioned the Lesbian filthineſs, but without explaining what it was. He did not think it neceſſary, at a time when every body underſtood this expreſſion; but a great many Greek words are grown already almoſt unintelligible in the courſe of many ages, and it makes the critics ſweat to gueſs what the ancients meant by them. The learned Mercurialis endeavoured to find the meaning of this paſſage of Galen. ‘Galenus, ſays he (10), 10 de Simp. med. ‘cap. 1. Xenocratem damnans, quòd ſtercora ægris ‘voranda daret, probrum ait gravius eſſe, κοπροφάγον, ‘id eſt, ſtercorivorum audire, quàm fellatorem, aut ‘cinædum. I have ſuppreſſed ſome words and paſſages in this place of Mercurialis: not that I pretend this learned Phyſician had not a right to ſpeak out as he has done; a commentator or interpreter, who only makes uſe of the authority of ſuch a writer as Martial, known to all the Republic of Letters, is not to be blamed. However, I was loath to cite the paſſages from Mercurialis entire; we muſt ſome times ſubmit to the ſcruples of the mode.

[D] Few people have mentioned the oracle of Lesbos.] Philoſtratus, if I miſtake not, is the only perſon, who gives us an account of it. He ſays (11), Philoctetes departed voluntarily from the iſland of Lemnos, after Diomedes and Neoptolemus, ſons of Achilles, 'had required it of him, in the name of all 'the Grecian army, and declared the anſwer the 'oracle of Lesbos had given, concerning his arrows; 'for, adds Philoſtratus, the Greeks make uſe of their 'own country oracles, as that of Dodona, the Py-'thian, and all others, in vogue and reputation, 'where approved predictions are delivered, as thoſe 'of Bœotia and Phocis: but as Lesbos was not far 'from Troy, the Greeks, at the ſiege, ſent to the 'oracle, which was there diſpenſed by Orpheus. For, 'after the bloody murther committed on him by the 'Thracian women, his head, arriving at Lesbos, 'lighted on a rock there: from this rock the oracu-'lar anſwers were given, whither not only the Leſ-'bians, but the other Æolians alſo, and the Ioni-'ans their near neighbours, and even thoſe about 'Babylon, reſorted for advice; for he foretold a-'bundance of things to the kings of Perſia, and to 'the elder Cyrus among the reſt, to whom it is ſaid 'he gave this anſwer, What is mine, O Cyrus, is 'thine, hereby intimating, that he ſhould become 'conſiderable among the Odryſians, and all over Eu-'rope. In reality, Orpheus heretofore obtained great 'conſideration and credit by his mighty wiſdom and 'knowledge, as well with the Odryſians, as among 'all the other Greeks, who celebrated his myſteries. 'But by this anſwer, he farther intended to ſignify 'what ſhould finally befal Cyrus; who venturing be-'yond the Danube, to ſubdue the Maſſagetes, and 'Iſſedonians, nations of Scythia, died by the hands of 'a woman, who commanded them, and who cut off 'his head, as the Thracian women had formerly ſer-'ved Orpheus (12).'

(12) Here is an example of the ambiguous anſwers of the oracles of Paganiſm; for what can be more ſtrained than the interpretation of the anſwer to Cyrus?

LESCARBOT (MARK), an advocate in the court of parliament, has written a Hiſtory of New France [A]. He had lived for ſome time in that country. He afterwards attended Peter de Caſtille, ambaſſador from Lewis XIII to Swiſſerland. And as he took a delight in writing accounts of the countries, in which he travelled, he wrote a deſcription of the thirteen cantons in heroic verſe, and publiſhed it at Paris in 1618. He was born at Vervins (a).

Wherein is compriſed the moral, natural, and geographical hiſtory of the ſaid province; with maps and draughts of it.* I uſe the ſecond edition, which is that of Paris, by John Millot, of 1611, in 8vo. This work is curious enough: the author intermixes with it many learned obſervations. He begins with the deſcription of the voyage of John Verazzan, a Florentine, who was ſent into America by Francis I, in 1524. This was the firſt voyage into that part of the world, under the protection of the crown of France.

LESLEY, an illuſtrious family of Scotland, deſcended from one of the chief gentlemen who came over from Hungary into England, and from thence into Scotland [A], with queen Margaret (a), about the year 1067 (b). His name was BARTHOLOMEW; he married one of this queen's maids of honour, and had a ſon by her called Malcolme. Some ſay that his wife was the queen's own ſiſter. He got the eſteem of the king of Scotland, and received diſtinguiſhing marks of it [B], for having, having, among other actions, built, and bravely defended the fortreſs of Edinburgh. He died loaded with years, and covered with glory, in 1120. His ſucceſſors in the right line lived in ſplendor, as well by the new benefits conferred on them by their princes, as by the marriages, which allied them to the nobleſt families, down to DAVID LESLEY, who was the eighth from Bartholomew. This David, after having bore arms in Paleſtine againſt the Saracens, for ſeven years, returned into Scotland, and, though he was eighty years old, married, and had a ſon, who was the firſt that had the title of baron of Leſley. His iſſue failed in the ſeventh generation, in the perſon of GEORGE, baron of LESLEY, who died very much in debt. His widow married John Forbes, who paying off the creditors, became poſſeſſed of the barony of Leſley (c). All the LESLEYS now in being, deſcend from two collateral branches; that of ROTHES and that of BALQUHANE. The branch of Rothes began in NORMAND LESLEY, brother to David, and advanced itſelf wonderfully in riches and honours. GEORGE, great-grandſon to Normand, was the firſt who had the title of earl of ROTHES (d). The right male line of his deſcendants became extinct, in 1681, by the death of JOHN ROTHES, whom king Charles II created duke, and raiſed to the greareſt poſts [C]. The collateral branches are very numerous [D], from one of which deſcended JAMES LESLEY, who ſignalized himſelf in the ſervice of the Great Duke of Muſcovy, where he was colonel. As for the branch of Balquhane, it began in the perſon of GEORGE, ſecond ſon to ANDREW, which Andrew was the ſixth lord Leſley from Bartholomew the founder of the family. GEORGE, firſt baron of Balquhane, obtained ſeveral lordſhips in grant from king David Bruce, and died in the year 1351. His poſterity, ſubdivided into ſeveral branches [E], has produced a great many perſons of diſtinguiſhed merit. It reckoned three generals of armies at the ſame time; one in Scotland [F], one in Germany [G], one in Muſcovy (e) [H]. I ſpeak of them in the remarks.

in the ſervice of the emperor. The ſervice he did his Imperial Majeſty, when Walſtein was killed, obtained him a regiment, and ſeveral other favours. Ferdinand III made him count of the empire, marſhal de camp general, privy counſellor, and governor of a province (9). He was embaſſador for his Imperial Majeſty at Rome, and in other courts, and was ſent to the Porte for the ratifications of the peace, concluded in 1664. He had been made knight of the golden fleece before. The Jeſuit Paul Tafferner, his confeſſor, has publiſhed a relation of that embaſſy to Conſtantinople. Count Walter Leſley died at Vienna, the fourth of March, 1667, in the ſixty firſt year of his age. He was married to Anne-Frances of Dietrichſtein, daughter to prince Maximilian of Dietrichſtein, high-ſteward of the emper's court; but, having no child by her, he made his nephew James, ſon to Alexander, fourteenth baron of Balquhane, his heir. He had ſent for him long before into Germany, and had been an excellent patron to him. This nephew roſe from the loweſt military degree, to the poſt of mareſchal de camp general. [I] The famous biſhop of Roſs . . . . . was of this family.] He was deſcended from Malcolme, ſon of Andrew, third baron of Balquhane. His father was a learned Civilian, who, after he had travelled into Italy, France, the Netherlands, and England, died the ſixteenth of March 1554. The prelate we ſpeak of had a great ſhare in the eſteem of queen Mary; ſhe made him a counſellor in the ſupreme court of Scotland, afterwards a member of her privy council, and employed him in ſtate affairs. He was appointed coadjutor of the abbey of Lindors, and at laſt biſhop of Roſs. He did great ſervices to this princeſs, and was impriſoned in England on her account, tho' an embaſſador from the king her ſon. He negotiated her liberty at Rome, at Vienna, and at ſeveral other courts, and afterwards died at Bruſſels in 1595. He wrote ſeveral books, and, amongſt others, a Hiſtory of Scotland (13).

LESSEVILLE, (EUSTACHIUS LECLERC DE) biſhop of Coutance, was ſon of NICOLAS LECLERC DE LESSEVILLE, lord of Thun, and Eucquemont, who died dean of the chamber of accounts; and of Katherine de Boulanger, ſiſter to the preſident le Boulanger, who had been provoſt of the merchants, and died in the grand chamber as he was giving his opinion. As Nicolas Leclerc de Leſſeville had ſeveral children, and that Euſtachius was only the third, having before him, ANTONY, lord of Eucquemont, who died young, and CHARLES, who died dean of the Great Council, he reſolved to be an eccleſiaſtic, and went to ſtudy in the Sorbonne, which was not uſual at that time for perſons of quality. He was not full twenty years of age, when he was nominated rector of the univerſity; and it was he who firſt made the univerſity to go in coaches, whereas before they always walked. Which made Henry IV ſay, that his eldeſt daughter, meaning the univerſity, was a very dragletail. Euſtachius had ſo ſtrong a call to the church, that he was ordained prieſt before he had any title to a benefice. He was doctor of the houſe and ſociety of Sorbonne, and quickly after Lewis XIII choſe him one of his almoners in ordinary. He afterwards treated about a place of counſellor in parliament; and was preferred to the cure of St Gervais at Paris, in the times of the troubles, which ſaved him his life: for, being in the town-houſe with ſeveral deputies, both of the parliament and of other ſocieties, and the people, as all the world knows, having roſe up in arms, and murdered ſeveral deputies, and amongſt others, the Sieur le Gras, maſter of requeſts, who had married his ſiſter whom we ſpeak of, ſome watermen and others of the rabble thought it their duty to reſcue their paſtor. Accordingly they forced their way through the reſt of the mob, and carried him off out of the midſt of the aſſembly, and conducted him to his houſe in ſafety. Some time after, he was preferred to the abbey of St Creſpin near Soiſſons, and the barony of St Ange, and was made honorary canon of the chapter of Brioude, which gives the title of count. At laſt the king gave him the biſhopric of Coutance, vacant by the ceſſion of Claude Auvri, treaſurer to the holy chapel at Paris. Tho' he did not live long after, yet he failed not to gain the eſteem and friendſhip of all his dioceſe, where his name is ſtill in veneration. He was particularly diſtinguiſhed by a great capacity, and a profound knowledge in Divinity and Law. As he was doctor of the Sorbonne, and had been fourteen years counſellor in parliament, he was equally verſed in both theſe ſciences, which made him arbiter of the moſt important affairs of the province. He died at Paris, the fourth of December 1665, during the aſſembly of the clergy, to which he was deputed, and was buried in Auguſtins, in the burying place of his anceſtors. Leclerc de Leſſeville bears azure, three creſcents, or, (a).

LESTRYGONS,

LESTRYGONS, or rather Læſtrigons, were a very brutal people, ſituated in Italy, near Cajeta. Their capital city bore the name of Formiæ (a) [A]. Homer calls it Læſtrygonia, or the city of Lamus (b). It is becauſe Lamus king of the Leſtrygons, and ſon of Neptune, built it (c): his dominions were pretty large (d). Antiphates, who reigned there, when Ulyſſes landed there, was a cruel man, who would have eaten all Ulyſſes's deputies [B], if they had not eſcaped, after having ſeen the ſad fate of one of them (e). It is certain the Leſtrygons paſſed for man-eaters [C]. Moreri, inſtead of ſaying this, obſerves, that they eat raw fleſh. It is not known whether they paſſed from Sicily into Italy, or from Italy into Sicily; but we cannot doubt of their ſettlement in Sicily, becauſe the country round the city Leontium was called Campi Læſtrygonii [D]. Ovid ſuppoſes they were originally Greeks (f). It is certain, that Homer compares them to giants; but this is no reaſon why Bozius ſhould ſay, that, according to the fabulous accounts, they made war upon the gods, that Hercules fought with them, that they were deſtoyed by thunder, that the plains, ſituated

[A] Their capital city was that which bore the name of Formiæ.] Cicero puts it paſt doubt; for he applies to the city of Formiæ, the epithet which is given by Homer, to the city where Lamus and Antiphates reigned. 'Si in hanc τηλέπυλον veneris 'Λαιϛρυγονίην (1) (Formias dico) qui fremitus Hominum? quam irati Animi (2)? —— If you come 'to Læſtrygonia with widely diſtant gates (by which 'I mean Formiæ) how tumultuous the inhabitants? 'what enraged minds?' See alſo Horace, Ode XVII, of the third book, and add to it theſe words of the preceeding ode.

Nec Læſtrygonia Bacchus in amphora
Langueſcit mihi;

Nor does my wine grow old in Leſtrygonian casks:

By which he means the Formian wine. Pliny is very poſitive: 'Oppidum Formiæ, Hormiæ prius 'olim dictum: exiſtimavere, antiqua Læſtrigonum ſe-'des (3). —— The city of Formiæ, formerly called 'Hormiæ, and thought to be the antient ſeats of the 'Leſtrygons.'

[B] Antiphates . . . would have eaten all Ulyſſes's deputies.] I deſire leave to give this name to the three men, whom he ſent to view the country. You are going to ſee, that Antiphates eat one of them, and that he ſpent his fury on Ulyſſes's ſhips, ſo that but one of them eſcaped.

Inde Lami veterem Læſtrygonis, inquit, in urbem
Venimus: Antiphates terra regnabat in illa.
Miſſus ad hunc ego ſum, numero comitante duorum:
Vixque fuga quæſita ſalus, comitique, mihique.
Tertius è nobis Læſtrygonis impia tinxit
Ora cruore ſuo: fugientibus inſtat, & agmen
Concitat Antiphates, coëunt, & ſaxa trabeſque
Conjiciunt: merguntque viros, merguntque carinas.
Una tamen, quæ nos ipſumque vehebat Ulyſſen,
Effugit (4).

To Lamus' antient Leſtrygonian town
We came: Antiphates then wore the crown.
To whoſe dire court, by great Ulyſſes ſent, Myſelf, with only two companions, went;
Whence two alone eſcaped by timely flight;
The third he ſeized, and mangled in our ſight:
We ſaw him cruelly the limbs devour,
And ſmear his impious lips with human gore.
We fly; the horrid Leſtrygonian crew,
With fell Antiphates, our ſteps purſue,
Quite to the ſtrand; thence ſtones and timber throw,
And ſink our men, and ſhips that rode below.
One only bark, which wiſe Ulyſſes bore,
Eſcap'd from the inhoſpitable ſhore.

Hence this barbarous Leſtrygon has been alledged as an example of cruelty and inhoſpitality.

Quis non Antiphaten Læſtrygona devovet?

Who curſes not the Leſtrygon Antiphates?

Says Ovid in the ninth elegy of the ſecond book de Ponto. In another place he expreſſes himſelf thus:

Nec tu contuleris urbem Læſtrygonis unquam
  Gentibus, obliqua quas obit Iſter aqua (5).

Nor ſet the Leſtrygonian town 'gainſt thoſe,
'Round whoſe fair walls the winding Iſter flows.

I omit ſeveral other paſſages, and content myſelf with theſe verſes of Sidonius Apollinaris.

Biſtonii ſtabulum regis, Buſiridis aras
Antiphatæ menſas, & Taurica regna Thoantis
Atque Ithaci ingenio fraudatum luce Cyclopem (6).

The ſtable of the Thracian king; thy altars,
Buſiris; and, Antiphates, thy table;
The Tauric realms of Thoas; and the Cyclops
By crafty Ithacus deprived of ſight.

[C] The Leſtrygons have paſſed for man-eaters.] Add to the proofs alledged in the foregoing remark theſe words of Pliny: 'Eſſe Scytharum genera, & 'quidem plura, quæ corporibus humanis veſcerentur, 'indicavimus. Id ipſum incredibile fortaſſe, ni co-'gitemus in medio orbe terrarum, ac Sicilia & Ita-'lia fuiſſe gentes hujus monſtri, Cyclopas & Læſtry-'gonas (7). —— That there are ſeveral Scythian na-'tions, which feed on human fleſh, I have ſhewn: 'which might ſeem incredible, did we not know, that 'in the middle of the world, even in Sicily and Ita-'ly, are to be found ſuch monſtrous people; I mean 'the Cyclopes, and Leſtrygons.

ſituated between Mount Veſuvius and Puteoli, were called Phlegræi Campi on that account, and that the flames of Mount Veſuvius proceed from the fire, which burns the Leſtrygons in hell. He pretends, that Homer, Pindar, Polybius in his ſecond book, and Strabo in his fifth book, affirm theſe things (g). He is miſtaken; the Leſtrygons did not cultivate land; but they had cattle (h). Homer ſhewed himſelf very ignorant of the globe, when he placed them in a climate, where the nights are very ſhort (i). It is not true that Thucydides believed, that the Leſtrygons were a fabulous people (k): he only ſays, that Hiſtorians tell us, that the moſt antient inhabitants of Sicily were the Leſtrygons, and the Cyclops; but that he has nothing to obſerve concerning their origin, and that he neither knows whence they came, nor what became of them (l).

LEUCAS was at firſt a peninſula, joining to the continent of Acarnania (a), but became an iſland by the induſtry of the Corinthians (b). They cut the iſthmus, and built a city upon the canal, which they called Leucas, whether they tranſported the inhabitants of the town of Neritus. This undertaking did not much promote Navigation (c); and if we believe Pliny, the ſands, driven in by the winds, reſtored the iſthmus [A]. In the article of SANCTA-MAURA (d), we ſhall ſpeak of its preſent ſtate. As to it's antient ſtate, if any circumſtance of it deſerves to be related, it is I think, the ceremony of the Leap [B]. There ſeems to have been a ſet

(d) The name of the iſland Leucas at this day.

[A] If we believe Pliny, the ſands reſtored the iſthmus.] He ſeems to fall into a contradiction here for, in the ninetieth chapter of the ſecond book, he reckons Leucas among the countries, which had been ſeparated from the main land by the violence of the ſea; in another place (1) he attributes it to the labour of the inhabitants. 'Leucadia ipſa peninſula 'quondam Neritis appellata, opere accolarum abſciſſa 'à continenti, ac reddita ventorum flatu congeriem 'arenæ accumulantium. —— The peninſula of Leucas, formerly called Neritis, cut off from the continent by the induſtry of the inhabitants, and reunited to it by the force of winds accumulating heaps of ſand.' Strabo, in the two places I have quoted (2), favours him as to the laſt paſſage, but not as to the firſt. Ovid (3) ſeems more favourable to him in reſpect of the firſt, than the laſt, when we conſider what he makes Pythagoras deliver concerning the changes of nature.

Nunc freta circumeunt. Zancle quoque juncta fuiſſe
Dicitur Italiæ, donec confinia pontus
Abſtulit, & media tellurem reppulit unda.

Leucas was part o' th' continent of old;
Now ocean round it's ſea-girt coaſt is rowl'd:
So Zancle, torn from the Italian ſtrand,
By forceful waters, left it's parent land.

After all, we cannot entirely excuſe Pliny, not even by Father Hardouin's kind expedient, who would have it acknowledged, that Leucas had been twice rejoined to the continent, becauſe, at the time of the Roman war with Philip king of Macedon, Leucas was a peninſula (4), and, in Livy's and Strabo's time, it was an iſland. By this rule Leucas muſt have been an iſland all the time betwixt this Roman war, and the reign of Auguſtus, and became a peninſula again, and continued ſo all the time betwixt Auguſtus and Pliny. If it had been made an iſland by the violence of a tempeſt, he ſhould not have obſerved a counteraction betwixt the labour of the inhabitants and that of the winds (5). It muſt therefore be ſaid, that the inhabitants made their country an iſland. But in this caſe, how ſhall we reconcile what Pliny had ſaid in the ninetieth chapter of the ſecond book perrupit mare Leucada? - - - the ſea broke through Leucas. This event muſt doubtleſs have preceeded the war againſt king Philip; but in theſe former times, we find it was the Corinthians, and not the ſea, which cut the iſthmus of Leucas.

[B] The ceremony of the Leap.] There ſtood upon the promontory of Leucas a temple of Apollo, and there was an ancient cuſtom (6) that annually, on the feſtival of this god, a criminal ſhould be thrown from the top of this promontory, in order to avert all impending evils. However they faſtened a great many feathers and live birds to the criminal, whoſe flight, it was hoped, would break the violence of the wretch's fall. They endeavoured to catch him at the bottom in ſmall barges lying round in a circle, and if he was ſaved, they only baniſhed him. All this was enacted by public authority, and for the public good; but there were private perſons, who volutarily leaped from the precipice, to put an end to the pains they ſuffered from love. Whence this place was called the Lover's Leap (7). Strabo informs us, on Menander's authority, that Sappho, deſperately in love with Phaon, who ſlighted her, was the firſt, who took the leap of Leucas: He cites Menander's verſes; but probably he had not quoted the whole paſſage: for, by what he has quoted, it does not appear that Sappho was the firſt, who took this dangerous leap. Beſides, Strabo does not come over to this poet's opinion: He ſays, that they, who have moſt exactly ſearched into antiquity, declare that Cephalus was the firſt, who made tryal of that deſperate remedy, when he was in love with Ptaola. An author (8), whom Photius has given ſome extracts of, traces the origin of this practice. He ſays, that Venus, after the death of Adonis, ſought him every where, and found him at laſt at Argos, in the iſle of Cyprus, in the temple of Erithian Apollo. As ſhe made no ſecret to this god of her paſſion for Adonis, he led her to the rock of Leucas, and bid her throw herſelf headlong from that precipice. She took his advice, and finding herſelf cured of her paſſion, ſhe deſired to know the reaſon of it. Apollo anſwered, that, by virtue of his gift of prophecy, he had diſcovered that Jupiter, finding himſelf ſmitten with the love of Juno, came conſtantly to ſit upon this rock, and thus abated the violence of his flame. He adds, that numbers of both ſexes had been cured of their love by leaping from the top of this mountain. Photius gives us a long catalogue of perſons, who had recourſe to this remedy. Some found themſelves cured, others loſt their lives by it. I have not met with Calyce among them, and am the leſs ſurprized, becauſe he omits the unfortunate Sappho.

pho. She tells us in a letter that Ovid has written as her ſecretary, that Deucalion, in love with Pyrrha the coy, took the leap of Leucas, without hurting himſelf; upon which his paſſion wore off, and Pyrrha began to love him in her turn.

Hinc ſe Deucalion Pyrrhæ ſuccenſus amore
Miſit, & illæſo corpore preſſit aquas.
Nec mora: verſus amor tetigit lentiſſima Pyrrhæ

His breaſt from love's tyrannic pow'r to free,
Deucalion leap'd unhurt, into the ſea:
The force of love a different way was turn'd;
Deucalion cool'd and thoughtleſs Pyrrha burn'd

Several (10) have mentioned this ſtrange remedy of love, and others have even ſaid, that ſome took this leap for another thing, namely to learn news of their relations.

I have ſaid, that Calyce is not to be found in the catalogue of the Leucas-leapers. She had fallen in love with a young man called Evathlus, and in vain ſollicited the goddeſs Venus to bring about their marriage. Evathlus perſiſted in his obſtinate coldneſs, and Calyce threw herſelf down the precipice of Leucas (11). I believe, if the account were faithfully caſt up, we ſhould find that more women than men had taken this deſperate leap.

[C] There ſeems to have been a ſet of people who engaged themſelves every year . . . . . to give this ſpectacle.] A paſſage of Servius has furniſhed Vinet with this conjecture (12). Servius's words are theſe: 'Fœminas in ſui amorem trahebat (Phaon) in queis fuit una quæ de monte Leucate, cum potiri ejus nequiret, abjeciſſe ſe dicitur; unde nunc aucturare ſe quotannis ſolent qui de eo monte jaciunt in pelagus (13).' Vinet thinks this paſſage ought to be reſtored thus, unde nunc auctorare ſe quotannis ſolent qui ſe de eo monte jaciunt in pelagus; and that this may ſignify, that there were ſome, who ventured for a ſum of money to take this leap, as others articled at ſuch a price to kill one another on the amphitheatre. The curious will do well to ſearch to the bottom of this particular. It is certain they engaged themſelves by a vow to take this leap; as appears by the anſwer of a Lacedæmonian, who was inſulted for drawing back at the ſight of the precipice. I knew not, ſaid he (14), that my vow would ſtand in need of another vow ſtill greater. Menander's verſes, cited by Strabo (15), ſhew that Sappho made a vow to Apollo before ſhe threw herſelf down, that is, probably, ſhe conſecrated this action to the god. I forgot to ſay, that there were two verſes of Anacreon concerning the Lover's-leap. Scaliger mentions them (16); but I think that they who ſay Hepheſtion has preſerved them (17), are miſtaken.

LEUCIPPUS, a Greek Philoſopher. The place of his birth is not agreed on; but almoſt all authors own him to have been the inventer of the Atomical ſyſtem; ſo that we muſt not rely upon Poſidonius's teſtimony [A]. It cannot be denied, that in ſome things, the carteſian ſyſtem reſembles that of Leucippus [B]; and Epicurus is to blame in not having acknowledged how much he was indebted to this Philoſopher's

[A] We muſt not rely upon Poſidonius's teſtimony.] According to which, we muſt believe that a Phœnician Philoſopher called Moſchus, who lived before the ſiege of Troy, was the inventer of atoms; for ſee what Strabo tell us. Εἰ δὲ δεῖ Ποσειδωνίῳ πιστεύσαι, καὶ τὸ περὶ τῶν ἀτόμων δόγμα παλαιόν ἐστιν ἀνδρὸς Σιδονίου Μόσχου πρὸ τῶν Τρωϊκῶν χρόνων γεγονότος. Imo ſi Poſidonio credimus, antiquum de atomis dogma Moſchi eſt, hominis Sidonii qui ante Trojani belli tempus vixit (1). Sextus Empiricus obſerves the ſame thing, and in the ſame manner as Strabo, that is to ſay, citing Poſidonius, with I know not what ſigns of diſtruſt, which does not appear in Strabo with reſpect to the other original doctrines of Phœnicia. Δημόκριτος δὲ καὶ Ἐπίκουρος ἀτόμους (ſubaudi ἔλεξαν εἶναι τὰ τῶν ὄντων στοιχεῖα) εἰ μή τι ἀρχαιοτέραν ταύτην θετέον τὴν δόξαν. καὶ ὡς ἔλεγεν ὁ Στωϊκὸς Ποσειδώνιος, ἀπο Μόσχου τινὸς ἀνδρὸς Φοίνικος καταγομένην. Democritus vero & Epicurus atomos (dixerunt eſſe rerum omnium elementa) niſi ſi antiquiorem eſſe hanc doctrinam ſit ſtatuendum, & ut ait Stoicus Poſidonius, a Moſcho viro quodam Phœnice adductam (2). If to this you add the fabulous ſpirit, which Cicero has diſcovered in the manners of his maſter (3), you will be of the opinion of the learned Dr Thomas Burnet, who does not believe, that Moſchus ought to be acknowledged the inventer of the hypotheſes maintained by Leucippus and Democritus. 'Vides rem totam in unius Poſidonii fidem referri, & de hujus fide utrumque authorem ſubdubitare; cum itaque Atomorum hypotheſin invexiſſe Lucippum aut Democritum multo plures & probatiores fidei teſtes affirment; & inter alios hujus ipſius Poſidonii diſcipulus Cicero: his ego libentius aſſentior; maxime, cum idem Cicero huic philoſopho falſidici notam adjicere non vereatur: Quædam etiam Poſidonius, pace magiſtri dixerim comminiſci videtur (4). ——— The whole matter, you ſee, reſts upon the ſingle authority of Poſidonius, and that both authors doubt a little of his credit: when therefore much the greater number, and thoſe the moſt to be depended upon, among whom is Cicero, the diſciple of this very Poſidonius, affirm, that Leucippus, or Democritus, brought in the hypotheſis of atoms, I readily aſſent to them; eſpecially, ſince the ſame Cicero does not ſcruple to call this Philoſopher a Falſifier: Poſidonius likewiſe, with reſpect to my maſter I ſpeak it, ſeems to have invented ſome things.' Perhaps Poſidonius was a little touched with the diſtemper, which reigns in all ages. We take, as much as in us lies, the glory of an invention from thoſe who boaſt of it, or are not of our party, and had rather find another inventer, in the remoteſt times and places.

[B] We cannot deny, that in certain reſpects, the Carteſian ſyſtem reſembles that of Leucippus.] The diſtemper, I have been mentioning, appears in our age, with reſpect to Mr Des Cartes. They endeavour to rob him of all the glory of the invention, and divide it among other Philoſophers, antient and modern. I enter not into that enquiry; but only ſay that, in ſome things, there is reaſon to believe he has only revived old notions. For example, is not the hypotheſis of the Vortices Leucippus's? the learned Huetius moſt clearly proves it. 'In varios vortices, ſays he (5), ſive mundos primam rerum materiam diſtribuerunt Leucippus, Democritus & Epicurus: unde exiſtimemus meritone in vorticum horum inventione tantum ſe jactet Carteſiana Schola. Ac de his quidem manifeſta res eſt apud Diogenem Laërtium & Heſychium Illuſtrium. Ajebant * enim corpuſcula ex infinitate ſimul collecta, Δίνην ἀπεργάζεσθαι; vorticem efficere; & κατὰ τὴν τοῦ μέσου ἀντέρεισιν περιδινεῖσθαι, εἱλεῖσθαι, συστρέφεσθαι, renitente medio circumvolvi: ex hac vertigine particularum ſeceſſiones & conjunctiones oriri; ex conjunctionibus enaſci globoſum acervum, σύστημα σφαιροειδές. ——— Leucippus, Democritus, and Epicurus, divided firſt matter into various vortices, or worlds: whence we may judge, whether the ſchool of Des Cartes deſervedly pretends to the invention of theſe vortices. The matter is made plain, with reſpect to theſe, in Diogenes Laërtius, and Heſychius Illuſtrius. For they ſaid, that Corpuſcles, collected from infinity, formed a vortex, and that from this whirl of particles aroſe ſeparations and conjunctions, and from conjunctions a ſpherical maſs.' We find beſides, in Leucippus's ſyſtem, ſome hints of that grand mechanical principle, which Mr Des Cartes ſo effectually employs, namely, that bodies, in a circular motion, remove from the center as much as poſſible. The antient Philoſophy teaches, that the more ſubtile atoms ſhoot themſelves as it were towards the void ſpace (6). Mr Des Cartes ſhould have given his ſubtile matter ſopher's invention (a) [C]. They, who have ſo much ridiculed the invention of Atoms, have not diſtinguiſhed with all the exactneſs that is neceſſary [D]. I have matter this quality, if he had kept to his own principle; but, by a conſequence, which we cannot ſufficiently wonder at, he forces to the center of the vortices this ſubtile matter, and to the circumference the more maſſy globules (7). I have ſpoken elſewhere (8) of thoſe, who ſay, that, in reſpect of the vortices, and the cauſes of gravity, Des Cartes is only Kepler's tranſcriber. They ought to add, that Kepler is the tranſcriber of Leucippus.

[C] Epicurus is to blame in not acknowledging, that he was indebted to the inventions of Leucippus.] It is the failing of moſt great wits; they will not eaſily acknowledge, that they are indebted for their notions to the lights of others; they would have it thought, that they have drawn all from their own ſtock, without any other maſter than their own genius. Epicurus has been reproached with having only reformed in ſome reſpect the ſyſtem of Democritus, of which Leucippus was the inventer. All this is teſtified by Cicero. 'Iſta enim à vobis quaſi dictata redduntur: quæ Epicurus, oſcitans hallucinatus eſt, cum quidem gloriaretur, ut videmus in ſcriptis, ſe magiſtrum habuiſſe nullum: quod & non prædicanti, tamen facile crederem: ſicut mali ædificii domino glorianti, ſe architectum non habuiſſe . . . . . Xenocratem audire potuit: quem virum? dii immortales! & ſunt qui putent audiviſſe, ipſe non vult. Credo plus nemini. Pamphilum quendam, Platonis auditorem, ait à ſe Sami auditum . . . . . Sed hunc Platonicum mirificè contemnit Epicurus: ita metuit, ne quid unquam didiciſſe videatur. In Nauſiphane Democriteo tenetur: quem cùm à ſe non neget auditum, vexat tamen omnibus contumeliis. Atqui ſi hæc Democritea non audiſſet, quid audierat? Quid eſt in phyſicis Epicuri non à Democrito? Nam etſi quædam commutavit, ut, quod paulo ante de inclinatione atomorum dixi; tamen pleraque dicit eadem; atomos, inane, imagines, infinitatem locorum, innumerabilitatemque mundorum, eorum ortus & interitus, omnia ferè, quibus naturæ ratio continetur (9). —— These things are delivered by you as dictated; in which the negligent Epicurus was deceived, when he boaſted, as we ſee in his writings, that he never had a maſter; which I ſhould eaſily believe, if he had not ſaid ſo, as I ſhould the owner of a bad houſe, who ſhould boaſt he had employed no architect . . . . . He might have heard Xenocrates: Gods! how great a man! and ſome think he did hear him, though he himſelf denies it. I give more credit to no one. He pretends he heard one Pamphilus, a follower of Plato, at Samos . . . . But Epicurus wonderfully deſpiſes this Platonic; ſo afraid is he to ſeem to have ever learned any thing. When he cannot deny, that he heard Nauſiphanes the Democritean, he loads him with all kinds of abuſe. But, if he was not brought up in Democritus's ſchool, where had he his inſtruction? What is there in the Phyſics of Epicurus, which is not fetched from Democritus? For though he altered ſome things, as what I juſt now mentioned of the inclination of atoms, yet he advances many things the very ſame; atoms, a void, images, infinite ſpace, and innumerable worlds, their birth and deſtruction, and almoſt every thing relating to the ſyſtem of nature.' Father Leſcalopier obſerves, that Heraclitus had alſo boaſted, that he was indebted to no body for his knowledge, and thereby diſcovered, that he thought it no diſgrace to have a ſpice of the ſacred diſeaſe, that is, arrogance (10). A ſtrange name for pride! One could forgive it in thoſe, who knew the pride of eccleſiaſtics, under the Popes of Rome. If any ſort of vanity deſerves this name, it is ſurely that of certain perſons, who boaſt, on ſome occaſions, that they owe their knowledge neither to reading, nor to the lectures of profeſſors. You ſet up then, we may tell them, for inſpiration.

[D] They who have ſo much ridiculed the invention of atoms, have not diſtinguiſhed with all the exactneſs that is neceſſary.] Lactantius lays out all his ſtrength in confuting Leucippus's hypotheſes, as well with reſpect to the origin and direction of the atoms, as to their qualities. He has done very well on the firſt point, but wretchedly on the ſecond. The epithets of madman, dreamer, viſionary, are due to whoever imagines, that a fortuitous concourſe of infinite corpuſcles produced the world, and is the continual cauſe of generation. But if we give the ſame names to thoſe, who maintain, that all bodies are formed from a various combination of atoms, we manifeſtly diſcover, that we have no taſte, nor idea of true natural Philoſophy. We muſt own, then, that in the following words of Lactantius there are good and bad objections: which proceed from his confounding things, which he ought to have diſtinguiſhed. 'Non eſt, inquit, providentiæ opus, ſunt enim ſemina per inane volitantia, quibus inter ſe temerè conglobatis univerſa gignuntur, atque concreſcunt. Cur igitur illa non ſentimus, aut cernimus? Quia nec colorem habent (inquit) nec calorem ullum, nec odorem: ſaporis quoque & humoris expertia ſunt, & tam minuta, ut ſecari, ac dividi nequeant. Sic eum, quia in principio falſum ſuſceperat, conſequentium rerum neceſſitas ad deliramenta perduxit. Ubi enim ſunt, aut unde iſta corpuſcula? Cur illa nemo præter unum Leucippum ſomniavit? A quo Democritus eruditus hæreditatem ſtultitiæ reliquit Epicuro. Quæ ſi ſint corpuſcula, & quidem ſolida, ut dicunt, ſub oculos certe venire poſſunt (11). —— It is not, ſays he, the work of providence; for there are ſeeds flying through the void, which, uniting at a venture, form all things. Why then do we not perceive them? Becauſe, ſays he, they have neither colour, heat, nor ſmell; they are likewiſe void of taſte and moiſture, and ſo ſmall that they cannot be cut or divided. Thus from from falſe principles he is neceſſarily driven to abſurd conſequences. For where, or whence, are theſe corpuſcles? Why did no one, but Leutippus, ever dream of them? By whom Democritus being inſtructed left the inheritance of folly to Epicurus. Which corpuſcles, if they really exiſted, and were ſolid, as they pretend, would certainly be viſible.' He dilates upon theſe objections in another book. 'Primum minuta illa ſemina, quorum concurſu fortuito totum cohæſiſſe mundum loquuntur, ubi, aut unde ſint quæro. Quis illa vidit unquam? quis ſenſit? quis audivit? An ſolus Leucippus oculos habuit, ſolus mentem? qui profecto ſolus omnium cœcus, & excors fuit, qui ea loqueretur, quæ nec æger quiſquam delirare, nec dormiens poſſit ſomniare. Quatuor elementis conſtare omnia Philoſophi veteres diſſerebant. Ille noluit, ne alienis veſtigiis videretur inſiſtere; ſed ipſorum elementorum alia voluit eſſe primordia, quæ nec videri poſſint, nec tangi, nec ulla corporis parte ſentiri. Tam minuta ſunt (inquit) ut nulla ſit acies ferri tam ſubtilis, qua ſecari, ac dividi poſſint: unde illis nomen impoſuit atomorum. Sed occurrebat ei, quòd ſi una eſſet omnibus, eademque natura, non poſſent res efficere diverſas, tanta varietate, quantam videmus ineſſe mundo. Dixit ergo levia eſſe, & aſpera, & rotunda, & angulata, & hamata. Quanto melius fuerat tacere, quam in uſus tam miſerabiles, tam inanes, habere linguam. Et quidem vereor, ne non minus delirare videatur, qui hæc putet refellenda. Reſpondeamus tamen velut aliquid dicenti. Si levia ſunt, & rotunda, utique non poſſunt invicem ſe apprehendere, ut aliquod corpus efficiant, ut ſi quis milium velit in unam coagmentationem conſtringere, levitudo ipſa granorum in maſſam coire non ſinat. Si aſpera, & angulata ſunt, & hamata, ut poſſint cohærere, dividua ergo, & ſecabilia ſunt; hamis enim neceſſe eſt, & angulis eminere, ut poſſint amputari. Itaque quod amputari, ac divelli poteſt, & videri poterit, & teneri (12). —— In the firſt place I aſk, where and whence are thoſe ſeeds, by whoſe fortuitous concourſe they pretend the whole world is formed? Who ever ſaw them? Who ever perceived or heard them? Had Leucippus alone eyes and underſtanding? rather he alone of all men was blind and ſtupid, who talked of things more vain and empty than a ſick man's dreams. The antient Philoſophers taught, that all things were made out of four elements. Leucippus would not allow it, that he might not ſeem to tread in the ſteps of others; but of the elements themſelves he pretended that ſome were primordial, which could neither be ſeen, touched, nor felt by any part of the body. They are ſo ſmall, ſays he, that there is no edge fine enough to cut and divide them; whence he gave them the name of atoms. But there lay an objection againſt him, that, if they were all of one and the ſame na-

I have often wondered, that Leucippus, and thoſe who have trod in his ſteps, never thought of ſaying that each Atom had an inherent vital principle. This ſuppoſition would have delivered them from a great part of their perplexity [E], and there is as much

' ture, they could not form different things, with ſo great a variety as we ſee in the world. He pretended therefore, they were ſmooth, rough, round, cornered, and hooked. How much better would it have been to have ſaid nothing, than to talk ſo wretchedly and impertinently? And I fear it will be thought no leſs impertinent to undertake to refute this opinion. However let us reply as if he had really ſaid ſomething. If theſe atoms are ſmooth and round, they cannot unite into one body; juſt as if any one ſhould endeavour to unite millet into one maſs, the very ſmoothneſs of the grains would prevent a coalition. If they are rough, and cornered, and hooked, that they may be capable of ſticking together, they muſt be likewiſe diviſible and ſecable; for they muſt have hooks and points, which may be cut off; what therefore may be cut off, and torn away, may be both ſeen and felt.'

A man would be laughed at in our days, who ſhould make ſuch objections; for ever ſince the chimerical qualities invented by the ſchoolmen, have been rejected, the only remedy left is that of admitting inſenſible parts in matter, whoſe figure, angles, hooks, motion, and ſituation, conſtitute the particular eſſence of the bodies, which ſtrike our ſenſes. Cicero has introduced an interlocutor, who has ſhewed Lactantius the error of not uſing diſtinctions; for he aſcribes the ſame qualities both to the figure of the atoms, and to their fortuitous concourſe (13). The moderns have diſtinguiſhed better; they reject the eternity of atoms and their fortuitous motion; but, keeping, in all other points except this, to the hypotheſis of Leucippus, they make an admirable ſyſtem of it. This is what Gaſſendus has done, who differs not from Des Cartes, about the principles of bodies, only as he retains a vacuum. Lactantius's objections againſt the indiviſibility of atoms are the weakeſt that can be made to the atomiſts; the followers of Ariſtotle and Mr Des Cartes propoſe much ſtronger; but, after all, they prove nothing more than the poſſible diviſion of all ſorts of extenſion; for as to the actual diviſion, all ſects are obliged to ſtop ſomewhere. It is plain there are neceſſarily innumerable corpuſcles, which are never divided, and this alone is ſufficient to invalidate Lactantius's objections by way of retortion. Would we make a ſound judgment of Leucippus's ſyſtem, we muſt follow that of Dr Thomas Burnet. Here is what he ſays of it (14): ' Ad hanc ſectam Eleaticam aggregari ſolent Leucippus & Democritus, viri celebres & eximii, qui hypotheſin Atomorum invexerunt: quæ licet, mea ſententia, falſa ſit & male fundata, dedit tamen occaſionem philoſophandi ſtrictius & accuratius. Hi enim non quærunt corporum principia, aut agendi vires inter numeros, proportiones, harmonias, ideas, qualitates, aut formas elementares, ut ab aliis factum eſt: ſed ipſa adeunt corpora, eorumque conditiones Phyſicas & Mechanicas examinant, motum, figuram, partium ſitum, tenuitatem aut magnitudinem, & ſimilia: & ex his cujuſque virtutes æſtimant, actiones definiunt, effecta explicant, idque recte ſolideque, ut mihi videtur, hucuſque. Quod vero has minutias indiviſibiles eſſe vellent, aut innatum impetum habere, aut inclinationes ad certa loca, aut denique inanibus ſpatiis disjungi, hæc & hujuſmodi, non tantum gratis dicta ſunt, ſed etiam claræ rationi refragantur. Utcunque, cum viam aperuerint ad ſaniorem diſſerendi methodum circa res phyſicas, & in hac parte de republica literaria non male meruerint, illos laude ſua ne fraudemus. ——— To this Eleatic ſect Leucippus and Democritus are uſually referred; famous men, who firſt invented the hypotheſis of atoms: which, though in my opinion, it be falſe and ill-grounded, yet gave occaſion to philoſophize more ſtrictly and accurately. For theſe men do not look for the principles of bodies, or their power of acting among numbers, proportions, harmonies, ideas, qualities, or elementary forms, as others have done; but they go to the bodies themſelves, and examine their phyſical, and mechanical ſtates, motion, figure, ſituation of parts, ſmallneſs, or magnitude, and the like: and from theſe they eſtimate the virtues of each, define their actions, explain their effects, and that rightly and ſolidly, I think, hitherto. But whereas they will have theſe ſmall parts to be indiviſible, to have an innate tendency to certain places, and laſtly to be diſunited in empty ſpaces, theſe and the like ſuppoſitions are not only without foundation, but even contrary to reaſon. However it be, ſince they opened a way to a more ſound method of reaſoning upon natural things, and in this reſpect deſerved well of the learned world, let us not rob them of the praiſe that is due to them.'

[E] This ſuppoſition would have delivered them from a great part of their perplexity.] They might then have given ſome ſort of anſwer to an objection, which they have never been able to ſolve; it is that, which Plutarch propoſes to Colotes the Epicurean (15), and which Galen has urged with great force, as we have ſeen above (16). It conſiſts in this; that every atom being deſtitute of a ſoul, and ſenſitive faculty, it is evident no combination of atoms can become an animate and ſenſitive being. But if every atom had a ſoul and ſenſation, we might eaſily conceive how a combination of atoms ſhould make a compound capable of certain particular modifications, as well with reſpect to conſciouſneſs and ſenſation, as with reſpect to motion. The diverſity, obſervable betwixt the paſſions of rational and irrational creatures, might in general be explained by theſe different combinations of Atoms. It is therefore very ſurprizing, that, tho' Leucippus overlooked the intereſts of his ſyſtem in this point, thoſe who came after him ſhould be ſo blind as never to have added ſo material an article; for the eaſineſs of improving the inventions of others, and the ſtreſs of the diſpute might very well have enabled them to carry their views farther than Leucippus had done. There is ſome reaſon to believe that Democritus had in ſome meaſure remedied that great defect in this hypotheſis. The paſſages, I have quoted in another place (17), ſeem to intimate, that he aſſigned a ſoul to every atom, which is confirmed by the teſtimony of Plutarch: ' Democritus ſuppoſes that all things are endued with ſome kind of ſoul, even carcaſſes themſelves, for as much as they manifeſtly partake of ſome degree of heat and ſenſation, the greateſt part being evaporated.' Ὁ δὲ Δημόκειτος πάντα μετέχειν φησὶ ψυχῆς ποιᾶς· καὶ τὰ νεκρὰ τῶν σωμάτων, διότι ἀεὶ διαφανῶς τινος θερμοῦ καὶ αἰσθητικοῦ μετέχει τοῦ πλείονος διαπνεομένου. Democritus porrò omnia ait quandam habere animam, etiam cadavera: quòd hæc ſemper perſpicuè aliquid obtineant caloris & ſenſus, majori parte exſpirata (18). But as none of Democritus's writings are preſerved to us, it is no eaſy matter to give a juſt and exact ſummary of his thoughts on this head; and beſides, we know that this notion has not been followed by the ſect of the atomiſts. Neither Epicurus, nor his ſucceſſors, ever maintained that atoms were indued with life or ſenſe, and they have conſidered the ſoul as a compound of ſeveral parts. They maintained that all ſenſation ceaſed by the diſunion or analyſis of the parts of this compound. See below (19) the diſcuſſion of a critical remark of Plutarch upon Epicurus. They would have found another great advantage in the hypotheſis of animated atoms; for their indiviſibility might have furniſhed them with ſome anſwers to an unſurmountable objection, to which their opinion is expoſed, who maintain, that matter may think, that is, be capable of ſenſation and knowledge. This objection is founded on the unity, properly ſo called, which muſt belong to thinking beings; for if a thinking ſubſtance were no otherwiſe one, than as a globe is one, it would never ſee a whole tree; it would never feel pain upon the blow of a ſtick. To convince you of this, let us conſider the figure of the four parts of the world upon a globe; you will ſee nothing on this globe which contains all Aſia, or even a whole river. The part, which repreſents Perſia, is not the ſame with that which repreſents the kingdom of Siam; and you diſtinguiſh a right ſide and a left in that part, which repreſents the Euphrates. From hence it follows, that if this globe was capable of knowing the figures it is adorned with, it would contain nothing which could ſay, I know all Europe, all France, all the town of Amſterdam, all the Viſtula; each part of the globe could only know that portion of the figure, which fell to it's lot; and as this portion would be too ſmall to repreſent any one place entire; the globe's capacity

FROM hence, that each atom is inanimate, it follows that no collection or combination of atoms can become a ſenſitive being.

THAT which thinks ought to be indiviſible. The advantage, which the ſyſtem of Leucippus would have had by aſſigning a ſoul to each atom.

much foundation for it as for the eternity, and inherent motion, which they attribute to their indiviſible corpuſcles. Let us obſerve, that there was a ſect of Philoſophers in the capacity of knowing would be entirely uſeleſs; no one act of knowledge could reſult from that capacity; at leaſt it's acts of knowledge would be very different from thoſe which we experience; for theſe repreſent to us all the object at once, a whole tree, a whole horſe, &c. An evident proof, that the ſubject, affected with the whole image of theſe objects, is not diviſible into many parts, and conſequently that man, as a thinking being, is not corporeal, or material, or divided, or compounded of many beings. If he were, he would be perfectly inſenſible of the ſtroke of a ſtick, ſince the pain would divide itſelf into as many particles as the member ſmitten conſiſts of. But theſe members conſiſt of infinite particles; ſo that the portion of pain, which belonged to each part would be too ſmall to be perceived or felt. If you anſwer that each part of the ſoul communicates it's paſſions to the reſt, I am ready to make you two or three replies, which will throw you back again into the mire.

I would tell you, in the firſt place, that it appears no more poſſible for the parts of a globe to communicate their pain, than to communicate their motion. Now it is moſt certain, that each part preſerves that quantity of motion, which falls to it's ſhare, and communicates nothing of it to others. Puſh a globe; the motion you communicate to it equally diſtributes it ſelf to all the particles of this moveable, to each according to it's bulk; and from that time forward, till the globe leaves moving, there is no new diviſion made of this motion among it's parts. Why then ſhould you ſuppoſe any other law with reſpect to thought; for inſtance, with reſpect to the pain you might excite in this globe by a kick with the foot? Ought you not to ſay, that this pain diſtributes itſelf through the whole globe, and that each part of the globe partakes of it, in proportion to it's magnitude, and retains what falls to it's ſhare? In the ſecond place, I deſire your anſwer to this ſhort queſtion. How does the part A of the ſoul communicate it's pain to the parts B and C. Does it transfer it by fairly diveſting itſelf, in ſuch a manner, that the ſame numerical pain, which was lately in the part A is now found in the part B? If ſo, it deſtroys a moſt certain and true maxim, That accidents do not paſs from one ſubject to another (20). Beſides, it deſtroys your own ſuppoſition. Your deſign is to ſhew, that the pain of a kick with the foot muſt be very ſmart, though divided into infinite portions, and you ſuppoſe that the portion, which falls to one part of the ſoul, quits that part, and fixes on another. But this way of communicating will not augment the ſenſation; for if, as faſt as one part of the ſoul communicates it's pain, it loſes it; an increaſe to that degree, which we call intenſive (21), is infallibly prevented, and thus the difficulty ſubſiſts in it's full force. One cannot conceive why a pain, becauſe divided into infinite parts, ſhould be an inſupportable ſenſation. You will ſay then, that one part of the ſoul communicates it's pain to the reſt, and yet retains it, that is to ſay, produces in the neighbouring parts a ſenſation like it's own. But my objection reverts. This like ſenſation produced a-new, is it not received into a ſubject diviſible in infinitum? it will conſequently then divide itſelf into infinite parts, after the manner of the firſt, and by this diviſion each ſubject, or each part of the ſubſtance, will have only a degree of pain ſo ſmall, ſo inſignificant, as not to be felt. Now experience teaches us quite the contrary. My third reply ſhall be, that you introduce into the world an infinite number of needleſs things. You can never bring your notion to bear, but by ſuppoſing a thing inconceivable, to wit, that the image of a horſe, or the idea of a ſquare, being received into a ſoul compoſed of infinite parts, preſerve themſelves entire in every part. This is the abſurdity of the intentional ſpecies, which the ſchoolmen dare hardly any longer advance. It is an abſurdity greater than that of thoſe doctors, who ſay the ſoul is all in all the body, and all in every part (22). But I let that paſs, and only aſk you, whether your ſuppoſition does not manifeſtly include this monſtrous abſurdity; that, in a famiſhed dog, there are infinite ſubſtances, which feel the gnawings of hunger, and, in a man who reads there are infinite things, which read and know each what they read. Nevertheleſs, we all know by experience, that there is only one thing in us, which knows that it reads, that it is hungry, that it feels pain or joy, &c. To what end then ſerves this infinite number of ſubſtances, which read in every reader, which hunger and thirſt in every animal, &c. This conſequence you cannot deny, ſince, to deliver yourſelf from the inconveniencies, to which you are expoſed by the diviſion of thought into as many parts, as there are parts in the ſubſtance of a material ſoul, you are forced to anſwer, that the parts of the ſoul, by reciprocally communicating their modifications, preſerve the ſenſation entire in every part. This puts me in mind of a very good argument, which a ſect of Philoſophers, whom I ſhall mention in the following remark, employed to maintain the ſpirituality of God. If God is a body, ſay they, the perfection of his being is found either in all the individual ſubſtances of his body, or in one alone. If in all, there are then many Gods; if only in one, the reſt are ſuperfluous. 'Si Deus eſt 'corpus, tùm Divinitas & Veritas ejus perficietur 'vel in univerſalitate & complexu Subſtantiarum indi'viduarum corporis illius, quod habet, vel in unâ 'tantùm. Si perficiatur in una, tùm nulla eſt utilitas 'reliquarum, ſed ſunt ſuperflua: nullaque eſt ratio 'eſſentiæ illius corporis, (quia una ſubſtantia indivi'dua non poteſt corpus conſtituere). Si in omnibus & 'ſingulis perficiatur tùm erunt Divinitates multæ, non 'verò Deus unus. Atqui verò jam demonſtrârunt, 'Deum eſſe unum. Ergo (23).' You will tell me, perhaps, that the ſoul does not ſee all the parts of a horſe at once, but one after another; that this ſucceſſion is ſo quick, that it is imperceptible, and that the impreſſion, received the firſt inſtant, laſts long enough to be united with the impreſſion of the following inſtants; whence it happens, that the ſoul believes it ſees the parts of an object, which really act no longer upon it. Thus the ſoul thinks ſhe ſees a circle of fire; when one turns round a flaming ſtick. She ſees the parts of this circle ſucceſſively, and yet ſhe thinks ſhe ſees them all at once. Which proceeds from hence, that the impreſſion, ſhe has received, laſts longer than the action of the object. I anſwer, that this ſubterfuge will not bring you off. It ſignifies nothing againſt my laſt, nor even againſt ſome of my former objections; it can only ſerve to dazzle a little on account of the diſproportion between the greatneſs of the object, and the ſmallneſs of the thinking ſubſtance. But after all, what could you reply, ſhould I ſay, that, when a man attentively beholds an immoveable body, a wall for example, the ſame part of the object, which ſtruck him the firſt of theſe imperceptible inſtants you mention, muſt ſtrike him every following inſtant; for no reaſon can be aſſigned, why it ſhould ceaſe acting on the ſoul. It acts then at the ſame time with all the other parts; but tell me, if you can, how the image of a wall can be fitted all entire, and at the ſame inſtant, to a ſubject diviſible in infinitum. This, and ſeveral other arguments, to be ſeen in the writings of ſome moderns, invincibly prove that thought is incompatible with a compound being (24).

WHETHER the perception of a body is formed ſucceſſively in the ſoul.

I have enlarged on this matter, on purpoſe to confirm what I had before laid down, that Leucippus, Epicurus, and the other Atomiſts, might have guarded againſt ſeveral unanſwerable objections, if they had bethought themſelves of giving a ſoul to every atom. They would thereby have united thought to an indiviſible ſubject, and they had as good ground to ſuppoſe atoms animated, as to ſuppoſe them uncreated, and endued with a moving virtue. It is as difficult to conceive this virtue in an atom, as that of ſenſation. Extention and ſolidity conſtitute the whole eſſence of an atom in our idea. The power of moving is not included in it. It is as foreign and extrinſic to body and extention, as that of knowledge. Why then, ſince the Atomiſts ſuppoſed in their corpuſcles a ſelf-moving force, would they rob them of thought? I know they could not have avoided all difficulties, by aſcribing it to them: they might ſtill have been preſſed with invincible objections (25). Yet there had been ſome glory in parrying a thruſt here and there. Let us obſerve, that very great Philoſophers have made the principal properties of the ſoul to conſiſt in a ſelf-moving power the Eaſt, who admitted the hypotheſis of atoms, and a vacuum [F]; but they amended, it for they aſcribed to God the creation of thoſe atoms. Let us alſo obſerve that the vacuum, which Gaſſendus had reſtored, and Des Cartes overthrown, gains ground daily, and becomes the favourite doctrine [G] of the moſt famous Mathematicians.

power (26). It is by this attribute they have characterized and defined it. Would any one then have thought it ſtrange, that they, who gave to atoms the principle of motion, ſhould give them a ſoul too?

[F] There was a ſect of Philoſophers in the eaſt, who admitted the hypotheſis of atoms, and a vacuum.] The famous Rabbi Maimonides, ſpeaks at large of this ſect of Philoſophers. They are called The Speakers (27). They principally exerciſed themſelves on theſe four points (28). I. That the world is not eternal. II. That it was created. III. That it's creator is one. IV. That he is incorporeal. This Rabbi mentions the twelve principles they laid down for their foundation. The ſecond of which was, that there is a vacuum, and the third, that time is made up of indiviſible inſtants. It does not appear, that their atoms were like thoſe of Leucippus; for they gave them no magnitude, and made them all exactly alike (29). Maimonides preſſes them hard (30) on their being forced to deny, that one moveable went faſter than another, and that the diagonal of a ſquare was longer than one of it's ſides. Theſe difficulties obliged them to ſay that the ſenſes deceive us, and that we muſt truſt to reaſon alone (31). Some even went ſo far, as to deny the exiſtence of a ſquare figure (32). Let us ſay, by the by, that they might have retorted theſe difficulties upon their adverſaries, and let us challenge all the patrons of diviſibility in infinitum, to anſwer the arguments, which prove that the diagonal of a ſquare is not longer than one of the ſides. For the reſt, theſe Arabian Philoſophers ſuppoſed in part, what I have ſaid Leucippus ought to have done; they taught, that every atom of animate bodies was animated, and every atom of ſenſitive bodies ſenſitive, and that the underſtanding reſided in an atom. There was no diſpute among them on this point; but as to the ſoul, they divided into two opinions about it; ſome ſaid, ſhe was lodged in one of the atoms, of which man, for example, is compoſed. Others compounded her of many very ſubtile ſubſtances. They were divided much the ſame as to knowledge. Some placed it in a ſingle atom, others in each of the atoms, which conſtitute the knowing perſon. ‘(33) Vita, ex ipſorum ſententia, exiſtit in unaquaque particula corporis viventis. [G] The vacuum . . . . became the favourite doctrine of the moſt famous Mathematicians.] Plutarch affirms (35), I. That a vacuum was rejected down from Thales to Plato. II. That Leucippus, Democritus, Demetrius, Metrodorus, and Epicurus, admitted an infinite vacuum. III. That the Stoics taught, that all was a plenum in the world, and beyond it an infinite vacuum. IV. That Ariſtotle acknowledged, beyond the world, only ſo much vacuum, as was ſufficient for the heavens to breathe in; adding, that the heaven is fire. I do not know where Ariſtotle has taught this doctrine; but I know where he has denied, that there are bodies beyond the heaven (36), which ſuppoſes his admitting an infinite vaccum beyond the world; for nothing could be more abſurd, than to ſuppoſe, above the higheſt heaven, a void and finite ſpace. Note, that he teaches in the ſame place, that there is neither place, nor vacuum, nor time, above the higheſt heaven; however, it is a meer queſtion about a word; for he rejects the vacuum, only as defined to be a ſpace, which contains no matter, but which may contain it. He maintained, that it was not poſſible, there ſhould be bodies above the world; therefore he could not admit a vacuum according to that definition; but he had doted, if, taking the void, ſimply and generally, for whatever contains or incloſes no body, he had ſaid, that, beyond the laſt celeſtial ſphere, there was no void. Chriſtian Philoſophers, profeſſing his doctrine, have taught, what Plutarch attributes to the Stoics, that all is full in the world, and that beyond it there is an infinite void. This they call the imaginary ſpace, and do not believe it to be a vacuum properly ſo called, though it includes no body; for by a vacuum, or void, they underſtand the ſpace, which containing no body, is yet ſurrounded by bodies on all parts. It is manifeſt, that this definition belongs not to the imaginary ſpace. As to the plentitude of the world, they have admitted it as a fundamental point, dear and precious to nature; ſince they have ſaid, that it has ſuch a horror for a vacuum, that it will rather violate it's own laws, than ſuffer it to inſinuate itſelf any where. It makes light bodies deſcend, and heavy bodies aſcend, as often as a vacuum threatens it, ſay they, theſe motions are contrary to her own laws, and do violence to the elements: but what ſhall we do in this caſe? is it not lawful and juſt, of two evils, to chuſe the leaſt? the modern Philoſophers have ſufficiently ridiculed theſe viſions. Galileus, and his ſucceſſor Torricelli, revived the doctrine of a vacuum; Gaſſendus, the great reſtorer of Leucippus's ſyſtem, brought it into faſhion, and pretended to have proved it demonſtratively. Mr Des Cartes declared for a plenum, and carried the thing much farther than Ariſtotle's followers had done; for he not only maintained, there was no vacuum, but alſo, that it was abſolutely impoſſible there ſhould be any; he went upon this, that the vacuum, having all the properties, and all the eſſence of body, that is, the three dimenſions, it were a contradiction in terms to pretend, that the vacuum is a ſpace without body. The identity he eſtabliſhed between ſpace and body, was thought by moſt people a great paradox; they cried out, that he detracted from the divine omnipotence, as teaching, that God himſelf could not by a miracle effect, that a veſſel, remaining a veſſel, ſhould not be filled with ſome matter. This is doubtleſs a conſequence of his doctrine, but which does not ſtrike at the omnipotence of God; the queſtion is not concerning his omnipotence, but only whether whatever has three dimenſions be body. Many have thought Mr Des Cartes's arguments very ſolid, and believed that, by the help of his ſubtile matter, motion and plenitude might be eaſily reconciled, and they have found a paralogiſm in the pretended demonſtrations of Mr Gaſſendus (37). Thus the reign of the plenum ſeemed to be better eſtabliſhed than ever, when, to our great ſurprize, we have ſeen ſome great Mathematicians of the contrary opinion. Mr Huygens has declared for a vacuum (38): Mr Newton * has taken the ſame ſide, and hath ſtrongly oppoſed this hypotheſis of Mr Des Cartes, as inconſiſtent with motion, levity, and ſome other phænomena (39). Mr Fatio is of Mr Newton's opinion, and I have heard him ſay, that the exiſtence of a vacuum is not a problem, but a thing certain, and mathematically demonſtrated. He added, that the void ſpace is incomparably greater than the full. This new ſect, patronizing a vacuum, conceives the univerſe as an infinite ſpace, in which are ſcattered ſome bodies, which, in compariſon of that ſpace, are no more than as ſome ſhips diſperſed here and there on the ocean. So that they, whoſe ſight ſhould be good enough to diſtinguiſh what is full from what is void or empty, would cry out, > Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vaſto (40).

> Few, ſcatter'd, floating on the waſt abyſs.

What perplexes the new patrons of a vacuum, is, that they find the Carteſian arguments againſt the nothingneſs of ſpace ſo very ſtrong, that they dare not maintain, as the ſchool Philoſophers do, that ſpace is a pure privation. When therefore they are asked, what theſe ſpaces are, which have really three dimenſions, are diſtinct from body, and ſuffer themſelves to be penetrated by bodies, without making any oppoſition, they know not what to anſwer, and are almoſt induced to adopt the chimera of ſome Peripatetics, who had the boldneſs to ſay, that ſpace is nothing but the immenſity of God (41). This would be a very abſurd doctrine, as Mr Arnauld has ſhewn in the books (42), wherein he pretends, that Father Mallebranche ſeems to attribute to God a formal extenſion. Note, that Mr Hartſoecker, a good Natural Philoſopher and Mathematician, has taken the middle way between Des Cartes, and the new followers of a vacuum; for if, on one hand, he pretends, that motion is impoſſible in the Carteſian ſyſtem, on the other ſide he will have the fluid expanſe, in which bodies float, and ſcud at their eaſe, not to be pure ſpace, or penetrable extenſion (43).

From this we may collect two things. One is, that theſe great Mathematicians, who demonſtrate a vacuum, give the Sceptics greater pleaſure, than they imagine. Obſerve how. The mind of man has no ideas more clear and diſtinct than thoſe of the nature and attributes of extenſion. This is the foundation of Mathematics. Now theſe ideas manifeſtly ſhew, that extenſion is a being, which has partes extra partes, and which conſequently is diviſible and impenetrable. We know by experience the impenetrability of bodies; and, if we ſeek the origin and reaſon of it à priori, we find it with the utmoſt perſpicuity in the idea of extenſion, and of the diſtinction of the parts of extended being, and cannot poſſibly conceive any other foundation of it. We conceive extenſion, not as a genus, which contains under it two ſpecies, but as a ſpecies, which has under it only individuals (44). Whence we conclude, that the attributes, found in any one extenſion, are found alſo in every other. In the mean time, here are Mathematicians, who demonſtrate a vacuum, that is an indiviſible and penetrable extenſion, ſo that a globe of four feet diameter, and the ſpace it fills, which is alſo of four feet, are no more than four feet of extenſion. There is therefore no truſting to any clear and diſtinct ideas, upon which our minds can reſt, ſince that of extenſion is found to have miſerably deceived us. This idea had induced us to believe, that whatever is extended has impenetrable parts; but here is now a ſpace mathematically demonſtrated, a ſpace, I ſay, with three dimenſions, which is immoveable, and which ſuffers other dimenſions to paſs and repaſs, without moving itſelf, or opening for them. The ſecond thing I have to ſay, is, that Spinoza's ſyſtem is but ill adapted to this two-fold extenſion in the univerſe, one penetrable, continued, and immoveable, the other impenetrable, and ſeparated into parcels, which are ſometimes diſtant a hundred leagues from one another. I believe the Spinoziſts would find themſelves ſtrangely puzzled, if they were forced to admit Mr Newton's demonſtrations.

'rationem ſi conſideraveris, invenies illam ſuperſtru-
'ctam eſſe propoſitioni ipſorum primæ & quintæ, ac
'proinde nullius eſſe ponderis. Poteſt enim illis dici,
'Corpus Dei non eſt, ut dicitis vos, compoſitum ex
'conjunctione particularum ejuſmodi individuarum,
'quales Ipſe creavit; ſed eſt corpus unum continuum,
'nullam niſi in Cogitatione admittens diviſionem.——
'If you conſider this reaſon, you will find that it 'is built upon their firſt and fifth propoſitions, and
'therefore is of no weight. For they may be told
'The body of God is not, as you ſay, compoſed of
'a conjunction of ſuch individual particles as he
'himſelf created; but is one continued body, admit-
'ting of no diviſion but in idea.' The anſwer, this Rabbi ſuppoſes might be made, is not very wide of their poſition, who admit a poſitive ſpace, which is the Deity itſelf.

LEUWENTZ, a town of Hungary, I mention it only to correct two groſs faults in the Supplement to Moreri [A].

[A] I mention it only to correct two groſs faults in the ſupplement to Moreri.] I. To affirm, that this town depends on the archduke of Auſtria, is to deceive the reader; for it is ſuppoſing, either that this town is annexed to the archduchy of Auſtria, or that it belongs to a prince diſtinct from his Imperial Majeſty, and yet known by the title of archduke of Auſtria. Both of which are falſe. Nothing was eaſier than underſtanding this phraſe of Mr Baudrand, which has been miſ-underſtood, ſub dominio Auſtriacorum etiamnum. Mr Baudrand had wrote his Dictionary (1) before the loſſes, which the Turks had ſuffered in Hungary, and whilſt they were in poſſeſſion of their laſt conqueſts, and particularly of Neuhauſel, of which he had been ſpeaking. For which reaſon he thought himſelf obliged to obſerve, that the houſe of Auſtria was ſtill in poſſeſſion of Leuwentz; for, having ſaid before, that this town depended on the government of Neuhauſel, he led his readers to believe, that this place belonged to the Turks, ſince the ceſſion of Neuhauſel, by the treaty of 1664. The ſecond fault is moſt abſurd. Mr de Souches, who beat the Turks at Leuwentz, in 1664, was not General of the French, though he was a Frenchman. He ſhould here have diſtinguiſhed theſe two things the more carefully, becauſe the French had extreamly magnified the part they had in the defeat of the Turks at the paſſage of Raab, in 1664. Mr Baudrand is ſecure from this criticiſm, though his phraſe, Grandi clade affecti fuere à Souchio Duce Gallo, is a little too equivocal.

LEWIS VII, king of France, was crowned at Rheims the twenty fifth of October 1131 (a), and reigned with his father till the firſt of Auguſt 1137, and afterwards alone till the month of September 1180. He married Eleanora daughter and heireſs to William, the IXth of that name, duke of Guienne, in the year 1137 (b). This princeſs was a great match, both on account of her beauty and of the fine provinces her father had left her; but it is pretended ſhe was very leud, and that her huſband had very good reaſons to diſſolve the marriage, if human prudence could have ſuffered him to renounce the poſſeſſion of Eleanora's great eſtates by this divorce. All Hiſtorians blame him for being more jealous than politic; for at laſt not being able to bear the weight of his jealouſy, and the diſhonour he pretended his wife's irregular life brought upon him, he earneſtly ſued for a divorce, and obtained it by the ſentence of the prelates of the kingdom, aſſembled at Baugency, in the year 1152 (c). He did what Marcus Aurelius would have done in the like caſe; but he had acted a wiſer part if he had imitated that emperor [A], and in conſideration of the dowry, ſtifled all thoughts thoughts of a ſeparation. He reſtored to the divorced princeſs all that belonged to her; and thereby put his moſt dangerous neighbour in a capacity of oppreſſing France; for the king of England (d) preferring the intereſts of his grandeur before the ſhame of marrying a divorced and diſgraced princeſs [B], went as we may ſay poſt to Bourdeaux (e), when ſhe was offered to him after the ſeparation, and preſently concluded the marriage. He ſacrificed without any difficulty, and even with a great deal of pleaſure, the nicety of a point of honour to ambition. The king of France had taken Eleanora along with him into Aſia, where, as if Europe were not a large field enough for her gallantries, it is ſaid, ſhe compleated the ruin of her reputation [C], being little affected with the ſanctity of the places ſhe went to ſee, with the princes of the cruſade.

loſopher. We here ſee that Marcus Aurelius knew how to reconcile theſe two characters. If he had kept the empire after the divorce, he had done an unjuſt action, and had but ill maintained the character of a Philoſopher. If he had choſe to be reduced to a private condition, rather than be a cuckold, he had ſhewn a contempt of greatneſs and authority, and ſo would have ill maintained his character of emperor. The juſtice of his maxim was not unknown to Burrhus, Nero's governor; for when this prince would have divorced Octavia, the emperor Claudius's daughter, Burrhus endeavoured to diſſuade him from it, by telling him, that if he divorced her, he muſt reſtore her the empire (2). We have here a king of France, who practiſed this principle ſo conſcientiouſly, that we may ſay he was ſcrupulous not only beyond what a prince ought to be, but beyond what any private perſon would have been. To prove this, I ſhall ſet down the words of a modern Hiſtorian, a great favourer of Eleanora, 'She retired, ſays he (3), immediately to her 'dominions of Guienne, from which the king withdrew his garriſons, without retaining any one place; 'though having two daughters by that marriage, 'which he kept with him, it ſeems he might, under pretence of ſecuring their pretenſions to the 'ſucceſſion, have ſeized on the fortreſſes of the duchy. 'Poſſibly he might have acted this out of policy, to 'prevent the revolt of Guienne, where the people, turbulent and jealous of their rights, would never have 'ſuffered him to make himſelf maſter to the prejudice of their lawful ſovereign; ſo that he judged 'it prudenteſt to wait till the death of this princeſs, ſhould put her daughters in poſſeſſion. Perhaps too it was a pure nicety of conſcience; not 'believing he could juſtly retain the eſtate of a princeſs he had divorced. Beſides, he had lately loſt 'two of the ableſt men of his kingdom; the abbot 'Suger, and the count de Vermandois, who died in 'the ſame year; and as they had the whole management of the kingdom, whilſt he never concerned 'himſelf with it, he was in as great a perplexity at 'their death, as a man whom his guides forſake in 'the midſt of a foreſt. So much it imports a ſovereign to be timely inſtructed in the intereſts of 'his ſtates, and to govern by his own underſtanding, 'and not by that of his miniſters. However, queen 'Eleanora was very happy, that Lewis VII, being 'more a monk than a king, liſtened to the ſcruples 'of his conſcience, rather than the motives of ambition.' I have retrenched nothing from this paſſage; there is a juſtneſs of thought runs through the whole, proper to inſtruct the reader. Another modern writer reaſons upon the motives of Lewis VII, without mentioning any ſcruples of conſcience. Here is what he ſays: 'Lewis being returned from the 'Holy-Land, had diſannulled his marriage with Eleanora of Aquitain, under pretence that they were 'near relations, but indeed to puniſh this queen, 'for a ſuſpected gallantry of her's in the eaſt, with 'a Turk named Saladin, and for other debaucheries, 'too public to be kept ſecret. Pure diſcontent put 'him upon this divorce, with ſo little precaution, 'that againſt all the rules of policy, he ſent back Eleanora into her own country, which he reſtored to 'her; not thinking, perhaps, that either there was 'any man ſo venturous as to marry a princeſs he had 'divorced, or any prince ſo little nice, as to take a 'diſgraced woman, by whom he had had two daughters. 'The event ſhewed he was miſtaken. Henry, then 'duke of Normandy, overlooked this ſcruple, to vex 'Lewis, and add Guienne to ſo many other fine 'territories which he poſſeſſed in France; by which 'he ſaw himſelf in a fair way to be one day as 'powerful as the king (4).' Add to this a paſſage of Mezerai, which I cite in the following remark.

For the reſt, I pretend not to draw a parallel between Fauſtina and queen Eleanora; the greateſt detractor cannot ſay that of the latter, which hiſtory ſays of Fauſtina. She went herſelf to chuſe her galants on the ſea-ſhoar, among watermen and mariners, and that becauſe they commonly went naked (5). My meaning is eaſily underſtood.

[B] The king of England preferred the intereſts of his grandeur, before the ſhame of marrying a divorced and diſgraced princeſs.] A paſſage of Mezerai will inform us of two things which will amaze good men, and men of honour; the one will be ſurprized, that the king of France ſhould pay ſo much deference to the ſevere laws of the Goſpel: and others, that a preſumptive heir of England, ſhould not pay enough to the laws of worldly honour: 'Lewis VII, 'being returned from the Holy-Land, was willing 'to get rid of his wicked wife, though he had had 'two daughters by her, Mary and Alix. To this 'end having declared to the Pope, that ſhe was related to him in a prohibited degree, he aſſembled 'a council at Baugency, where the biſhops being 'ſecretly acquainted with the true cauſe of this divorce, pronounced the marriage null: Eleanora 'having as paſſionately deſired it as he, becauſe, as ſhe 'ſaid, he was more a Monk than a king. And truly 'it was well for her that he was; for if he had not 'been ſomewhat monkiſh, he would have treated 'her in another manner, and not have been ſo conſcientious, as to reſtore her Guienne and Poitou; but 'have confiſcated them for her crime, and for the reſt 'have favoured her with her life, if he had thought 'fit. But we need not wonder that he committed 'ſuch a groſs fault in point of policy, in which he 'had little experience, having always truſted the adminiſtration, in a word, all the government and 'management of affairs, to his miniſter, the abbot 'Suger, who died the year before, had left him as 'much bewildered, as a man who loſes his guide in 'a deſert and unknown country. Moſt honeſt men 'will think this ſcrupulous reſtitution ſtrange, and 'men of honour will alſo wonder to ſee that Henry, 'to whom Stephen, having no children, had bequeathed the kingdom of England, ſhould marry this 'princeſs, whoſe debauchery was ſo public, that the 'king could not think any private gentleman would 'have had the meanneſs to diſhonour his family with 'her (6).'

[C] He carried his wife into Aſia, where it is ſaid ſhe compleated the ruin of her reputation.] Father d'Orleans had been telling us, that ſhe was ſuſpected of a gallantry with a Turk, named Saladin. This wants a farther explanation, ſuch as an Hiſtorian, this queen's apologiſt, has given. During Lewis VIIth's abode at Antioch, the queen wrote to Saladin for the 'liberty of one of her relations, whom ſhe loved much, 'and backed her letter with a conſiderable ſum for 'his ranſome (7). . . . . . He granted the queen the 'liberty of her relation, without taking the ranſome, 'and made a very ingenious and civil anſwer to her 'letter (8). The priſoner was the bearer of it, and 'delivered it to the queen, without ſaying any thing 'to the king. He often talked of Saladin's generoſity to the queen, and every where praiſed his genteel carriage, and great merit, with ſuch exaggerations as are natural to thoſe who ſpeak of a benefactor. The king was advertiſed of it, and was 'willing to know the circumſtances of that adventure. 'The ſecret the queen had made of her negotiation 'with Saladin, appeared ſuſpicious to him, and the 'proceeding of the Sultan ſeemed ſo extraordinary 'for a Turk, that he could not believe his generoſity ſity was diſintereſted. He thought an adventurer, ſuch as Saladin was, and head of the robbers, ſuch as the Turks then were, incapable of ſo generous an action, had he not deſigned to make himſelf amends by ſomething more advantageous than the ranſome he had refuſed. He made no long enquiry into what might be his deſign. What was told him of the genteelneſs and bravery of Saladin, of the letter the queen had written to him, and of the anſwer he had given her, made him look upon the queen as a woman who had betrayed him, and who held a criminal correſpondence with Saladin. He made no reflexion upon the diſtance of places, nor the quality of the perſons which rendered this commerce impoſſible, but fancied that this Sultan might come diſguiſed to Antioch, and that the queen ſaw him at her uncle's. Add to this, that this princeſs, provoked by his ſuſpicions, took no care to cure him of them; but puſhed on by her uncle, who was reſolved to revenge a repulſe the king had given him, inſtead of a meek behaviour and complaiſance, expreſſed a great contempt for him, and propoſed the diſſolving their marriage, which the relation, ſhe ſaid, between them made unlawful. Then it was, that the king feared, ſhe would quit him the firſt opportunity, to follow her gallant, and it was the fear he had of this, that made him ſend her away in a hurry from Antioch, not doubting, after ſuch a propoſition, but ſhe had formed the deſign. This is what Hiſtory informs us concerning this adventure, which might give occaſion to the jealouſies of ſo weak and ſuſpicious a prince as Lewis VII, but which cannot juſtify the calumnies, with which ſome Hiſtorians have blackened this queen's innocence.'

I grant, with Mr de Larrey, that the calumnies founded on this adventure, as if Saladin (9) had actually lain with queen Eleanora, are frivolous; but I do not think with him, that Lewis VII betrayed any ſymptoms of a weak and ſuſpicious prince in being perſuaded there was a myſtery of iniquity in the caſe; the moſt reſolute and the greateſt prince would have had a juſt occaſion to be alarmed. The moſt reſerved Hiſtorians acknowledge, that this princeſs was a coquette (10), and burned with luſt and ambition. Some months after her divorce, ſhe married Henry duke of Normandy, and preſumptive heir of England, a prince young, ardent, red-haired, and very capable to ſatisfy all her deſires (11). She was in love with him before ſhe was divorced, and it was that paſſion that prompted her to preſs the diſſolution of her marriage, as Mr de Larrey confeſſes (12). From a like motive ſhe was likely enough to run after Saladin (13). I have read in a book of the lady de Villedieu, a paſſage that I think remarkable, and which I ſhall ſet down without warranting the truth of it. 'Hiſtory has ſo celebrated this princeſs's beauty, that it would be a vain attempt to deſcribe it. She it was that charmed the fierceneſs of the brave Saladin, general of the Saracen army (14), and who having given him to underſtand, that ſhe believed no proteſtations of love, but in her own tongue, forced this great captain to that ſurprizing effect of love, as to learn the French tongue in a fortnight (15).'

Mr de Larrey doubtleſs will not take it ill, after I have owned with him, that there is no likelihood Eleanora had to do with the great Saladin, if I advertiſe my reader, that good Hiſtorians, who ſpeak of this queen's diſorders, do not ſuppoſe her lover was the ſame Saladin, who made himſelf ſo famous by his conqueſts. They ſay then, that the perſon ſhe had an affair with in Antioch was one Saladin, a baptized Turk (16). Others, without mentioning the converſion of this perſon, ſimply ſay, that he was a Turk named Saladin. And there are ſome who ſpeak as if he had never been baptized, and they deſcribe her running after a Turkiſh ſoldier, whom ſhe had made the object of her paſſion, in contempt of her religion and dignity. It is Mr Larrey himſelf, who ſpeaks thus in his advertiſement to the reader. All this manifeſtly inſinuates, that the great Saladin is not the perſon in queſtion, for a good Hiſtorian could not, in ſpeaking of ſo great a man, make uſe of the phraſe one Saladin; a Turk named Saladin (17). For the reſt, when this queen carried herſelf ſo ill in Antioch, Saladin was not Sultan of Iconium, as Mr de Larrey ſuppoſes (18), nor do I think that country was ever one of his conqueſts. He married one of his daughters a long time after to Melich, the Sultan of Iconium's ſon (19). This does ſome prejudice to Eleanora's apology.

John Bouchet, in his annals of Aquitain, affirms, that Lewis VII ſuſpected his wife deſired to marry the Sultan Saladin, and that that reaſon was alledged by the king when they treated of the divorce. 'Some have written, that if the ſaid king Lewis had not brought away his wife Eleanora, ſhe had formed a deſign, by the advice of her uncle duke Haymond, to quit the king, and marry the Sultan Saladin; by which means the ſaid duke Haymond would have recovered all his lands: he did this out of revenge, becauſe the ſaid king Lewis had refuſed to aſſiſt him to recover them; but he ſaid nothing to Eleanora of it, till he was in France, as we ſhall ſee afterwards (20).' Let us ſee what is contained in the place he refers to (21): 'The council being aſſembled, the matter was put in debate by the archbiſhop (22) of Langres, who was alſo ſummoned thither, ſpeaking thus; you know, gentlemen, what our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt formerly ſaid, that man cannot ſeparate thoſe, whom God has joined in marriage; however, he excepts one caſe, which is when one or the other commits adultery; for if that happens they may be diſſolved and ſeparated. Now gentlemen, it is true, as the king commands me to ſay, that in a voyage beyond the ſeas (from which, thanks to God, he is returned) through the great love he had to Madam Eleanora his wife, he took her along with him, as well to viſit the ſacred places of Jeruſalem, as to ſee Haymond, the duke of Antioch, her uncle, by whoſe means the king expected to have ſuccours and aſſiſtance in the ſaid country, to perfect his enterprize; nevertheleſs, the ſaid lady, without occaſion, cauſe, or reaſon, and from meer levity, deſigned to deſert the king, her huſband, and give herſelf up to Sultan Saladin, whoſe picture ſhe had ſeen, and thus betray the king and his whole army, and all this by the counſel of the ſaid Haymond her uncle. Which wicked and damned enterprize was not executed, as God would have it, by the great diligence the king made to retire from that danger, which he never declared to the ſaid lady. However, he has always laid this fact to heart, and can in no wiſe truſt in her, and would willingly be divorced, if he ſaw the thing were reaſonable, and that God would not be offended by it. For, as he ſays, he can never be aſſured of the children that may proceed from her.' The author adds, that the archbiſhop of Bourdeaux, deſiring that her divorce might be grounded on ſome other reaſon, beſides the petulancy and ill intentions, the ſaid lady Eleanora was charged with, propoſed another more honourable medium, which was, that the king and ſhe were relations, and that in the degrees prohibited. This overture was accepted, and the diſſolution of the marriage founded upon it. The queen informed of what had paſſed, 'fainted away from the chair ſhe ſat in, and was ſpeechleſs above two hours; nor could ſhe cry, nor open her teeth. And when ſhe was a little come to herſelf, ſhe began with her clear and beautiful eyes to look upon thoſe who had told her the firſt ſad news, and ſaid to them, &c. (23).'

[D] I ſhall ſet down what Brantome ſays of it.] He ſpeaks ill of Eleanora; he blames Edward III for having confined his mother in a caſtle for her love-intrigues. 'A ſlight offence, ſays he (24), ſince it is natural; and having converſed with military men, and uſed herſelf ſo much to ramp with them among arms, tents, and pavillions, it was hardly poſſible for her to contain, from playing the ſame pranks within the curtains, as this often happens; I refer myſelf to our queen Eleanora, ducheſs of Guienne, who attended the king her huſband beyond ſea, and to the holy-war, and who, by frequent converſing among arms and the ſoldiery, gave herſelf ſuch a looſe as at laſt to have to do with the Saracens; for which the king divorced her, which coſt us dear. Conſider, that ſhe had a mind to try whether theſe warlike men were as brave champions in a chamber, as in the field of battle, and that poſſibly it was her humour to love valiant men, for one valour attracts another, like virtue; nor did he ſay amiſs, band in that cruſade, were not the leaſt diſgraces that expedition expoſed him to. St Bernard had not promiſed theſe ill events [E]; on the contrary, he had fed him with hopes of great victories; and was ſo little concerned at the murmurs raiſed againſt him, that had it not been for perſons leſs zealous, and conſequently more capable of reaſoning aright upon the conſequences, he had engaged in a ſecond expedition (f). Lewis had reaſon to repent all his life, of the fault he had committed, in ſuffering the inheritance of the duke of Guienne, to come into the hands of the Engliſh. To oppoſe the king of England, he was forced to take a conduct moſt unjuſt in itſelf, and of ill example to all kings; which was to excite this prince's ſons to rebel againſt their father, and to protect them in their rebellion. But this he did ſo faintly, and with ſo little ſucceſs, that he contributed more to the glory of his enemy, than he injured him. Eleanora was very much diſſatiſfied at her ſecond marriage. She was at leaſt as jealous of the ſecond huſband [F], as the firſt had been of her. But the ſecond was much harſher than the firſt; he put her in priſon, and kept her cloſely confined all his life, as the reader will ſee in our remarks, with the ſequel of this queen's hiſtory [G]. Lewis died on the eighteenth or twentieth of September 1180 (g). Two years

[E] St Bernard had not promiſed theſe ill events.] Being ordered to preach up the cruſade throughout all Chriſtendom, he began in France. 'He aſſembled a national council at Chartres, in which he was choſen Generaliſſimo of that expedition; but he refuſed that office, contenting himſelf to be the trumpeter of it; he publiſhed it every where with that vehemence and aſſurance of ſucceſs, and, as was believed, with the working ſo many miracles, that the cities and towns were deſerted, and all people liſted themſelves for this war (26).' The emperor Conrad ſet out with an army of ſixty thouſand horſe, and arrived at Conſtantinople towards the end of March 1147 (27). Lewis began his march the ſecond week after Whitſuntide the ſame year, and arrived in Syria, in Lent 1148. Emanuel the emperor of Conſtantinople, cauſed plaiſter and lime to be mingled with the flour which he furniſhed to Conrad, 'and gave him guides, who after having led the army by long circuits, in which it conſumed all its proviſions, delivered it half dead and languiſhing, into the hands of the Turks, who cut it all to pieces, inſomuch that the tenth part did not ſurvive (28).' Lewis ran the ſame risk as Conrad; however, he eſcaped more by good fortune than prudence. 'He gained a battle in paſſing the river Meander; but he reaped no advantage by it; for after this, not ſtanding upon his guard, he received a notable check at the defile of a mountain. At laſt he came to Antioch, whereof Raymond, the queen's uncle by the father's ſide, then held the principality.' Here it was that he diſcovered his wife's commerce with Saladin, and was tempted to diſſolve his marriage. 'He found no other remedy to avoid this ſcandal, but to take his wife by night from Antioch, and ſend her away before him to Jeruſalem.' He and Conrad beſieged Damaſcus, and ſucceeded in this enterprize as ill as in all the reſt, 'thro' the prodigious treachery of the very Chriſtians of the country. Therefore theſe two princes deteſting their villany . . . . thought only of returning (29). Lewis being on board his veſſels, met on the road the naval force of theſe traitors, who laid in wait to take him. As they were engaged, or even, according to ſome authors, as they led him priſoner, it happened by good fortune, that the army of Roger, king of Sicily, their capital enemy, conducted by his lieutenant, arrived, who quickly cauſed them to releaſe their priſoner, having burnt taken, and ſunk abundance of their veſſels (30).' The ill ſucceſs of this cruſade, 'which made ſo many widows and orphans, ruined ſo many families, and diſpeopled ſo many countries, raiſed murmurs and reproaches againſt St Bernard's reputation (31), who ſeemed to have promiſed a quite different event. So that when the Pope, two years after would have had him preach up another cruſade, and oblige him to go in perſon to the Holy Land, in order to draw a greater number after him; the Ciſtercian monks broke all his meaſures for fear of a ſecond misfortune, which might have been greater than the firſt (32).'

[F] Eleanora was . . . . . jealous of the ſecond huſband.] Let us uſe the expreſſions of a modern Hiſtorian already cited (33). 'Queen Eleanora, the woman of all the world, whom it leaſt became to be jealous of her huſband, was extravagantly ſo, and had reaſon for it. Henry was a man of ill fame, with reſpect to women, and the monument we have remaining of the famous Roſamond, is a teſtimony to poſterity, of this prince's leudneſs. She who, at the time I ſpeak of, inflamed this queen's jealouſy, was Alix of France, betrothed to prince Richard, and given as her ſiſter Margaret, to be educated by her father-in-law, who was fallen in love with her. Exaſperated at this paſſion, and at the ſame time, by the fear, that if the ſon was vanquiſhed, the father being enraged, might come to ſome extremity againſt him, Eleanora knew ſo well how to perſuade Richard and Jeoffry, that it was their intereſt not to quarrel with their elder brother, that ſhe engaged them to enter into the confederacy of the malecontents.' That all my readers may underſtand this, I ought to obſerve, that the king of England's eldeſt ſon, by queen Eleanora, was in rebellion againſt him. He had ſtolen the princeſs Margaret of France, daughter to Lewis VII, who was to be his wife, and whom the king of England educated in his own court. According to ſome hiſtorians (34), it was ſhe, that raiſed Eleanora's jealouſy, and it was Eleanora (35), who excited her eldeſt ſon to this rebellion, as afterwards ſhe engaged her two younger ſons to join with their elder brother. This plot was hatched, whilſt the king was in Ireland. As ſoon as he returned into England, 'the firſt thing he did was to ſhut up Eleanora in a cloſe priſon, where ſhe remained all the time her huſband lived, and very dearly paid for the ſatiſfaction ſhe had ſought in a revenge, which neither did juſtice to the rights of the throne, nor thoſe of the conjugal engagement (36).'

[G] He kept her priſoner all his life as the reader will ſee . . . . with the ſequel of this queen's hiſtory.] Eleanora was a priſoner till the death of the king her huſband. This prince died in 1188. Richard, his third ſon, ſucceeded him. He was then in France, where he had been engaged in a furious war againſt his father. The firſt thing he did after his return into England, was to deliver queen Eleanora, his mother, who had been a priſoner ſixteen years (37). He made her regent of the kingdom (38) whilſt he went into the Holy-Land. The jealouſy which ſtill cankered in her ſoul, induced her to make a voyage to Navarre to ſeek a wife for the king her ſon. To underſtand this, we muſt know 'that it was told this queen, in priſon, that Henry deſigned to divorce her . . . . in order to marry the princeſs Alix (39). The fear of this made her hate this princeſs mortally; and when ſhe was in a way to revenge her ſelf, ſhe carried things to an extremity. As ſhe had a great aſcendant over Richard, ſhe endeavoured to put him out of conceit with this match, by giving him ſuſpicions of his father's conduct with this young princeſs, and ſeeing that her ſuſpicions were not ſufficient, ſhe added, that Henry had debauched her, and had had a ſon by her. At laſt, fearing that the charms of ſo fine a princeſs would be more prevalent in Richard's heart than her words, ſhe made all the haſte ſhe could to marry him to another. For this reaſon ſhe went to the court of the king of Navarre, deſigning to match Richard with the princeſs Berengaria

(25) This queen Eleanora was not the only one who accompanied in that holy war the king, her huſband, but before her, with her, and afterwards, ſeveral great princeſſes and ladies, with their huſbands, did croyſe themſelves; but did not croyſe their legs, which they opened and ſtretched in good earneſt. So that ſome ſtayed there, and others returned very expert. And under the cover of viſiting the holy ſepulchre, among ſo many arms made love in good earneſt: and indeed, as I have ſaid, arms and love agree very well together, ſo ſtrong and well cemented is the ſympathy.

‘Berengaria, having obtained permiſſion to negotiate this treaty before ſhe left England. It was not difficult for her to accompliſh it, having ſo much addreſs as ſhe had, and the match beſides appearing to the king of Navarre ſo advantageous, as it really was (40).’ Afterwards ſhe conducted the princeſs of Navarre into Sicily to her ſon, who conſummated the match before he ſet ſail to the Holy-Land. Eleanora returned into England, from whence ſhe went over into Germany in 1194, to deliver Richard, who was made a priſoner by the duke of Auſtria (41). Richard dying in 1199, ſhe formed cabals for devolving the crown upon her ſon John, earl of Mortaing, to the excluſion of Arthur her grandſon, tho' ſhe had more affection for Arthur than for John, and tho' ſhe was perſuaded, that John's pretenſions were unjuſt (42). But her ambition was the only rule of her conduct. ‘She apprehended that if Arthur ſhould come to reign, he would ſuffer himſelf to be governed by the ducheſs Conſtantia, his mother, a woman of ſolid ſenſe, and excellent courage, who would not give her any ſhare in the authority. Thus ſhe preferred the earl of Mortaing before him, a prince without faith or honour, becauſe ſhe believed, that having need of her ſupport, he would let her reign in conjunction with him (43).’ This earl is the ſame who was called John ſans terre (John without land). By the peace he made with Philip Auguſtus, king of France, in 1201, it was ſaid that the Infanta of Caſtile his neice, ſhould marry Lewis, Philip's only ſon. ‘Queen Eleanora, notwithſtanding her great age, went in queſt of this Infanta, her grand-daughter, to the court of Toledo, and brought her into Normandy (44).’ She was beſieged in Mirebeau, by prince Arthur her grandſon, in the year 1202. But John without Land ſuccoured her, and took this prince priſoner, and murthered him ſome time after. He durſt not do it, they ſay, whilſt Eleanora lived. This queen died, loaden with years and ſins. Let us uſe Mezerai's expreſſions. ‘This woman, conſummate in all ſorts of wickedneſs, lived above eighty years, kept up a war for above ſixty years, and ſettled a hatred betwixt France and England, that has continued above three ages; ſo that with reaſon we may ſay of her what the Greek Poet ſaid of Menelaus's wife, that we have ſuffered not a 10, but a 400 years fire and ſword by means of this woman (45).’ Her fruitfulneſs deſerves but part of the epithets which are given to the fecundity of Julia, Auguſtus's daughter (46), for Eleanora's ſons had a great complaiſance for their mother's paſſions, they revolted againſt their father at her deſire; and they who reigned ſuffered her to enjoy the regency; but otherwiſe they brought a thouſand miſeries upon their country. They had hearts like lions; but then it was not ſo much a true courage, as a hardineſs determined to deſpiſe the maledictions of fame, and behold with an unconcerned eye, the moſt atrocious crimes. In a word, they neither did honour to France, from whence they deſcended originally, both by father and mother, nor to England, the inheritance of their father. Eleanora's death is placed on the thirty firſt of March 1204 by Moreri, who adds, that coming out of priſon in 1194. She retired into a monaſtery, and died in that of Fontevraud. He is miſtaken five years, as to the time ſhe came out of priſon, and much more as to the retirement he attributes to her; for after her liberty, ſhe ſhewed her ambition as much as ever, her intriguing ſpirit, her jealouſy and vindictive humour. But it is true, that ſhe deſired to be buried at Frontevaux, and took the vail of the order (47). She was a great benefactreſs to that houſe (48), for which reaſon ſhe is repreſented in the obituary of Frontevaux, as one of the moſt virtuous princeſſes in the world. So certain it is, that in order to obtain of theſe honeſt monks teſtimonials of a good life, in the midſt of a conduct ſo ſcandalous, that the moſt flattering hiſtory dares not conceal it, it is enough to enrich them. See the remark [I] of the article of St GREGORY. ‘Migravit à ſeculo domina Alienoris Regina Franciæ & Angliæ, Duciſſa Aquitaniæ, quæ nitore Regiæ ſobolis ſuæ mundum illuſtravit. Nobilitatem generis, vitæ decoravit honeſtate, morum ditavit gratia, virtutum floribus picturavit, & incomparabilis probitatis honore, ferè cunctis præſtitit Reginis mundanis (49). —— Eleanora, queen of France and England, and ducheſs of Aquitain, departed this life, who by the ſplendor of her royal race, was an ornament to the world; ſhe graced her high birth by the regularity of her life, enriched it by the gracefulneſs of her manners, embelliſhed it by the flowers of her virtue, and by the honour of an incomparable probity excelled all worldly queens.’ I am ſorry Father de la Mainferme has not marked the day and year of Eleanora's death; for if it be the thirty firſt of March, 1204, as Moreri affirms, it follows that Mezerai and Larrey are miſtaken, in ſaying that John without Land durſt not kill his nephew Arthur in his mother's life-time, Mr Pinſſon des Riolles, whom I deſired to conſult Father de la Mainferme, informed me that this monk was dead, and that Father Labbe in his Genealogical Tables (50), and Father Anſelme in his Hiſtory of the Royal Family of France (51), mark the time of Eleanora's death, as Moreri does.

It muſt not be forgotten that this princeſs has been put in the catalogue of learned women. ‘Anno CIↃCCIII. obiit Aleonora Regina . . . . Ab eruditione ac prudentia multum celebrata eſt. Scripſit epiſtolas ad Cœleſtinum Papam, Henricum Cæſarem, Richardum & Joannem filios. Vide plura apud Matthæum Pariſium, nec non Balæum. —— In the year 1203 died queen Eleanora . . . . celebrated for her learning and wiſdom. She wrote letters to Pope Celeſtin, the emperor Henry, Richard and John her ſons. See more in Matthew Paris, and alſo in Bale.’ Thus Voſſius ſpeaks at the eighty ſecond page of his treatiſe de Philologia, in the Amſterdam edition, 1650. It is among the additions to his book. He did not know this particular, when he wrote the ſecond chapter, where he gives a long catalogue of learned women.

[H] He made a pilgrimage into England . . . . and another to St James of Galicia . . . . in 1155.] Let us make uſe of Mezerai's words. ‘As the devotion to the relics of St Thomas à Becket, increaſed by the example even of king Henry himſelf, who of his perſecutor was become his votary; king Lewis went over into England, paid his devotions at his tomb, and left magnificent marks of his piety (52).’ That prince had made a pilgrimage before. Let us hear what Mezerai ſays (53). ‘It was not lawful for the kings of France, as Yves de Chartres ſays, to marry baſtards. Now it was reported, that Conſtantia (54) was one. For this reaſon Lewis, two years after his marriage, deſired to enquire into it, and under pretence of going in pilgrimage to St James's in Galicia, he paſſed through the court of his father-in-law, the moſt magnificent prince of his time, who received him, and treated him royally at Burgos, and removed the ſcruple he had in his mind.’ This ſhews that devotion was one of the principal qualities of Lewis VII. ‘He was unfortunate in his greateſt enterprizes, ſays Mezerai (55), and too ſlack in affairs that demanded vigour; but as pious, charitable, good, equitable, liberal, and valiant, as any prince of his age; yet two faults may be laid to his charge, one againſt prudence, in having divorced his wife; the other againſt the laws of nature, in having ſupported the rebellion of king Henry's children againſt their father.’ Devotion and piety are undoubtedly the greateſt of all virtues. A prince can no more diſpenſe with them than a private perſon, and if he chuſes to fulfil the duties they enjoin rather than preſerve his dominions, he is, in the ſight of God, one of the greateſt men on earth; but it is certain, that, according to the courſe of human affairs, nothing is more likely to ruin a nation, than the ſcrupulous conſcience of the ruler. If his neighbours acted like him, we might expect from his piety, the greateſt happineſs that a people can enjoy; but if whilſt they practiſe all the tricks of ſtate policy, he preremptorily refuſes to take the leaſt ſtep beyond the ſevere rules of the goſpel morality, both he and his ſubjects will infallibly be a prey to other nations, and all the world will ſay, he was fitter for a monaſtic life, than to wear a crown, and that he would do well to yield his place to a leſs ſcrupulous prince. *Exeat aula. his ſon Philip to be crowned at Rheims, the firſt of November, 1179. He had him by Alix of Champaigne, his third wife. I have not given a chronological account of his actions, becauſe it may be found in Moreri.

This maxim eſpecially regards the head of a court. I ſpeak not of the piety, which conſiſts in building magnificent churches, in extending the limits of his religion by force of arms, and extirpating ſects. This kind of piety is ſometimes (57) ſubſervient to the temporal good of a prince, to his greatneſs and conqueſts. I ſpeak of a piety, that will not make uſe of the oblique ways of policy; I ſpeak of a conſcience that always prefers the honeſt before the profitable, and that rejects all the maxims of the art of reigning, which are contrary to exact probity. This virtue is doubtleſs prejudicial to a temporal intereſt, becauſe it allows not the reſiſting the attacks and cabals of the enemy. Lewis VII is an inſtance of it (58), tho' it muſt be owned that his ſcruples were of a very particular nature; for they hindered not his encouraging children to revolt againſt their fathers, and protecting them in that rebellion; but they would not ſuffer him to marry a baſtard; they forced him to make a voyage, to know whether his wife was the lawful daughter of king Alphonſus. He was afraid of offending againſt the laws of the kingdom. Why did he not fear to offend againſt the law of God, which commands children to honour their fathers?

I conclude with a paſſage of Mr Amelot de la Houſſaye, in which he cites Machiavel. 'The man, ſays he, in the fifteenth chapter of his Prince, who profeſſes himſelf a perfectly honeſt man, amongſt ſuch numbers as are otherwiſe, will be ſure to be ruined. There is therefore a neceſſity that the prince, who would ſtand his ground, ſhould learn the faculty of not being good, when he ought not to be ſo *. And in his eighteenth chapter, after having ſaid that the prince ought not to keep his word, when it is againſt his intereſt, he frankly confeſſes that this precept ſhould not be given, if all men were good; but there being ſo many wicked and deceitful, it is for a prince's ſecurity to know how to be ſo too. Without which he might loſe his dominions, and conſequently his reputation; it being impoſſible that a prince, who has loſt the one, ſhould preſerve the other (59).' Some pages after he ſpeaks thus: 'Some Maxims of ſtate are to be more equitably interpreted than is uſually done, the practice whereof is become almoſt abſolutely neceſſary, thro' the wickedneſs and perfidiouſneſs of men. Add to this, that princes are of ſuch refined policy, that he who at preſent would act like a downright honeſt man with his neighbours, would quickly be their dupe.'

(57) This reſtriction was neceſſary; for ſometimes this piety brings great prejudice to the moſt powerful princes: the houſe of Auſtria has felt it, France feels it.

(58) See Maimbourg's Hiſtoire des Croiſades, livr. iii, pag m. 357, & ſeq. where he ſhews, that the ſcruples of this monarch were the cauſe of the ruin of all his affairs in the expedition to the Holy Land.

* Plutarch ſays, that if to reign well one muſt abſolutely diſcharge all the duties, and obſerve all the rules of juſtice, Jupiter himſelf would not be able to do it.

LEWIS XI, king of France, was born at Bourges, in 1423. He ſucceded Charles VII, his father, in the year 1461. He was a prince well verſed in the art of reigning. He was conſummate in the intrigues of policy, which he very happily employed to deliver himſelf out of a thouſand perplexities; but they ſometimes confounded him (a), which is the leſs to be wondered at, when we conſider that he was not uniform in his conduct, but ran from one extream to another [A], being reſerved to exceſs, for the moſt part, and too open on ſome occaſions. It was juſtly ſaid of him, that he made himſelf as conſiderable by his vices, as by his virtues, being apt in the one as well as the other, to run into extreams (b). He was neither a good ſon, nor a good father, nor a good brother, nor a good huſband. At ſixteen years of age he ſet himſelf at the head of a party, and being forced to return to his duty, he watched for other occaſions of revolt, and perſiſted in theſe courſes till the death of his father [B], and even afterwards diſcovered his unnatural temper in a ſcandalous manner [C]. He took no care of [A] He ran from one extream to another.] Here follows what an hiſtorian ſays of him. 'He was the ableſt prince in the world, to bring men over to his opinion, to diſcover the ſecrets of his enemies, to perplex them with diſtruſts, and divide the moſt united; but in his mirth, was incapable of keeping in his ſecrets; every thing ſlipped from him, and he was more ſubject to commit faults, than able to repair them, which he did by all manner of ways, and more frequently by bad than good means (1).

[B] He ſet himſelf at the head of a party . . . and watched for other occaſions of a revolt, and perſiſted in theſe courſes till the death of his father.] Charles VII made a regulation, which neither pleaſed the great men, nor the officers who were fattened by the miſery of the people: they interrupted it by a dangerous commotion, which was called la Praguerie. The dukes of Alençon, Bourbon and Vendome, the baſtard of Orleans, and ſeveral others, were concerned in it, they complained that the king put the government in the hands of two or three private perſons; and hereupon made a league againſt his miniſters. La Trimouille himſelf, who was diſgraced, joined with them, reſolving to return to court at any rate (2).' To add more weight to this conſpiracy, the faction ſet the Dauphin at the head of them, giving out, that they only deſigned the reformation of abuſes, and to order it ſo, that all things for the future ſhould be managed by this prince's authority, regulated by the adviſe of the princes of the blood (3). They wrote letters in his name to the towns of Auvergne, and other provinces where they thought theſe deſigns might be approved. . . . . . But all the towns abominated this revolt (4); and as the king was vigilant, and attacked the conſpirators, where-ever they appeared, they were forced to have recourſe to his clemency, and deliver up the Dauphin. This commotion was quelled in leſs than nine months (5). This ſhews their compariſon to be juſt, who liken the people to coquets. There are ſome days in which they are not to be moved with ſighs or preſents; the next day they come to hand without any trouble. We may alſo ſay, that there are conjunctures in which the moſt plauſible manifeſto's of thoſe who take arms againſt their ſovereign, ſhake not the fidelity of the people: at other times half theſe pretences would be ſufficient for an entire revolution.

The king having pardoned his ſon, kept him near his own perſon, and watched him narrowly. He took him with him on ſome expeditions, and ſent him upon others, and gave him opportunities of obtaining a great reputation, eſpecially by the defeat of four or five thouſand Swiſſers near Baſil (6), who defended themſelves very bravely. He diſtruſted his ſon's natural temper, and kept him ſomewhat ſhort; but the young prince too haughtily took head; and it is ſaid, that he gave a box of the ear to the beautiful Agnes, the king's miſtreſs (7). This joined with other things, obliged his father to ſend him into Dauphiné for four months (8). The Dauphin went thither in a menacing manner: he carried himſelf with a great deal of haughtineſs, and committed intolerable extortions (9). He had intrigues with the neighbouring princes, and thought of returning no more to court; he received orders to return, and did not obey them; and knowing that Charles VII was taking meaſures to ſecure him, he eſcaped to the duke of Burgundy's court, and thereby made himſelf ſo much dreaded, that his father haſtened his own death, by too great an abſtinence, upon the bare apprehenſions of poiſon (10). Mezerai juſtly ſays, that Charles VII might have been called happy, if he had had any other father, or any other ſon (11).

[C] He diſcovered his unnatural temper, in a ſcandalous manner, after the death of his father.] This death 'gave him too great a joy to be kept within his own breaſt, and he gave ſuch marks of it, as could not but make the government of ſo unnatural a ſon to be feared. He rewarded him that of the education of his ſon, and married his daughters in ſuch a manner, as ſhewed he had no concern for their welfare [D]. It is pretended that he put his brother to death [E], and it is certain he had miſtreſſes and baſtards [F]. The peace he made with

‘brought him the firſt news of it, beyond his expectation. He wore mourning but one morning, and appeared in cloaths of a white and carnation colour after dinner the ſame day. He even forced the courtiers, who haſtened to join him at Guenap, to follow his example, ſince he would not ſuffer them to come into his preſence, with cloaths of a different colour from his own (12).’ Another Hiſtorian ſays, that from this king's, firſt behaviour it was concluded, ‘that he would embelliſh the beginning of his reign with other trophies, than clemency; he diſcarded almoſt all the officers and ſervants of king Charles his father; being wonderfully pleaſed to undo what he had done, to pull pown what he had built, and to build what he had pulled down (13).’ It is obſerved (14), ‘that he puniſhed his father's Phyſician, becauſe, following the rules of his art, he had obliged the ſick king to eat.’ He who informs me of this, adds, ‘That the pretence Lewis XI pleaded of rendering hereby the authority of the ſovereign inviolable to the laſt, is not allowable. He is in the right; but if he fancied that it was the true motive of this prince; if he believed, I ſay, that he was willing to take example by Domitian's temper, he is miſtaken. ‘Ut domeſticis perſuaderet ne bono quidem exemplo audendam eſſe patroni necem, Epaphroditum à libellis, Capitali pœna condemnavit (Domitianus) quod poſt deſtitutionem Nero in adipiſcenda morte manu ejus adjutus exiſtimabatur (15). —— To perſwade his domeſtics that men ought never to attempt upon the life of their patron, tho' inſtances were produced that the ſame had been juſtly done, Domitian condemned Epaphroditus his ſecretary to die, becauſe it was thought he had aſſiſted Nero when he killed himſelf.’ The Phyſician was puniſhed only becauſe Lewis XI had an averſion for a perſon, who had endeavoured to ſave Charles the ſeventh's life.

[D] He took no care of the education of his ſon, and he married his daughters in ſuch a manner as ſhewed he had no concern for their welfare.] He ‘was an ill father, and tho' he had had his only ſon ſo late, who was afterwards Charles VIII, that there was no probability this young prince ſhould ever give him the ſame diſturbances, that he remembered he had formerly given Charles VII, nevertheleſs he looked upon him as a formidable perſon. He took no care of his education; he placed none but mean perſons about him; he had him bred up in ſloth and pleaſures; and the only maxim he taught him, was, that a man was incapable of ruling, that did not know how to diſſemble. Anne of France, his eldeſt daughter, was perfectly beautiful, but ſhe had abundantly more wit than he was willing ſhe ſhould have had; and it was to humble her, that he married her to a younger brother of the houſe of Bourbon, of a genius ſo mean, that his majeſty had no reaſon to fear, he ſhould enter into any intrigues againſt his ſervice. Jane of France, his ſecond daughter, was ſo deformed, that the Phyſicians affirmed, ſhe would never have children; nevertheleſs he conſtrained the duke of Orleans, the firſt prince of his blood, to marry her, tho' he had reaſon to foreſee ſhe would be unhappy with him (16).’ He had obliged himſelf to give the duke of Calabria a force ſufficient to recover the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, ‘together with his eldeſt daughter in marriage; but of the temper he was of, he was far from chuſing ſo worthy a man for a ſon-in-law. He performed neither of theſe promiſes. . . . . . The count de Beaujeu was preferred before this duke, for no other reaſon, but becauſe he was beneath him in merit and valour; but the fortune of this younger brother of the family of Bourbon, was not bettered by marrying Anne of France. A contract of marriage was preſented him to ſign, which would have made over all the eſtates of this houſe to his wife, had not he been adviſed to evade it by ſome words which were not taken notice of; and as long as the king his father-in-law lived, he employed him only in affairs that were odious. . . . . . And after all, never did him any good (17).’ Peter Matthieu (18), obſerves, that Lewis XI, hated his daughter Jane, becauſe ſhe was black, little, and crooked. The lord Leſquiere, her governor, frequently hid her under his long robe, when the king met her, that he might not be afflicted at the ſight of her.

[E] It is pretended that he put his brother to death.] Let us again comment on this in Varillas's words. ‘Tho' Lewis by the advice of Francis Sforza had inveſted his brother with the duchy of Normandy, yet he took it away from him a little after the league for the public good was broken, and gave no other reaſon for it, but that this province was then one third of the revenue of France, and that his younger brother would be too rich, ſhould he enjoy it. He choſe rather to give him Guienne; but he ſo repented it afterwards, that the author, of the Hiſtory of Aquitaine, and the abbot of Brantome, pretend, he got his brother poiſoned by the abbot of St John d'Angeli (19).’ I have elſewhere cited (20) Brantome's words, and will not repeat them here. See alſo Peter Matthieu, in the Hiſtory of Lewis XI (21).

[F] He had miſtreſſes and baſtards.] I obſerve this as the proof of the character I have given him of an ill husband. He was twice married; the firſt time to Margaret Stuart, daughter to James I, king of Scotland, in 1436. She died at Chaalons upon the Marne the twenty ſixth of Auguſt, 1446 in the twenty ſixth year of her age (22). Hall and Grafton, two Engliſh hiſtorians, affirm, that ſhe diſguſted her husband by her ſtinking breath (23). Buchanan is very angry with them, and confutes them, in the firſt place, by Monſtrelet, who ſays ſhe was handſome and virtuous; in the ſecond place, by a Scotch author, who went into France with her, and never forſook her as long as ſhe lived. He has left it in writing, that ſhe was beloved by her father-in-law, her mother-in-law, and her husband, and was highly extolled in a piece of poetry made upon her death. Monſtrelet's teſtimony does not confute the Engliſh hiſtorians: a woman that is handſome and virtuous, may however be diſguſtful in that reſpect which they alledge. The teſtimony of the Scotch author is ſuſpicious; a domeſtic does not think himſelf obliged to publiſh, that his miſtreſs was hated in the family of her husband, and makes no ſcruple to ſay the contrary: it is a common-place of praiſe. Funeral encomiums are no argument againſt the ill humour of a husband. It might be proved by modern examples, that princeſſes much diſſatisfied with their husbands and father's-in law, have been praiſed after their deaths, in the moſt magnificent ſtrains by Poets and Preachers. However let us ſee Buchanan's words: ‘Quantam illam exiſtimabimus vel mentiendi licentiam, vel maledicendi libidinem, qua, in ejuſdem Regis filiam, utuntur: quam, ob oris graveolentiam (nihil enim in mores, homines alioqui tam impudentes, audebant confingere) marito ſcribunt fuiſſe ingratam? At Monſtreletus illorum temporum ſcriptor æqualis, & probam fuiſſe, & formoſam, memoriæ prodidit; & qui librum Pluſcartenſem ſcripſit, eique Reginæ, & naviganti & morienti, fuit comes, ſcriptum reliquit, eam, dum vixit, egregie caram ſocero, ſocrui, & marito fuiſſe, epitaphiumque carmen, omni laude plenum, Gallicis verſibus, Catalauni ad Matronam (quo in oppido deceſſit) fuiſſe publicatum, quod in Scoticum Sermonem verſum, plerique noſtrorum adhuc habent (24). —— How great muſt we think that liberty of falſifying or deſire of ſlandering to be, which they uſe againſt the daughter of the aforeſaid king! For whereas ſuch men, otherwiſe impudent enough, had nothing to alledge againſt her morals, they write that ſhe was unacceptable to her husband, becauſe of her ſtinking breath, whereas Monſtrelet, a cotemporary writer, doth affirm that ſhe was virtuous and beautiful. And he who wrote the Pluſcartine book, and who waited on that queen, both at ſea and at her death, has aſſerted, that as long as ſhe lived ſhe was very dear to her father and mother-in-law, and to her husband; and that her epitaph full of her praiſes, in French verſe, was publiſhed at Chaalons on the Marne, where ſhe died, and being afterwards tranſlated into Scotch verſe, moſt of our country-men have it by them to this day.’ with England in 1475, was more uſeful than glorious; he was jeſted on for it, but at bottom was excuſable [G]; for conſidering the great number of potent enemies he had to fear, it was better to be ſubmiſſive than to be haughty in that juncture. Of two evils the leaſt is to be choſen; it was an act of prudence; and a man ought not to pretend to a Roman courage out of ſeaſon. Lewis XI raiſed a great deal of money in his kingdom, and trampled much more on his ſubjects than his predeceſſors had done, and yet his perſonal expences were ſo ſmall, that he cannot be acquitted of ſordidneſs [H]. Thoſe

'day.' Mezerai affirms that Louis XI could never love his firſt wife, becauſe of ſome ſecret imperfection and ſo had no children by her (25). His ſecond wife was Charlotte of Savoy. This ſecond marriage 'was conſummated at Namure in the year 1457. She was very ill treated by her husband for many years together, and died at Amboiſe the firſt of December 1483, being thirty eight years of age (26).' I know not therefore for what reaſons Mr Varillas had recourſe to the ſilence of the Hiſtorians of Savoy. 'Lewis ſays he (27), was liable to a fickleneſs in love . . . . . . We have read in the king's library three contracts of marriage, which he ſigned in favour of ſo many of his natural daughters . . . . . but bating that, the Hiſtorians of Savoy, do not charge him with having uſed queen Charlotte his wife unkindly.' The following paſſage of Peter Matthieu will ſhew, ſhe was not very happy. 'In the firſt year of his abode there, Charlotte of Savoy was brought to Namure, to conſummate the marriage that had been treated five years before. A marriage which being made with reluctancy, was conſequently without love. When the duke of Burgundy gave the Dauphin his penſion of twelve thouſand crowns, Oliver de la March writes, that it was upon condition he ſhould marry her, which ſhews he had no great inclination to it. She brought him a ſon whom he called Joachim . . . . . The child died immediately after, which gave the father extream ſorrow, who not being yet poſſeſſed with the jealouſies which age brought upon him, deſired to ſee him a man, knowing that children, who are born late, are orphans betimes. The loſs of this child, who was the firſt that made him a father touched him ſo ſenſibly, that he made a vow, as Philip de Comines ſays, never to know any other woman but his own wiſe, and yet in ſeveral places of his chronicle, we find him amongſt the women, ſome of which were proſtitutes, and others married, and that to husbands of mean fortune raiſed to employments, with abundance of other inſtances of this kind, which do not beſpeak a continence equal to that of Alexander (28).' We ſhall ſee, below (29), the particulars of his galantries; but that which is ſufficient to convince us, that Charlotte of Savoy was not very happy, is, that her husband, at his death, admoniſhed his ſon not to truſt her; for, ſays he, I have always found that ſhe favours the Burgundians (30); judge whether he could love her, though he believed her otherwiſe good and virtuous. Mezerai, having ſaid of this king's firſt wife, what we have ſeen above, adds, he would very ſeldom have viſited the ſecond, only in hopes of having an heir (31). Obſerve well what follows: 'Every thing gave king Lewis apprehenſions; he always kept his wiſe at a diſtance, and in his laſt years baniſhed her into Savoy (32).' Philip de Comines obſerves, that this queen was none of thoſe in whom her husband could take great pleaſure, but however was a very good lady (33).

[G] The peace he made with England was more uſeful than glorious; he was jeſted upon for it, but at bottom was excuſable.] I am going to cite an author who is none of the moſt celebrated; but what then? It ſuffices that he ſpeaks good ſenſe. 'We find, ſays he (34), that Lewis XI, king of France, having too many affairs upon his hands, demanded peace of Edward IV, king of England, as ſoon as he underſtood he was entered into Picardy, and bought it very dear, little minding that the count de Lude, and others of his favourites, called him the cowardly king, as the politician Angevin has written, becauſe he only made that peace to diſunite and weaken his enemies, whilſt he might fortify himſelf to defeat them one after another afterwards, and maſter them, as he did for the moſt part . . . . (35). The Romans would rather have loſt their dominions, than have had ſuch a thought: for it never appears during the ſpace of 700 years, in which they made war with all nations, that they ever ſued for peace, except to the Gauls, who beſieged them in the Capitol, after having burnt their city, for which they revenged themſelves quickly after, and to Coriolanus. On the contrary being overpowered by king Perſeus, they would not grant the conqueror a peace, unleſs he ſubmitted himſelf and his kingdom to their mercy, altho' he offered to pay them tribute. And when king Pyrrhus, after having obtained ſome victories, and received ſome loſs, ſent his embaſſadors to Rome to treat of peace, according to the cuſtom of great princes who are in a foreign country; anſwer was made that he muſt firſt depart Italy, otherwiſe there could be no mention of peace, which was the anſwer of a magnanimous people, who perceived themſelves able to make head againſt the enemy: a thing which would ill become a weak prince who ought, as a wiſe pilot, to lower his ſails, and obey the tempeſt he cannot avoid, that he may get ſafely into harbour, and not make neceſſity miniſter to ambition; like the Vaivod of Tranſylvania, who confidently and openly ſaid, that he would chuſe to be a ſlave to the Turk, rather than an allie to Ferdinand, which happened to be his fate.' Peter Matthieu relates, 'That Edward had taken twelve members of the houſe of commons along with him, who by this time were weary of the war, and of lying in the field like the ſoldiers; theſe approved the propoſals of peace, and ſaid that if it was juſt and reaſonable, it would be imprudent to refuſe it, and that they ought to be ſatisfied with having reduced the king of France, to ſue for peace of the king of England, foraſmuch as a great king cannot be more humbled, nor deſcend lower, than to ſue for peace of his enemy (36).' This was doubtleſs a very great mortification to France; but the circumſtance of the time would allow no other methods without expoſing the ſtate to greater evils. Read theſe words of Philip de Comines: 'I believe a great many may think that the king debaſed himſelf too much: but wiſe men may judge by what I have ſaid, that this kingdom was in great danger, if God had not interpoſed his hand; who diſpoſed the mind of our king to make ſo wiſe a choice (and much confounded that of the duke of Burgundy, who committed ſo many errors as you have ſeen) in this matter, after having ſo much deſired what he loſt by his own fault. We had at that time a great many ſecret heart-burnings amongſt us; from which great miſchiefs would have enſued to this kingdom, and that quickly too, if this reſolution had not been taken, and that without delay, both with regard to Britany and other parts (37).

[H] He cannot be acquitted of ſordidneſs.] This is what we find in a book of La Mothe le Vayer: 'Scandalous parſimony the oppoſite to prodigality, is perhaps equally blameable. Lewis XI made himſelf contemptible by his vile habit, and his greaſy hats, which hiſtory upbraids him with: and we cannot read without indignation in the regiſters of the chamber of accounts, an article of twenty pence for two new ſleeves, to mend one of his doublets, with another of fifteen farthings to greaſe his boots (38).' Here a paſſage of Mezerai will very conveniently come in. 'The deciſive ſentence of Lewis XI did as little ſatisfy either party (39) as his interview with Henry king of Caſtile ſatisfied either French or Spaniards. The latter laughed at the penuriouſneſs and at the low and ſilly mien of king Lewis, whoſe coat was of coarſe cloth, ſhort and ſtreight †, and wore a leaden image of the Virgin Mary, on his bonnet; the former were ſhocked at the Caſtillian arrogance, and at the pride of the count de Lodeſme, Henry's favourite (40).' La Mothe le Vayer and Mezerai borrow theſe particulars from John Bodin; for thus he ſpeaks: 'There may be parſimony without leſſening the majeſty of a king, or the dignity of his houſhold, or debaſing his greatneſs, 'which

He made his ſoldiers pay their quarters punctually, and ſeverely forbid them to do any injury, and puniſhed the diſobedient with the utmoſt rigour. This was the reaſon why his kingdom, tho' very much loaded with taxes, did, notwithſtanding, grow rich [L]. The enacting that law, which makes Miſpriſion of treaſon which ſometimes is the cauſe of the contempt of ſtrangers, and rebellion of ſubjects; as it happened to king Lewis XI, who having almoſt expelled the gentlemen of his family, employed his Taylor for his herald at arms, his Barber for embaſſador, and his Phyſician for chancellor, (as one Antiochus, king of Syria, made Apollophanes, his Phyſician, preſident of his council ‡) and to mock other kings, he wore a greaſy hat, and the coarſeſt cloth; and even in his chamber of accompts was found, &c. . . . Nevertheleſs he heightened the taxes three millions a year, beyond his predeceſſor, and alienated a great part of the crown lands (41).' Here is what he had ſaid in another place of the ſame book (42): 'The king of Egypt having ſeen Ageſilaus rolling in a meadow, clad in a plain cloak of poor cloth, and lean, little, and lame, made no more account of him, than was made of king Lewis XI, who being choſen arbiter of a difference between the kings of Navarre and Caſtile, the Spaniards at the meeting ridiculed the French and their king, who looked like ſome pilgrim of St James of Compoſtella, with his greaſy hat edged with images, and his jacket of a tan colour cloth, and who had no majeſty in his face, no more than in his manners; and his train accoutred like himſelf, for he could not endure to ſee any body finely dreſſed; whereas the king of Caſtile, and his retinue, came richly habited, and their horſes bravely capariſoned, ſhewing a certain Spaniſh grandeur, which made the Frenchmen look like their valets.' We ſhall ſee below (43) that we may trace this to an author who lived before Bodin, and whom Varillas did not underſtand.

[I] The expences of his houſhold . . . . . and of his embaſſies.] Theſe are the words of Peter Matthieu, who wrote in the reign of Henry IV. 'The expences of his houſhold (44) were much inferior to thoſe of ſome lords of that time . . . . . by the accounts it appears, that they were augmented according to the years, the affairs, and journeys. They did not exceed thirty ſix thouſand livres till the year 1480, when they came to 43619 livres. In the year 1481; they were 66680 livres; and in the laſt year of his life 80603 livres. Nevertheleſs he never ſtirred from Pleſſis from the eighth of November to the ſeventh of September the year following, when he was carried to his grave at Nôtre-Dame de Clery. The number of ſervants for the ordinary ſervice of that expence, was not great, their wages were ſmall in compariſon of what they are in our days. They ſerved all the year, and the year began in October. None were in the liſt of his voluntary penſions but theſe following. Two chaplains at ten livres a month each, and a clerk of the chapel at a hundred ſols. A valet de chambre to the king at ninety livres a year. Four clerks of of the kitchen at 120 livres a year each. An overſeer of the roaſt, the pottager, the ſaucemaker, the maſter cook, a diſpencer of the armoury, two valets of the ſumpters, at ten livres each a month. Two ſcullions of the kitchen at eight livres a month; a Porter, a Paſtry-cook, a Baker; two Coachmen, each at ſixty livres a year; a groom of the ſtables, and two of his aſſiſtants at twenty four livres a month; a mareſchal of the forges at 120. The maſter of the chamber of the king's revenues 1200 livres, and the comptroller five hundred ‡. The gowns of the valets coſt but fifty ſols, and the cloaks of the Clerks, Notaries, and Secretaries, of the houſe and crown of France, but twelve livres (45).'

We have already ſeen that this prince employed his Barber on embaſſies. He made him a nobleman by patent in 1474, inveſting him with the county of Meulant, and changed his name from Oliver the Devil into that of Oliver le Daim (the Deer) (46). He ſent him on an embaſſy to the heireſs of Burgundy, who laughed at him: what, ſaid ſhe, have I to do with a Phyſician, I am very well (47). Mr de Wicquefort has mentioned this deputation of Oliver le Daim (48).

[K] He ſpent a great deal . . . . upon hunting, and upon the ladies.] 'Lewis's two predominant paſſions were for hunting and the ladies (§ α); and it is obſerved that his liberality ran into an inconceivable exceſs, as often as he had a mind to gratify either of theſe two paſſions. As for the firſt, he kept a prodigious number of huntſmen, falconers, hawks, and hounds, and was ſo ſollicitous of hindring thoſe who had the right of hunting, from exerciſing it under any pretence whatever, that it was more dangerous to kill a ſtag than a man . . . . When he parted from Lyons, after he had received certain advice of the defeat of the duke of Burgundy at Morat, he took with him, to the great ſcandal of good people, from this city, to that of Paris, two miſtreſſes *, one called la Gigonne, a widow, and the other la Paſſefilon, a Merchant's wife. Immediately after the prince of Orange had made him maſter of the duchy of Burgundy, he ſent for a young lady, a perfect beauty, called Hugete de Jaquelin who was at Dijon. But before all this we find in the king's library three contracts of marriage, which are ſo many teſtimonies of his incontinence, ſince he there appears in quality of a father of three natural daughters, and matches them without diſguiſing the matter (49).' Peter Matthieu tells us that this prince was at great expences for his amours, even when he was reduced to the neceſſity of borrowing. 'I have ſeen in the accounts of the chamber of the revenues, that being on a progreſs to Arras, he borrowed of one of his ſervants, called James Hamelin, the ſum of three hundred and twenty livres, ſixteen ſols, and eight deniers, to employ in his pleaſures and delights, and ſending for a gentlewoman of Dijon, called Huquette Jaquelin, widow to the deceaſed Philip Chamarges, in Auguſt 1479, , one of his Carvers, who went to fetch her, advanced the charges both of her journey and of the ſtay that ſhe made at Tours (50).' Note, that at that time twenty ſols went farther than two piſtols at preſent.

[(§ α) In the library of St Elizabeth at Breſlau there is a manuſcript hiſtory of king Charles VII, and Lewis XI, from the year 1410 to 1483. The author, who has not put his name to it, but in his preface, boaſts to have had in his youth ſeveral converſations with king Charles VII, ends his work with the epitaph of Lewis XI;

Perfidia inſignis, hinc uſque ad Tartara notus;

REM. CRIT.

[L] This was the reaſon that his kingdom . . . . . did notwithſtanding grow rich.] Thus you ſee how the ill qualities of a monarch are ſometimes compenſated with others, which, all things conſidered, make the people as happy as under a good and well-natured ſovereign (51). What Tacitus ſays, that the diſorders of government are interrupted by good princes who ſucceed bad ones; and that this makes a compenſation, treaſon a capital crime, is aſcribed to him [M]. He was ſubject to ſome caprices and humours is a good thought. Vitia erunt donec homines, ſed neque hæc continua, & meliorum interventu penſantur (52). But we may go farther, and ſay, that in the ſame perſon the good and the bad qualities ſometimes ſo counterpoize one another, that more public advantages reſult from it, than from a certain uniform goodneſs. Lewis XI levied too much money upon his ſubjects, but he made that money circulate; for his troops were obliged to pay exactly for whatever was neceſſary for them, and he never ſuffered them to ſteal or pilfer. Let us uſe the plain and antique ſtyle of John Bouchet (53). He would have juſtice adminiſtred, the church revered and not pillaged; and he delighted in adorning images and churches; and he ordered his ſoldiers exactly to be paid their wages, which his treaſurers could not fail in without peril of the halter. He had a long time in his pay above four thouſand men of arms, and a great number of foot, called Frank archers, with whom the earth was quite covered, from Bourdeaux to Picardy. Amongſt whom there was ſo good order and military diſcipline, that no violence was known to be done to the poor people, except in one place, where they ſtole ſome bees, and in another, where they filched a couple of pullets, for which the malefactors were immediately hanged, though they were men of arms. For this reaſon, tho' the people were burdened with great taxes and ſubſidies, and the king levied upon them four millions, ſeven hundred thouſand livres in taxes and ſubſidies yet the kingdom of France was rich, becauſe the money which the people gave, paid the ſoldiery, and the ſoldiery afterwards gave part of what they had received back, for what they had, and ſo a farthing did not go out of the kingdom. For this wiſe king never endeavoured to have two crowns, nor an imperial ſcepter, Here you may obſerve a for well placed; nothing exhauſts a kingdom more than the deſire princes have of making creatures in foreign countries, either for conqueſt by election, or any other conqueſt. Note that in all this John Bouchet contradicts the other Hiſtorians, who affirm, that Lewis XI much impoveriſhed his ſubjects (54), and employed a great deal of money in maintaining penſioners and intelligencers in foreign countries.

[M] The law that makes miſpriſion of treaſon a capital crime, is aſcribed to him.] This text is not unworthy the readers curioſity, but the comment much more deſerves it, as containing very particular circumſtances of Thuanus's trial *. I ſhall only be the count de Brienne's tranſcriber, who was miniſter and ſecretary of ſtate. ‘ The true occaſion of my intimacy with the chancellor, ſays he (55), was the promiſe he made to me, and which he faithfully kept, of contributing all he could to the deliverance of Thuanus; and indeed he acted with ſo much zeal in it, that though there was a law made in Lewis the eleventh's time, declaring, that whoever ſhould have notice of a conſpiracy formed againſt the king's perſon, or eſtate, and did not come and reveal it, ſhould be puniſhed as the author of the crime, and incur the ſame penalties of loſs of life and eſtate; though I ſay a magiſtrate as well verſed as the chancellor, in the knowledge of our king's ordinances, could not be ignorant of one of this importance, yet he diſſembled the knowledge of it, and carried himſelf on this occaſion, as if he made no account of that law; for after having often adviſed Thuanus, when he was examined and gave way to his lively and briſk temper, to give himſelf time to hear what was asked him, and to conſider what he ought to anſwer, he did not ſtick to declare even to cardinal de Richelieu (to prepare him for Thuanus's acquittal), that he found no law which condemned to death a perſon who had knowledge of a conſpiracy formed againſt the ſtate, unleſs he was an accomplice in it; that as to the accuſed, it appeared indeed that Fontrailles, at his return from Spain, had given him ſome intelligence, but that he diſapproved the deſign, and blamed this gentleman for having ſerved as an inſtrument to engage Monſieur in ſo odious a buſineſs. Cardinal Richelieu, ſurprized at this diſcourſe, conſulted with ſome of the commiſſioners of the chamber, one of which having quoted the ordinance I have mentioned, he cauſed it to be tranſcribed from the body of the law, and ſhewed it to the chancellor himſelf; but though he was preſſed ſo by this miniſter (whoſe way of acting on ſuch occaſions is but too well known) yet he could not be brought off from the reſolution he had taken of diſcharging the accuſed; but went on to invalidate that ordinance, ſaying, that it was not in uſe in the parliament of Paris, where he had been bred. I cannot diſown but when the votes were taken, he was of the ſide of the ordinance; but as his vote could not abſolve Thuanus, ſo it was not that which cauſed his condemnation, and every one who knows the duty of a preſident will acknowledge, that he cannot depart from a law, which all the judges declare valid, much leſs from a majority of opinions when given in form; it is alſo a great error, and which I am, with all the Lawyers, very far from entertaining, that it is in a judge's power, as a pacific arbitrator, to pronounce according to equity, and not according to the rigour of the law; for beſides that his oath obliges him to do juſtice, the character of a judge does not appoint him maſter, but only preſerver and miniſter of the laws and ordinances.’

This being not only an hiſtorical but a critical Dictionary, I may be allowed to make ſome reflexions on this narrative of the count de Brienne. I ſay then, that there are ſome paſſages in it, which methinks make not much for the honour of the chancellor. That which is alledged in his excuſe, of being for the ordinance, has a great deal of weight; but on the other hand, it may be employed as a conviction againſt him; for if he ought to be the miniſter of the laws and ordinances, he ought not to have attempted to have brought off Thuanus, that is, to invalidate the ordinance of Lewis XI. He ſhould either have refuſed the function of judge, or have diveſted himſelf of all friendſhip, as well as hatred for the accuſed perſon; and have had no other view than the diſcovery of the fact, and giving his ſuffrage according to the ordinance. Inſtead of this, we are told here, that he ſeemed to be ignorant, that there was any law which affected the criminal; and being advertized that there was, he anſwered, that it was not in uſe. Why then did he conform to it, in giving his vote? For what end was he the preſerver and miniſter of the laws? He could not be excuſed, either of oppreſſing innocence, or of prevarication; for if the law of Lewis XI was obſolete and out of uſe, Thuanus could not be reckoned an infringer of the laws, but muſt be declared innocent. But if in pronouncing him guilty, nothing was done but according to law, it follows, that the ordinance of Lewis XI had preſerved it's force, and conſequently, that the chancellor diſcharged the duties of his place very ill, in endeavouring to make it believed, that there was no law of this nature in France, and when he could not deny it, then alledging, that it was not obſerved in the parliament of Paris. There is reaſon to ſuſpect, that this was a ſubterfuge, and that he only ſpoke thus, that he might not be reckoned ignorant of an ordinance of Lewis XI; for how is it probable, that the parliament of Paris ſhould diſpenſe the ſubjects from the obligation of revealing treaſon? This obligation ſeems inſeparable from the oath of allegiance to the ſovereign. Mr du Maurier (56) relates, that one of Barnevelt's ſons was beheaded at the Hague, for being privy to the conſpiracy his brother had formed againſt prince Maurice, and not revealing of it; having not been accuſed by any of the conſpirators who were executed in great numbers in all the towns of Holland . . . . (57). He had the ſame fate as Francis Thuanus, who died for not revealing the deſign that Mr de Cinq Mars, great maſter of the horſe of France, had communicated to him. Du Puy's noble relations, cauſed a diſcourſe to be printed on this ſubject, wherein, to prove the iniquity of the ſentence, amongſt other paſſages, they made uſe of this of Gigas, a Milaneſe Lawyer. Qui conſilium adverſus Majeſtatem Principis initum cognoverunt, nec probare poſſunt, non tenentur revelare: & qui tales condemnant, non ſunt Judices, ſed carnifices. They who know a conſpiracy againſt a ſovereign, and cannot prove it, are not obliged to reveal it; and they who condemn ſuch, are not judges, but murderers. By this Milaneſe Lawyer's favour, Thuanus's judges did their duty (58), but the court did not; for never any fault of that kind was more worthy of pardon than humours, which were very ſingular, and theſe were ſometimes the rule of his favours [N]. As he was infinitely deſirous of prolonging his life, no perſon experienced his liberality more than his Phyſician. He gave him an abſolute authority over him [O]. He was very than Thuanus's (§ α). I am not ignorant of the fine diſtich which Mr Menage falſely aſcribes to Grotius (59). Mr Zuylichem is the author of it; it is the end of an epigram of eight verſes intituled Epitaphium Fr. Auguſti Thuani. See page 180 of his Momenta deſultoria, in the Leyden edition, of 1644, 8vo.

[(§ α) Peter de Puy (Puteanus) has written a vindication of Francis Auguſt Thuanus, wherein he proves that the ſentence againſt the ſaid Thuanus was not only contrary to all Civil laws, but even to the laws made in France; and that the judges were influenced and corrupted by cardinal Richelieu, who had a perſonal hatred againſt him. Mr Buckley has inſerted this valuable piece, in the ſeventh volume of his excellent edition of Thuanus's hiſtory of his own times. REM. CRIT.]

[N] He was ſubject to ſome caprices and humours, which were very ſingular, and theſe were ſometimes the rule of his favours.] He once commanded 'the abbot 'of Baigne, a man of great wit, and who had the art 'of inventing new muſical inſtruments, and always attended the king, and was in his ſervice, to get him 'a conſort of ſwines voices, thinking it impoſſible. 'The abbot was not ſurprized, but asked money for 'the performance; which was immediately delivered 'him, and he wrought a thing as ſingular as ever was 'ſeen. For out of a great number of hogs, of ſeveral ages, which he got together, and placed under a 'tent or pavillion, covered with velvet, before which 'he had a table of wood, all painted, with a certain 'number of keys, he made an organical inſtrument, 'and as he plaid upon the ſaid keys with little ſpikes, 'which pricked the hogs, he made them cry in ſuch 'order and conſonance, as highly delighted the king 'and all his company (60).' Bouchet adds to this the ſtory of a Scullion. The king, dreſſed in a very plain woollen gown went one day into the kitchen, and asked a boy that turned the ſpit ſome queſtions, who not knowing him, anſwered; 'I am a native of Berry, 'ſuch a one's ſon, and my name is Stephen; I ſerve 'the king here in mean quality, and yet I get as much 'as he. The king asked him what the king got? 'His expences (ſaid the boy), and by my faith, I will 'have my expences of him, as he has of God, and he 'will carry away no more than I. The king (who 'ſometimes raiſed people in a frolic) was pleaſed with 'the anſwer, and Stephen made his fortune by it; 'for the king made him his Valet de Chambre, and 'he grew very rich. Some ſay this was Stephen the 'Uſher, who was ſo loved by the king, that when at 'any time he gave him a box on the ear in anger, 'he pretended to be ſick, and a dying, and immediately the king gave him a thouſand, or two thouſand crowns. This king was very familiar with thoſe 'he loved; and deſpiſed royal pomp and coſtly 'cloaths; he eat and drank always in the hall, with 'all his lords and gentlemen, and they who drank 'beſt, and they who had any laſcivious jeſt upon women, were very welcome (61).' One day, as he entered into a church, whilſt the great bell went, he ſaw a poor prieſt ſleeping before the door, and enquiring if any body was dead, he was told that a canon was dead, whoſe benefice was in his majeſty's nomination, he ordered the prieſt to ſucceed him, to verify the proverb, that he who is happy his good fortune comes when he is aſleep (62). Let us add to all this, a paſſage of Stephen Paſquier. Now, though Lewis XI pretended to great zeal for religion and piety, yet he uſed them ſometimes according to the convenience of his affairs, ſometimes out of a wonderful ſuperſtition; thinking all things were lawful to him, when he had performed ſome pilgrimage. In ſhort, a man of arbitrary humours, by means of which, right or wrong, he put in, and out, what officers he pleaſed, and upon the ſame foot, ſometimes ran into fooleries and impertinencies, in which he would not be contradicted. As when he ordered all the birds of Paris that could ſpeak, to be brought into his chamber to divert himſelf with their gibberiſh (63).

The Jeſuit Garaſſe has cenſured theſe words of Paſquier, and made himſelf ridiculous. For a ſubject, ſays he (64), to take the boldneſs of thinking, ſpeaking, and writing, that his king was a fool, or ſubject to fooleries and impertinencies, is ſuch an extravagance and inſolence, as deſerves chaſtiſement . . . . . (65). I remember this device of ſome old ſlanderers, who to ſtain the honour of a brave emperor, ſaid of his religion, that aliam ſibi aliam ſervabat imperio, that he had two religions in his ſleeve, one for ſhew, and another for conſcience, one for the cloſet, another for the hall, one for himſelf, and another for his ſubjects . . . . (66). That a ſubject ſhould deſcribe his king as a libertine, who plays with God and religion, and makes Theramenes's buskins of both, and takes pilgrimages to canonize his impieties: I queſtion whether the miniſters have written ſo much of Charles IX . . . (67). This is a ſymptom of ill-nature, and a very wild diſpoſition. The anſwer that was made to this invective of Garaſſe, could not but confound him; he was ſhewed what was the duty of an hiſtorian (68), and it was maintained againſt him, that the firſt ſcandal proceeds from him who commits the evil, not from him who relates it, and that Paſquier ſaid nothing but what he had found in the hiſtories of Lewis XI. They did not forget the words of Tacitus (69), which teach us, that the chief deſign of an hiſtorian ought to be the preſerving the memory of good actions, and making poſterity dread the infamy of bad ones.

I omit the four ſtories related in Eraſmus's Colloquies; for though they denote a very ſingular and unequal method of rewarding, they are rather good proofs of the dexterity at diſtinguiſhing the artifices of a ſharper, or true merit, than ſigns of an odd and whimſical humour. Let us only give the ſubſtance of one of theſe four ſtories (70). A countryman, at whoſe houſe Lewis XI, in the time of his diſgrace, had ſometimes eaten turnips, was very well recompenſed for the preſent he made him of a large turnip, after he was upon the throne. This made a lord of the court believe, that if he gave the king a fine horſe, he ſhould receive a magnificent reward, but the king only ordered him the countryman's turnip.

[O] As he was infinitely deſirous of prolonging his life . . . . he gave his Phyſician an abſolute authority over him.] Concerning this paſſage, ſee the Miſcellaneous Thoughts upon Comets (71), and add to them this reflexion. It is believed, that his devotion for St Servatius, was founded upon this ſaint's long life. The legendaries ſay, that he lived three ages, others are content to give him a biſhopric, which he enjoyed above ſixty years. 'Inſitâ, Belgarum maxime populis opinione, affinem illum Chriſti, ejuſque ſupparem temporibus extitiſſe atque inde tertiam explevisſe hominum ætatem; ſive ita fuerit, neque 'enim deſunt, affirmare hoc auſi, ſeu potius ex longiſſima Epiſcopatus ſui præfecturâ, nam ultra ſeptuaginta annos illam extendit; prodigialiter annoſum ac 'triſeclisenem planè crediderint. Ut hinc ſuſpicari 'fortè quis poſſit Ludovicum Undecimum Galliæ Regem ideò ſibi ornandum delegiſſe Servatii templum, 'ut ab eo inter Divos maximè longævo, longam ipſe 'vitam, cujus erat producendæ cupientiſſimus, impetraret (72). ——— The people, eſpecially in Flanders, 'believe that St Servatius was Chriſt's kinſman, and 'his cotemporary; and that he lived thrice the age of 'man; whether this be really true, as ſome dare to affirm, or rather that it was ſaid ſo on account of the 'long duration of his epiſcopacy, which laſted more 'than ſeventy years. And this may be the reaſon, why 'Lewis XI king of France, took ſuch particular care to 'adorn the church of that ſaint; that by his interceſſion, he might obtain the prolongation of his life, 'which he earneſtly deſired.' Let us not forget this. 'Lewis XI had often ſaid in his life-time, that in 'whatever extremity he ſhould be, they ſhould never 'pronounce on him the word of death, thinking it 'too harſh for the ear of a king . . . . They who had 'the charge of his conſcience, expected, that he finding himſelf dying, ſhould acknowledge it. A Divine, his Phyſician, and Mr Olivier, took a reſolution to ſignify his condition to him. They went to 'him boldly, and with little reſpect, as people who 'had added impudence to the meanneſs of their condition; and their ſpeech was in theſe words: Sir, we 'are obliged to diſcharge our conſciences, confide no longer in this holy man, nor in any thing elſe: for aſſuredly very credulous as to Aſtrology; but I know not what to think of a ſtory related by certain authors, that at laſt he preferred an aſs to his Aſtrologers [P], and ſwore that animal ſhould ever after be his oracle, before the beſt of the tribe of Aſtrologers. I ſhall not repeat what I have ſaid in another place (b), concerning the hypocriſy of his devotion. Paſquier has made a right judgment on it, and could not in juſtice be cenſured for what he had ſaid upon that point, and ſome others (i). There never was a king in France, whoſe cruel conduct and extortions came ſo near to tyranny, as thoſe of Lewis XI [Q]. We ſhall ſee in another place of this Dictionary (k); what an abſolute

'ſurely you are no man for this world, take care of your conſcience, for there is no remedy. Each of them ſpoke ſome ſuch ſhort ſentence, to let him know, that they were all of the ſame opinion concerning his death. He anſwered, I hope God will aſſiſt me, I am not perhaps ſo ill as you imagine (73).' What ſhall we ſay of the careſſes he made to Francis de Paul? 'He flattered him, ſupplicated him, threw himſelf on his knees before him, built two convents of his order, the firſt in the park du Pleſſis les Tours, the ſecond at the foot of the caſtle of Amboiſe, that he might prolong his days for him (74).'

As to the authority of his Phyſician, read theſe words. Lewis XI 'changed his ſervants every day, and was ſubject to the roughneſs of John Cottier, his Phyſician, to whom he gave 10,000 crowns a month, durſt refuſe him nothing, and promiſed him all he could deſire, provided he would drive away the terrible phantom of death †, at the mention whereof he would cover his face in bed. This Phyſician ſometimes told him in a bravado, I know well enough, that ſome morning or other you will ſend me packing as well as the reſt, but I ſwear by God, that you ſhall not live eight days after. This poor prince, inſtead of treating him as Maximin did his ⸸, gave him all he deſired, biſhoprics, benefices, and offices (75).'

[P] They ſay . . . . . . he at laſt preferred an aſs to his Aſtrologers.] The ſtory is this, which I relate word for word, as I find it in a book printed at Lyons, in the year 1650 (76). 'Lewis XI, having a moſt famous Aſtrologer in his court, and intending one day to go a hunting, aſked him, whether it would be fair weather, or whether he did not ſuſpect it would rain, who, having conſulted his aſtrolobe, anſwered, that the day would be fair and ſerene; the king determined therefore to purſue his deſign; but having rode out of Paris, and coming near the foreſt, he met a Collier driving his aſs, laden with coals, who ſaid, that the king would do well to go back, becauſe in a few hours there would be a great ſtorm; but as what ſuch people ſay is but little regarded, the king made no account of it, but rode into the foreſt, and was no ſooner there but the day grew dark, thunder and lightening came on, and the rain fell in ſuch abundance, that every one endeavouring to ſave himſelf, the king was left alone, who had no recourſe but to his horſe's ſwiftneſs, to eſcape this misfortune. Next day the king having ſent for the Collier, aſked him where he had learned Aſtrology, and how he could ſo exactly foretel what weather ſhould happen; the Collier anſwered, Sir, I was never at ſchool, and indeed I can neither read nor write; nevertheleſs, I keep a good Aſtrologer in my houſe, who never deceives me; the king being amazed, aſked him what was his Aſtrologer's name, upon which the poor man, quite abaſhed, anſwered, Sir, it is the aſs which your majeſty yeſterday ſaw me driving, loaden with coals; as ſoon as bad weather is coming, he hangs down his ears forward, and walks more ſlowly than uſual, and rubs himſelf againſt the walls; by theſe ſigns (Sir) I certainly foreſee rain, which is the reaſon that yeſterday I adviſed your majeſty to return home: the king hearing this, caſhiered his Aſtrologer, and gave a ſmall ſalary to the Collier, that he might make much of his aſs, ſaying: Vivit enim Dominus, quia deinceps alio non utar Aſtrologo, quam carbonarii aſino. —— For the future, ſaid he, with an oath, the Collier's aſs ſhall be my Aſtrologer. Alas, poor Aſtrologers, what will become of you, if an aſs knows more than you?' I have ſaid elſewhere (77) that Angelo Cattho, who had been this king's Aſtrologer and Phyſician (78), arrived to great honours. You will find in Peter Matthieu, the names of this king's other Aſtrologers. It is ſaid, that one of them propheſied, that a lady whom the king loved would die in a week's time. The thing happening, Lewis XI ſent for him, and commanded the people about him not to fail, at a ſignal he ſhould give them, to take the Aſtrologer and throw him out at the window. As ſoon as the king ſaw him: you that pretend, ſays he, to be ſuch a wiſe man, and know ſo perfectly the fate of others, inform me a little what will be your own, and how long you have to live? whether the Aſtrologer was ſecretly adviſed of the king's deſign, or whether he knew it by his ſcience: Sir, anſwered he, without expreſſing any fear, I ſhall die three days before your majeſty. The king was ſo far from having him thrown out at the window after this anſwer, that, on the contrary, he took particular care not to ſuffer him to want for any thing, and did all that he could to retard the death of a man, which his own was ſo cloſely to follow (79). This Aſtrologer was no leſs ingenious than he who delivered himſelf from a like danger in Tiberius's time. Who being aſked what the ſtars predicted to him that day; anſwered, after ſome artificial preambles, that he found himſelf threatened with an extream danger. This anſwer was the reaſon, not only of his not being thrown from the top of the houſe, as it had been reſolved, in caſe his ſcience ſhould be found fallacious, but alſo of Tiberius's honouring him with his confidence (80).

[Q] There never was a king in France, whoſe cruel conduct and extortions came ſo near to tyranny.] Had Comines deſigned to give the pourtaiture of a cruel prince, he could have employed no ſtronger colours than thoſe which deſcribe his rigorous priſons, his iron cages, and nets ‡. He ſays, they were made of wood, covered with plates of iron: that he had got ſome Germans to make very weighty and terrible irons to put on the feet, and in which there was a ring to put one foot in, very hard to be opened, like an iron collar, with a thick and heavy chain, and a great iron ball at the end, very heavy, and theſe were called the king's nets. . . . . The reign of this prince was terribly tempeſtuous; it cannot be ſaid of it as of that of Antoninus, that it was not ſtained with blood *. Triſtan, his grand provoſt, who as juſtly deſerved by his barbarous and ſevere conduct, the name of Triſtis, as Maximin did, was ſo ready to execute his rigorous commands, that he ſometimes deſtroyed the innocent with the guilty, and always diſpoſed this prince rather to uſe the ſword to puniſh offences, than the bridle to reſtrain men from offending. . . . . Claude de Seyſſel could ſay nothing more ſevere on the memory of this prince, than what he writes, that about the places where he was, were ſeen a great number of people hanging on trees, and the priſons, and other neighbouring houſes, full of priſoners, which were often heard, both by day and by night, to cry out for the torments they endured, beſides thoſe who were ſecretly caſt into the rivers (81). The ſame Hiſtorian obſerves (82), that Lewis XI carried his abſolute power to exceſs. His provoſt went and took the priſoners who were in the palace-goal, and cauſed them to be drowned near the Grange aux Mercier, ... (83) Beſides the examples of the contempt of juſtice, which are often ſeen in ſeveral parts of the hiſtory of Lewis XI, in which we find trials begin by execution, and executions without example ; it ſays, that in many proceſſes, he would have juſtice done according to his own humour, and would not truſt to thoſe, who had the diſpenſing of it. A place alſo is ſtill ſhewn at Pleſſis lez Tours, where he concealed himſelf to watch his provoſt, when he examined the priſoners . . . . . . (84) There were repreſented to the ſtates which were held after his death, ſeveral ſorts of injuſtices, which, during his reign, had afflicted the people, every one complaining that he had not taken care to maintain the rules of juſtice.

lute ſubmiſſion he required of the parliament of Paris. For the reſt, he had eminent qualities, and ſuch as were abſolutely neceſſary to him; for without theſe he never could have maintained the monarchy againſt domeſtic and foreign enemies, againſt ſo many factions of his own ſubjects, and the rude attacks of the duke of Burgundy, ſeconded by England. He not only preſerved his dominions in the midſt of ſo many attempts, but alſo enlarged them; for he re-united Anjou, Maine, and the duchy of Burgundy to the crown, and acquired Provence (l). It was in his power to have added to it all the eſtates of the houſe of Burgundy, by matching the heireſs with the Dauphin [R]; but a ſurpriſing juſtice. It was ſaid in that aſſembly, that the king had raiſed to offices of judicature, men without ability and experience, and that blank commiſſions were ready drawn to inſert the names of thoſe who bid moſt, which were given to ſoldiers, huntſmen, foreigners, and illiterate people; that they might exerciſe them by others, and reap the profit of them; that the ſecretaries of the chancery exacted exceſſive fees at their diſcretion, and that for the ſeal to confirm a privilege to a city, they had exacted four hundred golden crowns. Then letters of appeal to the chancery and parliament, were denied to thoſe who had recourſe to the ſupreme juſtice of the king, againſt the injuſtices and oppreſſions of inferior judges; that they who adminiſtered juſtice in the parliaments, exacted great and exceſſive fees to re-imburſe themſelves for the offices they had bought; that ſeveral had been accuſed of crimes of which they were innocent, and the accuſers rewarded with the confiſcation of their eſtates, and ſometimes commiſſioned to try them, or to name what commiſſioners they thought fit; that the number of ſerjeants was multiplied in ſuch a manner, that in the Bailliwics and Seneſchalries, in which there were wont to be only twenty or thirty, there were in his reign an hundred, or double the number. Many lords and others addreſſed themſelves to this aſſembly for the reſtitution of their goods, lands, and offices, of which they had been deprived. It was repreſented to the ſame eſtates, that men, women, and children, were in ſeveral places forced, for want of beaſts, to labour with the plough to their necks, and that by night, for fear the day might expoſe them to the commiſſioners of the taxes (85).

We will finiſh this remark with a paſſage of Mezerai. Comines, ſays he (86), deſcribes him to us very prudent in adverſity, admirably skilled at penetrating the intereſts and deſigns of men, and at drawing and turning them to his own ends, furiouſly ſuſpicious and jealous of his power, moſt abſolute in his will, who never pardoned, and who terribly trampled his ſubjects under foot, and yet with all this, the beſt prince of his time. He had put to death above four thouſand perſons by different puniſhments, which he ſometimes delighted to ſee. Moſt of them had been executed without form of law, ſeveral drowned with a ſtone tied to their necks, others precipitated going over a ſwipe, from whence they fell upon wheels armed with ſpikes and cutting inſtruments; others were ſtrangled in dungeons; Triſtan, his companion, and provoſt of his palace, being judge, witneſs, and executioner.

[R] It was in his power to have added to his crown, all the eſtates of the houſe of Burgundy, by matching the heireſs with the Dauphin.] The princeſs Mary, heireſs of all theſe eſtates, had a deſire to be married to the Dauphin, and negotiated this affair by her principal counſellors. They removed all the difficulties that Lewis XI propoſed to them: his ſon, he ſaid, was not yet nine years old; he was extraordinary little for his age; his conſtitution could not either be more weak or more tender than it then was. Nothing was more dangerous for him than an early marriage (87). They replied, that the affairs of that princeſs would not admit any delay of her marriage; but that when it ſhould be accompliſhed with the Dauphin, there might be ways found to retard the conſummation, as long as it might be judged prejudicial to either of the parties. That Mary of Burgundy had declared, ſhe would willingly wait as long as they thought convenient; but that her ſubjects had at preſent occaſion for a maſter. The king replied, that the means they ſpoke of were not infallible; and that in the mean time, the health of his only ſon was ſo precious to him, that he could not expoſe it to a danger ſo great for a young prince, as that of a preſent marriage to a young lady, who was but too capable of conſummating it. The Flemings in vain endeavoured to convince Lewis, that his fear was imaginary, and not being able to effect it, they made him a ſecond propoſition, which was no better received than the firſt (88). This was the marriage of the princeſs to Charles count of Angouleme (89). The king was ſo blind as to ſlip this the moſt glorious and advantageous opportunity that heaven could have offered him. His hatred for the duke of Burgundy was extreme, and capricious in it's exceſs. It did not ſtop at his perſon, but extended to that of his daughter, for this only reaſon, that the duke was her father. This daughter had never done Lewis any injury, and yet he was ſo little equitable on her account, as to chuſe, that the eſtates ſhe inherited ſhould be poſſeſſed by ſtrangers, rather than ſecure them in a lawful way, ſuch as by marriage (90). This ſhews, that the paſſions of monarchs do not always turn with the wind of their intereſt. They are accuſed of this fault, and ſuppoſed to diveſt themſelves of friendſhip and hatred, with the greateſt eaſe, when their grandeur requires it; this may be true, generally ſpeaking, but they all have, like other perſons, ſome ſecret paſſions, or certain antipathies, which, on ſome occaſions, do not permit them to govern themſelves otherwiſe than according to this diſpoſition; to which they ſacrifice their glory, their prudence, and moſt valuable intereſts. Philip de Comines aſcends to a higher cauſe, and deſerves to be heard.

Notwithſtanding that Lewis XI was thus free from all apprehenſions, God permitted him not to take this matter, which was ſo great, by the moſt uſeful handle; and God ſeems to have ſhewn then, as he has done ſince, that he would rigorouſly perſecute this houſe of Burgundy, both in the perſon of the lord of it, and of the ſubjects having their eſtates in it. For all the wars which they have had ſince, would not have happened, if the king our maſter had taken things by the end he ſhould have done, to compleat their happineſs, and unite to his crown all theſe great lordſhips, to which he had no right. Which he ought to have done by ſome treaty of marriage, or have attracted them to him by good and true friendſhip; which he eaſily might have done, conſidering the great deſpair, poverty, and weakneſs, in which theſe lordſhips were. By doing which, he had retrieved them from great troubles, and at the ſame time had ſtrengthened his own kingdom, and ſecured it by a laſting peace (91). . . . . . When the duke of Burgundy was yet alive, the king often talked to me of what he would do, if the duke ſhould die, and he ſpoke very rationally at that time, ſaying, that he would endeavour to marry his ſon (who is our king at preſent) to the duke's daughter, (who ſince has been ducheſs of Auſtria) and if ſhe would not hearken to it, becauſe the Dauphin was much younger than ſhe, he would endeavour to marry her to ſome young lord of his kingdom, to keep her and her ſubjects in friendſhip, and to recover without contention, what he pretended a title to; and the king was ſtill in this mind, till a week before he heard of the death of the duke. But this wiſe reſolution, I ſpeak of, began to change a little, the day that he knew of the death of the ſaid duke of Burgundy (92). He expreſſes himſelf ſtill more fully in the following chapter, for he expreſly ſays, that God blinded this prince, in order to puniſh thoſe who did not deſerve to be happy. ‘Our king's underſtanding was ſo great, that neither I nor any one ‘elſe in the company could ſee ſo clearly into his ‘affairs as he himſelf; for, doubtleſs, he was one of ‘the wiſeſt and moſt ſubtle princes of his time. But in ‘theſe great affairs, God diſpoſes the hearts of kings ‘and great princes, (which he holds in his hand) to purſue methods ſubſervient to the works which he deſigns to bring about in due time. For, without ‘doubt, if it had been his will, that our king ſhould ‘continue the reſolution which he himſelf had taken ‘before the duke of Burgundy's death, the wars ‘which ſince have followed, and thoſe which are ‘waged at this day, would all have been preventſurpriſing fatality ſo infatuated him in this point, that he could not ſacrifice a perſonal paſſion to the moſt ſolid advantage he ever could have procured France, for the preſent and the future. He was blamed for ſuffering his enemies to make conqueſts in Germany, and for prolonging a truce, which gave them opportunities further to aggrandize themſelves. This cenſure was ill-grounded [S]. He died the thirtieth of Auguſt 1483, after ſuch tedious and ſevere diſtempers of body and mind [T], that there is hardly a human

'ed; but we were not yet worthy on either ſide 'to obtain that long peace which was prepared for us; 'and hence proceeds the error our king committed, and 'not from any defect in his underſtanding; for, as 'I have ſaid before, he was a very great man (93).' Nothing can be more judicious than this diſcourſe. We muſt ſay of this falſe ſtep of Lewis XI, what the Phyſicians ſay of ſome diſtempers, that there is ſomething ſupernatural in them, ϑεῖον τε. Herodotus would ſpeak out more frankly than any other; he who conceived the Deity as a jealous and malignant nature (94); for the event has ſhewn, that it was for the puniſhment of the people, that God permitted not the marriage of Mary of Burgundy and the Dauphin to take effect. They have ſuffered for the fooliſh politics of Lewis XI. It could never be ſaid more truly, Quicquid delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi (95).

The people ſuffer when the prince offends.

The marriage of this princeſs with Maximilian of Auſtria, was the original of a war, which has laſted above two hundred years, and which in all probability will laſt much longer. It has been ſometimes interrupted by the low condition of the combatants, only to return like intermitting fevers, when the diſſipated humours have had time to recruit. Hence we may derive thoſe rivers of blood, thoſe repeated burnings, ravagings, and deſolations. There is reaſon to wonder how a country of ſo little extent has been able to furniſh for two ages an ample theatre of war (§ α) to ſo many nations (96): France and the houſe of Auſtria, the principal parties, who have diſputed this piece of ground, have engaged moſt of the Chriſtian princes in their quarrel; for whenever the balance of power has been on the ſide of the latter, the former has been ſeconded in it's attacks; and when the former has been but too likely to conquer, the other has veen vigorouſly aſſiſted. The Eaſtern nations, who know not the nature of the country, nor the concurrence of obſtacles, laugh, that ſo many battles gained, and ſo many towns taken, ſhould not decide this quarrel. The conqueſt of three or four provinces, is, with them, the buſineſs of a very few years; their hiſtorians, ſpend but three or four pages in relating it. What would they ſay, ſhould they know that two camels could not carry all the hiſtories, that have been written upon the wars of the Low-Countries? The hiſtorians of the troubles which occaſioned the erection of the republic of the United Provinces are ſo numerous, that when Mr Varillas came to Paris, no body but Mr Naudé was capable of giving a catalogue of them (97). And yet theſe are but a very ſmall part of the wars of the Netherlands, ſince Charles VIII. It is ſaid that a Turkiſh emperor deſiring to ſee, in a map, the little territory that maintained ſo long a war againſt ſo potent a monarch (98), ſaid, that if it were his buſineſs, he would ſend a good number of Pioneers, and make them ſhovel that little point of land into the ſea (99). Theſe people doubtleſs pity both thoſe who have loſt ſomething, and thoſe who have not taken all in ſo long a ſeries of wars. They do not think it glorious to fight ſo often for the ſame towns; they take and reſtore them two or three times in the ſame reign, and ſo they are always to begin again. But what would they ſay, had they genius enough to reflect upon the conſequence of theſe loſſes? The houſe of Auſtria would not by this time have had a foot of ground in this country, if it had not loſt half of it in the ſixteenth century. It has experienced the truth of this maxim of the antients, that half is better than the whole (100). What it loſt then has ſerved, and will always ſerve, to ſave the reſt; without this, it would at this time neither have what it has preſerved, nor what it could not recover. The poor Flemings, as Comines very well ſaid, are always the ſufferers; whereas by the marriage of their princeſs with the Dauphin, they had probably only ſeen war at a diſtance; it would have been kept out of their frontiers, which is an ineſtimable advantage. As long as there is an inch of ground to be gained, they will always be the ſuffering party; this will be a conſtant and infallible ferment of new wars.

[(§ α) The ſame has been ſaid of Italy long ago, 'Et Galli & Helvetii, & Hiſpani & Teutonici, omnes eorum pugnas veniunt committere in Italiam, 'cum maximo Italorum diſcrimine. —— The French, 'and the Swiſs, the Spaniards, and the Germans, 'they all come to fight their battles in Italy to the 'great danger of the Italians.' Says John Nevizanus in his Sylva Nuptialis, Lib. IV, num. 136. REM. CRIT.]

[S] This cenſure was ill grounded.] It was indeed ſpecious; for, generally ſpeaking, it is true policy to oppoſe the conqueſts of an ambitious and well armed neighbour. But there is no rule without an exception, and there are circumſtances in which inſtead of croſſing an enemy in his enterprize, we ought not to hinder him from engaging in it: as for example, when we foreſee that ſuch a one will be hampered, and that the conſequences of this may be of advantage to us. This was the duke of Burgundy's caſe, when having conquered the duchy of Guelderland, he formed new projects againſt the empire. Let us hear a man that underſtood this matter admirably. 'The 'ſaid duke prolonged his truce with the king, and 'ſome of the king's ſervants thought, that he ought 'not to have prolonged it, nor have given ſo great 'advaatage to the duke. This ſeemed rational enough, 'but they did not underſtand this matter, for want 'of experience, and duly weighing circumſtances. 'There were others who ſaw farther into it than they, 'and who had more experience, as having been upon the places, who told the king, that that truce 'was wiſely made, and that he ought to ſuffer the 'ſaid duke to daſh himſelf againſt the Germans (an 'enterprize ſo great and daring, that it was almoſt 'incredible) ſaying, that when he had taken one place, 'or ended one quarrel, he would ſoon engage himſelf in another, and that he was not a man, ever 'to be contented with the ſucceſs of any undertaking '(in which he was oppoſite to the king; for the 'more he was * embroiled, the more he would embroil himſelf) and that there was no better way 'of being revenged on him, than letting him go on 'his own way, and even giving him ſome ſmall aid, 'without giving him ſuſpicion of any deſign of 'breaking this truce: for conſidering the greatneſs 'and power of Germany, it was not poſſible but he 'muſt ſoon be utterly ruined. For the princes of 'the empire, though the emperor was a man of little virtue, would ſee it done; and ſo it happened in 'the iſſue to the ſaid duke (101).

[T] He died . . . after tedious and ſevere diſtempers of body and mind.] He who ſupplies me with the proofs of this, is ſo valuable a witneſs, that it is not poſſible to have a better; for it is Philip de Comines. He tells us that the king, his maſter fell ſick at Forges near Chinon, in March 1480 (102). He intirely loſt his ſpeech, his ſenſes, and his memory . . . . Two or three days after he began to recover his ſpeech, and his ſenſes . . . . As he found himſelf ſomewhat better he began to enquire, who they were that had hindered him by force from going to the window? They told him the truth, and he immediately expelled them his family; ſome he turned out of their places, and never would ſee them more. Others . . . . he only diſmiſſed (103). The reaſon of all this was, that there was nothing he ſo much dreaded as the loſing his authority. What torment, what puniſhment was this? This diſtemper held him about fifteen days, and he recovered perfectly as to his ſenſe and ſpeech; but continued very weak, and in great apprehenſions of a relapſe (104). He accordingly relapſed the year following, and loſt his ſpeech a ſecond time, and was thought to be dead for two hours . . . . They devoted him to St Claude . . . . immediately his ſpeech returned and he walked about the houſe in a very weak condition (105). He made a journey to St Claude, and returned to Tours, and ſhut himſelf up, ſo that few could ſee him, and grew wonderful ſuſpicious of every body, and jealous, leſt they ſhould take away or diminiſh his authority (106) . . . . He did a great many ſtrange things, for which they that ſaw them, thought him bereft of his ſenſes; but they did not know him . . . . he knew that he was not beloved by the great perſons of the kingdom, nor by many of the meaner ſort, and he had ſo taxed the people, as never king did (107) . . . . ſo that it is no wonder if he had diſtracted thoughts and imaginations, and fancied he was not wiſhed well, and had great fears on that account . . . . In the firſt place hardly any one came to Pleſſis du Parc, (which was the place where he reſided) except his domeſtics and his archers, which were four hundred, a good number of them being always upon the guard, and walking before the palace, and guarding the gate: No lord or great perſon lodged within the court, and but few of the great lords were ever admitted: Nobody came near him but Monſeigneur de Beaujeu, the preſent duke of Bourbon, his ſon-in-law; he encompaſſed the caſtle of Pleſſis, with an iron palliſade, and fortified the entrance into the ditches of Pleſſis with forked iron turn-pikes; he alſo cauſed four pieces of ordnance to be made, all of maſſy iron, and port-holes to ſhoot through, and it was a majeſtic piece of work, and coſt above twenty thouſand livres: and laſtly, he placed there forty croſs-bow men, who day and night were in theſe ditches, and had orders to ſhoot at any man who approached them, till the gate was open in the morning: he fancied moreover that his ſubjects were ſomewhat forward to aſſume his authority when they ſaw an opportunity (108). Comines having amply ſpoken of Francis de Paula goes on (109), ‘ Our king was in Pleſſis, attended by very few, except archers, and under the ſuſpicions before mentioned; but he had taken all imaginable precaution; for he left no man either in the neighbourhood or town, of whom he had a ſuſpicion, but ſent them all away, under a guard of archers. Nobody ſpoke to him of buſineſs, but ſuch as concerned him moſt: he looked more like a dead than living man. He was grown ſo lean that no body could have believed it; he cloathed himſelf richly, more than ever he uſed to do wearing only robes of crimſon ſattin, furred with fine ſables, and gave ſome to whom he thought fit, without their aſking: for no body durſt aſk any thing, or ſpeak to him; he ordered ſevere puniſhments, to render himſelf dreaded, and for fear his ſubjects obedience ſhould ſlacken; for ſo he told me himſelf. He diſmiſſed officers, and diſbanded ſoldiers, leſſened ſome penſions, and took away others; and he told me a few days before his death, that he ſpent his time in placing and diſplacing people, and got himſelf more talked of in the kingdom than any king ever was, and this he did for fear they ſhould think him dead; for as I have ſaid, few ſaw him: but when his actions were talked of, every one was in ſuſpence and could ſcarce believe he was ſick; he cauſed all ſorts of beaſts to be brought him from foreign countries, and gave a prodigious price for them; and all this to amuſe the people that they ſhould not think he was ſick (110).’ The hiſtorian compares (111) the evils and pains king Lewis ſuffered to thoſe he had made others ſuffer; becauſe, ſays he, I hope that the miſeries he ſuffered before his death . . . . will prepare his way to heaven, and be part of his purgatory. He reckons amongſt thoſe evils, the indiſcretion of thoſe who pronounced him a dead man. What a thunderſtroke was it to him to hear this news, and this ſentence? for never man feared death more, or endeavoured more to find a remedy for it; and he had all his life-time ſaid to his ſervants, and to me among others, and prayed, that if ever we ſaw him in extremity, we ſhould ſay nothing to him, except, ſpeak little; and that we ſhould only bring him to confeſs, without pronouncing that cruel word death: for he did not ſeem to have courage to hear ſo cruel a ſentence (112). . . . . you ſee then how indiſcreetly his death was ſignified to him. Which I was willing to relate . . . . in order to ſhew, that the miſeries he endured were very great, conſidering his temper, who exacted more obedience than any one elſe in his time, and who had had more paid him. So that the leaſt word of an anſwer, contrary to his inclination, had been a great puniſhment for him to endure: ſome five or ſix months before his death, he was ſuſpicious of all men, and eſpecially of all who were worthy of authority; he was afraid of his ſon, and cauſed him to be ſtrictly guarded. No body either ſaw or ſpoke to him, except by his command; he was, ſuſpicious at laſt of his daughter, and ſon-in-law the preſent duke of Bourbon, and would know what people entered Pleſſis with them; at laſt he broke off a council, which the duke of Bourbon, his ſon-in law, held there by his command. When his ſon-in-law and the count de Dunois came back from reconducting the embaſſy, which was come to the wedding of the king, his ſon, and of the queen, at Amboiſe, and entred Pleſſis, and much people along with them, the king, who cauſed the gates to be well-guarded, being in the gallery, which looks into the court of Pleſſis, ordered one of the captains of his guards to be called to him, and commanded him to go and examine the attendants of the ſaid lords, whether they had not coats of mail under their cloaths; and that he ſhould do it, as by diſcourſing with them, without making too much ſhew of it. Judge then, whether he who had made ſo many people live in ſuſpicion and fear of him, was not well recompenſed; and who were thoſe that he could truſt, ſince he was jealous of his ſon, his daughter, and his ſon-in-law. I ſpeak not this on his account only. But for all other princes who deſire to be feared, they never meet with the requital of it till old age: for penance they fear every body: and what torment was it for this king to be troubled with this fear, and theſe paſſions (113)? Afterwards the author mentions (114) the ſlavery in which the Phyſician kept this prince, and having deſcribed (115), the precautions the king took to ſecure himſelf in a houſe ſurrounded with great iron grates, &c. &c. He goes on (116), ‘ Is it poſſible to keep a king in ſafer cuſtody, or in a ſtricter priſon, than he kept himſelf? The cages, in which he kept others, were about eight foot ſquare, and he that was ſo great a king, had only the ſmall court of a caſtle to walk in, though he ſeldom came there, but kept in his gallery without going from thence, except through the chambers; and went to maſs without paſſing through the aforeſaid court. Would not one ſay, that this king ſuffered as well as others? who thus ſhut up himſelf, and had guards about him, who was thus in fear of his children, and of all about him, and of his relations, and who changed continually his ſervants which he had brought up, and who had all their dependance upon him, ſo as to confide in none of them, but thus condemn himſelf to ſuch ſtrange confinements, and encloſures?’ What he ſays in the thirteenth chapter is wonderful. ‘ The poor and the vulgar ought to place but little hope in any thing in this world, ſince ſo great a king has ſuffered and laboured ſo much, and at laſt left all, unable to keep off death one hour, with all the diligence he employed to do it. I have known him, and have been his ſervant in the flower of his age, and in his greateſt proſperities; but I never ſaw him without trouble and care. Above all pleaſures, he loved hunting and hawking in it's ſeaſon, but he took not ſo much pleaſure in this, as in dogs (117). . . . . And even in hunting he had almoſt as much trouble as pleaſure; for he took great pains at it, he kept up with the ſtags, and roſe very early, and rode ſometimes a long chace, and would not leave the ſport whatever weather it might be; and thus he ſometimes returned very weary, and almoſt always in a fret with ſome body or other . . . . He was continually at this ſport, and lodged in the villages till ſome news came of a war; for moſt commonly every ſummer, there was ſomething to do betwixt the duke of Burgundy and him, and in the winter they made a truce (118) . . . Thus the pleaſures he took were but for a ſhort ſeaſon of the year, and were very laborious to his perſon, as I have ſaid; at the time that he repoſed himſelf, his underſtanding was at work; for he had buſineſs in a great many places: and as willingly concerned himſelf in the affairs of his neighbours as in his own. When he was in war, he longed for a peace or a truce; when he had made a truce, he could hardly endure it: he concerned himſelf with many little things in his kingdom, which he needed not to have done; but ſuch was his temper, and ſo he lived (119).' The life of this prince, before he was king, was not very happy. Comines ſhows it (120), after which he makes this concluſion: 'Now in what time of his life could it be ſaid he enjoyed any pleaſure, conſidering all the things above-mentioned? I believe that from his infancy to his grave, he had nothing but anguiſh and fatigues; and that, if all the good days of his life, in which he had more joy and pleaſure than labour and trouble, were reckoned up, they would be found but very few; and that there would be twenty of pain and labour, for one of eaſe and pleaſure (121).'

There is no reader ſo ſtupid as to want a comment upon what I have been relating; every one is able to imagine that there is no condition more miſerable than that of a ſick prince, who dares not own he is ſo, who ſuſpects every thing, and is forced to uſe a thouſand ſtratagems, to perſuade people he is not dead. Note, that Philip de Comines ſhews, by the example of four great princes (122), who died in his time, that man is but an inconſiderable thing, that this life is ſhort and miſerable, and that grandeur is nothing (123).

[U] He performed an act of religion, upon which a modern author has had ſome thoughts which deſerve to be examined.] Lewis XI made a contract, which was called the donation of Lewis XI, to the Virgin Mary of Boulogne, of the right and title to the fief and homage for the county of Boulogne, on which the county of St Paul depends, to be paid before the image of the ſaid lady by his ſucceſſors, in 1478 (124). The abbot of St Real pretends, that 'all antiquity, whether Greek or Roman, never ſaw any man pretend to honour himſelf before the people, by beſtowing bounties on the gods .... and that this refined devotion was reſerved for Lewis XI (125).' He maintains (126), that an exceſs of this nature in ſuch a one as he was, ought rather to be reputed an artifice, than an extravagance. ..... (127) That this action, however bold it appears, ought to be looked upon by us as the fruit of a conſummate wiſdom, and a long experience of the judgments of men: that there is nothing extraordinary in a prince's conſecrating .... the revenue of lands to the ſervice of God and his ſaints, to the uſe of his miniſters, to the ornament of their temples and their altars, nor even in putting his eſtates under their particular protection .... (128). That all this is agreeable to reaſon; but not ſo as to make choice of celeſtial powers for the objects of our liberality: that inſtead of asking any thing of them, or pretending to have received from them, one ſhould take upon him to be their benefactor; as if they had need of our benefactions, as much as we have need of theirs; and could actually enjoy them as we can theirs, their light and intelligence, when they pleaſe to communicate ſome rays of them. That however this has had a good effect; for (129) though Lewis XI made open profeſſion of inſincerity, as we ſee by his motto, yet it does not appear that at that time any one ſuſpected the leaſt artifice in ſo extraordinary a devotion. So true it is .... that the bare ſhadow 'of an imaginary intereſt, that heaven has in ſuch ſort of actions, and the ſanctity of names, that are mingled with them, may ſo blind the world, as to hinder it from perceiving the extravagance and mockery. This is wonderful; but it ſerves the better to diſcover the nature of the human mind by it's weak and whimſical ſide, that no one ſhould at that time reflect on the extravagance of a man's contracting with the holy Virgin, juſt as one man does with another, and making her at leaſt, in fiction, accept of a preſent which he remained as much poſſeſſor of after this pretended liberality as before. For, after all, were the Bailiffs, Provoſts, and other officers of the county of Boulogne, tho' they had been called the Virgin's Bailiffs, Provoſts, and officers, leſs obliged to obey the king? Did the church of Boulogne enjoy the revenue of the land, ſo that ſhe was better ſerved than before? Was the king ever the leſs count of it, for having given this county to the Virgin? Not at all? Did not the people at that time ſee this as we ſee it? they might if they had pleaſed; but Lewis XI ſaw all theſe things much better than they or we. In the mean time, this prince, ſo dextrous in the uſe of all the inſtruments of policy, who had ſo profoundly ſtudied that of religion in particular, and plaid this engine in all the known methods, thought he might ſafely try it this one way more, when once he had invented it, and carry it ſo far without danger; he judged in ſhort that his people were capable of bearing with it. He muſt have been well acquainted with their nature, to venture ſo far.' I do not copy any of the reſt of this long paſſage, though it be very ſolid.

I find in ſome reſpects a great deal of ſolidity in theſe reflexions; but conſidering the practice that has prevailed in all times, and which the abbot of St Real has commended, I do not find any thing wonderful in this conduct of Lewis XI, nor any reaſon to ſuſpect more artifice in it, than in the reſt of his devotions. The Heathens made donations to their gods, not only of precious ſtones, and of veſſels of gold and ſilver, but alſo of lands (130). The Catholics daily give the holy Virgin, ſome a pearl-necklace, others a crown, or a robe beſet with diamonds, &c. They diſſeize themſelves of the property of theſe goods, and convey them to the mother of the ſon of God. Why will not you allow then, that a man may as well convey the title of ſovereign of a certain fief to her? Is it ſtrange that Lewis XI ſhould declare himſelf her vaſſal, her liege-man in reſpect of a county whereof he was ſovereign? What mighty wonder is it, that he ſhould from henceforth command homage to be paid this ſaint? I own he reſerves to himſelf the profitable demeſnes, and all the other advantages of poſſeſſion; but this hinders not his granting away an honourable right; and the conveyance he makes of it comes under the ſame ſpecies of liberality, as the gift of a heart of ſilver, or a crown glittering with precious ſtones. The inſtrument of this conveyance, hung up in a church in letters of gold, would be as glorious an ornament as a ſtatue of ſilver. Wherein then lies the extraordinary whimſicalneſs of Lewis the eleventh's devotion? and why muſt it be ſaid, that he would not have had the boldneſs thus to impoſe upon the public, if he had not profoundly known the folly and weakneſs of the people. If he had conſecrated to the holy Virgin the revenue of this fief, to be employed to the uſe of eccleſiaſtics, and the adorning of altars, he had practiſed a ſort of devotion, which the abbot of St Real had judged very ſolid (131). This therefore is a laudable way to chuſe the celeſtial powers for the objects of our liberality; it ought therefore to be permitted, to offer them the ſovereignty of an eſtate, and to convey it to them, in order to hold it from them, back again, by fealty and homage; for this right is what a man may as well diveſt himſelf of, in honour of them, as of the revenues of that eſtate. Remember that the victims ſacrificed to the gods, and all the other offerings of devotion, were always conſidered as a preſent, and that the prieſts employed them neither for food, nor any other uſe, otherwiſe than in quality of the miniſters of thoſe celeſtial powers. They were not the proprietors, they were only the uſufructuaries, and that by a kind of ſecondary conveyance. The firſt conſiſted in this, that the man who offered a victim, or any thing elſe, gave up to the gods all the right he had in it. The ſecond in this, that the gods transferred to their miniſters the adminiſtration and uſe of theſe offerings, So that at bottom, the conduct of Lewis XI had nothing extraordinary in it, as not being a liberality of a new invention, and we need not wonder that his ſubjects were not offended at it. It is true, he might have been cenſured, becauſe his donation alienated nothing from him; for he ſtill remained maſter of the land, he reſerved the real profits, &c. wholly to himſelf. But they would be to blame, in imagining that he ſought only to deceive; this act of religion might in him be as ſincere as any other. It is very probable he believed he had made a donation terate man, and no way countenanced learning, have been ſufficiently confuted by Gabriel Naudé (n). I do not give a chronological ſeries of his principal actions; this you will find in Moreri, copied almoſt word for word from Father Anſelm (o); this ought alſo to be underſtood of the other French monarchs. Mr Varillas is miſtaken as to the cauſe he alledges of the antipathy between the French and Spaniards [X]. He has ſucceeded pretty well in diſcovering the machinations of the war againſt Lewis XI, and the arts by which they were defeated, and that terrible conſpiracy was deſtroyed (p). That ſubject was ſuitable to his genius, and the turn he had given to his ſtudies: but there is a little book, where we ſee more diſtinctly the plan of this enterprize, and the means uſed by that prince to defeat it [Y].

The reflexions of Mr Joly (q), on the life of this king, are very judicious. I ſhall recite a paſſage of it, which will give me occaſion to rectify a remark concerning the Rozier des Guerres, the roſe-tree of the wars [Z].

donation which would highly pleaſe the holy Virgin, diſpoſe her to protect him, and be liberal of her favours towards him; his principles and acts of piety might all be wrong, and yet attended with a ſincere perſuaſion of mind; one proof of this is, that he never durſt ſwear falſly upon the croſs of St Laud (132), being ſtruck with a vulgar tradition, that they who ſwore upon this croſs, and were perjured, died a miſerable death before the year's end (133). The conſtable of St Pol prayed him to ſwear upon that croſs, that he would neither do, nor ſuffer any other to do him any harm (134). The king anſwered, that he had ſworn he never would take that oath, for any man alive; but that there were no other oaths; but he would willingly take to ſatiſfy him (135).

I wiſh this reflexion may ſerve as a warning to all my readers, that there are no thoughts ſo much to be ſuſpected, as thoſe which are put off in an aſſuming manner, and with a majeſtic tone. The foregoing reflexions of the abbot of St Real are, of this kind, the fitteſt in the world to dazzle; but diveſt them of their ornaments, and take a near view of them, and you will find nothing ſolid in them.

[X] Mr Varillas is miſtaken, as to the cauſe of the antipathy between the French and Spaniards.] 'Moſt of the accounts both French and Spaniſh, that were publiſhed upon occaſion of the interview of Lewis with Henry IV, king of Caſtile, aſſign for a reaſon of the ſtrange change that happened there, Lewis's extream negligence in dreſs, unbecoming the dignity of a prince of his rank; and to ſay the truth, before that interview, the French and Caſtilians practiſed, towards each other, all the duties of good neighbourhood. They mutually ſuccoured each other, and performed all the good offices that decency and charity required (136).' Mr Varillas gives ſeveral inſtances of it, after which he goes on in this manner, 'but when the court of Henry IV, king of Caſtile, which appeared in ſo magnificent an equipage, that the like was never ſeen, nor any thing near it, for three or four hundred years before, ſaw Lewis dreſſed in a drab de Berry, that was not new, and his head covered with an old hat, which had nothing remarkable in it but a leaden image of the Virgin, that was ſewed to it; the Caſtilians conceived ſuch a contempt for the French, on account of their king, that they took the firſt opportunity of breaking with them; and the antipathy betwixt the two nations, may be dated from that time, which has ſince become immortal (137).'

I doubt not but Mr Varillas would have been hard put to it, to ſhew us any accounts of this interview, which ſay, that the hatred that has laſted ſo long between the French and Spaniards, is derived from thence. I am certain Philip de Comines is the firſt who has made reflexions thereupon, and that almoſt all other writers are his tranſcribers in this particular; but he is far from giving any ground for the pretended diſcovery of Mr Varillas. He has made a digreſſion (138) tending to ſhew that the interview of princes is more prejudicial than profitable. He gives ſeveral inſtances of it, the firſt whereof is the interview of Lewis XI, and the king of Caſtile: 'Thus theſe two nations, ſays he (139), which had been ſo ſtrictly allied, ridiculed each other. The king of Caſtile was ill-favoured, and his dreſs diſpleaſing to the French, who laughed at it. Our king was dreſſed in a ſhort jerkin, and ſo mean that nothing could be more ſo; and ſometimes he wore very ſorry cloth, and a ſorry hat, different from the reſt, with a leaden image tacked to it. The Caſtilians laughed at it, and ſaid it was out of ſtingineſs. Thus, in effect, that interview broke up, with ſcoffing and ſatire on both ſides, and thoſe two kings afterwards never loved one another.' What he has ſaid of the interview of the emperor and Charles duke of Burgundy, is equally ſtrong (140). Should we hence conclude, that the Germans and Burgundians have hated one another ever ſince? Would not this be falſe? Were not they good friends, after the death of the duke of Burgundy? Did not they act in concert againſt France? We ſhould have ſeen the ſame betwixt the French and Caſtilians, had not ſtronger reaſons intervened than the diſcontent at this interview. Caſtile, Arragon, and ſeveral other eſtates of Spain were re-united: and hence proceeded the hatred of the French and Spaniards; for ever ſince that re-union, France has been obliged to act either upon the offenſive or defenſive againſt Spain.

LEWIS XII, king of France, great-grandſon to Charles V [A], ſucceeded Charles VIII, on the ſeventh of April 1498. He had the title of duke of Orleans, and had gone through many diſgraces in the reign of his predeceſſor. Nor paid he all the ſubmiſſion due to his ſovereign: for he had taken up arms againſt him, and was taken priſoner in a battle gained againſt thoſe of Brittany, by the army of Charles VIII (a). He was in love with the heireſs of Brittany, and hoped to marry her; but he had not that ſatisfaction till after the king his predeceſſor's death, and it obliged him to an action altogether odious and unjuſt, to wit, the diſſolving his marriage with the princeſs Jane of France [B]. His reign was remarkable for great events, ſome proſperous, and others unfortunate [C]; but take him all together, he was one of the greateſt men that had been

[A] He was great-grandſon to Charles V.] He was ſon to Charles duke of Orleans, who was ſon to Lewis of France, duke of Orleans, aſſaſſinated in Paris by his uncle the duke of Burgundy, the twenty third of November, 1407 (1). This Lewis, ſon of Charles V, had married Valentina of Milan; ſo that Lewis XII, grandſon to Valentina, had the juſteſt pretenſions in the world to the duchy of Milan, and yet he could never maintain himſelf in that country.

[B] He was obliged to diſſolve his marriage with the princeſs Jane of France.] She was daughter to Lewis XI, and ſiſter to Charles VIII. She was married at twenty two years of age, to our Lewis, in 1476. She behaved herſelf very well with reſpect to him whilſt he was in diſgrace, and it was ſhe, who, by her entreaties, brought him out of priſon, in 1491 (2); but that was not ſufficient to balance, in her husband's heart, the violent inclination he had for Charles the eighth's widow: this was Anne of Brittany. He had loved her, and was beloved by her, before ſhe married Charles; therefore, to gratify his paſſion for her, he cauſed his marriage to be annulled, and promiſed ſuch rewards to Pope Alexander VI, that he obtained of him all he had a mind to. There are few but believe he was perjured, in maintaining he had not known her, ‘ He proteſted he had married her by force, fearing the indignation of Lewis XI, her father, who was a man of an abſolute will, but that he had never known nor touched her (3).’ This Brantome ſays, but he adds, ‘ I believe her husband, as I have heard ſay, had known her very well, and ſenſibly touched her, though ſhe was ſomewhat deformed in her body; for he was not ſo chaſte as to abſtain, having her ſo near him, and ſo cloſe to his ſide, conſidering his temper, which was a little luſtful, and very prone to the pleaſures of Venus, as his predeceſſor had been; but he was minded to recover his firſt love, which was queen Anne, and that fine duchy, which threw great temptations into his ſoul, and therefore he divorced that princeſs, and his oath was believed and received by the Pope, who gave him a diſpenſation, which was received by the Sorbonne, and by the court of parliament of Paris (4).’ Mr Varillas will give us the particulars of the injuſtices which were committed in this affair. ‘ Lewis XII had ſollicited * the diſſolution of his marriage with Jane of France, daughter and ſiſter to the two laſt kings, though he was obliged to her for his liberty and life; he had ſworn before the commiſſioners of the holy ſee, that the marriage had not been conſummated, though this princeſs had ſworn the contrary; and the miracles ſhe afterwards wrought, ſeem to confirm the truth of what ſhe had ſaid; he had maintained, in writing, other facts upon this ſubject, which were not more probable: he had corrupted, by his money, the ſecretary of the legate , and underſtanding, from him, that the permiſſion to marry again was expedited, he married the queen, without waiting till this permiſſion came to his hands, which was the cauſe of the legate's poiſoning his ſecretary (5).’ Even thoſe who will not allow that this princeſs wrought miracles, will be obliged to acknowledge, that ſhe lived an exemplary life after her divorce, and that her moderation under ſo ſenſible an injury was wonderful; for which reaſon her word is more to be depended on than the oaths of her husband. For it is certain that ſhe declared to the commiſſioners, with all that modeſty which her virtue and her ſex required, that the marriage had been conſummated. Jane of France being interrogated in her turn upon the ſame articles, anſwered. . . . . . . That modeſty would not permit her to explain herſelf clearly upon the third article (6), and nevertheleſs that her conſcience did not ſuffer her to aſſent to it (7). If it were true, as a Jeſuit affirms, that great prodigies were obſerved upon the diſſolution of the marriage, no one could doubt of the injuſtice and perjury of Lewis XII. The declaration of this divorce ‘ was followed, or at leaſt attended, with terrible prodigies, as earthquakes, ſtorms, tempeſts, thunder, and, above all, with ſo great a darkneſs, that, in the day time, ſays this author (8), they were obliged to make uſe of torches, to be able to read the ſentence of ſeparation and nullity of the marriage (9). Theſe are ſurprizing events, of which the cotemporary writers ought not to have been ſilent; their general ſilence would have been a ſtranger prodigy than the reſt. However, it is plain they have ſaid nothing of them; for if they had, the knowledge of a thing of this nature would not have been ſo ill preſerved, as that almoſt every one ſhould look upon it as a new diſcovery in the Jeſuit's book. We ſhall here mention a reflexion of a modern author: ‘ How is it poſſible, ſays he (10), that an event of this nature ſhould be unknown to Brantome, or Mr Varillas, who have known or read ſo many ſecret memoirs? we may obſerve this ſmall difference between the two, that the latter ſays expreſsly, queen Jane wrought miracles; whereas the firſt only ſays, ſhe was reckoned a ſaint, and almoſt a worker of miracles. In matters of this kind, the farther we are removed from the fountain head, the more we know.’ Note, that ‘ the people of Paris murmured openly, at the king's divorcing the daughter of Lewis XI, and that there were ſcrupulous doctors, who blamed him in the pulpits (11).’ Judge then whether the prodigies would have paſſed in ſilence. It might be ſaid that ſince Brantome's death, ſeveral miracles were wrought at the queen's tomb (12), and therefore Mr Varillas might be more poſitive than he. Be it how it will, the ſentence that declares the marriage null, being pronounced the twenty ſecond of December, 1498 (13), the king married Anne of Brittany the eighth (14) of January following.

been ſeen for ſome ages. The republic of Venice being grown very powerful, and the haughtineſs great power is attended with, having appeared too much in her conduct, ſeveral ſtates confederated to bring her to reaſon [D]. Lewis XII, who came into this league, had almoſt the ſole glory of humbling this State [E], which was grown formidable and odious to all it's neighbours. After ſo noble a ſucceſs, a league was formed againſt this monarch, by the intrigues of a Pope (b), who was not only a great warrior, but alſo a refined Politician. Lewis ſo confounded this confederacy, that if the duke de Nemours had not been killed in the battle of Ravenna, this haughty and warlike Pope engagements, ſo that it may be ſaid the court of France ſuffered itſelf to be wretchedly impoſed upon by that of Spain, and that the French ſoldiers ſuffered themſelves to be beaten by the Spaniſh ſoldiers. The bad conduct of Lewis the twelfth's generals, the manifeſt cauſe of theſe diſgraces, is no ground of comfort or apology, but rather another mortification for this prince, as ſhewing that he made an ill choice of thoſe he employed. The other loſs, to wit, that of the Milaneſe, plainly manifeſted the ſame defect: he gave the government of it to a man very much hated (15), and who in that poſt made himſelf more odious than he was before; and who, among other faults, committed that of ſuffering the French to provoke the jealouſy of the inhabitants, by the liberties they took with the women (16). Yet he had the ſatisfaction of quickly recovering the Milaneſe, for which he was indebted to a piece of treachery, which is very rare among the the Swiſſers (17); but he never could repair the other loſſes in this country. In vain he raiſed great armies, to revenge himſelf on the king of Arragon; he miſcarried every where, both in Italy, Biſcay, and Rouſſillon. The diſcontent occaſioned by ſo many bad ſucceſſes, the loſs of his reputation, and the inability to diſcover all theſe Spaniſh deceits, was ſo great, as to bring upon him a ſickneſs which reduced him to the laſt extremity (18).

[D] Several ſtates confederated againſt the republic of Venice, to bring her to reaſon.] Lewis was highly provoked againſt the Venetians by twenty affronts that they had put upon him (19). The Pope, the emperor, and the king of Spain, hated them no leſs for different cauſes, and particularly becauſe they had encroached upon the territories of each of them (20). All theſe princes formed a league with that ſecrecy againſt them at Cambray, in the year 1508 (21), that, as dextrous as they were, they knew nothing of it till it began to be executed (22). The French embaſſador (23) declaims againſt them in a terrible manner, in a ſpeech he made before the emperor Maximilian, in the year 1510. He ſet forth the origin, progreſs, deſigns, artifices, and political maxims, of this republic (24). But it muſt be remembred, that an Orator who will excite his auditory to war, is not much concerned about hiſtorical exactneſs. However it be, this republic hath been already ill treated otherwiſe than by words. This we ſhall ſee in the following remark.

Note, that John le Maire de Belges, Judiciary and Hiſtoriographer to queen Anne of Brittany, wife to Lewis XII, wrote a book at leaſt as ſatirical as the embaſſador's oration; he intituled it, The Legend of the Venetians. He obſerves in his prologue, that the intire ruin of their republic was then held as a certainty, and that they alledged certain prophecies (25), oracles, and ſoothſayings, on that ſubject, and aſtrological prognoſtications, appearances of ſigns, ſtrange eclipſes, comets, lightenings, earthquakes, monſters, portents, and divers preſages. . . . . I have given myſelf the trouble, continues he, to make a collection and an abridgment of all the Venetian hiſtories and chronicles, which I have reduced to three principal points; by which I have found, that if any prophecies, divinations, or prognoſtics of their ruin have been divulged, it has been by the foreſight and pre-admonition of the juſt judgment of God, which I pretend to prove by the abovesaid three points or articles. It is uſeful to obſerve this, becauſe it ſerves to diſcover, I. The oſtentation of nations, who ſee a ſucceſsful beginning of their enterprizes. II. The credulity with which people collect and apply prognoſtics. III. The quickneſs wherewith providence confounds thoſe proud and ſuperſtitious diſcourſes; for the republic of Venice ſoon recovered itſelf.

[E] He had almoſt the ſole glory of humbling this ſtate.] ‘The Venetians ſaw him beyond the Alps, with forty thouſand men, beginning the war with them, and the Pope at the ſame time thundering againſt them his excommunications, which make great impreſſion upon people, when ſeconded by the terror of arms. The king, having paſſed the river Adda, purſued their army ſo cloſely, as to fight it the fourteenth day of May, and gained that memorable battle of Giera-d'Adda, near the village of Aignadel, four miles from Caravaz. Their infantry were all cut to pieces, and their general, Alviana, having loſt an eye, was taken priſoner. In a fortnight's time, the king, almoſt without ſtriking a ſtroke, reduced all the places they kept from him. He might alſo have taken Vicenza, Padua, Verona, Trevis, and all the places that belonged to the empire, or the houſe of Auſtria, if his juſtice had not exceeded his ambition. He ſent back the deputies of all theſe towns, who brought him the keys, to the emperor, who received them under his obedience, and put garriſons in them. The Pope had ſent an army of ten or twelve thouſand men, into Romagna (26). . . . . . . King Ferdinand had only a ſmall naval force in the gulph, and hoped to make his advantage, as he did, of the labour, and at the expence of the French. Now the loſs of the ſingle battle of Aignadel, put the ſtate of Venice into ſuch a conſternation, that deſpairing to keep any thing on the Terra Firma, they reſolved to ſhut themſelves up in the iſlands of their gulph, and in this deſpair commanded all the governors of the places that had belonged to the Pope, or Ferdinand, to open their gates to them, and recalled their magiſtrates from Verona, Padua, Vicenza, and other places, to which the emperor had pretenſions. Thus you ſee how theſe three potentates, by the valour of the French, rather than by their own forces, recovered all that had been taken from them: and how the ambition of the Venetians, by keeping no bounds, ſaw thoſe of their dominions in a ſmall time reduced to the very brink of their canal (27).’ You will tell me, it is a French Hiſtorian that ſays this, who may be ſuſpected to flatter Lewis, in attributing to him all the effects of the league of Cambray. Let us therefore cite Paul Jovius, who acknowledges that the emperor had ſent little more than envoys, when the French army had already confined all the Venetian forces within their canals. This Hiſtorian, to excuſe the Pope for abandoning the league, and re-uniting with the Venetians, repreſents his action as the only means of preſerving Italy. He does not ſay, that there was any thing to be apprehended from the emperor, or the king of Spain, but only ſpeaks of Lewis XII. His expreſſions are very ſtrong. ‘In præaltis animi receſſibus graviores cauſæ pontificem cunctis ſenſibus peracrem, ſtrenuum, indomitum, vehementer excitabant, ut ſaluti Italiæ maturè proſpiceret, diligentiſſimeque caveret, ne deletis Venetis, impotenti demum barbaro foret ſerviendum. Namque Ludovicus ubi uno ſecundo prælio Venetas opes contrivit, ac ademptis tot urbibus continentis, gentem adverſo rerum ſucceſſu conterritam intra paludes, ipſaſque Venetias circumflui maris beneficio permunitas compulit, cunctis formidandus evaſerat: præſertim quum ad id bellum Maximilianus Cæſar nihil ferè præter legatos & Auguſti nomen attuliſſet. Pope had been forced to ſeek a ſanctuary out of Rome [F]. France would even have cauſed him to be depoſed, notwithſtanding the death of the duke de Nemours, if almoſt all Europe had not conſpired againſt her. Never was ſeen againſt a ſingle kingdom, ſuch a multitude of enemies [G]; ſo that it muſt be confeſſed, France ſaw itſelf reduced to great extremities (c). But beſides that it was very glorious for Lewis XII, to have been ſo much the terror of his neighbours, as that they ſhould believe it impoſſible, without an unanimous oppoſition, to ſtop his career; he had alſo the glory of diſſolving this formidable league by his negotiations [H]. The peace he made with the Engliſh, ‘ pontificem decebat) Venetos, ne ſe tantis fluctibus obrutos, planè demerſos, ac penitus extinctos vellet, ſuppliciter deprecantes, ſublevandos cenſuit (28). ——— Some important reaſons induced the Pope, an active, ſtout, and reſolute man, to provide betimes for the ſafety of Italy, and uſe his utmoſt diligence, leſt when the Venetians were ruined, Italy ſhould be ſubjected to a fierce barbarian. For Lewis having in a battle overthrown the forces of the Venetians, and taken many towns on the continent, they being affrighted by their misfortunes, had reſolved to retire to the iſlands of their gulph; ſo formidable was this prince become to every body: eſpecially ſeeing that the emperor Maximilian, had contributed nothing to this war, but embaſſadors and the Imperial name. Julius knew how deſirous the French king was to extend his dominions, he knew the inexhauſtible riches of France, he ſaw that the flouriſhing ſtate of Milan, by the expulſion of the Sforza's, was fallen into the hands of the French; that the Genoeſe had been ſubdued, and were bridled by ſome fortreſſes; moreover, that the Venetians, who ſome time before had a vaſt power all over the world, had, in one hour's time, been ſtripped of their troops, dominions, and authority. By which things being moved (as became a moſt equitable and truly Italian Pontiff) he thought fit to aſſiſt the Venetians, who humbly intreated him not to ſuffer them, after having endured ſo many calamities, to be utterly ruined.’

[F] If the duke of Nemours had not been killed . . . . . the Pope would have been forced to ſeek a ſanctuary out of Rome.] Even before Gaſton de Foix (29), that thunderbolt of war, who probably would have excelled the two Scipio's, if he had lived as long as they; before, I ſay, he had gotten the victory of Ravenna, Julius II was upon the point of leaving Rome, that he might not fall into the hands of the French; and he had abandoned it, if Lewis XII had not ſuffered himſelf to be inchanted by the charms of ſuperſtition. This we learn from Mezerai. In this conſternation, ſeeing no ſecurity for him in Rome, if the victorious army of the king advanced, he had thoughts of propoſing an accommodation, but when he found that the king, tired with troubleſome ſcruples of his wife, had given orders to Trivulcio, to make an attempt upon the lands of the church, he ſhewed himſelf more intractable and implacable than ever (30). The victory of Ravenna caſt Rome into a like conſternation, though the commander, who was moſt to be feared, had loſt his life in the battle. And the Pope was intreated to embark as ſoon as he could, and betake himſelf to flight (31). The charms of the ſame ſuperſtition, gave him new confidence once more, and delivered him. The aſtoniſhment was ſo great in Rome, that the cardinals in a body came and deſired the Pope to make peace with the king. Ferdinand and the Venetians having given him ſome courage, he had recourſe to his ordinary artifices, which were to amuſe the king, by propoſitions of accommodation, and to employ the queen, who, by motives of conſcience, careſſes, intrigues, and importunities, frequently diſarmed him, and cooled his courage (32). Who would not pity the fate of Lewis XII, who had ſo dangerous a domeſtic enemy, in the perſon that was moſt dear to him? this is a ſtrong confirmation of what I have ſaid above (33), concerning the ſcruples of Lewis VII. Nothing is ſo capable of ſtopping an arm ready to lay an enemy under foot, or reaching to gather the fruits of an important victory, as the artifices or bigottry of a confeſſor. It is ſaid indeed, that Lewis XII once impoſed ſilence on his wiſe, who continually importuned him; What, Madam, ſaid he, do you think that you are wiſer than ſo many famous univerſities, who have approved the council of Piſa? do not your confeſſors tell you, that women are to be ſilent in the church (34)? but what could it ſignify to ſay this once? a woman ſo tenderly beloved by her huſband, as Anne of Bretagne was, is not diſcouraged at three or four refuſals. She ſtill returns to the charge, till her demands are granted. Theſe are birds of the bed, or the night, whoſe warbling is much to be feared, it perſwades ſooner or later. The hiſtorian whom I have cited, obſerves, that ſome monks, who governed this queen's conſcience, ſo filled her ſoul with ſcruples, that ſhe never ceaſed to importune her huſband (35). Had Juvenal known ſuch things, he would have bid people beware more of the ſuperſtititions, than of the pedantry of a wiſe.

> Non habeat matrona tibi quæ juncta recumbit,
> Dicendi genus; aut curtum ſermone rotato
> Torqueat enthymema, nec hiſtorias ſciat omnes (36).

> O what a midnight curſe has he, whoſe ſide
> Is peſter'd with a mood and figure-bride!
> Let mine, ye gods! (if ſuch muſt be my fate)
> No logic learn, nor hiſtory tranſlate.

The queen we ſpeak of, ſo obſtinately maintained her point, that her huſband was forced to grant her all ſhe deſired, that is, to ſubmit meanly to the court of Rome, Here is another paſſage of Mezerai (37). ‘ The ſpirit of the king bore up againſt all theſe adverſities, but he had one domeſtic trouble, which was greater than what all his enemies gave him. This was his own wife, who touched with ſcruples common to her ſex, could not ſuffer him to be at variance with the Pope, or to ſupport a council againſt him. As ſhe continually teized him upon theſe two points, he was frequently forced for peace ſake, to ſtop the progreſs of his arms, when his affairs went beſt, and he was upon the point of bringing Julius to reaſon. At laſt, being totally vanquiſhed by her importunities, and by the remonſtrances of his ſubjects, whom ſhe excited on all ſides, he renounced his council of Piſa, and adhered to that of Lateran, by his proxies, who cauſed his mandate to be read the eighth ſeſſion, the fourteenth of December, the Pope preſiding in it (38).

[G] Never was ſeen againſt a ſingle kingdom, ſuch a multitude of enemies.] Lewis had at the ſame time a war to maintain, againſt the Pope, the republic of Venice, Spain, and England; or againſt the Pope, England, the emperor, and the Swiſs; and for an over-charge, he was to ſupport a miſerable dethroned king (39), who brought him no other aſſiſtance but the juſtice of his cauſe, which ſignified nothing: this is a common caſe enough.

[H] . . . . he had the glory of diſſolving this formidable league by his negotiations.] ‘ (40) France was then in greater danger than it had been of a long time before. For, on one hand, the Swiſs, extreamly fluſhed with the victory of Novara, entered it by the dutchy of Burgundy, and he (41) with the Engliſh, attacked it on the ſide of Picardy. The Switzers beſieged Dijon with twenty five thouſand men, to which the emperor had joined the nobility of Franche-Comté, and ſome German cavalry, commanded by Ulric duke of Wirtemberg. La Tremouille having defended it ſix weeks, thought it more adviſable to divert the courſe of this torrent, which after the taking of the place would have overflowed all to the gates of Paris, than render it more violent by oppoſition. He entred into a negotiation with them, and managed it ſo well, as to ſend them back into their own countries, undertaking that the king ſhould pay ſix hundred thouſand crowns, and renounce the council of Piſa, and the duchy of Milan. He had no expreſs orders to grant them

(41) That is to ſay, the emperor.

Engliſh was a deciſive ſtroke. It is true, that by accident it became fatal to him, having engaged him in a marriage, which did him more prejudice, than an army of an hundred thouſand men could have done: for this prince having married Henry the eighth's ſiſter, a very lovely princeſs, gave himſelf up too much to the pleaſures of matrimony [I]. He did not proportion his conjugal benevolence, either to his own ſtrength or age, but to the youth of his wife. Having only daughters, he earneſtly deſired that ſhe might give him a ſucceſſor. He quickly wore out, in that exerciſe, his weak conſtitution. He conſummated the marriage the tenth of October, 1514 (d), and died of a looſeneſs the firſt of January 1515 (e), in the fifty third year of his age (f), without being able, by ſo many efforts ſo prejudicial to his life, to get the queen with child. This was very happy for France; for if the queen had brought him a ſon, inſtead of Francis I. they would have had an infant-king, who would have been a weakly prince all his life [K]. Lewis XII was ſo inclined to eaſe his ſubjects, that he deſerved the ſirname of Father of the People, an elogy a thouſand times more glorious than that of Great, Auguſt, Magnificent, Hardy, &c. He bore ſatires againſt his own perſon with patience, but not againſt the queen [L]. He paſſionately loved this princeſs, and had

'them theſe conditions; but he thought he ought to do it to ſave France, and gave them ſix hoſtages, two lords, and four citizens (42). . . . . At the ſame time, towards the middle of July, the emperor and the king of England had beſieged Terouenne with above 50000 men. The French army ſucceſsfully enough, threw a convoy of proviſion and ammunition into the ditches; but upon their return, not being ſufficiently upon their guard, they were charged and routed. The battle was fought the eighteenth of Auguſt, near Guinegaſte. It was called the battle of the ſpurs; becauſe, on that occaſion, the French made more uſe of their ſpurs than of their ſwords.' Terouenne capitulated fifteen days after (43). Tournay quickly ſurrended. The peace therefore came very ſeaſonably: it was concluded at London the ſecond of Auguſt 1514 (44).

[I] He gave himſelf up too much to the pleaſures of matrimony.] Guicciardin and Paul Jovius make this obſervation. Qua in Galliam perducta, Ludovicus incredibili ſumptu & mira ludorum varietate nuptias celebravit. Sed dum ætatis & valetudinis quæ ei tum erat tenuiſſima, penè oblitus, intemperantius (ut ferunt) procreandis liberis operam daret, concepta edaci febricula non multos poſt dies interiit. —— The peace being made, Lewis who was a widower married Mary, ſiſter to Henry, a young princeſs of an exquiſite beauty; as ſoon as ſhe arrived in France, Lewis celebrated his nuptials with incredible expences, and an admirable variety of entertainments. But not conſidering his age, and his conſtitution, which was then but weak, he indulged too much, as they ſay, his deſire of begetting children; and falling ſick of a fever, died a few days after.' Theſe are Guicciardin's words: 'Il re di Franchia, mentre che dando cupidamente opera alla bellezza eccellente & alla età della nuova moglie, giovane di diciotto anni, non ſi ricorda dell' età ſua, e debilità della compleſſione, oppreſſo da febbre, e ſopravenendogli accidenti di fluſſo, parti quaſi repentinamente della vita preſente, havendo fatto memorabile il primo giorno dell' Anno MDXV con la ſua morte (46). —— While the king of France was wholly taken up, with the charms and youth of the new queen, who was but eighteen years old, without regarding his age, or his weak conſtitution, he fell ſick of a fever, attended by a flux; which very ſoon put an end to his life, and rendered memorable, the firſt day of the year 1515 by his death.' Mezerai agrees with theſe two Italians. 'Many believed, ſays he (47), that his too much careſſing the young queen, was the cauſe of his death.' Mr Varillas obſerves, 'that the Phyſicians and courtiers, who ſaw him marry again, unanimouſly foretold, that he would not long ſurvive this ſecond marriage (48).'

[K] If the queen had brought him a ſon . . . . they would have had an infant-king, who would have been a weakly prince all his life.] We do not lay down this as certain, but only as probable, grounding on the reaſon aſſigned by good authors, of the infirmities of Charles VIII. 'There is no reaſon to doubt, but Charles VIII was of as weak a conſtitution, as we have ſaid, ſince Comines aſſures us *, that this prince was always infirm in body and mind, and Gaguin † has gone farther than he, in ſaying, teneris atque imbecillibus membris adeo Carolus fuit, ut ſedulo duci illum & geſtari molliter priuſquam ſolide incedere oportuerit. —— Charles was of ſo weak and crazy a conſtitution, that they were obliged to lead or carry him, with a particular care, before he was able to walk ſteadily.' Which we may reaſonably believe, proceeded from the great age of his father, ſince, according to Dominicus Mencinus's obſervation, [L] He patiently ſuffered the ſatires againſt his own perſon, but not againſt the queen.] For this we will cite Brantome's memoirs; 'The king, ſays he (50), had that conſideration for Anne of Brittany, his wife, that being one day told how the clerks of the Baſoche du Palais, and the ſcholars had acted plays, into which they brought the king and his court, and all the grandees, he made no more of it, than to ſay that they muſt have their paſtime, and that he allowed them to ſpeak of him and his court, but however not diſreſpectfully; and above all, that they ſhould not ſpeak of the queen, his wife, in any manner whatever; otherwiſe he would have them all hanged.' theſe words of Coſtar. ‘Our Lewis XII, who deſerved the title of Father of his people, was not he brought upon the ſtage in his good city of Paris, and repreſented as an inſatiable miſer, who drank in a great gold goblet, without being able to quench his unreaſonable thirſt? He praiſed the invention, and made himſelf merry with it, and perhaps was glad that his love of riches, which had never given the leaſt of his ſubjects occaſion to weep, furniſhed them with a matter of laughter and agreeable diverſion (51).’ In general this monarch was of ſo ſweet and debonaire a temper, that the rigour he exerciſed againſt the duke of Milan, was thought to be a divine judgment. ‘He cauſed him to be removed from Lyons to Loches, where he was ſhut up for ten years together to his death, with a rigour ſo contrary to the mercy of this good prince, that it was believed to be a viſible chaſtiſement of God (52).’ This miſerable duke of Milan was ſhut up in an iron cage, where he had not ſo much as the comfort of being able to read or write. This one ſevere action made many conclude, that Lewis XII was of a cruel temper. ‘Eum tamen pervicacis obſtinatæque naturæ, & proinde ſævum & inexorabilem plerique exiſtimarunt, vel ob id præcipue, quod Lodovicum Sfortiam erepto omni ſcribendi, & quæ cuperet legendi ſolatio, ferrata in cavea omnium miſerrimum mori coëgiſſet (53).

[M] His wife . . . . was a great queen, and of rare chaſtity.] You may ſee her elogy in Brantome (54), and in Hilarion de Coſte (55); I only point out theſe authors; but I ſhall do more as to Peter de St Julian, I ſhall copy him concerning a very curious fact: ‘Queen Anne, ſays he (56), ducheſs of Brittany, and Madam Anne of France, ducheſs of Bourbonnois, (the former twice queen of France, and the latter daughter to king Lewis XI, and regent in France, during the minority of king Charles VIII her brother) ſo virtuouſly baniſhed immodeſty, and planted honour in the hearts of the ladies and gentlewomen, citizens wives, and all other ſorts of French women, that they who were known to have blemiſhed their honour, were ſo diſgraced and diſcarded, that the virtuous women would have thought they injured their reputation, ſhould they ſuffer them in their company.’ I do not think there is a ſurer way to make modeſty flouriſh than this. If once it were the faſhion for all women of good reputation to refuſe the company of thoſe who were ſuſpected of gallantries, would any of our ladies venture to diſcredit themſelves? It would be very eaſy, in my opinion, for queens to place their ſex upon a good foot; they need only baniſh the ladies their preſence, who were accuſed upon good grounds; in a word, they need only imitate Anne of Brittany. A modern author (57) points out the moſt fruitful ſource of the corruption of our age, when he ſays, that whereas heretofore a woman who was jealous of her reputation, would have ſcrupled the company of another, whoſe virtue was ſuſpected, at preſent the ſame reſpect is ſhewn to thoſe of an irregular conduct, as to thoſe of a regular. It is diſcouraging virtue, to rob it of it's temporal recompence (58), which is done by paying the ſame reſpects and civilities to a woman of a tattered reputation, as to another of virtue and honour: but, this is almoſt the paſs that things are come to. ‘In effect, what can we inſtance that is eaſier obtained by thoſe who are continually on their guard, than by others who are under ſome diſgrace? Do the former go more confidently than others to great feaſts, or ceremonial meetings, or do they receive greater civilities at them? Is it any obſtacle to a great marriage ſettlement, that one has been the diſcourſe of a whole nation? Is one leſs praiſed in an epiſtle dedicatory, or a funeral ſermon? By no-means; and we may ſay with Solomon upon all this, that the ſame thing happens to him that ſacrificeth, and to him that ſacrificeth not (59). See the remark [C] of the article GONZAGUE (ELEONORA DE).

But to return to queen Anne of Brittany: her chaſtity was not unſerviceable to the ſupporting her haughty humour. Theſe are the words of one of her panegyriſts (60). ‘I am not ignorant that ſome ‡ have written, that this good king finding his princeſs was very fond of ruling, let her quietly govern her duchy of Brittany; and underſtanding that ſhe was carrying on ſome intrigues againſt his inclination and ſervice, he would not however reſent it, ſaying, to thoſe that preſſed him to it: Some allowance is to be made to a chaſte woman.’ There are thoſe who had rather their wives were given to galantry, provided they were ſubmiſſive, than have them chaſte, and imperious with all (61). Lewis XII was not of this humour. See the tenth ſatire of Boileau, in the place, where he ſpeaks of the price, at which a virtuous wiſe knows how to rate her modeſty.

[N] I ſhall only mention one of his witty ſayings.] ‘After the league of Cambray, the Venetians made a deputation to him to endeavour to bring him off. The ſenator, who was the chief of the embaſſy, made him a ſpeech full of the wiſdom of their republic; and Lewis, who would neither contradict, nor grant what he asked, anſwered pleaſantly, I will play ſuch a number of fools againſt your wiſe men, that all their wiſdom ſhall not be able to reſiſt them; for our fools are a ſort of people that ſtrike on all ſides, without minding where, or hearkening to any reaſon for it (62).’ He might well ſay that he would oppoſe fools to the Venetians: for all that the French did in Italy under Charles VIII, and Lewis XII, was an effect of that martial fury, which foreigners themſelves own to be the temper of the French ſoldiers at the firſt onſet. That ardor and briskneſs did produce very good ſucceſſes; but as their generals were not men of judgment, and very little conduct was then obſerved in the affairs of France, their conqueſts were as ſoon loſt as gained. There was not much prudence at that time, either in the head or members of the council. This it was that ſaved Italy, as has been lately acknowledged by a famous profeſſor of Frieſland. ‘Si Carolus VIII & Galli tum temporis ita fuiſſent animati, ſicut eſt Ludovicus XIV & ejus conſilium, cujus inſtituta rationeſque fere ſunt mathematicæ, actum fuiſſet de Italia, cujus nulla amplius erat vis militaris. Sed ut Galli hanc expeditionem impetu magis quam conſilio, fati non prudentiæ ductu ſuſceperant & executi erant, ita mirum non eſt, idem fatum, deficiente conſtantia, illos deſtituiſſe (63). —— If Charles VIII and the French at that time, had been as active as Lewis XIV, and his council, whoſe deſigns and meaſures are almoſt mathematical; Italy had been loſt, it having no longer any military forces: but as the French had undertaken the expedition out of impetuoſity, rather than deliberation, and left the conduct of it to fate, rather than prudence, it is no wonder if the ſame fate, when they had no ſteadineſs, did forſake them.’

[O] I ſhall alſo give the deſcription of his perſon.] Naudé has inſerted it in his additions to the hiſtory of Lewis XI (64), and obſerves, that he found it in a very ſcarce book, which was printed 120 years ago (65). ‘ and hands, his epiglottis prominent, his breaſt narrow, his body rather ſtooping than ſtrait, his complexion choleric, the motion of his eye quick and rolling upwards, and his legs ſmall.’

LEWIS XIII, king of France, ſon and ſucceſſor to Henry the Great, was born at Fontainbleau, the ſeventeenth of September, 1601, and began his reign the fourteenth of May, 1610. If the ten firſt years of his reign were diſturbed by ſeveral factions, which ſometimes degenerated into Civil-wars [A], the twenty three others were no leſs agitated by religious or foreign wars: ſo that what Job ſays in general, of all men, is applicable in a more particular manner to this prince (a). His reign, which was ſo much diſturbed by wars, was extreamly glorious; nor had France for a long time gained ſo many ſignal victories. And yet in the midſt of all theſe triumphs and glories, this monarch was very unhappy [B]: for his own family occaſioned him perpetual vexations.

[A] His reign . . . . was diſturbed by various factions which ſometimes degenerated into Civil-wars.] When a man examines the hiſtory of Lewis the thirteenth's reign, from the beginning to the end, he is a thouſand times tempted to aſk himſelf theſe queſtions: But is it true, that I am reading the tranſactions in France? Have I not before me a book, wherein the writer, from a romantic fancy, has thought fit to characterize a mutinous people, a nobility inclined to rebellion, and to publiſh theſe characters under the name of France, to conceal that of ſome other nation? A man is the more tempted to aſk theſe queſtions, who ſuffers himſelf to be prejudiced, either by the railleries of ſtrangers, who repreſent the French as the idolaters of monarchy and of their monarchs, or by the elogies which ſeveral French authors beſtow upon their own nation, as if naturally dutiful to their kings, with an unparallelled zeal and loyalty. Nothing is falſer than theſe railleries of foreigners, and encomiums of French pens. The author of Mr de Louvois's Political Teſtament, knew the genius of the nation much better; he lays it down, that the only and true way for France to avoid Civil-wars, is the abſolute power of the ſovereign vigorouſly ſupported, and armed with all the neceſſary force to make it feared. ‘ As for turbulent and rebellious people, ſays he (1), it is certain there have been as many ſeen in France, in the preceding reigns, and in the beginning of your majeſty's, as in any other country.’ He eſtabliſhes the ſame maxim, when he makes this obſervation concerning the Engliſh (2): ‘ It is well known what diſpoſition they are of at bottom, they are as inconſtant and unruly as other nations; but when all is ſaid, they are not more ſo: it is the occaſions and the form of their government, the impunity and the means that are left in their hands, which make them turbulent. We ſhould ſee, in other ſtates, ſubjects who are the moſt ſubmiſſive, grow mutinous and factious, if the prudence, the authority, and vigour of their ſovereigns, did not keep them under, and cut off all opportunities.’ Conſider how he reaſons upon the difference there is in France, betwixt this and the preceding reigns. ‘ What is become at preſent of thoſe multitudes of turbulent and ſeditious ſpirits? Have they not all the pretences they ever had? Do not the wars and other expences, with which your majeſty is obliged to maintain the luſtre of your glory, oblige you to impoſe upon the people more exceſſive taxes, than ever were raiſed by Lewis XI. Have not the Proteſtants been more provoked than under Charles IX, and Lewis XIII? Is not the nobility heavier laden than ever? Does not the clergy contribute to the neceſſities of the ſtate more than ever they have done, either in this age or in all ages paſſed? And has not your majeſty as many controverſies with the ſee of Rome as any of your predeceſſors ever had? and yet all is quiet and ſubmiſſive; there is no revolt or treaſon heard of. War and confuſions are kept off at a diſtance; whereas heretofore they were at home and in our bowels . . . . (3). Whence proceeds this difference? . . . . Whence comes this change? From the difference wherewith your majeſty manages the royal authority; from your prudence to make a right uſe of it, from your skill in riding that brute beaſt the people, which being unbridled, would run at random every way, whither it's inſtinct drove it; but which is inſenſibly accuſtomed to be governed by bit and bridle, and moves ſurer where it feels an even and ſtrait rein. It is abſolute power that is the true and only curb to check the intemperate heat of a blind and capricious multitude (4).’ He ſays in another place (5), ‘ that the limited authority of a king, and of republics, has more inconveniencies, and is ſubject to more ill conſequences to the ſtate and people than arbitrary power. Factions, ſeditions, tumults, civil wars, frequently do more miſchief in one year, than all the exceſſes of an abſolute monarch can cauſe in a whole life.’ He may be miſtaken with reſpect to ſome countries; but there is no probability that he is miſtaken as to his own nation, which is of ſuch a genius, that the worſt ſtate that can befal it, is to live under an effeminate and weak government; in that caſe every gentleman is the tyrant of his village; every great lord is the tyrant of his lordſhip, and nothing but ſeditions and inſurrections are to be heard of (6). Read the Hiſtory of France, and eſpecially obſerve the minorities, and you will be convinced of what I have been ſaying; you will find that the character of this nation is the very ſame that Mr de la Bruyere gives of children. See the margin (7).

[B] In the midſt of ſo much . . . glory, this monarch was very unhappy.] A modern author, deſigning to ſhew the vanity of human proſperities, makes uſe of two great examples; he runs over the life of Auguſtus, and then proceeds in this manner (8): ‘ Let us come to the ſecond inſtance, and behold the moſt glorious potentate of this age, with ſuch a ſeries of the bleſſings of heaven, as all the earth has reaſon to be aſtoniſhed at. One may eaſily judge that I mean Lewis XIII, whoſe proſperities doubtleſs will be admired by thoſe who come after us, if they judge of them by the luſtre of his heroic actions, by the number of his trophies, by the extent of his conqueſts, and by the greatneſs of his triumphs. In effect, whether you conſider the monſters he has ſubdued at home, or caſt your eyes on the advantages he has every where reaped abroad, you will be forced to confeſs, that France never had a more fortunate king than he. There is not a frontier but he has far advanced into his enemies country. France has ſubdued the pride of thoſe who envied her, and confounded their deſigns. And if you obſerve what has paſſed on the ocean, as well as the Mediterranean, you will conclude, that all the elements fought for us, under the command of this prince. Now the inſtances of his good fortune were no leſs conſpicuous in his domeſtic affairs; and here doubtleſs he had great advantages above Auguſtus on that account. God gave him for a companion of his bed, a princeſs, whoſe ſingular goodneſs, together with many other extraordinary and truly heroical virtues, might have made her beloved, though ſhe had not been in other reſpects one of the moſt perfect and moſt agreeable perſons of her time. He ſaw himſelf the father of two ſons, moſt worthy of his affection; as being ſo beautiful and well formed by nature, that he could not wiſh them more accompliſhed; beſides the ſeaſon in which he had them, ought to have rendered them ſtill more dear to him. He was reſpected by all the world; and on what ſide ſoever he turned himſelf in his Louvre, he ſaw nothing but teſtimonies of love and reverence. Could any thing then be wanting to his felicity, to make it more entire, if we judge by appearances? And yet with all this, what ſhould we ſay, if by his own confeſſion, he never ſpent one day without ſome mortification, nor ever taſted in his life a joy that 'was not daſhed with the bitterneſs of diſcontent? I 'ſhall here take care, not to commit the fault of him, 'whom the Athenians treated ſo ill for having obliged 'them to deplore a ſecond time the misfortunes of 'their allies, by repreſenting them on the ſtage. And 'indeed, my imprudence would be greater than his, 'if I ſhould at preſent enlarge on ſo ungrateful a ſubject, as would be that of the ſorrows, and continual 'inquietudes of this monarch. But however, ſince 'his laſt words at the point of death, which the Civilians call ſacred, and which are reckoned oracles in 'mouths leſs ſincere than his, have aſſured us, that 'his ſatisfactions were never pure, nor his pleaſures 'exempt from ſadneſs and affliction, may we not 'well conclude, that all his happineſs, as well as that 'of Auguſtus, had nothing real in it, and was only of 'the nature of thoſe things, which ſubſiſt no where 'but in opinion?' I make no reflexions on this long paſſage, though it were eaſy perhaps to find in it ſome ſubject of criticiſm; I ſhall content myſelf with obſerving, that we here ſee the moſt convincing proof imaginable of my text. Lewis XIII confeſſes he was unhappy; no body could know this ſo well as himſelf, and he had no reaſon to diſſemble, in the condition he was in. See in the remark [E], my citation from Mr le Laboureur.

La Mothe le Vayer ſays one thing, which obliges me to give a ſhort ſupplement. 'Auguſtus, ſays he '(9), had the mortification to leave for his heir to the 'greateſt part of his eſtate, and ſucceſſor to the empire, the ſon of his mortal enemy' This is falſe (10); but it is very true, that Lewis XIII, left the regency of his kingdom to a perſon he heartily hated, and conſequently his mortification was greater than that of Auguſtus. It is eaſily gueſſed why this author did not carry on the parallel between the misfortunes of the Roman emperor, and thoſe of the king of France on this head. The following remark will acquaint us with the little affection Lewis XIII had for his wife, whom yet he declared regent.

[C] He could not confide either in his mother, his wife, or his brother.] Here is matter enough for dividing this remark into three parts.

I. Lewis XIII, for the good of his kingdom, that is, to deprive factious ſpirits, of the means of forming dangerous cabals, was forced to give order for his mother to depart France; nor did he come to theſe extremities, till after he had gone thro' a long courſe of diſturbances, in which the royal authority was very ill uſed. It was neceſſary more than once to ſubdue, by force of arms, the partiſans of Mary de Medicis.

II. As to his wife, I refer you to the memoirs of the duke de la Rochefoucaud. 'I have been aſſured 'by Mr Chavigny himſelf, ſays this duke (11), that 'waiting upon the king, from the queen, to beg pardon for whatever ſhe had done; and even for what 'had diſpleaſed him in her conduct, beſeeching him 'particularly not to believe, that ſhe had any hand in 'the affair of Chalais, or had ever liſtened to any propoſitions of marrying Monſieur, after Chalais ſhould 'have made away with the king; his majeſty anſwered 'Monſieur de Chavigny, without any emotion, in the 'condition I am in, I muſt pardon her, but I muſt not 'believe her.' Note, that the king was at the point of death when he ſpake theſe words. It is a time, in which men generally ſpeak what they think, eſpecially in matters where a lie is of no uſe to them. We muſt conclude then, he died fully perſuaded, that his wife was an accomplice in a moſt horrid conſpiracy, in which it was reſolved to take him off, and to marry her to the duke of Orleans his ſucceſſor. Now as the affair of Chalais happened in the year 1626, judge whether this prince lived a few years in diſtruſts, with reſpect to this queen, and in the anguiſh of a melancholy reſentment. Nor ought it any longer to be thought ſtrange, that ſhe continued barren for ſo many years. Could the moſt incontinent husbands reſolve to approach their wives, if they believed them guilty of ſo black a treaſon? It would require a great deal of time for a prince to digeſt this thought: his confeſſor muſt return again and again to the charge (12), even though a long courſe of years ſhould have allayed the wound. Whether Lewis XIII was in the right or no, it was the ſame thing. His heart equally ſuffered. The duke de la Rochefoucaud ſays (13), that the king, when he gave this anſwer to Mr de Chavigny, believed, that the queen was ſtill in a correſpondence with the Spaniards, by means of Madam de Chevreuſe, who was then at Bruſſels. He obſerves alſo, that they were obliged to play an hundred engines, in order to procure the regency for the queen. 'She believed the king very far from ſuch a thought, 'conſidering the little inclination he had ever ſhewn 'for her (14). . . . . She and Monſieur, who had had 'but too many proofs of the king's averſion, and who 'almoſt equally ſuſpected, that he deſigned to exclude 'them from the management of affairs, ſought all 'poſſible ways to obtain it (15).' She never would have obtained the regency, if the king muſt have left her in full authority; but in hopes of leaving her only the ſhadow of it, he paſſed the declaration (16). 'He could not conſent to declare her regent, 'nor could he reſolve to divide the authority betwixt 'her and his brother. The correſpondence of which 'he ſuſpected her, and the pardon he had lately granted Monſieur for the treaty of Spain, held him under 'an irreſolution, which perhaps he could not have overcome, if the conditions in the declaration which 'cardinal Mazarine and Monſieur de Chavigny propoſed, had not furniſhed him with the expedient, he 'ſought to leſſen the power of the queen, and to make 'her in ſome meaſure dependant upon the council he 'deſigned to eſtabliſh (17).'

III. As to his brother, all the world knows his falls and relapſes; he was engaged in all ſorts of conſpiracies, whole provinces made inſurrections in his favour; he correſponded with Spain. In a word, ſince the king believed him an accomplice in the affair of Chalais, he could not chuſe but look upon him with an evil eye: this object brought to his remembrance, that a deſign had once been formed to take away his life, and marry his widow to the duke of Orleans, who was to have ſucceeded him. I do not know whether jealouſy, mixed with all the other diſcontents of Lewis XIII, but it is poſitively ſaid, that the queen was highly civil to the duke of Orleans Let us hear what ſome memoirs, publiſhed in 1685, inform the world (18). 'Monſieur made his court daily to the 'queens, who reſided at Paris during the ſiege of 'Rochel, carrying himſelf with a great deal of freedom, even to the reigning queen with whom he had 'always been in a good underſtanding, and never obſerved much ceremony. When ſhe came into France, 'ſhe called him, Monſieur, both ſpeaking to him, and 'of him, and always continued that ſtile, with which 'ſome found fault, for in writing to him, ſhe only 'called him her brother. During the ſhort journey 'that the king made to Paris, Monſieur having met 'the queen one time as ſhe was coming from a nine 'days devotion to obtain children, told her, by way 'of raillery, Madam, you have been ſolliciting your 'judges againſt me, I conſent you ſhould carry your cauſe, 'if the king has intereſt enough.' As he is repreſented in theſe memoirs, he had ſome need of the advice that was given the duke of Valois (19). The ſame book acquaints us, that the king was at leaſt as much diſpleaſed at his brother's having children, as at the barrenneſs of the queen. Here what alarms were given him upon the marriage of the duke of Orleans with the heireſs of Montpenſier. 'Tronſon, 'ſecretary of the cabinet, and ſome other particular 'ſervants of the king, who only conſidered the intereſt of his royal perſon, and not that of the ſtate, 'having repreſented to the king of what dangerous 'conſequence it was to him to marry Monſieur his 'brother to a rich heireſs, allied as ſhe was to the 'houſe of Guiſe, which had heretofore aſpired to the 'crown, and with ſo large a revenue as was ſettled 'upon him; by which means, his majeſty, having no 'iſſue, would only be conſidered as a languiſhing 'king, and the court, which is wholly conducted by her huſband's inclination for the intereſts of Spain. Lewis XIII, having not a head ſtrong enough to reign by himſelf, and ſuffering himſelf to be always led by favourites, furniſhed but too many pretences to reſtleſs ſpirits; and if in the neceſſity he found himſelf of depending on his miniſters, he had not at laſt fallen into the hands of the Great Cardinal Richelieu, he had run the riſk at leaſt of his crown [D]; but this able miniſter being obliged by his own intereſt to ſupport the authority of his maſter, applied himſelf with ſo much vigilance to diſſipate the conſpiracies, that he ſoon made them all vaniſh into ſmoke. Some great men were beheaded; but this ſeverity was abſolutely neceſſary at that time [E]. Clemency, ſo uſeful on many other occaſions, had been very

'intereſt, would abandon him, to go over to Monſieur, as a vigorous prince, who quickly promiſed iſſue, upon which every one would ſound his hopes, and form deſigns, which muſt needs be to the prejudice of his royal perſon. His majeſty was hereby ſo affected with jealouſy, that father Souffran, his confeſſor, coming to wait on him one morning in his cloſet, his majeſty juſt riſing out of his bed, threw himſelf on his neck all in tears, telling him, that he knew, to his coſt, that the queen his mother would remember all her life, what paſſed at the death of mareſchal d'Ancre, and that the advantages ſhe procured to Monſieur, permitted him not to doubt, but that ſhe loved him much more than himſelf. The Father being much ſurprized at this diſcourſe, endeavoured gently to remove this diffidence in the king's mind, and aſſured him to the contrary, &c. (20).' He was pacified, and the marriage was concluded (21); from which quickly proceeded a daughter: all this vexed the king, and it was a happineſs to him, that his ſiſter-in law died a little after her lying-in: however, he appeared to be much afflicted by it. See the margin (22). He was afterward very far from conſenting to a ſecond marriage of his brother (23).

[D] If he had not fell into the hands of . . . . . . Richelieu, he had run the risk at leaſt of his crown.] They who beſet the two queens and monſieur, had no expectations under the miniſtry of cardinal de Richelieu, but hoped for every thing, if his royal highneſs ſhould aſcend the throne. There were two ways of placing the crown upon his head; one by making away with the king, and the other by treating him like Don Alphonſo, king of Portugal. The ſecond could not eaſily be executed, in a nation ſo jealous of it's fundamental laws (24), and under ſo vigilant and able a miniſter as cardinal de Richelieu. Therefore the other expedient was agreed on, if it be true, that Chalais had the deſign above-mentioned (25), in the paſſage of the duke de la Rochefoucaud. It was impoſſible to convince a great many people, but there was a moſt horrible myſtery of iniquity in agitation, to give at once the crown and the queen to the duke of Orleans. I know not what to think of it. See the Life of cardinal Richelieu, printed at Amſterdam, in 1694. Tom. I. pag. 304.

[E] He was forced to behead ſome great men; but this ſeverity was . . . . . neceſſary at that time.] Of all thoſe that were beheaded for rebellion in the reign of Lewis XIII, none was ſo much lamented as the duke of Montmorenci (26). And truly he was a lord of great merit, adored in Languedoc, his government, and admired by all France, as appeared by the zeal with which they ſollicited his pardon. But this was the very thing, which, in good politics, ought to induce the king, not to pardon his treaſon. It was dangerous to let a perſon live who was ſo generally admired, and who might ſo eaſily draw all Languedoc into a ſecond rebellion. Had he done it at the time that the Spaniards beſieged Leucate (27), what would have become of France? do not tell me that gratitude would have fixed him to this prince's ſervice, or the weakneſs he had diſcovered in the duke of Orleans have cured his fondneſs of revolting in favour of him. Theſe are poor reaſons. The duke of Montmorenci, received into favour, would never have been able to bear the power of the cardinal, and would have taken his meaſures a ſecond time to deſtroy him. He would have taken advantage of the teſtimonies, the grandees and provinces had given him of their extraordinary eſteem, during his impriſonment, &c. There was a neceſſity of uſing great ſeverities, under a reign in which the French nobility were ſo familiarized to this ſort of conſpiracies, inſurrections, and correſpondencies with Spain, that one would think that the idea of infamy, or even of a fault, did not enter into this ſort of crimes. It would be in effect turning a monarchical government into anarchy, to let ſuch abuſes go unpuniſhed. Mr le Laboureur relates a thing which is very curious; to wit, that the king conſented to the duke of Montmorenci's death, only from a ſpirit of ſervitude. I will give the whole paſſage; becauſe it ſerves to ſhew, that Lewis XIII, with a ſceptre in his hand, and the crown on his head, was under greater conſtraints, and more unhappy, than if he had had irons on his feet. 'This reflexion ought eternally to renew the tears of France, upon the fate of Henry duke of Montmorenci, and Damville, admiral and mareſchal of France, only ſon to this conſtable, who fell rather by misfortune than inclination, into a ſmall fault, and who was overwhelmed with all the rigour of the laws; though it had no ill conſequences, and there was no danger of any ill effect from it: I ſay farther, though the king was to loſe by it the ornament and glory of his court, the honour of his nobility, and delight of his kingdom, and what ſtill ought to be more dear to a great prince, the moſt auguſt and worthy ſubject of clemency that will ever be ſeen. I have it from the mouth of the late prince of Condé, that Lewis XIII, expreſſed to him his ſorrow on his death-bed, not with tears, but with ſobs, and conjured him to believe, that violence had been done him in that unhappy journey to Toulouſe, which he made againſt his will, and where againſt his reſolution, he was overpowered by a multitude of pretences, or rather deluſions of ſtate, which diſappeared after that fatal tragedy, and left him under a moſt ſtinging uneaſineſs, which he had ever ſince concealed in his boſom. Ah! my couſin, ſaid he to him afterwards, this is not to reign, but rather to be the ſlave of tyranny, at leaſt to feel all the pains of it in a lawful royalty, to hear only finiſter reports, and to be always in diſtruſt of thoſe who are neareſt to us, of our principal officers, and of thoſe on whom we place our affections; and to ſubmit and regulate our conduct, by the phantoms of politics, which are frequently only another's private intereſt (28).'

There are, I queſtion not, many truths in this diſcourſe. I am perſuaded that cardinal Richelieu, more than once, repreſented to the king, his maſter, the deſigns of his rebellious ſubjects, greatly heightened and exaggerated; for in the numerous conſpiracies that were formed in this reign, there were many that deſigned only the ruin of the cardinal, and meant no harm either to the perſon or authority of the prince; and yet his eminence had the policy to inſinuate (29), and even to perſuade him, that they were contriving to take the crown from him, and give it to the duke of Orleans. Hence it was that this prince was brought to conſent to the taking off ſo many heads. He afterwards found he had been impoſed upon, and ſecretly lamented it. He was to be pitied; but it is very probable, that he was ſenſible he could not deliver himſelf from one ſlavery, without ſubmitting to another yoak, ſtill more incommodious; and this was the reaſon that hindered his diſplacing the cardinal, though he really hated him. The removing of this miniſter would have delivered the king bound hand and foot, into the power of the duke of Orleans. They might perhaps have left him the title of king; they might have governed in his name; but all affairs would have been managed according to the caprice of this duke's favourites. It would have been a ſtrange government. The two queens and their creatures, the duke of Orleans and his, would have perplexed and confounded every thing, and no great deſign could have been formed for the glory of the monarchy, and againſt the interests very pernicious in this. We muſt not believe thoſe who dare affirm, that people were put to death, whoſe only fault conſiſted in their having had the misfortune to diſpleaſe the prime miniſter [F]. They would perhaps ſpeak more reaſonably, and the charge would reſts of Spain; and if any glorious events had happened, the king would have ſeen the duke, his brother, carry away all the honour of them; a cruel ſubject of jealouſy, and a thouſand times harder to bear, than the aſcendant of the cardinal. We are not ignorant how often jealouſy of authority, made Lewis XIII uneaſy. He fell ſick, when he was told, that the Engliſh had landed in the iſle of Rhe; and could not go in perſon to the coaſt of Poictou. He was adviſed to ſend Monſieur thither as his lieutenant-general (30). Monſieur's firſt enterprize having not ſucceeded well, the king wrote to him 'a letter full of reſentment, for having ſo lightly expoſed the troops, without any occaſion, and againſt the expreſs orders of his majeſty, which were only to keep things at a ſtand, and to hazard nothing till his arrival. Perhaps, if Monſieur had ſucceeded in his firſt enterprize, he would have given greater diſcontent; and it is believed that that fear made the king anticipate the time of his perfect recovery, that he might appear in his camp as ſoon as poſſible (31). Here follows a ſtill greater effect of the ſame jealouſy. 'The king having declared the duke of Orleans general of the army in Italy †, at the ſollicitation of the queen, his mother, afterwards repented his having given him this command, from an apprehenſion, that his brother might reap a great deal of glory in Italy, which would eclipſe his own. This thought ran in his head to ſuch a degree, that it even broke his ſleep. Coming to Chaliot ‡, where the cardinal was, he told him he could not ſuffer his brother to be generaliſſimo of the army in Italy, and that a way ſhould be found to remove him from that poſt. The cardinal anſwered, that he knew but one way of getting this command out of the duke of Orlean's hand, which was, that the king ſhould go himſelf into Italy; but if he took that reſolution, it was neceſſary to depart in eight days at fartheſt. The king ſaid he would do it, and immediately prepared for his expedition (32).' A man muſt know but little of princes, to deny that the jealouſy they conceive againſt their ſons or brothers, and in general againſt their ſucceſſors, is not a more afflictive evil, than the chagrin of depending too much on the firſt miniſter. See in Brantome (33), the furious jealouſy of Charles IX, againſt his brother the duke of Anjou, general of the troops, that beat the Proteſtants at Jarnac, and at Montcontour. There is no doubt but it was a leſs evil for Lewis XIII to be governed by cardinal Richelieu, than it would have been to ſee his brother, his mother, or his wife, in too great credit at court. The creatures of theſe three perſons were only capable of forming little court intrigues, which would have ruined the general affairs. So that the good of the kingdom required, that ſeverity ſhould be uſed againſt the heads of the rebels, who would put the government into hands which were too much in the intereſt of the Spaniards (34).

[F] We muſt not believe thoſe who dare affirm, that people were put to death, whoſe only fault conſiſted in their misfortune to diſpleaſe the prime miniſter.] The author of the memoirs of Mr d'Artagnan affirms, that the mareſchal de Marillac, and ſeveral others, were judged and condemned by commiſſioners, though no other crime could be imputed to them, but their having preſumed to diſpleaſe the cardinal (35). He afterwards relates, what we have ſeen above (36), concerning the prieſt Grandier, and then adds, St Preuil's caſe exactly reſembled that of this unfortunate prieſt; a thouſand and a thouſand witneſſes were produced againſt him, both from the government of Dourlens, which he had enjoyed before that of Arras, and from ſeveral other places. Le Meunier was often confronted with him, but though all his crime, as well as Grandier's, conſiſted only in diſpleaſing the higher powers, he nevertheleſs loſt his head (37). Obſerve here three great falſhoods: for if we examine, without prejudice, all the parts of mareſchal de Marillac's trial, we ſhall eaſily ſee, that he was guilty of infinite extortions and depredations, and within the ordinance, which condemns thoſe guilty of peculation, to the confiſcation of body and goods (38). It is true, that interpreting this law in the moſt mild and favourable ſenſe, by the confiſcation of body, might be underſtood the loſs of liberty, and not of life, but from the judges not taking it in the milder ſenſe, but following the moſt ſevere interpretation, it does not follow, that the mareſchal was innocent, and that all his crime conſiſted in having rendered himſelf diſagreeable to cardinal Richelieu. Many irregularities are alledged in his trial (39), and all to prove that the commiſſioners were bribed, and that the innocence of the accuſed was oppreſſed; but we muſt know alſo, that other authors affirm the trial was agreeable to the exacteſt forms of law (40). Conſider well Mr du Chaſtelet's obſervations upon the life and condemnation of marſhal de Marillac; it is an anſwer to a libel which the cardinal's enemies had publiſhed. We ſhould be too raſh, either to believe without examination what they maintained, or the narratives of his friends in favour of him; the ſatires on one ſide are as much to be ſuſpected. as the flatteries on the other. Let us miſtruſt both, and determine nothing till after a thorough diſcuſſion of the facts; let us alſo diſtruſt that natural biaſs we all have to preſume in favour of thoſe, who incur the diſgrace of a too potent miniſter. 'It is a fault too common in thoſe who are not called to the helm, to endeavour to croſs the ſteerage; and as if the confidence of the prince, and the favour of the people could not be united in the ſame ſubjects, we ſee not a man in place, or who has the leaſt ſhare in the conduct of affairs, whoſe perſon and actions are approved till after his death or diſgrace. The various accidents of the marſhal de Marillac's life, and the different affections towards him according to his fortune, furniſh our age with a certain proof of this antient maxim. All France found fault with the choice the king made of him, ſpoke publickly of his depredations, blamed his promotion to honours, ſaid he wanted courage, and could obſerve no merit nor quality in him worthy ſo high an advancement. As ſoon as his majeſty was reſolved to puniſh him, and for weighty reaſons withdrew his protection, his former accuſers ſupported him againſt juſtice, affirmed he was innocent, worthy of his employments, and ſo well ſtored with valour and piety, that he deſerved every thing except his fall (41).' Thus Mr du Chaſtelet ſpeaks, at the beginning of a book I have cited above. It is ſaid that cardinal Richelieu underſtanding that the commiſſioners had paſſed the ſentence of death upon him cried out: 'It muſt be owned that God grants an underſtanding heart to judges, which he does not give to other men, ſince they who have tried the marſhal de Marillac, have diſcovered actions in him worthy of death; I did not believe there was enough againſt him to whip a page for (42).' If I had heard the cardinal ſay this, I ſhould believe he ſpoke it. Many people believe that he very well knew that in a conference, wherein it was debated what courſe ſhould be taken with the cardinal, this marſhal had given his vote for killing him; it is even ſaid, that he offered his hand for ſuch an exploit (43). Such a man as this would have been actually puniſhable, and would have appeared ſo eſpecially to the cardinal.

As to what concerns St Preuil, the memoirs I have cited are much more unreaſonable: he was a gentleman of Angoumois, who had raiſed himſelf by an extraordinary bravery; as nice on the point of honour, and the reputation of a good duelliſt and bold cavalier, as he was little conſcientious in point of debauchery and extortion. It is confeſſed in Mr d'Artagnan's memoirs, that he had run away with a married woman. Who after this will venture to ſay, that his crime only conſiſted in having diſpleaſed the higher powers? Is not a rape puniſhable with death by the laws of the kingdom? Are not they who ſteal a woman, though with her own conſent, reputed, in France, worthy of death? St Preuil, with much more reaſon, had incurred the ſame puniſhment, having carried off a woman whoſe huſband was ſtill alive. I paſs over his extortions and violences, of which he was convicted, and which were ſo much the more odious as he commanded in a place but lately reduced under the French power, and which was to be reconciled to their new dominion, by a moderate adminiſtration. would be ſevere enough, ſhould they ſay, there were ſome beheaded, whoſe crimes had all gone unpuniſhed, if they would have adhered to his intereſt. They who ſpake equitably, were content to complain in behalf of ſome of theſe unhappy perſons, that the court had ſubjected them to the moſt ſevere interpretations of the law, and had not pardoned them. They who liſtened only to their paſſion, extended their complaints and revenge even to the judges themſelves, which could not be juſt with regard to him, who preſided in the trial of the duke of Montmorenci [G]. Notwithſtanding the domeſtic conſpiracies the cardinal had to ſtruggle with, he omitted not applying himſelf uſefully to foreign affairs. He procured the king, his maſter, the glory of humbling the houſe of Auſtria, which was the terror of all Europe. To induce him to make war with Spain, he removed the ſcruples of conſcience which had reſtrained him before [H]; for as Lewis XIII hated the Proteſtants, he could not eaſily bring himſelf to diſturb the houſe of Auſtria, which was then ſtruggling with them. The cardinal turned him

The truth of this maxim of the emperor Marcus Aurelius, was never more manifeſt than in the reign of Lewis XIII. In cauſis majeſtatis hæc natura eſt, ut videantur vim pati etiam quibus probatur. It is uſual on all trials for crimes againſt the ſtate, that even they who are duly convicted, are thought to have been oppreſſed (44).. Moſt people are ſo indolent as not to give themſelves the trouble of examining who is in the right, or who is wrong, however they will be judging of things, and in order to do it the cheapeſt way, they take up with probability, and think it very likely that they who have the greateſt power are the unjuſt ſide. Dion Chryſoſtome has made this obſervation; Οὐ γὰρ ἃ ποιοῦσιν ἔνιοι σκοποῦσιν, ἀλλὰ τίνες· ὄντες οὐδὲ τοὺς ἀδικοῦντας, ἢ βιαζομένους ἐθέλουσιν ἐξετάζειν πολλάκις, ἀλλ᾽ οὓς εἰκὸς βιάζεσθαι τῷ δύνασθαι πλέον. Quidam enim non conſiderant quæ faciant, ſed qui ſint; neque injuriam facientes, neque violentiam paſſos volunt examinare plerumque, ſed quibus veriſimile ſit injuriam fieri ab iis qui plus valent (45). A compaſſion for the miſerable, and the envy men bear to men in power, are a ſource of deception. Τοῖς μὲν γὰρ δυστυχήσασιν ἔλεος, τοῖς δὲ κρατήσασι φθόνος παρακολουθεῖ· καὶ τὸ μὲν ἡττηθὲν, τοῖς τοιούτοις ἀδικεῖσθαι, τὸ δὲ νικῆσαν, ἀδικεῖν δοκεῖ. Quippe infelices miſericordia, potentes invidia ſequitur: ac victus accepiſſe, victor attuliſſe injuriam videtur (46). But that which gives occaſion to this, is the too frequent experience that they who are in authority, are apt to abuſe it, to revenge themſelves on their enemies by oppreſſing them with falſe accuſations.

[G] . . . this could not be juſt with regard to him, who preſided in the trial of the duke of Montmorenci.] It was Mr de Chateauneuf keeper of the ſeals. He was in diſgrace, when Lewis XIII died, and great endeavours were uſed to recal him after the prince's death; but cardinal Mazarin oppoſed it to the utmoſt, 'in which he was wonderfully aſſiſted by Madam the princeſs, who upon an additional pride occaſioned by the victory of Rocroy, thought every thing due to her, and preremptorily publiſhed that all their family would retire from court, if the queen reſtored a man to the council, who had preſided at the condemnation of the duke of Montmorenci her brother (47).' Could any thing be more unjuſt than this princeſs's pretenſion? Did Mr de Chateauneuf deſerve to be expoſed to the leaſt reſentment of the duke of Montmorenci's ſiſter and relations? Could he poſſibly avoid preſiding at this trial? Did not his place require him to accept of this commiſſion from the king? And could he be of a different opinion from that of all the judges, who, notwithſtanding the vehement deſire they had to ſave the duke of Montmorenci's life, gave all their votes for the ſentence of death. The prince of Condé, his brother-in-law, and the princeſs of Condé, his ſiſter, had they been his judges, could not have given their opinion otherwiſe than Mr de Chateauneuf did. Nothing is more evident, than that a governour of a province, who rebels againſt his king, and gives battle to the king's troops, and is taken priſoner in ſuch a battle, deſerves death. It was evidently true, that Mr de Montmorenci's caſe was this: the proofs were as clear as the day, beſides his own confeſſion. There remained therefore no ſhadow of uncertainty, either upon the queſtion of right, or that of fact, and therefore there could be no difference in opinion; the princeſs therefore had no reaſon to complain of Mr de Chateauneuf, and yet ſhe expreſſed her reſentment openly, as if it had been a reaſonable thing; ſo true it is, that the great ſuffer themſelves to be blinded by their haughty paſſions, ſo far as to glory in that which is really a vice, and a lamentable weakneſs.

[H] The cardinal Richelieu removed from the king thoſe ſcruples of conſcience which had reſtrained him before from attacking Spain.] Mr Silhon informs us of this: 'How juſt ſoever, ſays he (48), was the ground of this rupture (49), they had heſitated upon it, but for the violent inſtances of the Dutch, and the zealous offices of ſome friends they had near the king and cardinal Richelieu, the king was averſe to it upon religious ſcruples, which were removed by an aſſembly of doctors, ſummoned upon this occaſion.' This prince's diſpoſitions in his alliances with Proteſtants will be better known, if we conſult the Muſæum Italicum of two famous Benedictines. 'They had the ſight of a letter of the late king Lewis XIII, in cardinal Francis Barberini's library. Pope Urban VIII, had complained to his majeſty of his alliance with the Swedes, whoſe victorious arms at that time ravaged Germany. The king ſecretly anſwered the Pope with his own hand, and offered to break off his alliance with the Swedes, provided the Catholic king would ceaſe to protect the duke of Orleans, who was then retired to Bruſſels, and would join his forces with thoſe of France, to turn them againſt the Proteſtants of Germany and the French Huguenots. His holineſs communicated the king's letter to the Spaniſh embaſſador, who wrote about it to Madrid, and received no anſwer. Had it not been for this original letter the public would have been unacquainted with this curious piece of our hiſtory (50).' This paſſage is taken from Mr Couſin's journal. Add to this what we find in one of Mr Gallois's journals, which will inform us, that if Lewis XIII had followed his own inclination, he would have ſuffered the Proteſtant religion to be deſtroyed by the emperor in Germany, ſince before the miniſtry of cardinal Richelieu, he did great ſervices to the Catholic cauſe in the empire. Here follow the words of Mr Gallois in the abſtract he gives of the embaſſy of the duke of Angouleſme, the count of Bethune and Chateauneuf, ſent by Lewis XIII into Germany, in 1620. 'The motive of this embaſſy was as glorious to France, as the ſucceſs of it was advantageous to the houſe of Auſtria. Ferdinand II ſucceeding to the empire, ſaw himſelf diſpoſſeſſed of the crown of Bohemia by the prince Palatine, and of that of Hungary by Bethlen Gabor. He ſaw at the ſame time the upper Auſtria revolted, and moſt of the Proteſtant princes in arms againſt him. The king might have peaceably waited the ruin of a prince, whoſe deſigns could not but be ſuſpected to him; but becauſe the Catholic religion might have ſuffered ſome diminution in Germany by the loſs of this prince, he choſe rather to ſupport him in his fall, than to ſuffer religion to fall along with him. He offered him a powerful aſſiſtance, and at the ſame time to ſuccour him with his counſels, and the authority of his name; he ſent the duke of Angouleſme, and Meſſieurs de Bethune and Chateauneuf, embaſſadors into Germany. Upon their arrival they made the treaty of Ulm, by which a ceſſation of arms was concluded betwixt the Catholics and the Proteſtants; which was the cauſe of gaining the battle of Prague, and afterwards of the re-eſtabliſhment of the emperor's affairs (51).' Do not imagine that this language is an artifice of the journaliſt; for the Proteſtants acknowledge (52): that this embaſſy was very ſerviceable to the emperor, and prejudicial to the princes, who were confederated againſt the houſe of Auſtria.

him from theſe views of religion, and engaged him in a league with Holland. This was concluded in the year 1635, and at the ſame time war was declared againſt Spain. People will not allow that the preſſing ſollicitations of the United Provinces, was that which overcame the repugnancy of the French to this league. On the contrary, it is pretended, that it was the French who expreſſed the greateſt earneſtneſs for it [I]: Some ſay that the cardinal drove on this affair too faſt (b), and ground themſelves on the perplexity he was in the very ſecond campaign; but they do not conſider, that the ſublimeſt human underſtanding could never have foreſeen, that the firſt campaign would have gone as it did: it began with a compleat victory over the Spaniſh army, and according to all appearance muſt have diſabled them for ſeveral years: and yet in the iſſue was the pitifuleſt campaign that ever was [K]. The French have long ſince imputed the

[I] It is pretended it was the French expreſſed the greateſt earneſtneſs for it.] Mr Huber, who has been ſome time dead (53), profeſſor of Law in the univerſity of Frieſland, pretends (54) that the court of France, fully reſolved upon the war, politickly concealed that deſign as long as the duke of Orleans was at Bruſſels. She made herſelf be courted by Holland, and this game laſted above a year; but after the return of the duke, and the defeat of the Swedes at Nortlingen, cardinal Richelieu expreſſed an earneſt deſire to enter into a league with Holland. ‘Neque tamen aliter ſe commiſere, quam ubi præter Suecos, etiam Belgas fœderatos ſtabili & fidenti fœdere ſibi conjunxiſſent, à quo multi in Hollandia imprimis, adhuc erant alieni. Mirum eſt, quanto ſtudio & fervore Richelius extremo tempore, cum prius ſe rogari paſſus eſſet, in hoc fœdere fabricando verſatus ſit, quod tandem confectum die 8. Februar. MDCXXXV (55).’ If you believe the French, the cardinal was not drawn out of his irreſolution but by the meer force of the engines the Hollanders played. We have already heard Mr Silhon (56) upon this; the following paſſage will tell us much more of it. ‘That which drew us out of that ſtate of uncertainty, and turned the ſcale againſt ſeveral conſiderations which were of weight in the king's and cardinal's mind, was the truce the Hollanders gave clearly to underſtand they would make, unleſs we reſolved on a war. The conſequences of this truce (if it had been made) were doubtleſs to be feared by us and our allies, but not ſo much as was then apprehended at court, and as father Joſeph and Charnaſſé, who laboured mightily at this wheel, endeavoured to repreſent it . . . . . The preſents which were not ſpared on the part of the States, during this purſuit, and afterwards, removed all the obſtacles that ſtood in the way. Beſides this, as the fear of the inconveniencies, with which the truce threatened us, had been the moſt powerful motive to make us hearken to the war, the hopes of the fruits we might reap by it, was no ſmall charm to draw us in. Almoſt one half of what Spain poſſeſſes in the Netherlands, was to have accrued to us by the articles of the treaty, and the diviſion between the Hollanders and us, was drawn up ſo nicely, that each had what lay moſt convenient for him in this imaginary ſpoil. With theſe engines they worked juſt as they pleaſed, and the zeal we manifeſted to follow all their motions was ſo great, that whereas they would have given us money to oblige us to break, if we had kept up the market, they obtained a great ſum from us, and would not receive it except in fifteen penny pieces and by weight, that they might more advantageouſly convert it into their own country coins. The beſt of all was our conſenting that the prince of Orange ſhould have the whole management of the war, and that our generals ſhould be only his ſubalterns, and receive their commands from him (57).’

[K] It was the pitifuleſt campaign that ever was.] Let us hear an hiſtorian who is neither a Frenchman nor a Hollander, nor Spaniard: ‘As the French, ſays he (58), marched towards Maeſtricht with above thirty thouſand men, and forty pieces of canon, prince Thomas with ſome troops which were not very ſtrong, attempted to diſpute their paſſage at Aveſneſs (59), where he was beaten, and loſt a great many men. Afterwards the victors advancing without oppoſition, joined the prince of Orange, who expected them with twenty thouſand foot, ſix thouſand horſe, and eighty pieces of canon. This army appeared terrible, both for it's numbers and valour, and the world was already in expectation of ſucceſſes anſwerable to the greatneſs of it's forces.’ But what were it's exploits? It forced a little pitiful town (60), where horrid barbarities were committed (61). ‘It pretended to march to Bruſſels; but the prince of Orange having retarded the march, gave the Spaniards time to come up with their army to it (62). It beſieged Louvain with the following ſucceſs (63): ‘The boldneſs of the aſſailants having been at firſt a little checked, the French army began to diſperſe; for the Hollanders ordering proviſions to be punctually brought from the neighbouring places for their own troops, did not leave enough for the French, who tho' by their bravery and ſtrength they might have ſurmounted all other perils, yet experienced that hunger was an invincible enemy. A great part died for want of bread, a greater part deſerted, who were afterwards killed by the peaſants; ſo that their forces being extreamly weakened, and proviſions failing, the generals agreed upon the neceſſity of raiſing the ſiege, and permitting of all to eſcape the beſt they could. The commanders and the remnant of the French army were reduced to come and take ſhipping in Holland, where the people laughed at them, ſeeing no more remain of a great army, which expected important conqueſts, than a handful of diſpirited people all in confuſion, and forced to take ſanctuary among their allies . . . (64). The French army was no ſooner diſperſed, but the terror, which before ſeized the provinces depending on Spain, ſeized the Hollanders in their turn, and pierced them to the heart. The count of Embden ſurprized the fort of Schenk . . . . which opens a paſſage into the heart of Holland. The prince of Orange, without loſing time, went to lay ſiege to it.’ Mr Nani commits a groſs fault here, he ſuppoſes, on one hand, that the Spaniards did not take the fort of Schenk till after the diſperſion of the French troops; and on the other that the French had no ſhare in the re-taking of this fort. Theſe are all falſhoods (65); Silhon ſpeaks of them in a quite different manner: ‘But farther, ſays he (66), having firſt related the inſincerity of which he accuſes the Hollanders, as if fortune had meant to put an opportunity into our hands of revenging our ſelves generouſly on the Hollanders, and returning good, for the ill which they had done us; ſhe permitted the Spaniards to ſurprize the fort of Schenk in the Betau, that is to give them entrance into the very bowels of Holland, ... (67). In theſe hard and melancholy circumſtances France was not wanting to them; and without remembering the treatment our army had met with from them, ſent orders to marſhal de Breze, who was the only commander left, not to ſeparate from the prince of Orange till the reduction of the fort of Schenk, which was done ſeveral months after it's attack.’

But here follow more myſterious reflexions. I have read in a book printed in 1664 (68), that the French complained that the Hollanders had ſuffered the fort of Schenk to be taken, in order to have a pretence of ſeparating the armies, whoſe conjunction gave them umbrage. Here follows the words of this book (69): ‘If you will believe the French they will give another account of it; for they ſay that this loſs was ſuffered by the conſent of the ſtates who being jealous to ſee the forces of ſo potent a king come too near their frontiers, let this fort be loſt on purpoſe, that they might have a pretence of ſeparating from the French army, to re-take the key of their country; and in maintenance of their poſition they alledge two reaſons, the firſt is, that no conſiderable garriſon was left in it, and that two men of war had retired the very day it was taken. The ſecond, that they deſignedly ſtarved their army; ſo that of forty thouſand men, there returned not above five thouſand into France; which words are not to be taken for an article of faith.’

fault to the prince of Orange [L], generaliſſimo of the army, and have alſo ſaid, that cardinal Richelieu, with all his great genius, was deceived by the Hollanders [M]. The famous cavalier Nani has given too far into theſe French notions, as a Frieſland Civilian has ſhewn [N]. Lewis XIII died the fourteenth of May 1643, after a tedious

[L] . . . . the French have imputed the whole blame to the prince of Orange.] I do not cite the authors that have written ſince the year 1672; neither de Pontis (70) who repreſents this prince extremely vexed at the victory of Avein; nor abbot Bizot (71), who accuſes Holland of having acted a treacherous part at the ſiege of Louvain, and on ſome other occaſions. I ſhall cite a book printed in 1651, which ſpeaks after this manner (72): ‘ The Hollanders did not wait long to make us feel the effects of this jealouſy. The gaining the battle of Avein which attended the firſt motion of our arms, contrary to the expectation of all the world, no leſs alarmed them, than the Spaniards, who loſt it; and for fear this advantage ſhould draw others after it, as is uſual, and that our generals, marſhal Chaſtillon and marſhal Brezé, ſhould puſh the victory farther, the prince of Orange ſent them orders to come and join him. However, if Chaſtillon, who acted honeſtly in the things he was concerned in, had been hearkened to, they had gone and beſieged Namur, and there made a good eſtabliſhment, notwithſtanding the orders of the prince of Orange. But Brezé, who was in the confidence of the cabinet, and in the ſecret of affairs, oppoſed him, and made his colleague reſolve to obey their generalliſſimo according to the intention of the court. This was the firſt ſeed of diviſion, which afterwards ſo ripened between theſe two generals, that they came at laſt to draw their ſwords one againſt the other. . . . . (73). The prince of Orange marched our army ſo long about, without any other action except the ſiege of Tirlemont, and left it ſo deſtitute of ſubſiſtence, tho' he was obliged to furniſh it (74), that it mouldred away of itſelf; or rather we may ſay, that for want of ſuccouring it the Hollanders deſtroyed it without fighting, and had the ſpoils of it, which was very great and rich, almoſt for nothing. Beſides this, the conduct of the prince of Orange, and the tedious round-about marches of his army and ours, without any meaning or deſign gave the Spaniards leiſure to recover from the conſternation the battle of Avein had caſt them into, and to call a potent aſſiſtance from Germany, which put us almoſt upon the defenſive.’

Let us copy here a paſſage from a work I have often cited: ‘ much about the ſame time came the news of the defeat of Prince Thomas at Aveins, which cauſed a great conſternation in all the country; the French army afterwards advancing to the very gates of Bruſſels, never was ſuch a terror known among theſe people. The cardinal infant had already cauſed the moſt precious furniture of the palace to be removed to Antwerp, and ordered all his army to line the canal, being reſolved to abandon Bruſſels himſelf, if hunger and Picolomini, who arrived with the German ſuccours, had not forced our army to retire. It was alſo ſaid, that the prince of Orange was not overjoyed to ſee them ſo far advanced into the country. The queen-mother and Madam, were already fled to Antwerp, where their officers were forced to conceal themſelves a good while, to avoid the fury of the people, who deteſted the French nation ſince the ſacking of Tirlemont (75).’ What might not a general have done, who had known how to make uſe of this ſtrange conſternation, which had ſeized the court of Bruſſels? A Roman conſul in the like caſe would have given a good account of a whole province, before the end of the year.

[M] Cardinal Richelieu . . . . was deceived by the Hollanders.] They ‘ were to attack the Spaniſh provinces with fifty thouſand foot, and ten thouſand horſe . . . . they had divided the conqueſts after this manner: Luxemburgh, Namur, Hainault, Artoiſe, and Cambreſis were to be the portion of France, with a part of Flanders on this ſide the line that was to be drawn from Blachembergt, betwixt Bruges and Dam, including in it Ruremond. The reſt was to fall to the States of Holland, which promiſed to leave the Catholic religion, in poſſeſſion of the places where it was eſtabliſhed. It was agreed alſo to make neither peace nor truce, but with joint conſent, and to enter into no accommodation nor treaty, till the Spaniards were intirely driven out of the Low-Countries. They were to beſiege the places alternately, firſt one of thoſe that was deſigned for France, and then one of thoſe aſſigned to Holland; and to leave the generals of the army the choice of attacking, which they thought fit. They were beſides this to maintain jointly a naval force at ſea. France was to declare war with the emperor, or any other prince, who upon this occaſion ſhould attempt to diſturb the States of the United Provinces (76).’ This occaſions a dilemma; either cardinal Richelieu was perſuaded that the Hollanders would obſerve this treaty, or he was not. If he was perſuaded of it, where was his underſtanding? Does not the leaſt common ſenſe dictate, that it was incomparably more the intereſt of Holland, that Spain ſhould preſerve a part of the Low-Countries, than that they ſhould be intirely divided betwixt France and the United Provinces? If cardinal Richelieu did not think that Holland was ſimple enough to conſent, that Spain ſhould loſe all this country, he was very ſimple himſelf to make a treaty, which he knew Holland would never execute, and which the public good, the ſovereign law of ſtates, could never permit them to execute. I confeſs, that it is hard to draw the cardinal out of this labyrinth, and not to ſee, that he committed a groſs blunder, unleſs we ſay, that the poor condition the Swedes were reduced to, and the barbarous affront France had received, by the detention of the archbiſhop of Treves, would not ſuffer this crown to leave Spain at reſt, but ingaged it in a league with Holland upon conditions, which it knew would never be intirely executed. The preſent evil required, that France ſhould be ſatisfied with the execution of one part, and let time work out the reſt. Here follows Mr Silhon's reflexions (77).

‘ The Hollanders by this means (78) compaſſed two points, which were very much to their advantage; one was the embarking us in the ſame war they were engaged in, which it was in all appearance impoſſible for them ever to get out of but by a peace, which would make them be acknowledged for ſovereigns, by thoſe who looked on them as ſubjects; which was what was propoſed in their treaty with us. The other, that though the diviſion agreed on, if it came to be accompliſhed, muſt be an eternal principle of jealouſy; and they muſt believe, that the having us for their neighbours, inſtead of the Spaniards, was only changing their fears, and perhaps making their condition worſe; yet they thought it more eligible to expoſe themſelves to a certain evil, againſt which there were many remedies, to obtain a preſent and very important good, namely, that of making us partners in their fortune; that is to ſay, of giving themſelves by this alliance, a more firm and ſolid baſis than they had before. It is true, they would have allowed us to make our ſelves maſters of the maritime towns, which were ſo fatal to their commerce in the hands of the Spaniards, or even of ſome other places which were frontiers to ours. But for us to eſtabliſh ourſelves in the heart of Flanders, and in the places which were near them, was that which made them uneaſy, and which they hoped the courſe of the war would hinder of itſelf, or that they themſelves ſhould find means to divert it, either by ceaſing to act againſt the Spaniards, and employing, as they always did, a great part of their forces; or taking an opportunity of reconciling themſelves to them, under any plauſible pretence, which the ſtate of affairs might offer.’

[N] A Frieſland Civilian has ſhewn it to the cavalier Nani.] This cavalier imagined, that prince Frederic Henry ſuffered the French army to periſh, to revenge himſelf of an injury he had received from cardinal Richelieu; and that he ſought an occaſion of dious ſickneſs, and ſo weary of his condition, that he ceaſed not to repeat theſe words of holy Job, Tædet animam meam vitæ meæ (c). He had been a lover of war, and perſonally aſſiſted in ſeveral fine expeditions. He bore the ſirname of Juſt; a title, which, according to the maxim of the antients, includes all moral virtues (d). He never loved reading, after they had diſguſted him by making him read a book which he diſliked [O]. We may ſay, generally ſpeaking, that he had not been well inſtructed in learning, and that he never loved it [P]. And yet, upon ſeveral occaſions, he diſcovered making it appear to all Europe, that himſelf was the greater genius of the two. There is no doubt, ſays he (79), but that as the United Provinces had agreed to all the articles which obliged the French to an open rupture with Spain, they feared nothing ſo much, after the obtaining their deſires, as having them for their neighbours, under the pretence of friendſhip. To the general intereſt of Holland, were added the particular reſentments of the prince of Orange, againſt Richelieu; for the latter, though he outwardly profeſſed a friendſhip for the prince, and an intimacy with him; had endeavoured, but a few years before, by ſome ſecret practice, to make himſelf maſter of Orange, a town whereof the eldeſt ſons of the houſe of Naſſau bear the name, and which is ſituate towards Dauphiné; but as this deſign did not ſucceed, the cardinal concealed the thing as much as poſſible, and prevented it's being talked of. Frederic Henry on his part diſſembled this injury with as great artifice as had been uſed to ſuppreſs it, and waited a favourable occaſion to revenge himſelf. At laſt this prince found the means to make the people ſay of him, that if by the taking of ſeveral places of importance, he had obtained the reputation of great courage and military experience, he could not be denied in the world, the praiſe of a great and conſummate politician, ſince he outwitted Richelieu: however, Richelieu ſeeing a neceſſity for the alliance of the Hollanders, and the friendſhip of this prince in the war he had undertaken, deſpiſed leſſer revenges to apply himſelf to the greater. Let us ſee Mr Huber's anſwer.

I. He ſays, that if the French wanted proviſions, it was their own fault; why did not they provide magazines? The treaty did not import, that Holland was to furniſh them with the neceſſary proviſions (80); that if the ſuttlers choſe to ſell their goods to the Hollanders rather than to the French, it was becauſe the latter wanted money, and obſerved no diſcipline (81). II. That it was in the Hollanders power to remove the king of France's territories from their frontiers, by making peace with Spain, and that the hatred they had for the Spaniſh nation, did not give them time to reflect upon the evil of being next neighbours to France (82), and that after all cavalier Nani judges of their manners by the myſterious artifices of Italy. Non eſt dubium quin Nanius Belgarum ingenia moreſque ſecundum Italos eorumque profundas artes æſtimet (83). III. That the prince of Orange being generaliſſimo of the two armies, and having earneſtly endeavoured to bring this league to a concluſion, there is no probability, that to revenge himſelf of ſome practices of the cardinal, he would deprive himſelf of the glory of a proſperous campaign, nor expoſe the republic to the reſentment of ſo neceſſary and formidable an ally. IV. Laſtly, that the alliance having ſubſiſted for twelve years, the French never complained of this pretended perfidy. Arauſionenſis ſummo ſtudio belli ſocietatem procuraverat. Imperium in ipſum Gallorum exercitum ſuo conjunctum acceperat, ut omnis gloria in ipſum redundaret: hoc unice in eam gratiam, ut propter evanidas in Arcem Arauſionenſem inſidias à Richelio propoſitas, Regem potentiſſimum deformi proditione lethaliter offenderet? Remque publicam tunc ejus amicitiæ indignam daret præcipitem, & Societatem tanta Principis ipſius cura ſtudioque contractam incontinenti abrumperet? Quid enim aliud ab immani proditione perfidiaque poterat expectari? Cum tamen eadem Societas per duodecim annos continuata ſit, nec quicquam ejuſmodi tunc temporis vel unquam poſtea Galli de fœderatis Belgis, etiam cum irati eſſent, conqueſti fuerint (84),

I do not think we can oppoſe to theſe reaſons of Mr Huber, what Mr du Maurier relates concerning the uneaſineſs which prince Frederic Henry gave to cardinal Richelieu, in order to be revenged for the enterprize he had formed upon the principality of Orange. This author ſays (85), that the prince concealed his reſentment in his heart, and waited for a favourable opportunity to expreſs it, which happened to preſent not long after; for . . . . (86) the army of France having totally routed the Spaniſh forces at Avein, joined the prince of Orange, after having pillaged a part of Brabant; but the prince, who always had at heart the affair of Orange, and who liked the neighbourhood of the French, no better than that of the Spaniards, by a ſcarcity of proviſions and ſubſiſtance, ruined our victorious army, which, retiring into Holland, after the raiſing the ſiege of Louvain, under the pretence of the approach of Picolomini with the German army, periſhed there for the moſt part, of hunger, poverty, and diſeaſes, the ſixth part not returning into the kingdom. The prince of Orange looked upon cardinal Richelieu as a reconciled enemy, who courted him only becauſe he had a neceſſary occaſion for him; and therefore, underhand, gave him all the diſcontents imaginable, favourably receiving all thoſe who were diſgraced in France, and honouring them with the nobleſt employs, and even with his intimacy; among others, Mr Hauterive, and Mr Beringhen, whom he reſpected as much to vex the cardinal, as for any merit of theirs; and cardinal Richelieu, as potent as he was, ſaw himſelf obliged to ſwallow theſe pills, his affairs neceſſarily requiring a diverſion on the part of Holland . . . . . . (87) Thus he continued to court the friendſhip of the prince of Orange, and it was agreed, that each ſhould forthwith attack the common enemy on his ſide. From that time he kept up a faithful and perfect correſpondence with the prince; and the prince, who was ſufficiently revenged, and drew great advantages from the alliance with France, afterwards executed the treaties ſincerely. It is manifeſt, that this is only a copy of the cavalier Nani's ſlanders; and beſides, as du Maurier's memoirs were wrote after the year 1672, they were not fit to be alledged as an authority. However, we may by this fact ſee to what great misfortunes a king is expoſed, when he is ſerved by a prime miniſter, who is perſonally hated in the country of his allies. Lewis XIII would have had the fatal experience of it; they would have ſacrificed his armies, to the paſſion of being revenged on his cardinal. This ſacrifice would have been a very ingenious way of revenge; for nothing is more likely to ruin a prime miniſter, than the bad ſucceſs of a war. But let us not believe all this ſyſtem of the Venetian Hiſtorian, and Mr du Maurier.

[O] They gave him an averſion to reading, by making him read a book he diſliked.] Lewis XIII, not being conducted according to his inclinations, nor by the way his genius led him to, was ſo tired with the uſeful, but diſagreeable, reading of Fauchet's Antiquities, that it gave him a general and inveterate averſion for all ſorts of books, which could not be cured to his life's end. The author from whom I borrow theſe words (88), cites Gomberville, in the Doctrine of Manners, and places this fact under the twenty fourth of March. I know not why he choſe that day. See the Menagiana, where you will find what follows (89): Mr de Gomberville, of the French academy, was ſon to the Buvetier, (or maſter of the victualling-office) of the chamber of accompts. He has written in his book concerning the Doctrine of Manners, that what diſcouraged Lewis XIII from ſtudy, was their giving him Fauchet's Hiſtory of France to read. The bad language of this author gave him a diſguſt, though otherwiſe there were ſome good things in him.

[P] He had not been well inſtructed in learning, and he never loved it.] Mr le Vaſſor, who has publiſhed the firſt volume of the Hiſtory Lewis XIII, obſerves, with wonder, that he has found but few things concerning this king's education (90). He ſays, that the governor (91) whom Henry IV appointed him, had not qualities equal to that important employ, and that the picture an author (92) has lately given us, of the extravagant and romantic amours of the wholly Epicurean vered a great delicacy of wit [Q]. I ſhall tranſcribe the character given him in the Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantes [R]. The ſame reaſon which, in ſeveral other articles, hinders my relating a ſeries of actions, according to the order of time, has hindered my doing ſo here; which is, that I would not repeat what is to be found in Moreri. I am ſurprized, that he ſhould forget the ſolemn act, by which Lewis XIII put his perſon and kingdom under the protection of the holy Virgin (e). Mr Godeau exerciſed his muſe on this ſubject, with little judgment. A learned critic attacked him upon it with great force [S]. I forgot curean life and death of Vauquelin des Yvetaux, firſt preceptor to Lewis XIII, is a certain proof, that Henry IV, who had made choice of him, was not a good judge of men of merit (93). He adds, that a year after the death of Henry IV Vauquelin loſt this employment, through the jealouſy of ſome people, and that Nicolas le Fevre ſucceeded him, a man diſtinguiſhed for his learning and piety, and died a year after, and that Fleurance Rivaut, an able Mathematician, ſay they, aſcended from the poſt of ſub-preceptor, to that of preceptor in chief. A young man, continues he, who paſſes through ſo many different hands, ſeldom makes any great proficiency.

It is certain, that Nicolas Vauquelin, Sieur des Yvetaux, had wit and learning. He was ſon to Mr de la Freſnaïe, preſident to the Bailliwic, and preſidial ſeat of Caen, in the year 1605, of whom a great collection of verſes had been printed at Caen (94). Nicolas le Fevre was of Paris, a man of great merit, and of an exact, profound, and extenſive knowledge, great probity, and incomparable modeſty. Moreri's article of him is good. See alſo the elogies, which Caſaubon hath given him (95). He was choſen by Henry IV to inſtruct the prince of Condé (96), but not to be preceptor to the Dauphin, as le Grain affirms (97). He was raiſed to this preferment, under the regency of Mary de Medicis (98). He died the third of November, 1612, aged ſixty eight years and ſome months. But let us ſuppoſe, as much as you pleaſe, that both he and des Yvetaux were men of great merit, and that the quality of a good preceptor, a quality more rare than that of preceptor is common, was united in them to that of being learned: we could not thence conclude, that Lewis XIII had been well educated; for they were but a very ſmall time directors of his ſtudies. We ſhould know how they acquitted their charge, who came after le Fevre. We cannot be over-prejudiced in their favour, when we conſider, that they perſiſted in making him read Fauchet's works, which diſguſted him. This was not the way to form his taſte, but diſcourage him. It is ſaid however, that he grew very nice upon the point of eloquence, and that the haranguers of that time infinitely diſpleaſed him, though his own encomiums were the ſubject matter. Here is my witneſs (99): Always to praiſe, always to admire, and to this purpoſe to make uſe of periods a mile long, and exclamations that reach the ſkies, vexes even thoſe whom we praiſe and admire. The victorious complain of it in the midſt of their triumphs. And I know from good hands, that the late king beholding himſelf one day in a glaſs, and wondering at the great number of his grey heirs, charged them upon the complimenters of his kingdom, and their long periods. He ſaid to the perſon from whom I have it, theſe remarkable words, I fancy, it is the harangues that have been made me ſince my coming to the crown, and particularly thoſe of Monſieur le * that have made me grey ſo ſoon.

[Q] On many occaſions he diſcovered great fineneſs of parts.] If what Balzac has been telling us, does not ſeem a good commentary upon this text, what will you ſay after reading theſe words of the chevalier de Meré? How comes it then that this court is ſo different from what it was heretofore? Henry the Great, who judged well of every thing, though he had hardly ſtudied any thing but military affairs, and the late king, in my opinion, have not a little contributed to it. This prince, whom we have ſeen, had a delicate wit, and ſaid excellent things. Can any thing be more agreeable than this ſaying: put on your hat, Brion; my brother gives you leave. And ſo many others which I could cite. As he loved good raillery, he very much diſliked that which was bad; and the C. D. R. had like to have been diſgraced, for having written to M. D. E. in a kind of raillery, though all the guilt of it conſiſted in it's being dull (100). A great many readers will better underſtand the meaning of, Put on your hat, Brion, &c. if I tell the ſtory a little at large, as Mr Bourſault has related it. 'The late duke of Orleans, Gaſton of 'France, was ſo jealous of the rights belonging to 'his quality, that upon this head, he never excuſed any body. To have the pleaſure of ſeeing the 'princes of the blood uncovered before him whenever 'he found an opportunity of ſpeaking to them, he 'kept them as long as poſſibly he could, and never 'uncovered himſelf one ſingle moment, for fear of 'forgetting his own quality. Lewis XIII going one 'day from Paris to St Germain, in the exceſſive heat, 'in company of the duke of Orleans, the lords, who 'were bare-headed at the ſides of the coach, were 'hardly able to bear the violence of the ſun. The 'king perceiving how they ſuffered, had the good 'nature to ſay to them; Cover yourſelves, gentlemen, 'cover yourſelves, my brother gives you leave (101).'

[R] I ſhall tranſcribe the character that is given him in the Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantes.] 'He was 'jealous of his power even to exceſs, though he 'could neither underſtand nor enjoy it. He could 'never, in the whole courſe of his life, either exerciſe it himſelf, or ſuffer it in the hands of another. 'It was equally impoſſible for him not to raiſe his 'favourites to an exceeding power, and to bear with 'them in the grandeur, to which he himſelf had 'raiſed them. By enriching them, he made them diſagreeable to him. The exceſs of his complaiſance to 'them, was the firſt degree of his hatred; and I do 'not know, whether we can find in his hiſtory, the 'example of a favourite, whoſe death or fall he lamented. But he always concealed his ſentiments; 'and becauſe he communicated them to few people, 'they who will have the conduct of princes to be always 'myſterious, accuſe him of a black and profound diſſimulation. To ſay the real truth, the reaſon of his 'ſilence was, that he neither truſted himſelf, nor any 'body elſe; and was very timerous and weak. Almoſt all that have ſpoken of him, acknowledge he 'had courage; that in danger he loſt not his judgment; that he loved and underſtood war; that he 'was maſter of much fine knowledge; but that he 'had not the art of reigning (102).' This picture ſeems pretty well drawn to the life.

[S] A learned critic attacked Mr Godeau with great force.] The king's declaration concerning this act of devotion to the holy Virgin, is dated the tenth of February, 1638. You will find it entire in the French Mercury (103); I will only take this part of it: 'FOR THESE CAUSES we have declared, 'and do declare, that taking the moſt holy and glorious Virgin, for the ſpecial protectreſs of our kingdom, we particularly conſecrate to her our perſon, 'our ſtate, our crown, and our ſubjects, beſeeching 'her to inſpire us with a holy conduct, and to defend this kingdom ſo carefully againſt the efforts 'of all it's enemies, that whether it ſuffers the ſcourge 'of war, or enjoys the calms of peace, which we beg 'of God with all our heart, it may never depart 'out of the ways of grace, which lead to thoſe of 'glory. And that poſterity may never fail to purſue our deſires upon this ſubject, for the immortal 'remembrance, and in teſtimony of the preſent conſecration, which we make, we will cauſe the great 'altar of the cathedral church of Paris to be built 'anew, with an image of the Virgin embracing her 'precious ſon in her arms, deſcended from the croſs; 'we will be repreſented at the feet of the ſon and of 'the mother, offering them our crown and ſcepter. 'We admoniſh the archbiſhop of Paris, and enjoin 'him, that he annually, on the day and feaſt of the 'Aſſumption, make a commemoration of our preſent 'declaration, in the high maſs, which ſhall be ſaid in 'his cathedral church, and after the veſpers of the 'ſame day, that a proceſſion be made in the ſaid 'church, at which all the ſovereign companies ſhall 'aſſiſt, and the body of the city, with equal ceremony, 'as is obſerved at the moſt ſolemn general proceſ'ſions.

I forgot to ſay, that the royal authority was more powerfully exerted under the reign of Lewis XIII, than it had ever been in France [T]; and I do not believe the parliament of Paris

‘ ſions. Which we will alſo have done in all churches, both parochial and monaſterial of the ſaid city and ſuburbs; and in all towns, boroughs, and villages, of the ſaid dioceſe of Paris. We in like manner exhort all archbiſhops and biſhops of our kingdom, and at the ſame time enjoin them, to cauſe the ſame ſolemnity to be celebrated in the epiſcopal churches, and other churches of their dioceſes.’

Mr Godeau made a hymn upon this occaſion, in which the king, ſpeaking to the Holy Virgin, ſets off the extraordinary merit of cardinal Richelieu, and acknowledges him not only as his colleague, but as a colleague who watched in order to let his aſſociate ſleep. The Jeſuit (104) who cenſured Mr Godeau, exceeded the bounds of modeſty and moderation; but at the bottom he had reaſon for cenſuring this conduct. I will give you his cenſure ſomewhat at large, and do not fear being blamed for it, as I may poſſibly be for ſeveral other citations out of books, which are very common; for this Jeſuit's book is ſcarce known, and hardly to be met with. We will therefore boldly cite a large piece of it, which will inform us, that Lewis XIII did not love to have his firſt miniſter praiſed at his own coſt. He was ſenſible of his dependance, but he did not care that any body ſhould know it, and it is even certain, that the cardinal dextrouſly managed his maſter's delicacy, both in his words, and his external conduct. So that Mr Godeau made uſe of flatteries, which were neither agreeable to decorum, nor to prudence (105). ‘ Cùm Ludovicum XIII offerentem ſe ac regnum Mariæ Virgini, induceret, huic de iſto ſermonem affinxit, qui totus abhorreat à regis ſenſu & conſuetudine, Cardinalis prudentia, ac voluntate, rei natura. Quid attinuit à rege, ſanctis ac religioſis ſuis ad Dei matrem precibus, cujuſquam mortalis laudes admiſceri? quid neceſſe fuit, minutè atque enucleatè exaggerari? quid convenit tam multis in tam exiguo carmine? . . . . . . ‘ What ſay'ſt thou, traitor? Hold the helm with the king, to poſſeſs equal power and authority with his prince? For this is not to act as a viceroy, but to be a king as well as his maſter. If you had ſaid this of the king's only ſon, the next and indubitable heir of the crown, in the life-time of his father, you had certainly treſpaſſed upon majeſty; but when you ſay this of another, of a ſubject, a ſervant of the crown, one who cannot entertain a thought of this ſort without guilt, do you either think yourſelf innocent, or that you ſhall eſcape without reproof? Are you ignorant that Lewis ſtill retains his authority? That he is extreamly nice in theſe things, and will not bear the leaſt encroachment on his power, that the cardinal, well verſed in ſuch things, fears nothing more than that ſuch wicked and inconſiderate ſpeeches, ſhould either come to the king's ear, or be diffuſed among the people, ſo that it is to be wondered, if either of them thought your poem worth reading, you did not grievouſly offend both, eſpecially when you have no excuſe left, and cannot palliate your imprudence, by pretending that this dropped from you unawares, or that your verſe required it, and that you were under a neceſſity of writing in that manner, ſince it was ſo eaſy, ſo natural to obſerve the rancour and miſchief of theſe words, and to have taken the roughneſs away, or to have ſoftened them in this manner: While ſo wiſe a miniſter under me holds the helm. . . . . What follows is ridiculous enough, the cardinal alone is made a match for hell, and all the powers of darkneſs. I fear not what hell or the devil can do againſt me. And again, what is not only arrogant, but impious. Thro' him every thing is to me poſſible. So then if the cardinal had been preſent the king had not died. It was fit to omit a paſſage, in which open flattery is the leaſt thing which deſerves reprehenſion, and wherein it is ſaid, that he would have been a king if he had not been an aſſiſtant and coadjutor to the king. And you yourſelf had been a king, &c. Neither can I avoid being angry with you, Godeau, becauſe in ſuch a torrent of praiſes as you have beſtowed upon the royal ſervant, you at the ſame time depreſs the king, and repreſent him to us a drowſy indolent prince, nay make him confeſs this of himſelf:

[T] The royal authority was more powerfully exerted . . . . than it had ever been in France.] A remarkable thing! The royal power was more ſtrongly eſtabliſhed

Paris ever ſuffered a more ſhameful mortification, than what it was forced to ſubmit to in 1631 [U]. It is true, this illuſtrious body ſeemed a little to have forgot it's duty, and had the miſfortune to ſuffer it ſelf to be carried away by the artifices of ſome factious ſpirits. I ſhall examine perhaps in another place (f), the Horoſcope, that is found in Sulli's Memoirs.

It is very probable that Lewis XIII was not ſorry for the death of cardinal Richelieu; for he was a man he feared but loved not; and whom he would have been gladly rid of, if powerful reaſons had not prevailed. He imagined, amongſt other things, that his troops being eſtabliſhed under a prince who neither enjoyed authority nor abſolute liberty himſelf, than it had been under monarchs leaſt depending on their miniſters, and the beſt ſkilled in the art of Governing. It is properly under Lewis XIII, and not in the reign of Lewis XI, that the kings of France had their manumiſſion. This muſt be aſcribed to cardinal Richelieu; it is he that began the work of arbitrary power, and carried it on pretty near to perfection; but not ſo near, as was then complained of; the ſucceeding time has ſhewn, that ſeveral things were wanting to this work, which have been ſince added, or are adding at preſent. The people and magiſtrates were ſenſible of this innovation, and murmured at it (107); it was the ſubject of a thouſand diſcourſes. Coſtar argued once againſt a politician, who maintained, ‘that no princes were more dangerous, than ſuch as a Latin Poet (108) calls nimium reges, ſovereigns that are too much ſovereigns; and kings that are too much kings.’ They who would ſee Mr Coſtar's reaſons, need only read the laſt letter of his Dialogues: ‘Under weak reigns, ſays he (109), foreign and domeſtic wars are inevitable. If a king is not abſolute at home, it is impoſſible he ſhould be feared abroad, and the contempt which his enemies will have of his forces will neceſſarily excite their ambition and their avarice . . . Provided the cardinal be ſuffered to act, provided God deſigns not only to have ſhown him to mankind, but to ſuffer us to enjoy for many years the great preſent he has made us by giving him to the world; all theſe little taſſel-hawks of kings, which in ſome ſort divided the kingdom (110), will ſee their tyranny at an end; and if they are any farther conſiderable, it will not be for the power of doing ill, but only for the merit of their perſons, and the uſefulneſs of their ſervices. . . . . The people for a long time have been compared to the ſea (111), which is naturally calm and ſmooth, unleſs diſturbed by the violence of the winds; but our wiſe pilot has found out a way of binding them, ſhutting them up, and maſtering them: ſo that in the condition he has placed us, if any trouble or ſedition could poſſibly riſe, for want of heads to conduct and ſupport it, the remedies would be as eaſy as the cauſes would be light; for this multitude we ſpeak of is a monſter, whoſe heart as well as brains is in it's head. And Tacitus has ſaid of the populace, that without a guide, it trembles, is frighted, and ſtunned: Vulgus ſine rectore, pavidum, ſocors.’ Thus he apologizes for the ſentences of baniſhment and death, to which recourſe was forced to be had to diſperſe the factions. ‘In the inteſtine diſeaſes, adds he (112), with which France laboured, there was a neceſſity to repeat bleeding to ſave it's life.’

[U] I do not believe that the parliament of Paris ever ſuffered a more ſhameful mortification than in 1631.] The king being adviſed of the preparations for war, which were made in favour of the duke of Orleans, almoſt throughout the kingdom (113), and that Burgundy was to be the principal ſeat of the rebellion, he flew thither to quaſh it. This diligence obliged the duke to retire (114) into the Spaniſh territories with his abettors. Theſe were declared guilty of treaſon. The declaration having been recorded in the parliament of Burgundy (115), was ſent to the parliament of Paris, where the opinions were ſo divided, that there was a decree of diviſion, inſtead of a decree of verification (116). ‘Whereupon the king being returned to Paris, was obliged, that he might not let ſuch an irregularity paſs without due correction, to ſend for the parliament to the Louvre, with orders to come thither on foot, as culpable, and in a condition of receiving the reprimand they deſerved, in order to give them to underſtand that it was not their province to deliberate about affairs of ſtate; that he did not ſend them the declarations he made upon this ſubject for any other end but only to publiſh them, regiſter them, and cauſe them to be obſerved by the people, and that the declaration in queſtion ought to have been publiſhed with ſo much the leſs difficulty, as there is a great difference betwixt a commiſſion which is delivered for the trial of any perſon; and a declaration which is publiſhed by his majeſty, to let his ſubjects know who they are he complains of, the reaſons he has for ſo doing, and for which they are guilty of high treaſon; conſidering moreover that in a declaration of this kind, his majeſty allows them a certain time, during which they may obtain the favour of his clemency, if they have recourſe to it, and even after that all the formalities neceſſary in criminal cauſes are obſerved, before condemnation. This was done in the Louvre, the king ſitting in his council, and the parliament in a body, kneeling in his preſence; and after the keeper of the ſeals had given them to underſtand from his majeſty, that they had no authority to judge of the declarations of ſtate that were ſent to them, he tore with his own hands the decree of diviſion which had been entered in the regiſters, and commanded to ſubſtitute in it's place that of his council, by which he annulled it, with prohibition to deliberate for the future upon ſuch like declarations: and finally to expiate the fault of this body upon ſome particulars; the preſidents Gayan and Barillon, and the Sieur Leſne, counſellor, were commanded by the king's order to remove for ſome time from Paris, and were ſuſpended from the exerciſe of their employments, for having ſpoken of his actions, and the conduct of the ſtate with too little reſpect (117).’

In foreign countries a great many people, imagine that the excluding the parliaments of France from a ſhare in the ſovereignty is a new thing; there are many Frenchmen under a like miſtake. It will not be amiſs therefore to ſhew here by certain and indiſputable facts, that the parliament of Paris has for a long time had the bounds of it's juriſdiction declared, and that upon the foot of an antient cuſtom. The parliament being in the Louvre, in 1631, in the poſture above-mentioned (118), the keeper of the ſeals, de Chaſteauneuf highly blamed the proceedings of the parliament of Paris, and proved to them, by many reaſons, AND BY DIVERSE EXAMPLES, that the parliament neither can nor ought to take cognizance of any but private affairs, and differences betwixt man and man, and not meddle with the affairs of ſtate, of which the ſovereign reſerves the ſole cognizance to himſelf. That even in the buſineſs of trials of princes, dukes, and other officers of the crown, for their male-adminiſtration in the direction of the finances, and the management of the ſtate, to the end that the parliaments may take cognizance of them, it is neceſſary the king ſhould ſend them an expreſs commiſſion, which in that caſe extends their ordinary juriſdiction; or elſe that his majeſty aſſiſt in perſon, and authorize by his preſence the inſtruction of theſe extraordinary proceedings. That moreover, there being a great difference between a commiſſion to make out a trial, and a declaration, only mentioning thoſe the king complains of, it was never doubted, but the parliaments ought to take cognizance of the cauſe, before they judge upon a commiſſion; and that on the contrary, they are obliged, without any delay or deliberation, to record a declaration, which always leaves criminals a certain time, in which they may return to their duty, and thereby ſtop the proceeding any further in their proſecution. The remonſtrance of the keeper being at an end, the king ordered the regiſter of the court to be brought him, and the leaf ſhewn him, wherein was the decree of diviſion, which he himſelf tore out, and inſtead of it, cauſed the decree of the council to be inſerted the ſame day, the twelfth of May; by which moſt expreſs prohibitions were made to the ſaid court of parliament, ever after to deliberate upon ſuch like declarations, being commanded by the creatures of his eminence, he could not diſpoſe of them as he pleaſed [X] if he broke intirely with him. He was often ſollicited either to give orders, or give leave, to kill that cardinal [Y], but could never be brought to it. Nor would he even clarations, concerning affairs of ſtate, it's adminiſtration and government, at the peril of loſing their places, and greater if neceſſary; and for the fault committed in this inſtance by the ſaid court, it was ordered, that the ſaid letters of declaration ſhould be withdrawn from it, with moſt expreſs inhibitions, to take any juriſdiction or cognizance of their contents. No body was ever better acquainted with the laws of the kingdom, than chancellor de l'Hoſpital; and yet obſerve how he makes Charles IX ſpeak (119). Bodin will tell you, that this prince made a decree the twenty fourth of September, 1563, forbidding the parliament of Paris to put it to the queſtion, whether they ſhould or ſhould not record the edicts his majeſty ſent them (120). Francis I. made a like ordinance in the year 1528 (121).

[X] He imagined that his troops being commanded by the creatures of the cardinal, he could not diſpoſe of them as he pleaſed.] Mr d'Artagnan's memoirs inform us that Cinq Mars, the king's favourite, conceived a great averſion for cardinal Richelieu, after he had obſerved that his eminence prevented his marrying a princeſs. He endeavoured to induce the king to diſmiſs this miniſter, and he thought he had obſerved that if his majeſty did it not, it was not ſo much for want of good will, as becauſe he was afraid of him. His majeſty had anſwered, when he ſpoke to him of it, that what he propoſed was very difficult, that he did not conſider that this miniſter was maſter of all the places of his kingdom, and of all his forces both by ſea and land; that they were his relations and friends who commanded them, whom he could cauſe to revolt againſt him, both as often and as long as he pleaſed (122). Let us add here a reflexion: the favourites of princes, or thoſe who have the greateſt ſhare in the government, labour commonly with an incredible diligence to procure to themſelves, or their relations the moſt profitable and honourable employments. One would ſay, that they look upon themſelves as the heirs of mankind: there is no place vacant, but they beg it for themſelves or for ſome of their creatures. Some there are who attribute this only to an inſatiable avarice, and an unbounded ambition; but it is certain, that if in the beginning theſe are the only motives of this conduct, prudence obliges them to continue it after; for the enviers and the enemies of a prime miniſter daily increaſe in proportion to his authority; he has therefore new and hourly occaſions to make himſelf ſupports and ramparts; for which reaſon he inceſſantly turns out of places perſons who are ſuſpected, and advances ſuch as devote themſelves to his fortune. Cardinal Richelieu maintained himſelf this way, and ſo ſtrengthened his power, that it laſted longer than his life. You have ſeen in the paſſage of Mr d'Artagnan's memoirs, that this hindered the king from gratifying his own deſire of ruining him. Obſerve now from theſe words of the duke de la Rocheſoucaud, in what condition affairs were, after the death of his eminence (123): I came to court, which I found as ſubmiſſive to his will (124), after his death, as in his life-time. His relations and creatures had the ſame advantages that he had procured them; and by an effect of his fortune, of which few examples are to be ſeen, the king who had hated him, and wiſhed his deſtruction, was obliged not only to diſſemble his ſentiments, but alſo to authorize the diſpoſal the cardinal had made in his will, of the principal employments, and of the moſt important places of his kingdom. He farther choſe cardinal Mazarine to ſucceed him in the government of affairs, and thus he was aſſured of reigning more abſolutely after his death, than the king his maſter had been able to do for the thirty three years that he wore the crown. But to omit nothing, it muſt be obſerved, that it was for the king's intereſt at that time, that the armies and fortified towns ſhould not be under the direction of the cardinal's enemies. This miniſter's abilities could not have been ſufficient to ſupport him, had it not been for the good ſucceſſes which attended the king's arms; he muſt neceſſarily have fallen if Lewis the thirteenth's wars had been unſucceſsful. It was therefore the intereſt of his enemies, that the Spaniards ſhould triumph, and put the kingdom in continual frights. What had not France to fear, if the French generals had wiſhed the ruin of the cardinal, and if their particular fate had not depended upon that of the miniſter? They who wiſhed his ruin, were wonderfully pleaſed with the ſucceſſes of the Spaniards in 1636. And the count de Soiſſons, a prince of the blood, performed his duty very ill, when it was neceſſary to oppoſe their progreſs; for he would not have been ſorry if they had ſucceeded ſo far as to force the king to ſacrifice the cardinal to the public indignation. We could never have believed, theſe are the words of the king's declaration (125), that after we had pardoned the count de Soiſſons, our couſin, the ill behaviour he had been guilty of towards us, in the year 1636, when we truſted our arms in his hands; that he would have embarked himſelf again, &c. See what has been ſaid above (126), concerning the raiſing the ſiege of Fontarabia.

We have ſeen in the beginning of this remark, that cardinal Richelieu proved Cinqmars, by oppoſing his marriage with a princeſs. Not to engage the reader in the trouble of conſulting another book, we will ſay here that this princeſs was the ſame Mary de Gonzaga, who married the king of Poland ſome time after. She had been courted by the duke of Orleans, his majeſty's only brother; but the queen-mother, to prevent the match, cauſed her to be ſent to the Bois de Vincennes (127). This detention ended a little after by the king's order, who promiſed his brother, in 1631, that he ſhould have leave to marry her (128). The duke of Orleans made no advantage of this conſent; he meditated a rebellion, which was quaſhed in it's birth, and he retired into foreign countries, and engaged himſelf to a ſiſter of the duke of Lorrain. One of the ſix things which gave Cinqmars an implacable averſion to cardinal Richelieu, was, that in ſpeaking of the princeſs Mary de Gonzaga, he added, that his mother had a mind to marry him to her. Your mother, anſwered his eminence, is mad, and if the princeſs Mary has ſuch a thought, ſhe is madder than your mother; when ſhe has been propoſed as a wife for Monſieur, would you have the vanity and preſumption to pretend to her? It is a ridiculous thing (129). Note, that the author of the Galantries of the kings of France, has vented a thing deviliſh ſatirical concerning the amours of Cinqmars.

[Y] He was often ſollicited to give orders or give leave to kill the cardinal.] I have mentioned in the preceding remark, Lewis the thirteenth's anſwer to the propoſition of diſmiſſing the cardinal. This anſwer made his young favourite conclude (130), that when he ſhould have killed the cardinal, the king, inſtead of revenging him, would be the firſt that would be pleaſed at the deliverance. Thus continually fortifying his reſolution of ſacrificing this firſt miniſter, he endeavoured to engage Treville in the execution: '(131) but Treville, who was wiſe and prudent, anſwered him when he ſpoke to him of it, that he had never been concerned in any aſſaſſination, and that it was as much as he could do if his majeſty ſhould declare to him, that the good of the ſtate depended on it. Cinqmars replied, that if nothing was wanting but that, the thing ſhould be quickly done, even before he was two days older, and only deſired his promiſe on that condition. Treville gave him his promiſe without making much reflexion on what he did; in the mean time, whether he only did it becauſe he believed the king would never conſent to ſuch a thing, he who was daily ſhewing how much diſturbed he was for having cauſed the marſhal d'Ancre to be taken off as he had done, or whether he gave too much way to his reſentment, Cinqmars had no ſooner his word for it, but he ſounded the king upon the matter. The king, who was plain and ſincere, acknowledged that he ſhould not be very ſorry to be rid of his eminence, not thinking on what deſign he made that propoſition. He thought that what he ſaid to him was only a thing at random, as when one is asked whether he would be glad or ſorry that this or that ſhould happen. However, Cinqmars taking advantage of this anſwer, went back to Treville . . . and deſired him to ſound the king . . . Treville ſpoke to his majeſty upon this ſubject that very day. He anſwered even after the death of this miniſter, ſuffer his family to loſe any of it's luſtre; and it was believed, he deſigned by this, to perſwade the world that he had not raiſed it out of a ſlaviſh condeſcenſion [Z]. The ſame reaſon ſhould have induced him to leave in priſon, or baniſhment, the perſons which the cardinal had put out of his majeſty's favour; yet perceiving himſelf near his end, he conſented to the liberty or return of moſt of them. It is ſaid ſome œconomical motives mingled in this affair [AA]. The ſhort time that he ſurvived ‘ anſwered nothing but what was agreeable enough to what Cinqmars had endeavoured to perſuade him . . . . . (132) Cinqmars who had the art of deceiving, and putting off a look or a wink for an aſſertion, thought that inſtead of making Treville repeat what he had promiſed, it was enough to make the king declare to him the ſame thing he had ſaid. Treville who had heard the king ſay as much, not once, but an hundred times before, was not ſo thoroughly ſatisfied as he imagined; he deſired that his majeſty would explain himſelf more poſitively upon it; and the thing being ſpun out till his departure, it was reſolved to execute their deſign at Nemours. The one engaged only upon the other's promiſe, which he conſtantly made of the king's declaring himſelf; and the other made him this promiſe only, becauſe he thought to amuſe and inſenſibly oblige him to do the thing, without making much reflexion on it. When the court was come to Melun (133), Treville challenging Cinqmars with his promiſe, he refers him to Fontainebleau, where the king was to ſtay a day. He actually ſpoke of it to his majeſty, and preſſed him to conſent to it; but the king, deteſting the propoſition, anſwered, that he wondered he ſhould offer to ſpeak to him of it; Cinqmars concealed this from Treville, telling him that his majeſty's anſwer was, that hints were ſufficient, without obliging a king to give a poſitive command: That ſo did the marſhal de Vitry, when he took off the marſhal d'Ancre . . . . (134) Treville was not at all ſatisfied with this anſwer; and though all the meaſures were taken for this aſſaſſination, he broke it off, as ſoon as he ſaw the king would not conſent to it.’ After this the author relates, that Cinqmars had a dagger made to kill the cardinal, himſelf: that he hanged it to the hilt of his ſword, as was the faſhion of that time; that the cardinal having notice of the deſign ſtood upon this guard; that chance, however, ordered it ſo that he was twice ſide by ſide with Cinqmars on the road; but whatever reſolution this favourite had taken, he was ſo confounded when he was to ſtrike the blow, that he had not the power to lay his hand to the poinard, which yet was made on purpoſe to take away his life.

I do not pretend that every thing in Mr d'Artagnan's memoirs is to paſs for truth, but it is certain his eminence was perſuaded that Cinqmars had reſolved to execute this aſſaſſination at Lyons. See the letter he wrote to his majeſty the ſeventh of July, 1642 (135). And it is plain from the king's letter, that Cinqmars made no ſcruple to make an attempt upon the life of the cardinal; and that he not only propoſed it to the king, as a thing neceſſary, but alſo offered to execute it himſelf; at which his majeſty was aſtoniſhed, and condemned ſo wicked a thought (136). This furniſhes us with a good argument, to confute a falſe ſtory of Guy Patin; a world of people take it for a certain fact, and make a thouſand ſerious reflexions upon it; the thing ſounds ſo very ſtrange and ſurpriſing. Theſe are his words: I have always in my thoughts the paſſage of the preſident Thuanus's hiſtory, where mention is made of Antony Richelieu, commonly called the monk, which coſt Thuanus's grandſon his life. He had much better not have written a hiſtory at all. Who can tell but in ſome age or other a tyrant may ariſe, who may let looſe his indignation againſt my family, to revenge ſome truth that I had ſpoken of his anceſtors? Thuanus had not loſt his head, if cardinal Richelieu had not ſought an occaſion of revenging himſelf upon the grandſon, for what the grandfather had written (137).’ This he wrote the eighth of November, 1658. He perſevered in this notion, and repeated this obſervation writing to a friend, the thirty firſt of July 1669, only with this difference, that he took the cardinal's victim to be the hiſtorian's ſon, and not his grandſon. He then was better acquainted with the degree of relation. The preſident Thuanus's hiſtory, ſaid he (138) is fine and more than fine; but it ſo diſpleaſed cardinal Richelieu, that it coſt the author's eldeſt ſon his life, who was a very worthy man, and this on account of a paſſage concerning Antony du Pleſſis de Richelieu, in the firſt tome under Francis II, in the year 1560. . . . . This paſſage begins thus. Antonius Richelius vulgo dictus Monachus, &c. The facility with which ſo many people believe Guy Patin's aſſertion in theſe two paſſages, may convince us, that on ſome occaſions it is enough to make a thing be believed if it contains an exceſs of extravagance and crimes: it becomes credible on this very account, that it ſhocks good ſenſe and probability. But omitting that, let us reaſon a little upon it. It is certain, that Cinqmars had undertaken to deſtroy cardinal Richelieu; his eminence was convinced, that he intended to do it even by aſſaſſination. It is certain, that Thuanus was Cinqmars's intimate friend, at leaſt, that he was privy to the deſign of this favourite, as to the point of deſtroying the cardinal (139). Is not this ſearching for mid-day at twelve a clock (if we may uſe this proverbial phraſe), to go ſo far as the expreſſions of Thuanus the hiſtorian, in queſt of the cauſe of Thuanus's death, the confident of Cinqmars. Could the prime miniſter, as vindictive as he was, found his reſentment upon a phraſe of the father, when he knew his mortal enemy, had ſo much intimacy with the ſon. Muſt not the ſpirit of revenge have ariſen from that intimacy? Patin talks like a man who ſhould affirm, that Mævius having been cudgelled by Titius, chaſtiſed him only becauſe Titius's father had not ſaluted a relation of Mævius with reſpect enough (§ α).

[Z] Nor would he ſuffer the family of the cardinal to loſe any of it's luſtre . . . . . to perſuade the world that he had not raiſed it out of a ſlaviſh condeſcenſion.] It was believed, as ſoon as he was dead, that as the king had hardly ever loved him, his family would not long ſhine with that luſtre he had given it. But his majeſty, who foreſaw, that if he did ſuch a thing, it would be ſhowing too openly, as it had been often ſaid in the world, that this miniſter had always kept him as it were in tutelage, from which nothing but his death had freed him, he not only ſupported that cardinal's family, but gave it additional honours. He cauſed the Mareſchal de Brezé's ſon to be received as duke and peer into the parliament (140). We have ſeen above (141), the duke de la Rocheſoucaud's obſervation concerning the power the cardinal's creatures were in, when he returned to court after his eminence's death. Mr de la Chaſtre has ſpoken of it in the ſame ſtrain (142).

[AA] He conſented to the liberty or return of moſt of them . . . . . It is ſaid ſome œconomical motives mingled in this affair.] The king, whoſe diſtemper increaſed every day, being deſirous to give, at the end of his life, ſome marks of his clemency, whether out of devotion, or to ſhew that cardinal Richelieu had had a greater ſhare than he, in all the violences which had been committed ſince the diſgrace of the queen-mother, conſented to the return of the moſt conſiderable of thoſe who had been perſecuted; and he was the more willingly induced to it, as the miniſters, foreſeeing ſome diſorders, endeavoured to oblige perſons of condition, to ſecure themſelves againſt all that might happen in a revolution like that which threatened them. Almoſt all who had been baniſhed, returned (143). The author I have this from, is very conſiderable, being a great lord, who was then upon the place, and who was as much diſtinguiſhed by his parts as by his birth. Another perſon of quality, and much concerned in the intrigues, will help to confirm our text: here follow his words which contain a ſatirical ſtroke upon the king (144): *Some time before, cardinal Mazarin and Monſieur de Chavigni had induced the king to ſet at liberty the mareſchals de Vitry and Baſſompierre, and the count de Cramail. vived the cardinal, was perhaps the moſt uncomfortable of his whole life; for beſides his bodily infirmities, he had a great many troubles of mind. And as it is very probable, he was not ignorant of the queen's intrigues [BB], we may reaſonably believe that his mind

The means they made uſe of on this occaſion, deſerve to be mentioned, being pleaſant enough; for finding that his majeſty had not much inclination to it, they attacked him on his weak ſide, repreſenting, that theſe three priſoners were a great expence to him in the Baſtille; and that not being in a capacity of caballing in the kingdom, they might as well live in their houſes, where they would coſt him nothing. This took; the king being poſſeſſed with ſo extravagant an avarice, that all who had a demand of money upon him, were a burden to him; inſomuch, that after the return of Treville, Beaupuy, and others whom the late cardinal's reſentments on his death-bed had forced him to abandon, he ſought an occaſion of ſnubbing each of them, to deprive them of all hopes of being rewarded for what they had ſuffered for him. The liberty of the priſoners was followed by the recalling the exiles (145). Facts of this kind are ſuch, as many think moſt deſerving the readers curioſity. Wherefore I imagine the putting them in my Dictionary will be approved.

[BB] It is very probable he was not ignorant of the queen's intrigues.] Her conduct, from the death of cardinal Richelieu, to that of the king (146), ſhows that ſhe was very ambitious, and that it was not without reaſon, that the cardinal herein conforming to the ſenſe of his maſter, kept her ſhort; for had ſhe been ſuffered to meddle in public affairs, ſhe would have had her dependants and confederates, the ready way to multiply factions, which were already but too troubleſome. Let us ſhew in general, what ſhe did to obtain the whole regency, notwithſtanding the deſire and intention of the king her husband. The cardinal had remonſtrated to this prince, that conſidering the laſt conſpiracy againſt the ſtate, in which Cinqmars had employed the name and authority of his royal highneſs, to give greater weight and credit to his faction . . . . it would not be proper, in caſe of his majeſty's deceaſe, to ſuffer the duke of Orleans, his brother, to aſſume the regency and government of the kingdom, much leſs the tutelage and education of the ſons of France (147). The king very much approved this advice of the cardinal; and underſtanding on the firſt or ſecond of December, 1642, that the recovery of this firſt miniſter was deſpaired of, he made haſte to act according to this advice; ſo that on Wedneſday the third day of the month, he ſent for the preſidents of the parliament of Paris, and the attorney and ſolicitor general, and told them, ‘that he had cauſed a declaration to be drawn up, (in caſe God ſhould diſpoſe of him) to exclude the duke of Orleans, his brother, from the regency, whom he had already pardoned, even to the ſixth time, and to whom he did not think he ought, after this, to intruſt what was moſt dear to him, his kingdom and his two ſons: that the parliament muſt regiſter, as ſoon as poſſible, this declaration ſo important and neceſſary to the public tranquility (148).’ It was regiſtred the fifth day of the ſame month to be fully and entirely executed (149). The king's health declined every day, and no body judged he could live long: hereupon the court was filled with cabals and intrigues; ſome were very forward in offering their ſervices to the queen, others were contriving to reſtore the duke of Orleans to favour. Father Sirmond, the king's confeſſor ‘was induced to propoſe to him his brother's co-regency with the queen . . . . but this propoſition ſo violently diſpleaſed the king, that after having ſharply rejected it, and ſaid ſomething of it to the queen, he would hear his confeſſor no more, and diſmiſſing him, under another pretence, took father Dinet in his place (150).’ At laſt the king was reconciled both to the queen and the duke of Orleans. He made a declaration, in which ‘he appointed (God calling him to himſelf) the queen, his wife, to be regent, to have the education of their children, with the adminiſtration of the kingdom; and the duke of Orleans, his brother, to be lieutenant-general of the minor king, in all the provinces, under the authority of the queen. He orders that the queen-regent, and the lieutenant-general, ſhall determine nothing, without the advice and ſovereign council of the regency, compoſed of his couſins, the prince of Condé, and the cardinal Mazarin, and the Sieurs, Seguire, chancellor of France, Bouthillier, ſuperintendant of the finances, and de Chavigni, ſecretary of ſtate, all ſtiled miniſters of ſtate; and that the prince and the cardinal be the chiefs in the order as they are named, in the abſence of his royal highneſs. It is his pleaſure alſo, that every thing be deliberated and reſolved in his council, by the plurality of voices; and that by the ſame plurality, proviſion be made both for the moſt important employments, and principal offices of the crown, and alſo for the places of ſuperintendent of the finances, firſt preſident, and attorney-general in the parliament of Paris, and ſecretary of ſtate (151).’ This declaration being read aloud in his majeſty's chamber, in preſence of the princes, and the dukes, and peers, &c. the nineteenth of April, 1643. The king ſigned it, and addreſſed the following poſtſcript; This above is my moſt expreſs and laſt will, which I will have to be executed. The queen and the duke of Orleans ſigned it likewiſe, after having promiſed and ſworn to each other, not to infringe it. Which was not done with reſpect to the queen, without a flood of tears, the teſtimonies of her grief and affliction . . . . . This being done, the deputies of the parliament were introduced. The king, ſick as he was, declared to them himſelf, that he had cauſed letters for the regency to be drawn, which he deſired might be ſpeedily regiſtred, to which purpoſe he would ſend the next morning Monſieur, his brother, and the prince of Condé, and the chancellor, the grand chamber. In effect, they were read and publiſhed the ſame morning, in a full houſe (152). The king's letter, which accompanied the declaration, enjoined the parliament to regiſter it without any delay or difficulty . . . Afterwards to take from the regiſters, the declaration againſt Monſieur the king's only brother, immediately to put it into the hands of the chancellor, to be cancelled or torn (153). The queen, very much diſpleaſed with the limitations made to her regency, thought of nothing but how to get the declaration annulled, and the king had ſcarce cloſed his eyes, but ſhe was pompouſly conveyed to the parliament of Paris, to obtain a full and entire regency. It was the antient cuſtom, that the widows of the kings of France ſhould keep for forty days together in their chamber, without ſeeing ſun or moon till their husbands were buried (154). Anne of Auſtria, Lewis the thirteenth's widow, did not ſhut herſelf up in that manner; but went to Paris the next day after the death of the king her husband (155), and three days after appeared at the moſt pompous and ſplendid ceremony that could be ſeen at the parliament of Paris, and by the intrigues ſhe had formed before, cauſed the laſt will of the king to be annulled, that very declaration of the foregoing month of April, which ſhe had ſworn to obſerve, and which had coſt ſo much labour and pains (156), and was undoubtedly the work of the chancellor Seguier . . . . and the firſt preſident Molé (157).

It is obſervable, that one of the means which the queen's ſervants uſed to arrive at their ends, was to induce her to employ the creatures of cardinal Richelieu, and like a good Chriſtian to forget the injuries ſhe had received from them. Montaigu, a devotee by profeſſion, mixing God and the world together, and joining to the reaſons of devotion, the neceſſity of having a miniſter inſtructed in the affairs of ſtate, added farther, (in my opinion) another conſideration, which abſolutely gained her, which was to repreſent to her, that cardinal Mazarin was the beſt qualified of any one to negotiate a peace, and that being born a ſubject to the king, her brother, he would make it advantageous for her houſe, which ſhe ought to endeavour to maintain in power; in order to make it a ſupport againſt any faction which might ariſe in France in the time of her regency (158). No prophet could have ſpoke truer than Montaigu; for it fell out, that at ſixteen years end, cardinal Mazarine concluded the peace with Spain, ſo advantageous to that crown, and diſadvantageous to France, that the moſt intelligent have thought, that that conduct of his

We have not as yet ſeen a good hiſtory of his reign, which makes us impatiently wait for that, which Mr le Vaſſor has undertaken; the firſt volume of it (g), which reaches to the time of this prince's coming to age in 1614, has been well received by the publick.

was owing to the entreaties or commands of the queen-mother, in whom the king, her husband, had always obſerved a Spaniſh heart; the reaſon, in part, why he was willing that her regency ſhould depend on the council he joined with her (159). ‘Lewis the Juſt did not ſo much inſiſt upon precedents, as upon reaſon. He knew that the queen, his wife, underſtood nothing of affairs, and that ſhe could not have any experience in them, having never had any ſhare in the government. As the regency, ſaid he, is a thing of great weight, and the queen has not the ability that is neceſſary for the reſolution of difficulties, inſeparable from government; we have thought fit to conjoin with her, and under her authority, a council that may determine. Beſides, that which was particular on this occaſion was, that there being a rupture between the two crowns, the queen would be obliged to make war againſt her own brother, the Catholic king. Lewis XIII had heretofore upbraided her, that ſhe could not forget her country, and that ſhe intereſted herſelf too much in the news and affairs of Spain (160).’

[CC] There was no body, even to the Dauphin, but vexed him without the leaſt ill meaning or deſign.] Mr Bourſault having ſaid, that kings are ſo nice, that the leaſt thing wounds them, and that they who are moſt dear to them, are ſometimes thoſe who vex them moſt, gives this inſtance of it. ‘One day, as I was with the preſident Perrault, in his fine gallery, Monſieur de la Vrilliere, ſecretary of ſtate, came to ſee him, and from him I have the following ſtory. The king, who was then but Dauphin, was baptized at St Germain, the twenty firſt of April, 1643, being four years of age, ſeven months, and ſome days. Lewis XIII, could not aſſiſt at that ceremony; he was ſick, and died three and twenty days after. The Dauphin, as he came from baptiſm, was brought to the king, to whom he ſaid, that he had been juſt baptized. I am glad of it, my ſon, ſaid the king, but what is your name? My name, replied the young prince, is Lewis the fourteenth, without thinking on what he ſaid, and perhaps even not knowing the conſequence of it. And yet this anſwer afflicted the king: in the condition he was, he took it for an ill omen, and turning to the other ſide: Not yet, ſaid he, not yet. Some flatterer (for princes have the misfortune to have ſuch before they can ſpeak) had already poſſeſſed this royal infant with the great name he was ſoon to bear; which was the cauſe of this little mortification he innocently gave the king his father (161).’

[DD] What I have ſaid concerning the little advantage they got by the victory of Avein (162).] I cited Mr Silhon, who aſſures us, that the artifices of the prince of Orange, had hindred the French from making an advantage of that victory, and I have obſerved, that this author ſaid this in the year 1651, and that I would not cite thoſe who have written after the year 1672: I ſtill follow the ſame method, and this is the reaſon why I ſhall not at preſent alledge Mr de la Neuville, who ſaid (163), among other things, that the prince of Orange had found means, without appearing to do ſo, to ſacrifice to his jealouſy the fineſt army that had been ſeen in that age (164). But I may alledge the teſtimony of an Italian, whoſe book was printed the year 1640: It is count Galeazzo Gualdo Priorato, a well known Hiſtorian; he relates (165), that the French generals were of opinion, that inſtead of beſieging Louvain, they ſhould march directly to Bruſſels. That advice was followed, but the prince of Orange having found the execution difficult, retook the rout to Louvain, and ſhewed that the taking of that place would be very important. The Hiſtorian adds, that ſome people diſcovered an artifice in that proceeding, ſince it was believed, that the Dutch had rather have the Spaniards for their neighbours, than the French. Queſta benche buona opinione, e uſcita di bocca d'un Capitano tanto prudente, nondimeno non tralaſciarono alcuni di diviſarla per artifitioſa; concioſia che gli Hollandeſi credevaſi, che amaſſero bene la corriſpondenza colli Franceſi per cavarne aiuti, ma non già la vicinanza, e maggior loro grandezza, perche ſtando quelle Provincie ſotto all' obedienza d'una Corona, la cui potenza era lontana, e diſunita, eſſi erano ſtati, e tuttavia vedevanſi baſtanti a difender la loro libertà: il che più difficile ſarebbe riuſcito loro, quando haveſſero havuto da fare con un Potentato di forze, e di Stato unito, e loro confinante (166).

LICINIA, a veſtal, puniſhed for her leudneſs, about the 640th year of Rome. There were three veſtals all at the ſame time, who behaved themſelves ill. Lucius Metellus, the Pontifex Maximus, not having puniſhed this diſorder ſo rigorouſly as he ſhould have done, was proſecuted for his remiſſneſs on an impeachment of Sextus Peduceus, tribune of the people. The high prieſt condemned only one (a) of the three veſtals, and acquitted the other two (b). Licinia was one of the latter, tho' no leſs guilty than ſhe that was condemned. They were both mightily exclaimed againſt for the numbers of their galants, and they accuſed one another. At firſt, they had to do with but a few of their beſt friends, and that in great ſecrecy, declaring to each, that he was the only perſon, who had received the favour: afterwards, the number of ſharers increaſed, at a ſtrange rate; for the longer they lived in this diſorder, the eaſier it was to convict them of it. They had then reaſon to fear informers; and could think of no better way of obliging all to ſilence, than granting to all the laſt favour. This did not pleaſe the firſt galants: However, they durſt not make a noiſe; too loud complaints would only have betrayed them. The evil took ſuch a head, that the two veſtals made no longer any difficulty of giving themſelves up to ſeveral galants, and that in the knowledge of each other (c): and I believe that for ſome time they lived together in a good underſtanding, and that then Emilia introduced her brother to Licinia, and the latter introduced her brother to Emilia. However it be, it is certain, that each had the other's brother for galant (d); a great many of both ſexes, freemen and ſlaves, were privy to the intrigues of theſe veſtals; nevertheleſs, their crime remained a ſecret for a long time, as to what we call the public. At laſt, one Manius, who had been the firſt inſtrument or pimp to the amour, turned informer. He had not been made free, nor recompenſed according to his expectation; and beſides, was a man, who delighted in miſchief (e). I have already ſaid, that the high Pontif, the proper judge of offences of this kind, had not uſed the neceſſary ſeverity. The diſcontents, which his remiſſneſs had occaſioned, was the reaſon of giving Lucius Caſſius a commiſſion, to re-examine the proceſs [A]. He was a rigorous, inflexible judge, as I have ſhewn in ſpeaking of him. Licinia could not eſcape him: For how could ſhe hope to eſcape the ſentence of death, when Martia, her companion, who had but to do with only one Roman knight [B], could not eſcape? Caſſius's ſevere methods for the diſcovering and convicting the accomplices, were ſo extraordinary, that they were thought to have exceeded the juſt bounds (f).

[A] Lucius Caſſius was commiſſioned to re-examine the proceſs (1).] Aſconius Pedianus gives us this account of it: 'Ob quam ſeveritatem quo tempore Sextus Peduceus Tribunus plebis criminatus eſt L. Metellum Pontif. Max. totumque collegium Pontificum male judicaſſe de inceſtu Virginum Veſtalium, quod unam modo Æmiliam damnaverat, abſolverat autem duas, Martiam & Liciniam, populus hunc Caſſium creavit qui de eiſdem virginibus quæreret, iſque & utraſque eas & præterea complures alias nimia etiam, ut exiſtimatio eſt, aſperitate uſus damnavit. —— On account of which ſeverity, when Sextus Peduceus, tribune of the people, accuſed L. Metellus, the Pontifex Maximus, and the whole pontifical college, of judging ill in relation to the leud actions of the Veſtals, in that they had condemned only Æmilia, but had acquitted two, Martia and Licinia, the people commiſſioned Caſſius to inquire into the matter, who not only condemned thoſe two, but many others likewiſe, uſing, as is thought, too great ſeverity.' Inſtead of alias, I ſhould read alios; for the number of the Veſtals was too ſmall, to ſay, after the condemnation of two, that many others were condemned. We muſt ſay then, that theſe many others of Aſconius were the galants, the bawds, &c. of the Veſtals. Dion obſerves, that the criminal Veſtals involved abundance of people in their misfortune: Αἱ ἱέρειαι τὸ πλεῖστον αὐταὶ τοῦ τε ὀλέθρου καὶ τῆς αἰσχύνης ὦφλον, συχνοῖς δὲ δὴ καὶ ἄλλοις μεγάλων κακῶν αἴτιαι ἐγένοντο. ἥ τε πόλις ἅπασα ἀπ᾽ αὐτῶν ἐταράχθη. Virgines Veſtales ipſæ quidem maximam mali ac dedecoris partem tulere, ſed tamen alios quoque plurimos in graviſſima mala conjecere, & univerſam civitatem ſuo ſcelere perturbavere (2).

[B] Martia, her companion, who had to do only with one Roman knight.] If her companions had been as cautious as ſhe, it is probable, they might have violated their rule with impunity. Poſſibly even Martia would neither have loſt her reputation nor her life, if, to redreſs the remiſſneſs of the former judges, the too rigid Lucius Caſſius had not been commiſſioned. Μαρκία μὲν τῇ τε καθ᾽ αὑτὴν καὶ πρὸς ἕνα τινὰ ἱππέα ᾐσχύνθη· κἂν διέλαθεν εἰ μή περ ἡ ζήτησις ἐπὶ τῶν ἄλλων ἐπὶ πλεῖον ἀρθεῖσα καὶ ἐκείνην προσκατέλαβεν . . . διὰ τοῦτο καὶ τὰς κολάσεις οὐ μόνων τῶν ἐλεγχθέντων μίσει ἀλλὰ καὶ τῶν ἄλλων πάντων τῶν αἰτιαθέντων μίσει τοῦ συμβεβηκότος ἐποιήσαντο. Marcia quidem ſeorſim cum uno equite Rom. rem habuerat, ac fortaſſis latere potuiſſet, niſi latius porrecta quæſtio eam quoque involviſſet . . . . Itaque odio admiſſi tanti ſceleris non modo de convictis, ſed de omnibus qui delati erant ſupplicium ſumptum (3). —— Marcia had to do with but one Roman knight, and perhaps might have eſcaped, had not the enquiry, being carried farther, involved her likewiſe. . . . . . Therefore, in deteſtation of the crime committed, not only thoſe convicted, but all thoſe informed againſt, were puniſhed. It is a remarkable thing, and which ſhews very well the power of conſtitution, that the Veſtals fell into incontinence, in ſpight of the dreadful puniſhment, and prodigious infamy, they were expoſed to (4), and in ſpight of the actual puniſhment of their companions. Minutius Felix has touched upon this. 'Cum pæne in pluribus virginibus & quæ inconſultius ſe viris miſcuiſſent, Veſta ſane neſciente, ſit inceſtum vindicatum; in reſiduis impunitatem fecerint, non caſtitas tutior, ſed impudicitia felicior (5). —— When inceſt was puniſhed in many Veſtals, who had indiſcretely proſtituted themſelves, the reſt eſcaped, not becauſe they were chaſter, but more fortunate in their amours.'

LIEBAUT (JOHN) a native of Dijon, practiſed Phyſic at Paris in the XVIth century with ſome ſucceſs. He there married Nicole Stephens, a learned woman, and daughter to Charles Stephens [A]. He publiſhed ſeveral books [B], ſome of which were tranſlated into ſeveral languages, and often re-printed. He quitted Paris, I know not why, and returned into his native country [C], where he died I know not when.

[A] He married Nicole Stephens, a learned woman, and daughter to Charles Stephens.] La Croix du Maine (1) makes mention of three books ſhe had written, but were not printed. I. An Anſwer to the Stanzas on Marriage, written by Ph. des P. (2). II. The Contempt of Love. III. An Apology for Women, againſt thoſe who undervalue them. James Grevin (3) was in love with her, and courted her; and as he was a Poet, he writ verſes in abundance upon his amours, and in praiſe of his Nicole, whom he called Olympia. The volume of his love-verſes was for this reaſon called Olympia. This we learn from la Croix du Maine (4). Another ran away with the prey; for ſhe was married to our John Liebaut.

[B] He publiſhed ſeveral books.] The Bibliotheque of Phyſicians, enlarged by Mercklinus, makes mention but of three books of John Liebaut. Theſaurus ſanitatis paratu facilis, at Paris by James du Puy 1577. De præcavendis curandiſque venenis Commentarius. Scholia in Jacobi Hollerii commentaria in lib. vii. aphoriſmorum Hippocratis. The moſt curious of his books have been forgotten, which are thoſe, that treat of the diſtempers of women, and of their ornaments and beauties. He wrote them in Latin. They were afterwards tranſlated into French; but the tranſlator found himſelf ſometimes obliged to omit ſome paſſages of the original (5), to avoid deſcribing things offenſive to modeſty. We ſhall ſee below, that Liebaut cannot be ſaid to be a meer tranſlator of an Italian Phyſician. He was no more indeed with regard to a German Phyſician, called Gaſpar Wolfius, whoſe four books of the Secrets of Phyſic and Chymiſtry (6) he tranſlated into French. He had a good ſhare in a book of Agriculture, which was much eſteemed, and of which there are many editions (7). This book is called The Country-Houſe: Charles Stephens was the firſt author of it. Liebaut, his ſon-in-law, corrected and enlarged it conſiderably. It was tranſlated into Engliſh, Flemiſh, and High-Dutch (8). Note, that the French tranſlation of the two books above-mentioned has been ſeveral times printed. I make uſe of the firſt edition, which is that of Paris, 1582, in 8vo, and I have an edition in twelves of the three books of the Embelliſhment and Ornaments of the human body. It is of Lyons, 1594. There are abundance of particulars in this work, whether relating to the characters of the beauty of each part of the body, or to the means of rectifying diſagreeable accidents. You there find a chapter (9) concerning the ſtink of excrements, and firſt of ordures. The author maintains, that this is a matter of importance; therefore, adds he, to render a damſel amiable, and in all reſpects agreeable, and to crown her beauty with all the perfections that can be deſired in a handſome body, we ſhall enquire into the means of correcting the ſtink of her excrements, if exceſſive. It were ridiculous to complain, that delicate ears are offended at ſuch diſcourſes: but Phyſicians would be ſtill more ridiculous, if they had regard to ſuch complaints. They are obliged to write in this manner; it is their profeſſion; Father Coton's reſerves (10) are no rule to them.

[C] He returned into his native country.] Here is a paſſage of Patin. 'As for John Liebaut, he was a Burgundian Phyſician, who never made his fortune here. He was ſon-in-law to Charles Stephens, who died in the Chatelet greatly in debt. After his death, Liebaut went to Dijon to lay his bones in his native country. His wife was called Nicole Stephens, ſhe was niece to the great Robert Stephens, who left Paris after the death of Francis I, finding himſelf deprived of his good maſter, and perſecuted by the Sorbonniſts, and retired to Geneva. Liebaut's book of the Diſtempers of Women is only a tranſlation of Marinello, who had written it in Italian, under the

Note, that Charles Stephens died in 1566. It is not true that Liebaut's book upon the Diſtempers of Women is only a tranſlation of Marinello. I have not the firſt edition of this Italian's book, but only that of Venice, appreſſo Giovanni Valgriſio, 1574, in 8vo. It is an edition, augmented and corrected (12), though not intituled la Comara, but le Medecine partenenti alle infermita delle donne. I have compared it with John Liebaut's book, and found it very different. It is true, the French author ſays ſeveral things, that were ſaid by the Italian: but after all, he cannot be reputed a meer tranſlator (13), Marinello had not the ſame ſcruples, as he who tranſlated John Liebaut's book: he explained a hundred things in the vulgar tongue, which he had better have ſuppreſſed or have written in Latin (14). Mercklinus did not know this work of John Marinello, nor that de gli ornamenti delle donne, publiſhed a ſecond time, by the ſame author, in 1574.

LIGARIUS (QUINTUS) lieutenant to Caius Conſidius, who commanded in Africa in quality of proconſul, acquitted himſelf ſo well in this poſt, that the people paſſionately deſired to have him for their governor when Conſidius was recalled. They obtained their deſire, and continued very well ſatisfied with the conduct of Ligarius. They would have made him their commander in chief, when they took arms at the beginning of the civil-war betwixt Cæſar and Pompey; but as he had a mind to return to Rome, he refuſed engaging in public affairs. He reſted for a while, after Publius Accius Varus had accepted that command (a). This is what Cicero ſets forth in his oration for Ligarius. He paſſes over other things in ſilence, and only confeſſes in general, that his party had embraced the intereſts of Pompey. It is probable that Ligarius had ſhewed himſelf very averſe to Julius Cæſar's deſigns, who neverthelеſs gave him his life (b), after the defeat of Scipio, and the other generals, who had renewed the war in Africa, in favour of that cauſe, which Pompey had defended. This favour did not prevent Ligarius's living concealed out of Italy. His brother and friends, and particularly Cicero (c), omitted nothing to obtain Cæſar's leave for his return to Rome; and they had hopes of accompliſhing it, when Tubero, in the midſt of theſe tranſactions, formally declared himſelf Ligarius's accuſer. Then it was that Cicero made that admirable oration for the accuſed, which in a very ſingular manner changed the intentions of Cæſar [A]. Ligarius was

(c) Cicero, Epiſt. xiv, lib. vi, ad familiar.

[A] Cicero pronounced for Ligarius that admirable oration . . . . . which changed the intentions of Cæſar.] Nothing can be finer than this oration. Pomponius Atticus was charmed with it (1): Cornelius Balbus and Oppius admired it, and ſent a copy of it to Julius Cæſar (2). We cannot eaſily comprehend why the Civilian Pomponius ſhould praiſe it ſo coldly; ‘ Extat Ciceronis oratio, ſays he (3), ſatis pulcherrima, quæ inſcribitur pro Q. Ligario. —— There is extant a good pretty oration enough of Cicero's for Q. Ligarius.’ Beudeus thinks the word ſatis, ill placed before a ſuperlative. It is anſwered (4) that the poſitive is often put inſtead of the ſuperlative on ſuch occaſions. Very well, Pomponius's meaning then will be, that Cicero's oration for Ligarius is well enough. But this is a diſproportionate encomium, and too dry. Cicero out-did himſelf both in the compoſition and in the action, and perhaps the ſucceſs of his orations was never more remarkable. Cæſar did not deſign to acquit Ligarius, and yet he did it, unable to withſtand the emotions and workings in his ſoul, whilſt Cicero was ſpeaking. The accuſer was ſo vexed at the iſſue of his cauſe, that he renounced the bar (5), and betook himſelf to the profeſſion of the Civil-law. Let us examine a paſſage in the work of a Jeſuit upon the compariſon of Demoſthenes and Cicero. Conſult alſo the Chevræana (6).

‘ Cicero . . . . . undertook the defence of Q. Ligarius, his friend, accuſed of having born arms againſt Cæſar, tho' he was obliged upon ſeveral accounts to continue in his intereſts. Cæſar, who had already condemned him in his heart, having however a curioſity to hear Cicero, whom he had not heard of a long time, by reaſon of his preſence in the war, which he had now finiſhed, ſaid to one of his friends, who would have diſſwaded him, What ſignifies it? Let us even hear him; my reſolution is taken, and nothing that can be ſaid for him ſhall alter it one way or other †. But this Orator ſpoke with ſo much force in his friend's defence, that he moved Cæſar's heart in ſpight of all the oppoſition and the reſolutions he had taken not to ſuffer himſelf to be perſuaded: and Cicero ſaying ſomething of what paſſed at the battle of Pharſalia, in Cæſar's praiſe, this prince felt an extraordinary emotion throughout his whole frame; and, as if he had been perfectly enchanted by Cicero's diſcourſe, he let fall the paper he had in his hands. In fine, he was not able to reſiſt ſo many charms, nor that fine and delicate manner, in which he commended him ‡; and whatever reſolution he had taken to withſtand the Rhetoric of ſo powerful an Orator, he was forced to pardon Ligarius. I ſay nothing of a like favour, which Cicero obtained for king Dejotarus, and for his friend Marcellus from this ſame emperor, who was ſuch a maſter of his reſolutions, and ſo hard to be perſuaded (7).’

Father Rapin is here by no means guilty of the fault ſo incident to the Sieur Varillas, an Hiſtorian, who never related an adventure, as he found it in his authors, but flouriſhed and embroidered it after his own way; it is certain Plutarch expreſſed himſelf no leſs ſtrongly than this Jeſuit, as we may judge from the following words (8): ‘ It is reported, that, when Quintus Ligarius was proſecuted for having born arms againſt Cæſar, and Cicero had undertaken his defence, Cæſar ſaid to his friends, what hinders, but that after ſo long a time (9), we ſhould hear Cicero ſpeak? It being long ſince concluded, that Ligarius is an ill man, and our enemy. But when Cicero began to ſpeak, he wonderfully moved him, and proceeded in his ſpeech with ſuch a vehemence, and admirable grace, that Cæſar's countenance often changed; and it was very evident, that all the paſſions of his ſoul were in commotion. At length, the Orator touching upon the battle of Pharſalia, he was ſo tranſported, and agitated, that ſome of the papers he held fell out of his hands; and thus, being overpowered, he acquitted Ligarius.’ Let us note two miſtakes of father Rapin. He ſuppoſes that Cæſar had not heard Cicero of a long time; he is miſtaken; for a few months before, Cicero had ſpoken the oration pro Marcello before him. Here is the proof of it: ‘ Fac igitur, quod de hominine nobiliſſimo & clariſſimo, M. Marcello feciſti NUPER in curia, nunc idem in foro de optimis, & huic omni frequentiæ probatiſſimis fratribus. Ut conceſſiſti illum Senatui, ſic da hunc populo (10). ——— As you lately pardoned M. Marcellus, at the requeſt of the ſenate; ſo now pardon this man, at the requeſt of the people.’ It would be ſome excuſe to this Jeſuit, if we could ſay that he followed Plutarch's narration; but after all, it is no entire juſtification, ſince he has followed him in a falſe fact. I add, that it is not certain, that this Greek author imputes to Cæſar, what the Latin and other tranſlators predend he does: the Latin verſion, printed with Plutarch's original, runs thus: Quid obſtat quin Ciceronem tanto intervallo audiamus dicentem? This Latin anſwering to this Greek; Τί κωλύει διὰ χρόνου Κικέρωνος ἀκοῦσαι λέγοντος. The queſtion is, whether διὰ χρόνου in this place ſignifies, after a long time, or was abſolutely acquitted. He was no ſlave to notions of gratitude, for he became one of the accomplices of Brutus and Caſſius [B]. I ſhall have two faults to charge upon father Rapin (d).

or whether it would not be better rendered a little time, as the learned Fabricius has done: Quid eſt cauſæ, he tranſlates it (11), cur Ciceronem orantem aliquamdiu non audiamus? It may be objected perhaps, that this ſenſe is ſomewat abſurd, ſince Cæſar did not mean to hear a part of Cicero's oration, and go out of the aſſembly before he had made an end. I anſwer that διὰ χρόνȣ might, be a way of ſpeaking amonſt the Greeks, much like our Engliſh expreſſion a little. Now when one ſays, Let us go a little to ſee ſuch a thing; Let us go hear this preacher a little; what hinders, but we may go and hear ſuch a one's funeral ſermon a little? he does not mean to ſee or hear by halves, nor has he any deſign to go out of the church before the end of the ſermon. This methinks is the moſt natural idea we can fix to Cæſar's words. The other error of Father Rapin is his ſuppoſing, that Cicero obtained the ſame favour for king Dejotarus, and Marcellus, as for Ligarius. Nothing is more untrue; for, in the firſt place, he did not procure Dejotarus's diſcharge (12); and, in the ſecond place, it was not he, but the ſenate, that obtained Marcellus's pardon. The oration for Marcellus was only to give thanks for a favour, which Cæſar had granted at the requeſt of the whole aſſembly. See what Cicero himſelf relates in a letter to Sulpicius (13).

[B] He was one of the accomplices of Brutus and Caſſius.] Plutarch will not permit us to doubt of this. Among Pompey's friends, there was one Caius Ligarius, whom Cæſar had pardoned, tho' accuſed for having been in arms againſt him. This man not being ſo thankful for having been forgiven, as incenſed at that power, which made him need a pardon, hated Cæſar, and was one of Brutus's moſt intimate friends. Him Brutus viſited, and finding him ſick, O Ligarius, ſays he, what a time have you found to be ſick in? At which words Ligarius raiſing himſelf, and leaning on his elbow, took Brutus by the hand, and ſaid, But, O Brutus, if you are on any deſign worthy of your ſelf, I am well (14). LIMEUIL (ISABELLA DE LA TOUR DE TURENNE (a), DEMOISELLE DE) maid of honour to Catherine de Medicis, verified by her conduct a witty ſaying in the Menagiana (b), viz. that the function of maid of honour to a queen is a very difficult part. She ſunk under the weight of it, in the face of the whole court; for ſhe lay-in at the queen's-palace without having been married. The Prince of Condé was the father of this child. A chronological diſpute aroſe hereupon [A]. And beſides, writers are divided

[A] A chronological diſpute aroſe hereupon.] This doubtleſs the too lovers never expected; they little imagined, that their careſſes ſhould afford matter of diſpute between authors a hundred years after; the fact is this. We will begin with theſe words of the General Criticiſm on the Hiſtory of Calviniſm (1). 'The prince of Condé, falling in love with one of the queen's maids, called Mademoiſelle de Limeuil, ſaid ſo many moving things to her, that they ſoon came to what we call the concluſion of the romance. She had a ſon by him, of whom ſhe lay-in, in the reign of Charles IX, the twenty fifth of May, 1561, in the very palace of the Louvre: but the queen, who at that time had occaſion for the prince to balance the overgrown power of the houſe of Guiſe, had compaſſion on humane frailty. Thus one of our wits ſpeaks of this adventure in a kind of romance, intituled, The Prince of Condé. where we find ſeveral other very curious ſtrokes of hiſtory, and very faithfully related. Another of the queen's maids had juſt ſuch another diſaſter about two or three years after. Catherine de Medicis, perceiving that the prince loved this young lady, reſolved to lay hold of this occaſion for penetrating into his deſigns; and therefore adviſed her, who probably had no need of incitements, not to over-act the part of a prude. Mezerai will tell you this ſtory much better than I †. The queen endeavoured to captivate the prince of Condé by the charms of pleaſure, and by the lure of one of her maids of honour, who, ſparing nothing to ſerve her miſtreſs, found herſelf indiſpoſed for nine months, and was for ſome time the whole diſcourſe of the court, where ſuch ſort of accidents give more diverſion than ſcandal. The prince had another intrigue of note with the widow of the mareſchal of St André, and had married her, if the admiral had not warded off the blow by propoſing another match. . . . (2). He made him ſuch remonſtrances ‡ as obliged him to break off, by the conjugal bond, all his pernicious engagements with the mareſchal's widow, who, endeavouring to enamour the prince, fell ſo in love with him, as to purchaſe her ſatisfaction at the price of her eſtate of Valery, which ſhe made him a preſent of.'

Several perſons have found two remarkable falſities in this account; for it is not true, that Mademoiſelle de Limeuil lay-in in the year 1561, and that another of the queen's maids of honour made the ſame ſlip with the prince of Condé ſome years after. Yet ſome opiniators maintain, that the date in the romance, cited by Mr Maimbourg's critic, is juſt; and conſequently, that the prince of Condé debauched two of Catherine de Medicis's maids of honour, one after another, in a ſhort time. This conſequence is moſt certain, if the author of the romance be not miſtaken; for it cannot be denied, that one of this queen's maids of honour lay-in in 1564, after her familiarity with the prince; but once more, the author of the romance tells an untruth. It is neither a fault of the preſs, nor a poetical fiction, but an hiſtorical falſity. The whole ſeries of the book maniſeſtly ſhews that the author ſpeaks of an intrigue, which preceded the impriſonment of the prince, and the ſentence of death paſſed upon him in November 1560. The author therefore alone is anſwerable for the number 1561 and not the Printer. It cannot be ſaid, that he antedated it deſignedly, from a liberty allowed in an epic poem, or in a romance; for, as his book has every where as exact dates, as thoſe of Mezerai, whether concerning the death of Francis II, and of the king of Navarre, or concerning the prince's pardon, &c. we muſt ſuppoſe, that he deſigned to give the true date of the young lady's lying-in. The circumſtances of the day, and month, and place, which he has carefully collected, confirm this opinion, ſince they ſignify nothing to the œconomy of the piece: he only touches upon them by the by, to quicken the attention of his reader, by a particularity ſeldom found in ſuch ſort of books. To what end ſhould he antedate her pregnancy two years? The romance gains nothing by it: the intrigue might have been carried on as well by laying the ſcene of it two years after. The tenor of the book maniſeſtly ſhews this. Our author therefore muſt have been deceived by his memoirs, in which 1561 had been put inſtead of 1564. I know thoſe, who, after ſome reflexions on this matter, have imagined, that the Demoiſelle de Limeuil was twice got with child by the prince, and that the author of the romance ſpeaks of the firſt pregnancy, and Mr Mezerai of the ſecond. I cannot think them in the right: for though the court of France was at that time very diſſolute, it cannot be conceived, that a maid of honour ſhould lye-in at the Louvre in 1561 and make the ſame falſe ſtep three years after in the quality of maid of honour. divided about the conſequences of this adventure [B]. Some pretend, that the young lady was expelled the court [C], and others, that ſhe loſt not the queen's good graces were ſtill obſerved, and ſome regard had to the public. Brantome, who ſpeaks of this court, from his own certain knowledge, expreſsly affirms it (3). The moſt natural ſignification of his words is, that the maids of Catherine de Medicis had never a better time than while they lived with her, becauſe they had full liberty either to taſte of all the joys of marriage, or abſtain, provided they had the art and induſtry to prevent pregnancy. There was therefore ſome diſgrace to be feared, when they wanted this point of skill; for that queen acted almoſt like the Lacedæmonians, who did not puniſh the theft, but the want of cunning to conceal it. We ſhall preſently ſee, that Mrs Limeuil was diſgraced. They, who require proofs of it, form a horrible idea of Catherine de Medicis.

[B] Writers are divided about the conſequences of this adventure.] The beſt hiſtorians agree, that the queen-mother lent an hand to the amours of the prince, and of Mrs Limeuil. See, in the preceeding remark (4), a paſſage of Mezerai: It is taken from his chronological Abridgment: here is another from his great hiſtory (5). 'The queen, having gained 'nothing by this method (6) . . . bethought her of another more ſubtle, which was to gain the prince by the 'lure of love and pleaſures, by which the haughtieſt 'ſouls are captivated without a ſtruggle. She treated 'him with all the demonſtrations of a cordial friendſhip, and entire confidence; ſhe gave him the government of Picardy, the firſt ſubject of his diſcontent, and had all the reſpects paid him that are 'due to the firſt prince of the blood. Beſides this, 'ſhe had people ſuborned to amuſe him with all 'kind of diverſions; and the charms of the fair 'Limeuil, one of her maids, were ſo ſerviceable to 'her deſigns, that for ſome time he had laid aſide all 'thoughts of any thing but her; which his wife Eleanor de Roye, a woman of ſevere chaſtity, diſcovering, died of grief; an accident that gave the 'queen a deal of joy, becauſe this lady being of an 'imperious temper, and very zealous for the Huguenot religion, was the ſharpeſt ſpur to quicken the 'courage of the prince. But, on the other hand, 'the royal palace, and her ſelf, ſuffered great ſcandal 'from theſe love-intrigues; for Mrs Limeuil giving 'too much way to the prince's paſſion, was ſo imprudent, and ſo ill concerted her meaſures, as to 'lye-in in her wardrobe, in the face of all the world; 'for which reaſon ſhe diſcharged her with diſgrace, 'though ſhe could not hinder her ſpeaking ſomewhat 'too plainly of the occaſion of her misfortune.' Mr Varillas has not forgot this intrigue. Let us ſee what he ſays of it.

'Love entred into the cauſe, and ſeconded the 'artifices of the queen. Mademoiſelle de la Limeuil 'was the handſomeſt of her maids of honour, and 'the prince grew ſo fond of her, that the princeſs his 'wife, perceiving it, died of jealouſy. The queen, 'attentive to the leaſt occaſions of ſtrengthning her power looked upon this conjuncture as the moſt favourable that could ever preſent itſelf. She fancied that, 'as the Chatillons had engaged the prince in hereſy, 'by marrying him to their niece, ſo ſhe might 'reduce him to the communion of the church, by 'giving him a young lady to wife, who had the 'honour to be her relation, whoſe charms might fix 'his inconſtancy, and get out of him all the ſecret 'deſigns of Calviniſm. In this thought, ſhe ordered 'the young lady to omit nothing that might contribute to captivate the prince. But it was expoſing 'a moderate virtue to too great a riſque, to make it 'grapple with a lover, who took the leaſt advantages 'in love, as well as in war, to puſh things to an 'extremity. The lady, feigning a kindneſs for the 'prince, became in love with him in good earneſt, 'and, to her ſorrow, was not the only perſon at court, 'whoſe heart was inſenſibly engaged (7).' He afterwards relates the amours of the mareſchal de St André's widow, with this prince, and her extraordinary liberalities to him, and then adds (8): 'Mademoiſelle 'de Lemeuil made reflexions, very wide of the truth 'on ſo uncommon an adventure; ſhe ſuppoſed the 'prince leſs amorous, or more intereſted, than he 'really was, and imagined that, ſince he had accepted the eſtate of St Valeri, he deſigned, in good 'earneſt, to marry the mareſchal's widow, her jealouſy encreaſed, to ſuch degree, that, not having 'fortune enough to equal the liberality of her rival, 'ſhe reſolved to out-do her in granting the prince 'what was deareſt to her in the world: the pregnancy, which ſoon followed, made her ſhame 'public, and ſhe was ignominiouſly diſcarded the 'court.'

[C] Some pretend, that the young lady was expelled the court.] Mezerai and Varillas affirm it, and there is no room to doubt the truth of it. A ſatirical author is of the ſame opinion, in a writing that is very injurious to the queen-mother: he owns, that the young lady was ſent to a convent (9). Mr le Laboureur cites a fragment of this ſatire, which will ſtand properly enough in this place. I ſhall add to it Mr le Laboureur's preamble, becauſe it aſſigns another the cauſe of this prince's amour, and fixes the time when the lady was brought to bed (10). 'Amongſt 'the other news, there was a talk of the fair de 'L . . . . .'s lying-in, one of the maids of honour; 'upon which occaſion it may not be amiſs to obſerve, 'that, after the peace of Orleans, the prince of Condé, continuing at court, thought he could not better 'remove all ſuſpicions, than by plunging himſelf into the pleaſures of the times, and getting a miſtreſs. 'The queen, who thought it the ſureſt chain to 'bind him, was not diſpleaſed that this maid, of one 'of the firſt families of the kingdom, hearkened to 'his vows and offers of ſervice, not thinking perhaps, that this friendſhip would ever paſs the bounds 'of gallantry. But, whether the maid could not 'reſiſt his quality, and reaſons of ſtate conſpired together, or rather the eſteem of the prince; or that 'ſhe hoped one day to marry him, as it is ſaid he 'had promiſed her, in caſe Eleanor de Roy his 'wife, whoſe life was deſpaired of ſhould die, as it 'happened the ſame year, ſhe could not long hold 'out againſt ambition and love, and all was revealed 'by the birth of this ſon, during the progreſs to 'Lyons.' Thus ſpeaks this libel (11).

graces [D]. In a word, there are great variations on this head [E]. Be that how it will, ſhe was daughter to Giles de la Tour, lord of Limeuil (c); and was afterwards married to Scipio Sardini, baron of Chaumont upon the Loire, &c. a noble Luccheſe (d) [F]. She one day rebuffed the conſtable of Montmorency, the moſt terrible man in the world [G]. I ſhall

That noble maid, ſo ſweet and mild,
Late play'd the whore, and had a child.
Some ſay, to gain the prince, the queen
Herſelf contriv'd the amorous ſcene.
But others from this ſtory vary,
And lay it to the ſecretary.
Howe'er it be, the queen did rate her,
As ſhe had nothing known o' th' matter,
And to cloyſter ſent the fair,
To taſte of diſcipline ſevere:
But ſure the penance was too great
For ſuch a light offence as that.
What nymph has virtue at command
Such ſtrong temptation to withſtand?
She's dead; the lovely creature's ta'en,
To mix with the celeſtial train;
Where now ſhe prays that heaven's high pow'r
Wou'd bleſſings on her father ſhow'r.

'The queen was the more offended at this diſorder 'happening in her family, as it was too public to be 'concealed; but time wore it off, and the lady was 'married ſome time after.' The court came to Lyons, towards the middle of June, 1564. So that, ſince the lady lay-in, during the time of this progreſs, it may reaſonably be ſuppoſed, that her child was born the twenty fifth of May the ſame year. Therefore the author of the romance has gueſſed right at the day, though not at the year.

[D] . . . . and others, that ſhe loſt not the queen's good graces.] This is the opinion of the author of the forementioned romance. The queen, ſays he (12), who at that time ſtood in need of the prince of Condé, to balance the over-grown power of the houſe of Guiſe, had compaſſion on human frailty. He ſuppoſes, that the lady continued maid of honour to the queen, and that ſhe tried to diſſuade the prince from taking arms. 'Mademoiſelle de Limeuil, ſays he (13), 'companion of Mademoiſelle du Rouet (14), and maid 'of honour, as well as ſhe, with whom the prince of 'Condé had formerly lived, even to a familiarity, 'which for ſome time incommoded her, did all that 'was poſſible to change his paſſion for war, into 'a paſſion of another kind, in which the combat, to 'her knowledge, had ſomething much more agree'able. She knew his inclination, and, valiant as he 'was, ſhe doubted not but he was as ſenſible to 'love as glory. She wrote to him, and deſired him 'to conſider, that he was going to make war with 'a perſon, with whom he had ſome time been upon 'better terms, ſince her religion placed her in the 'number of his enemies.' This author is miſtaken; for it is certain, the queen put her in a convent, and ordered her to be cloſe confined (15). This ought not to be ſuppreſſed in the Diſcours merveilleux de la vie de Catherine de Medicis. Let us ſee what the author of this ſaitre obſerves concerning la Limeuil. He ſays (16), that the prince of Condé began to be in love with her during his confinement, and that this young lady 'was one of the maids the queen-'mother had ſet on to debauch him, every thing 'being lawful to ambition, provided it can compaſs 'it's deſigns.' Having mentioned the peace concluded the eighteenth of March, 1563, he ſays (17), that the queen, 'to deſtroy the prince of Condé's 'reputation with his party, conſtantly treated him at 'the expence of the honour of Limeuil, who grew 'big with child. And the queen, to put the beſt face 'upon it that ſhe could, pretending to ſtorm at Li'meuil, this young lady had the boldneſs to tell her, 'that ſhe only followed the example of her miſtreſs, 'and obſerved her commands.' This is all he ſays: ſincerity required that he ſhould have owned, that Limeuil was baniſhed and cloyſtered.

[E] There are great variations on this head.] In the Diſcours Merveilleux, it is ſaid, that the prince loved the lady Limeuil, from the time of his impriſonment, after the battle of Dreux: but Mr Mezerai, and Mr Varillas affirm, that his love commenced not till after the firſt peace. Varillas ſays, that the queen propoſed to marry her to the prince, and that the young lady flattering herſelf with the hopes of this honour, ſtuck at no means for attaining it; but the other Hiſtorian attributes the hopes of marrying the prince to the wife of the mareſchal of St André alone. Varillas ſays, that the prince was loved by both theſe ladies at the ſame time, and that they rivalled each other, the one beſtowing on him her eſtate, the other her maidenhead. Mezerai ſays nothing of this conteſt; he ſuppoſes (18), that the prince was a widower, when the queen projected a match between him and the mareſchal's widow: if ſo, what becomes of the rivalſhip mentioned by Varillas; that rivalſhip which made theſe two ladies ſtrive which ſhould be the moſt prodigal of her favours to the prince? This is only a chimera, according to Mezerai's opinion; for Eleanora de Roye was ſtill alive (19), when Limeuil lay-in: and thus, before the prince was a widower, this lady had left the court in diſgrace, and retired to a monaſtery. She did not therefore diſpute the point with the mareſchal's widow, nor oppoſe the preſent of her maidenhead to the grant of the eſtate of Valeri in Gatinois.

[F] She afterwards married Scipio Sardini, baron of Chaumont on the Loire, &c. a noble Luccheſe.] I truſt much more to the authors I have cited, than to the publiſher of the Galantries of the kings of France. 'Mademoiſelle de Limeuil, ſays he (20), having lain-'in, endeavoured to comfort herſelf for the loſs of 'the great hopes ſhe had conceived, by marrying 'Jeoffrey de Cauſac, lord of Fremon, who had loved 'her a long time, and whom ſhe had neglected, ever 'ſince her intrigue with the prince of Condé.' For the reſt, Scipio Sardini had been one of the Italian farmers of the revenues, who made their fortunes in France, under Catherine de Medicis. I have read a contract (21) paſſed between the clergy of France and him, the fourth of March, 1588, for the offices of alternate receivers, and two comptrollers of the hereditary tenths in each dioceſe of this kingdom, and of other ſubſidies and duties. He is there called the noble Scipio Sardini, a Luccheſe gentleman, living in the city of Paris, in the pariſh of St Severinus. It is doubtleſs the ſame Scipio Sardini, who took Baudius into his houſe, and allowed him a penſion (22); the ſame alſo, whom Baſſompierre ſometimes mentions in his memoirs, of whom I find this particular at the twenty firſt page of the Thuana. 'The life of Caſtruccio Ca'ſtracani de gli Interminelli, written by Aldo Ma'nucci, is very fine, and quite different from that 'written by Machiavel. . . . . . This life is very 'well worth the looking after: I never ſaw but one 'copy of it, and that was in the hands of the lord 'Scipio Sardini: he had it from one Interminelli, the 'ſame who had prevailed on Manucci to write this 'life.' I believe it is printed at Lucca, in 4to, in Italian. It is a fine piece.

[G] She rebuffed the conſtable of Montmorency.] I will tell the ſtory juſt as I find it in Brantome. 'One 'day at the ſiege of Roan (23), as the queen went 'to the fort of St Catherine of Rouën, attended with 'her maids of honour, the conſtable having ſaid ſome'thing to her, and taking his leave of her, met Ma'demoiſelle de Limeuil, one of the handſomeſt maids 'of the court, and who had wit at will, and he came 'on horſeback to ſalute her, intending to have ſome 'diſcourſe with her, and always called her his miſtreſs, 'and would ride cloſe by her ſide; for the good man 'was no enemy to beauty or love, either in words 'or deeds; for he had played ſome pranks in his youth, 'which I will not mention. Mademoiſelle de Li'meuil, who was not in her beſt humour that day, 'took little notice of him, for ſhe could be proud 'enough when ſhe pleaſed, and began to huff him 'ſtrangely, and bid him be gone about his buſineſs, 'who ſaid to her, Truly, my miſtreſs, I am going; 'you rebuff me ſeverely: it is but fit, anſwered ſhe, 'that you ſhould meet with ſomebody to rebuff you, 'ſince you make it your buſineſs to rebuff all mankind. 'Adieu then, ſaid he, my miſtreſs, I will leave you; 'for you have given me my own (24).'

ſhall ſet down a paſſage of Brantome, which is curious enough [H]. Her eldeſt ſiſter, maid of honour to Catherine de Medicis, died at court. Brantome ſpeaks of her [I].

[H] I will produce a paſſage of Brantome concerning her, which is curious enough.] I do not fear that the judicious will declare againſt my conjecture, when they have well examined the circumſtances of the following ſtory. It is difficult not to find in it Mademoiſelle de la Limeuil, and the prince of Condé.

‘(25) I have known another prince, but not ſo great (26), who, during his firſt marriage, and his widowhood (27), fell in love with a very handſome young lady, to whom he made, during his amours and careſſes, noble preſents of carkanets, rings, jewels, and abundance of other fine things, and, amongſt them, a very fine and rich looking-glaſs, in which was his picture. Now the prince happened to marry a very handſome and virtuous princeſs, who made him diſreliſh his firſt love, though they were equally beautiful. This princeſs intreated and teized her huſband to that degree, that he ſent to demand of his firſt miſtreſs, all the fine preſents he had made her. This was a heart-breaking to the lady; however, ſhe had a ſoul ſo great and noble, though ſhe was not a princeſs, but of one of the beſt families in France, that ſhe ſent him back all his preſents, and, amongſt the reſt, the looking-glaſs with his picture; but firſt, to grace it the more, ſhe took a pen and ink, and fixed a pair of horns to the temples of his forehead, and delivering all to the gentleman, ſaid to him; Here, friend, carry this to your maſter, which I ſend him juſt as I received it, having, for my part, neither added nor diminiſhed, though ſomething has grown to it ſince of it's own accord; and tell that fine princeſs, his wife, who has ſo much importuned him to demand what he had given me, that, if a certain lord in the world (naming him, as I could do, if I pleaſed) had ſerved her mother ſo, and re-demanded and reſumed what he had given her for lying with her, ſhe would be as poor in trinkets and jewels, as any lady at court; and her head, which is ſo loaded with them at the coſt of ſuch a lord, and heretofore of her mother, would be only decked with flowers out of the garden, inſtead of theſe jewels: but let her make her beſt uſe of them, I ſcorn to keep them. They, who knew this lady, would eaſily judge ſhe gave this anſwer; and ſhe told it me herſelf, for ſhe was very free of diſcourſe; however, ſhe had like to have come by the worſt, as well from the huſband as the wife, who were equally affronted; but they ought to blame themſelves; for why would they thus provoke and enrage this poor lady, who, it was ſaid, had earned theſe preſents dearly enough with the ſweat of her brow. This young lady being one of the fineſt and moſt agreeable perſons of her time, notwithſtanding the uſe this prince had made of her body, met with a very rich match, though not of an equal family; ſo that happening to upbraid one another with the honour which each had done the other, ſhe, who was ſo great, in marrying him; he anſwered her, I have done more for you, than you for me; for I have diſhonoured myſelf to retrieve your honour, meaning, that, as ſhe had loſt it when a maid, he had repaired it, by making her his wife.’

[I] Her eldeſt ſiſter . . . . Brantome ſpeaks of her.] In theſe words (28); The elder Limeuil, at her firſt coming to court, happened to make a lampoon, (for ſhe ſpoke and wrote well) upon all the court; which however was rather diverting than ſcandalous; but aſſure yourſelf, ſhe (29) had her ſoundly jerked, with two of her companions, who were privy to it; and, but that ſhe had the honour to be related to her by the houſe of Touraine, allied to that of Bologne, ſhe had been ignominiouſly chaſtized, by the expreſs command of the king (30), who deteſted ſuch writings. In his elogy of Catherine de Medicis, he obſerves that this young lady died at court. He tells us, in another place, a remarkable thing of her. ‘During her ſickneſs, ſays he (31), of which ſhe died, ſhe never left off diſcourſing; for ſhe was a great talker, and of a ſatirical wit, which ſhe exerciſed very ſeaſonably and well, and was very handſome withal: when ſhe came to her dying hour, ſhe called her valet (for each of the maids of honour had one) whoſe name was Julian, and who play'd very well on the violin. Julian, ſaid ſhe, take the violin and play, till you ſee me dead (for I am going) The Defeat of the Swiſſe, the beſt you can. And when you come to the word all's loſt, play it four or five times over in the dolefuleſt note you can; which he did, and ſhe aſſiſted him with her voice, and when they came to all's loſt, ſhe repeated it twice, then turning herſelf to the other ſide of the bed, ſhe ſaid to her companions, all's loſt this inſtant in good earneſt, and ſo expired. Here is a merry pleaſant death; I have this ſtory from two of her companions, who are worthy of credit, and who ſaw the ſcene.’ They, who would give a catalogue of perſons, who have died jeſting, muſt not forget this young lady.

LINACER (THOMAS) an Engliſh Phyſician, and one of the learnedeſt perſons of the XVIth century [A], ſtudied at Florence under Demetrius Chalcondylus and Politian, and ſo remarkably diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his modeſty and genteel behaviour, that Lorenzo de Medicis made him the companion of his childrens ſtudies. He lived afterwards at Rome, and was in great eſteem with Hermolaus Barbarus. Being returned to England, he was appointed preceptor to prince Arthur, eldeſt Son to Henry VII, and dedicated to him the Latin Verſion of Proclus's Sphere [B]. He was pitched upon with two other Engliſhmen (a) for the tranſlating of Ariſtotle: but this deſign was abandoned by his companions. He tranſlated ſome tracts of Galen into Latin, and publiſhed a learned work de emendata Latini ſermonis ſtructura (C). He was Phyſician to the king of

[A] One of the learnedeſt perſons of the XVIth century.] Conſult Baillet and Pope Blount, who have collected the praiſes that had been given him, the former in the IVth Tome (1) of the Judgments of the Learned; the latter at the three hundred and ſeventy ſixth, and three hundred and ſeventy ſeventh pages of his Cenſura celebriorum authorum.

[B] He dedicated to prince Arthur, the Latin verſion of Proclus's ſphere.] Paul Jovius (2), and George Lilius (3), affirm it; and yet Eraſmus tells us, this book was dedicated to Henry VII, who made no account of it, becauſe an envious perſon had told him that it was not the firſt tranſlation of Proclus. ‘Thomæ Linacro peſſimè ceſſit quòd Proclum à ſe denuo verſum Regi hujus patri dicârat. Andreas quidam Tolaſates (4) præceptor Arcturi principis & in regnum paternum ſucceſſuri, niſi mors antevertiſſet, cœcus adulator, nec adulator tantum, ſed & delator peſſimus, Regem admonuit hoc libelli jam olim fuiſſe verſum à neſcio quo; & erat, ſed miſere. Hanc ob cauſam Rex & munus aſpernatus eſt, & in Linacrum velut in impoſtorem inexpiabile concepit odium (5). —— Linacer ſucceeded very ill in dedicating his new tranſlation of Proclus to the king, this prince's father. One Andrew of Toulouſe, tutor to prince Arthur, who would have ſucceeded his father, if he had lived, a blind flatterer, and not only a flatterer, but a ſcandalous informer, told the king, that this book had been tranſlated before; and it is true, it had been; but wretchedly. For this reaſon the king not only rejected the preſent, but conceived an inveterate hatred to Linacer as an impoſtor.’ Eraſmus tells us on this occaſion, a mad freek of Henry VII.

preface is wanting. It had been dedicated to the princeſs Mary, as we are aſſured in the following words (6): ‘ Sed & de emendata Latini ſermonis ſtructura, ex præſtantiſſimorum authorum obſervatione compoſitum volumen paulo antea, quàm vita excederet, publicavit, adſcripta præfatiuncula Mariæ Henrici Octavi ex Catharina Hiſpana conjuge filiæ, laudatiſſimæ indolis & admirabili virtutum omnium concentu ad omnem gratiam promerendam natæ Principi, cui renovato prudentiſſimi patris exemplo Henricus Rex Linacrum à tuenda ſanitate præfectum adhibuit. ——— Beſides, a little before his death, he publiſhed a book, De Emendata, &c. from what the beſt authors had obſerved, with a ſhort preface to Mary, daughter of Henry VIII, a princeſs of great abilities and virtues, to whom king Henry, after the example of his moſt prudent father, aſſigned Linacer as her Phyſician.’ Mr Baillet (7), citing the page, from whence I take this Latin, ſays, that the author relates, that Eraſmus and Budeus praiſed Linacer for having written this treatiſe. I do not find this in my edition.

[D] He bequeathed a houſe to the college of Phyſicians.] Theſe words are a tranſlation of thoſe of Goergius Lilius; Londini obiit, honeſta domo in ea urbe Medicorum Collegio ex teſtamento relicta (8). Paul Jovius expreſſes himſelf thus: Honeſtam domum Londini Medicorum Collegio dedicavit (9). Neither of them have been exact; for it ſhould have been ſaid, that Linacer built the College of Phyſicians at London, and was firſt preſident of it. This is what is affirmed in his epitaph (10). It is ſaid alſo, that he founded three public lectures in Phyſic, two at Oxford, and one at Cambridge.

[E] He died as the age of ſixty four.] I ſhould have ſaid that he died in February 1525, had I followed the account of an Engliſh author, which has been printed with Paul Jovius; for theſe are his words, ‘ Londini obiit . . . . ſepultus eſt in divi Pauli templo maximo, ad Septentrionalis portæ ingreſſum, eo fere tempore, quo Franciſcus Gallorum Rex ad Ticinum in Ciſalpinis pugnans, à Cæſareanis ducibus captus eſt (11). —— He died at London . . . . was buried in St Paul's church, at the entrance of the north gate, about the time when Francis, king of France, was taken by the Imperialiſts, at the battle of Pavia.’ But it is better to ſay, with Mr Moreri, that Thomas Linacer died the twentieth of October 1524. Pope Blunt ſays ſo too (12); and yet he mentions this Phyſician's epitaph, in which the day of his death is fixed to the ſeventh of October 1524.

[F] Eraſmus highly commends him, but makes him guilty of the ſame fault as Paulus Æmilius.] I paſs over the encomiums he has given him. They are to be found in his Ciceronianus, and in ſeveral places of his letters. I ſhall confine myſelf to his blaming him for having too nice a taſte. Nec multum abfuit ab hoc vitio, ſays he (13), after the words you have ſeen above (14), where he deſcribes the humour of the hiſtorian Paulus Æmilius, Thomas Linacrus Anglus, vir undequaque doctiſſimus. He wrote a letter to him in 1521, in which he intreats him not to make the public languiſh, and deprive it ſo long of the works which were impatiently expected from his pen. He tells him, that it is to be feared his conduct will be rather thought a cruelty, than a modeſt precaution. ‘ At tu, ſi mihi permittis, ut libere tecum agam, ſine fine premis tuas omnium eruditiſſimas lucubrationes, ut periculum ſit, ne pro cauto modeſtoque crudelis habearis, qui ſtudia hujus ſeculi tam lentâ torqueas expectatione tuorum laborum, ac tam diu fraudes deſideratiſſimo fructu tuorum voluminum. Fortaſſe terret te noſtrum exemplum, ſed etiam atque etiam vide, dum ſtudioſius vitas noſtram culpam, in diverſum deflectas (15). ——— But, to be free with you, by ſuppreſſing your learned writings, you run the riſque of being thought cruel, inſtead of cautious and modeſt, in that you keep us ſo long in expectation of your works. Perhaps my example deters you; but take care, leſt, by carefully avoiding my fault, you run not into the contrary.’ The fault our Linacer is blamed for is not very common with authors; and yet in ſome reſpects it may be thought too frequent; in general, it is not the bad or middling authors that are guilty of it, but the moſt excellent pens. It were to be wiſhed, that they, who publiſh ſo many bad pieces, and ill digeſted works, which are hardly of any uſe to the Republic of Letters, would overſtrain the maxim, That one ought to let a writing lie by in his cloſet for nine years (16). It were well if ſuch would run into an exceſs of delicacy, and never think they had finiſhed a compoſition. It rarely happens that they have a thought of this kind, though, if they frequently had, no one would be ſorry for it. But it is a misfortune that a moſt ingenious man ſhould be like that famous Painter, who never knew when his pictures were finiſhed, and whoſe failing Apelles knew ſo well: ‘ Cum Protogenis opus immenſi laboris ac curæ ſupra modum anxiæ miraretur (Apelles) dixit . . . . omnia ſibi cum illo paria eſſe aut illi meliora: ſed uno ſe præſtare, quod manum ille de tabula non ſciret tollere: memorabili præcepto, nocere ſæpe nimiam diligentiam (17). ——— Apelles, admiring the too laboured and over-finiſhed work of Protogenes, ſaid . . . . . that himſelf either equalled, or was excelled by Protogenes; but that in one particular he exceeded Protogenes, in that the latter never knew when to have done: a remarkable precept, that too much diligence is hurtful.’ Theſe words of Pliny are excellent; they contain a proverb, which Eraſmus applies to the learned, of Linacer's taſte, and teach us, that a too forced and obſtinate exactneſs often mars the whole work. I will give you Eraſmus's application of it. ‘ Peculiariter autem conveniet (proverbium, manum de tabula) in quoſdam ſcriptores plus ſatis accuratos, & moroſæ cujuſdam diligentiæ, qui ſine fine premunt ſuas lucubrationes, ſemper aliquid addentes, adimentes, immutantes, & hoc ipſo maxime peccantes, quia nihil peccare conantur (18). —— The proverb (manum de tabula) is very applicable to certain writers, more accurate than enough, and auſterely careful, who are for ever altering their works, and offending in the very endeavour not to offend.’ But what comes of this over ſcrupulous exactneſs? why, much loſs to the public, and much prejudice to the authors who aim at it. The public is too long deprived of the good it might reap from the compoſitions of great authors, even tho' they ſhould fall ſhort of the perfection which they might have given them; nay, it is often deprived of them for ever; becauſe they die, before they have diſpoſed of them in a method, from whence their friends, or executors, might draw any advantage. They, who compoſe with too difficult a judgment, and correct their productions with extream ſeverity, are at laſt diſcouraged by the labour, and afraid of touching their own work. They look on it as a rack, and painful buſineſs, and delay as much as poſſible the ſetting their hand to it; the remembrance of the fatigue they have been at in altering one page, makes them dread the event; ſo they ſuffer whole months to paſs without returning to the painful task; and thus, while we imagine that their book is far advanced, becauſe we know it has been in hand for ten or twelve years, nothing is found except perhaps ſome rough draughts, and disjointed pieces; and it often happens, that they die before the work has received it's form. Hereby they deprive themſelves of the glory they might aſpire to. Some are more happy; they are indefatigable, and by aſſiduous filing and poliſhing their compoſitions, without any intermiſſion, they at laſt find them worthy of public notice; but the pains they are at to pleaſe themſelves very often mars all; for there is a certain degree of correctneſs, beyond which nothing can be done, but what, inſtead of perfecting the work, and giving it more nerves and ſtrength, weakens and diſpirits it. ‘ Perfectum opus abſolutumque eſt, nec jam ſplendeſcit limâ, ſed atteritur (19).

is, of being not eaſily ſatisfied with his own works, and reviſing and touching them over too often.

‘ —— It is a perfect and finiſhed work; but the file, inſtead of brightening, has worn it away.’ Pliny the younger, who uſes theſe words in one of his letters, makes uſe of the ſame thought in another place, to ſhew his friend the miſchief of an over-correctneſs. ‘ Diligentiam tuam in retractandis operibus valde probo. Eſt tamen aliquis modus, primum, quod nimia cura deterit magis, quam emendat; deinde, quod nos à recentioribus revocat, ſimulque nec abſolvit priora, & inchoare poſteriora non patitur. Vale (20). —— I very much approve your diligence in reviſing your works. Yet is there ſome meaſure to be obſerved; firſt, becauſe too much care rather ſpoils, than amends; in the next place, becauſe it neither ſuffers you to finiſh one piece, nor begin another.’ Quintilian, another great maſter, lays down the ſame principle, and explains it admirably, and declares, that a writing, by continual mending and new molding, loſes it's natural force. The ſound parts, ſays he, are cut off, the blood drained, and it looks like a body covered with ſcars: how fine is his expreſſion! ‘ Et ipſa emendatio finem habet. Sunt enim qui ad omnia ſcripta tanquam vitioſa redeant; & quaſi nihil fas ſit rectum eſſe quod primum eſt, melius exiſtiment quicquid eſt aliud, idque faciant quoties librum in manus reſumpſerint, ſimiles medicis etiam integra ſecantibus. Accidit itaque ut cicatricoſa ſint, & exanguia, & cura pejora. Sit igitur aliquando quod placeat, aut certè quod ſufficiat; ut opus poliat lima, non exterat (21).’ The Orator Calvus was an inſtance of this. He ſet up too ſevere a court of Inquiſition againſt his own writings, and by diſciplining them over rigorouſly, and to a degree of ſuperſtition, broke the conſtitution, and even the heart of them. ‘ Accuratius quoddam dicendi & exquiſitius afferebat genus: quod quanquam ſcienter eleganterque tractabat, nimium tamen inquirens in ſe, atque ipſe ſeſe obſervans, metuenſque ne vitioſum colligeret, etiam verum ſanguinem deperdebat. Itaque ejus oratio, nimia religione attenuata, &c. (22) ——— He ſet the example of a more accurate and correct ſtile; in which though he excelled, yet, by too ſeverely criticiſing himſelf, and ſtudying, to avoid faults, he loſt real beauties. Thence his ſtile was weakened thro' too much niceneſs.’ Quintilian calls it ſelf-calumny (23). Here is a metaphor, which a modern author has made uſe of on this occaſion. ‘ There are ſome barren wits, ſays he, who, having made an effort once in their life, never leave combing it, till they have plucked the very hairs off, and after all it proves an abortion (24).’ We may reckon Sannazar in the number of the moderns, who have been troubled with Calvus the Orator's diſtemper. ‘ We cannot forbear blaming this Poet's making his poem groan and cry under the file for ſo long together, and his having too much worn and weakened it, under pretence of poliſhing it more and more (25).’

The remarks I have made on this occaſion, will not be thought foreign by thoſe who conſider what I had to prove. I was to ſhew, that the pains Linacer took to ſatisfy himſelf in his compoſitions was a fault. This ſeeming a paradox, it was neceſſary to reaſon upon it, and to produce authorities. But I deſire it may be remembered, that this does not univerſally reſpect all thoſe, who vigorouſly apply themſelves to refine and reform their writings. They do well, and are very commendable, provided they run not into exceſs (26). The only thing that can with any colour of reaſon be blamed, is the intemperance in this point. Non amo nimium diligentes, ſaid a noble perſon among the antient Romans (27). I have two things to ſay before I conclude. There are ſome authors, who are a hundred times harder to be pleaſed in the beginning, than in the ſequel of their work. Raſures, blots, alterations, and other ſymptoms of a diſſatisfied judgment, appear chiefly in the firſt lines of the original. This has been obſerved in the manuſcript of a tract of Plato (28), and of that of Petrarch. Here is a paſſage of Muretus, in which Arioſto is taxed with the ſame nicety. ‘ Audivi à maximis viris, quique id facillime noſſe poterant. Ludovicum Arioſtum, nobiliſſimum nobiliſſime domus præconem, in duobus primis grandioris illius poematis ſui verſibus plus quam credi poteſt laboraſſe, neque ſibi prius animum explere potuiſſe, quam cum illos in omnem partem diu multumque verſaſſet. Idem accidit & nobiliſſimo Etruſcorum poetarum Franciſco Petrarchæ: cujus ex autographo, quod habuit vir præſtantiſſimus Petrus Bembus, facile cernitur, eum in limando ſecundo item poematum ſuorum verſu ſæpe ſudaſſe (29). ——— I have been told by very great men, and ſuch as could very eaſily know it, that Lewis Arioſto took incredible pains about the two firſt verſes of that greater poem of his, nor was ſatisfied till he had turned them every way. The ſame happened to the famous Tuſcan Poet Francis Petrarch: from whoſe own manuſcript, in the hands of Peter Bembus, it is eaſily ſeen, that he took repeated pains in poliſhing the ſecond verſe of his poems.’ Mr de Vigneul Marville ſays, ‘ there are writers, who are infinitely at a loſs how to begin, but run apace, when once the way is opened. The firſt lines of Thuanus's hiſtory coſt him more pains than all the reſt; but, when once he had conquered that difficulty, he made great ſpeed.’ The other thing I have to ſay, is, that there are authors, who, reviſing a work they deſire to reprint, are at greater pains, than at the firſt compoſition. They apply themſelves with more pleaſure and ſcrupulouſneſs to correct a printed copy, than a manuſcript. But for the moſt part it is loſt labour; for there are few, who compare editions, and, unleſs they be patiently and ſkillfully compared, the importance of the corrections is not perceived. Such a place of a ſecond edition, which contains no more lines than the firſt, or even not ſo many, is changed from lead to gold (30); but where are thoſe, who perceive this? I have ſpoke elſewhere (31) of thoſe, who write with difficulty, or without it, and I ſhall ſpeak of them again elſewhere (32).

LINGELSHEIM (GEORGE MICHAEL) Preceptor, and afterwards counſellor to the elector Palatine (a), flouriſhed in the beginning of the XVIIth century. He was born at Straſburg (b). He has been reckoned the author of a book, intituled, Idolum Hallenſe, in which Lipſius is ſeverely handled [A]. He held a correſpondence by letters

(b) Ibid. pag. m. 162.

[A] He has been reckoned the author of a book . . . in which Lipſius is ſeverely handled.] He ſent copies of it to his friends (1), and demanded their opinion of it with an eagerneſs, as if he had been the author. It was therefore excuſable to judge him the author of the Idolum Hallenſe. Scaliger, that great critic, went upon other reaſons; he thought he diſcovered Lingelſheim's genius in this work. Autor de Idolo Hallenſi eſt Lingelſheim, ſaid he (2). He it was that ſent me a copy . . . . I diſcover in the Idolum Hallenſe the turns of Lingelſheim's wit; I know him very well; he ſent me the book, and deſired me to write him my judgment on it. This was what he ſaid in converſation; he confirmed it in a letter he wrote to Lingelſheim, concerning the Idolum Hallenſe (3), in which he aſcribed this work to him, and commended him much for it; but he was afterwards informed, that Denaiſius was the author of it. Lingelſheim, ſaid he (4), wrote to me, that Denaiſius, aſſeſſor of the Imperial chamber, is the author of the Idolum Hallenſe; and, becauſe he lives among the Jeſuits, he deſires not to be named. Mr Placcius has very well obſerved, that the judgment of this top-critic was not always to be relied upon. ‘ Hac ſane vice erravit, & infeliciter criſin ſuam, quam ipſemet tantopere prædicare ſolebat, exercuit Heros ille Criticorum Hypercriticus (5). ——— For this time at leaſt he was miſtaken; and this hypercritical hero of critics employed his judgment, which he ſo cried up, unſucceſsfully.’ He cites Melchior Adam (6), who has aſcribed this work to it's true author Peter Denaiſius: he obſerves, that Colomiés was ignorant of the truth of this affair, having ſaid, in two places (7), that Lingelſheim was the author of this book. Baudius conjectured like Scaliger, affirming, that the public voice was agreeable to his conjecture; ſo true it is, that the ſkillfuleſt are ſubject to err, in conjectures of

of this kind. 'Viro gravi & ſapienti Johanni Lingelſhemio officioſam ſalutem nunciari cupio. Conſentiens fama eſt eum eſſe auctorem libelli de Idolo Hallenſi adverſus Lipſium, & id ipſe conjeceram cum primum in manus meas venit. Non eſt quod patrem pudeat ſuæ prolis, cum non puduerit tantum virum tales nugas effutire in dedecus antepartæ famæ (8). —— I deſire you would complement the learned Lingelſheim in my name. It is generally reported, that he is the author of the book intituled, The Idol of Hall, againſt Lipſius, and I gueſſed ſo when it firſt came into my hands. A father need never be aſhamed of his offspring, ſince ſo great a man was not aſhamed to publiſh ſuch trifles to the diſgrace of the character he formerly obtained.' Mr Teiſſier (9) has followed the crowd. In all appearance, Lingelſheim told Bongars, that Denaiſius was the author of this Idol of Hall; ſee his 157th letter. For the reſt, this book was printed in 1605, in 4to, with this title, Diſſertatio de Idolo Hallenſi Juſti Lipſii mangonio & phaleris exornato atque producto. I have read in a letter of Lingelſheim (10), that Goldaſt was thought the author of this book, and that the Amphitheatrum honoris aſcribes it to Scaliger. Another letter of Lingelſheim informs us, that Goldaſt had the care of the impreſſion, and that this created him many enemies; for this book exaſperated the Jeſuits beyond meaſure. 'Quam gaudeo probari tibi ſcriptum de Idolo, certe omnium bonorum cum magno applauſu acceptus eſt; ſed facetiæ illæ ſcholaſticæ commoverunt noſtros Academicos, adeo ut Rector diſtractionem libelli edicto inhibuerit, & jam vindictam ſpirant magiſtri, eo quod nimis contumelioſus ſit interpres in totum ordinem, & quia Goldaſtum editorem hujus ludi ex typographo cognoverunt, & ſtilis & telis in illum inſurgunt, atque etiam aulicos in partes trahunt, quos nimis ruſticatim ille tetigerit (11). —— I am pleaſed that you approve the book of the Idol; it meets with a general applauſe; but our Academicians are ſo offended at theſe ſcholaſtic jeſts, that the rector has prohibited the ſale of the book, and the maſters now breathe revenge, becauſe the commentator is too ſevere upon the whole order, and they know that Goldaſt publiſhed it; and they even draw the courtiers to their ſide, whom he has too bluntly attacked.' In another letter he obſerves, that the Carmelite (12), who anſwered for Juſtus Lipſius, caſt a thouſand reproaches upon Bongars, and looked on him as author of the Idol. Lingelſheim would have had Bongars demand juſtice againſt him from the French embaſſador: 'Indignatus ſum quum reperi anagramma ſus obnigra, ubi monaſtico acumine ſuſpicionem ſuam prodit quaſi tu autor eſſes. Cogitavi, anne per Oratorem Regium qui Bruxellæ eſt, ſi eſt tibi amicus, negotium beſtiæ illi creari poſſet ob atroces injurias quas in te effundit, cum tamen author libri non ſis, & quam voluptatem in maledicendo cepit, eandem in lite moleſta & infamia quæ condemnatos injuriarum manet, perdat (13). —— It moved my indignation, when I met with the anagram ſus obnigra, in which, with a monkiſh ſharpneſs, he betrays his ſuſpicion as if you were the author. I conſidered, whether you might not haraſs him by means of the king's embaſſador at Bruſſels, if he is your friend, in revenge for the reproaches he throws upon you, though you be not the author of the book, and rob him of the pleaſure he has taken in calumniating by the diſgrace attending thoſe who are convicted of calumny.' Lipſius anſwered nothing: it was the beſt thing he could do; his friends turn this ſilence to his honour; they ſaid he generouſly deſpiſed his adverſary, and, like a maſtiff who keeps on his way, without turning aſide to worry a little cur that barks at him he would not leſſen himſelf by a conteſt with this anonymous author. This is the general way of ſpeaking, when people know not what to anſwer. 'Exinde maledicta acerbiora neſcio quis terræ filius, Idoli Hallenſis (ô Lucianeam blaſphemiam igne Tartareo expiandam!) titulo ementito, ſparſit in vulgus. Sed prudentoribus amicis ſuadentibus, LIPSIUS ſiluit, & judicio contemſit, atque adeò contemptu ſolo novum iſtum Porphyrium vincendum eſſe cenſuit. Sic fere generoſior moloſſus importunum catulum ſtolide adlatrantem præterit, nec dente aut pugna dignatur (14).'

[B] It is a miſtake to affirm, that he was Bongars's ſecretary, and that he publiſhed the letters, which paſſed between them.] I ſay this againſt the learned Mr Morhof, whoſe words are theſe (15): 'Bongarſii & Lingelheimii (16) epiſtolæ, editæ ſunt Argentor. ann. 1660. in 12 (17). Erat Bongarſius vir ſuo tempore magni nominis ſub Henrico IV, negotiis publicis ſæpe admotus . . . . Lingelheimius itidem vir in publica dignitate conſtitutus, & ad Helvetios legatus, olim Bongarſio ab epiſtolis literas Bongarſianas una cum ſuis publicavit; fuit enim inter illos commercium literarum mutuum. —— The letters of Bongars and Lingelſheim were publiſhed at Strasburgh in 1660, in 12mo. Bongars was a man of a great reputation in the reign of Henry IV, being often employed in public affairs . . . . Lingelſheim likewiſe bore a public character, being ſent embaſſador to the Swiſs: he likewiſe publiſhed the epiſtolary correſpondence between himſelf and Bongars.' Compare this with the Bookſeller's preface, and you will wonder how ingenious men ſhould be impoſed upon in ſo egregious a manner. The fate of authors is deplorable; for even when they fancy they apply their ſtrongeſt attention, they miſtake the ſenſe of a moſt eaſy paſſage: I much fear, this has often been my own misfortune. Here is what the Bookſeller of Straſburg declares before his edition. 'Leges hic Bongarſii & Lingelſhemii Epiſtolas multa eruditione & variis prudentiæ documentis plenas, beneficio Nobiliſſimi Ampliſſimæque dignitatis viri qui Inclytæ Reip. ad Helvetios legatus à clariſſimo viro Dn. Franciſco Veyrazio eas ut lucem viderent, accepit. Has venerandus hic ſenex qui in contubernio illuſtris Bongarſii duodecim annos, eidem ab epiſtolis vixerat, deſcripſit integras. —— You will here read the learned and judicious letters of Bongars and Lingelſheim; for which we are indebted to a very great man, who, being embaſſador to the Swiſs, received them from the learned Francis Veiraz, in order to publiſh them. This venerable old man, who lived twelve years with the illuſtrious Bongars, and wrote his letters for him, tranſcribed them entire.' The Bookſeller ſpeaks here of two perſons; of the firſt without naming him, and of the ſecond under the name of Francis Veiraz. The latter gave the letters to the other, who had been ſent on a deputation from the town of Straſburg to the Swiſs cantons. It is doubtleſs of Veiraz, that we muſt underſtand what the Bookſeller declares in the laſt part of the paſſage before-mentioned: it is he who was ſecretary to Bongars twelve years; it is he who copied the letters, which this Bookſeller publiſhed. Lingelſheim had been long dead, when they ſaw the light. Thus Mr Morhof is miſtaken ſeveral ways (18).

LINGENDES (CLAUDIUS DE)

LINGENDES (CLAUDIUS DE) one of the moſt famous preachers of the XVIIth century, was born at Moulins in 1591, and became a Jeſuit at Lyons in 1607. He taught Rhetoric and the Belles Lettres for ſome time; but, as he had a wonderful talent for the pulpit, he applied himſelf moſtly to preaching, and got ſuch a reputation, that few preachers were thought to equal, but none to excel him (a). He was rector of the college of Moulins for eleven years, and afterwards provincial of the province of France. He was thrice deputed to Rome, to the general aſſemblies of the ſociety, and died at Paris, ſuperior of the profeſſed houſe, the 12th of April 1660 (b), not in the year 1666, as Moreri aſſures us. His ſermons were publiſhed after his death. I ſhall ſay ſomething of them them that is very remarkable [A]. He publiſhed but two books [B].

[A] I ſhall ſay ſomething of his ſermons that is remarkable.] I ſhall only ſet down what Mr Gallois has ſaid, ſpeaking of the ſermons upon all the Lent goſpels, by the reverend Father de Lingendes, printed at Paris in two volumes in Octavo, in 1666. 'It is very ſurprizing that Father de Lingendes, whoſe eloquence all France admired, ſhould never ſtudy his expreſſions, but was ſo unconcerned in this point, that he compoſed in Latin, the ſermons he was to preach in French: the truth is, this great man conſidered only the force of reaſoning, the vehemency of the paſſions and the nobleneſs of his figures; he was of the opinion of that antient, who looked upon a diſcourſe as finiſhed, when he had nothing to provide, but the words. After the death of this father, ſeveral of his ſermons were publiſhed, which were found written with his own hand, and there are already two editions of them (1). But that language not being underſtood by every body, a great many wiſhed they might ſee them in French. The thing ſeemed to be the eaſier, as there would not be ſo much as the trouble of tranſlating them. For his ſermons, having been copied by ſeveral tranſcribers, as he preached them, it was thought there was no more to do, but to collect and publiſh them juſt as they found them. Nevertheleſs, the diverſity, which appeared between the different copies of the ſame ſermons, ſhewed that they were not faithfully taken; it was therefore thought proper to tranſlate theſe ſermons from the original Latin, yet without neglecting theſe French manuſcripts, the expreſſions whereof have been retained as near as poſſible. The tranſitions have alſo been added, the poliſhing, and ſome few ornaments, with which the heat of diſcourſe furniſhed him, and which are found in all the manuſcripts of the writers, though not in the Latin text: ſo that the French edition is not a bare tranſlation of the Latin. But the difference between them is, that the Latin gives theſe ſermons juſt as the author wrote them; the French as they were delivered from the pulpit: the firſt ſhews the analyſis of the diſcourſe, the ſecond the parts joined together; the one is more uſeful to thoſe who would make ſermons, the other properer for thoſe who would only read them. The Latin edition is alſo much larger than the French. For of all the ſermons in the former, only the moſt excellent have been culled out, and juſt as many as are to make a courſe for Lent (2).'

[B] He publiſhed but two books.] One in Latin, and the other in French. Votivum monumentum ab urbe Molinenſi Delphino oblatum anno, 1639, in 4to. Counſels for the conduct of life.

(1) The firſt is of the year 1661, in 4to. Two years after they publiſhed ten ſermons of this Jeſuit on the Holy Sacrament, which were afterwards printed in French, as well as his Lent-ſermons.

LINGENDES (JOHN DE) native of Moulins, and couſin to the former, was a celebrated preacher, and by that means roſe to the biſhopric of Sarlat, and afterwards to that of Mâcon. He made the funeral oration of Lewis XIII at St Denis. It was printed a little after (a). He was preceptor to the count de Moret [A], natural ſon to Henry IV in 1619. The poet de LINGENDES was his couſin [B]. This family is ſtill in being [C].

(a) See the abbot de Marolles, in the catalogue of the authors who had preſented him with their books.

[A] He was appointed preceptor to the count de Moret.] 'He did not ſtay long with him the firſt time; for by I know not what underhand management, againſt the intention even of Madam the counteſs of Moret, and her brothers the chevalier de Bueil, and de la Perriere, Croſilles was ſubſtituted in his place, who had formerly been the moſt agreeable perſon in the world to them. The count ſuffered this change, though he loved de Lingendes; but he did not hate Croſilles, and thought it beſt to obey the king chearfully . . . . . . Afterwards de Lingendes was reſtored (1).'

[B] The Poet de LINGENDES was his couſin.] Here is what the ſame abbot de Marolles ſays of him (2). 'He wrote with reputation in 1607, and 1610; and we have a poem of his upon the birth of the duke of Retelois, and that other ſo famous upon the baniſhment of Ovid, which is prefixed to Nicolas Renouard's tranſlation of the Metamorphoſis.' By ſtriving to imitate Politian, if we believe Colletet (3), he became at laſt more polite in ſome of his pieces, than Politian himſelf.

[C] This family is ſtill in being.] NICOLAS DE LINGENDES, brother to the biſhop of Sarlat, was ſteward of the king's houſhold. He was ſent into Spain to negotiate the marriage of Lewis XIII with Anne of Auſtria. His firſt wife was Mary d'Abra de Raconis, aunt to Charles de Raconis, biſhop of Lavaur, and he had by her CHARLES DE LINGENDES, ſteward to the king, ſub-dean of the knights of St Michael, and father to JOHN AUGUSTINE DE LINGENDES, captain of horſe (4).

LIPPOMAN (ALOISIO) a native of Venice [A], was one of the learned prelates of the XVIth century. He diſcharged ſeveral nunciatures with the reputation of an able miniſter. The firſt was, as I take it, that of Portugal. He was biſhop of Modon, and coadjutor of Verona, when he was ſent from Bologna to Rome, together with ſome other prelates (a), to plead in the cauſe about tranſlating the council in 1548 [B]. He gave his opinion peremptorily in this aſſembly againſt the plurality of benefices, as Father Paul obſerves (b), who, beſides, gives him the commendation of having lived exemplarily (c). After the interruption of the councils (d), he was ſent nuncio into Germany in 1548, from whence Pope Julius III recall'd him two years after (e). The year following, he made him one of the three preſidents of the council (f). Paul IV ſent him into Poland in 1556, to ſtop the progreſs of the proteſtants (g). He preferred him to the biſhopric of Bergamo in 1558, and made him his ſecretary (h). Lippoman died the 15th of Auguſt 1559 (i). He publiſhed ſeveral books [C]. It is ſaid, that he exerciſed

[B] He was ſent . . . . . to Rome . . . . . . to plead in the cauſe about the tranſlating the council.] The legates of the Pope, being unwilling to continue the council of Trent, would have it removed to Bologna, and ſome biſhops, not approving of that adjournment, remained at Trent. Hereupon the legates deputed a certain number of biſhops to the Pope, to give an account of their conduct. Lippoman was one of thoſe deputies (2).

[C] He publiſhed ſeveral books.] The moſt conſiderable, if I miſtake not, are Catena Sanctorum Patrum in Geneſim & in Exodum. The Catena in Geneſim, was printed at Paris, in folio (3), 'by Charlotte Guillard, in the year 1546. It is a very good impreſſion. He came himſelf to Paris to ſpeak with the widow, and prevailed with her to poſtpone a great work (4), which the univerſity impatiently expected, to go on with the impreſſion of the ſecond volume, Catena in Exodum, which was finiſhed in 1555. It is printed in the ſame form, and with the ſame beauty, as the former. Theſe editions are intermixed with Greek, Hebrew, and all ſorts of good characters.

characters.’ I know not how to reconcile this with ſeveral good catalogues, which ſay, that the Catena in Exodum was printed at Paris, in the year 1550. Lippoman's other works are, Catena in aliquot Pſalmos. A compilation of lives of the ſaints, in eight volumes. Confirmatione di tutti gli dogmi Catholici, con la ſubverſione di tutti i fondamenti delli moderni heretici, at Venice, 1553. Eſpoſitioni volgari ſopra il ſimbolo apoſtolica, il pater noſtro, &c.

[D] It is ſaid, that he exerciſed great cruelty againſt the ſectaries . . . . . . in Poland.] According to the author, whom I am about to cite, Lippoman was the firſt apoſtolic nuncio, that was ſeen in this country. He put to death ſome Jews, to terrify the Heretics. He ſuborned and bribed certain accuſers, who made oath, that a woman had ſold an hoſt to ſome Jews, and that theſe miſcreants had, with the prickings of needles, drawn a vial of blood from it, to heal the wound of circumciſion. The king's order was ſurreptitiouſly obtained for burning them. They inſiſted on their innocence at the ſtake. The king, being informed how the matter was carried, conceived a great indignation againſt Lippoman. Neverthele∫s, a narrative of the whole affair was drawn up in the king's name, and ſent to Rome, to ſwell the catalogue of miracles in the archives. I ſhall ſet down the words of a Poliſh writer, who tells us this. He begins by reproaching Lippoman with his mean extraction (5). ‘ Primus id officii apud nos geſſit Aloyſius Lipomanus Venetus, homo, ut facta teſtantur, pervicax & crudelis. Quod tanto minus mirandum, quando Aſperius nihil eſt humili cum ſurgit in altum. Dicebatur enim eum incerto parte fuiſſe natum. Hunc quamprimum Nuncii Terrarum in Comitio viderent, extemplo eum compellarunt: Salve progenies viperarum. Talem ſe reipſa fuiſſe Lipomanus probavit. Videns enim dogma eorum de Sanctiſſimo, ut vocant, Sacramento in magno verſari diſcrimine, coacto Loviciam Pontificum omnis generis conventu, è re ſua judicarunt exemplum ſeveritatis, vel potius feritatis, ad incutiendum populo ſibi parenti metum, & diſſentientibus horrorem in aliquo ex infima vulgi fece ideoque impunius ſtatui. . . . . . Hinc impetu in Judæos quàm odio publico laborantes, tam innocentiæ præſidiis defectos, facto, tres è grege eorum & fœminam quandam Dorotheam Laziciam in vincula conjecerunt. Capita accuſationis hæc fuerunt: Laziciam cum de more ſolenni ante Paſchatos feſtum ad Sacram communionem accederet, occultatam in ore hoſtiam Judæis vendidiſſe: hos acubus eam confixiſſe: inde ampullam ſanguinis, quo ad ſanandum infantium circumciſorum vulnus opus habeant, collegiſſe. . . . . . (6). Mandata nomine Regio ad Borcum (7) per diſpoſitos equites miſere, ut Judæos ex mente Legati Apoſtolici & Spiritus S. (ſcilicet) concilium Lovicenſe regentis ad rogum damnaret. Lata in Judæos ſententia. “ Hi ad rogum deducti palam liberè dicere: Nunquam nos hoſtiam emimus vel acubus confiximus: Nos enim nequaquam credimus hoſtiæ ineſſe Dei corpus: Imò ſcimus Deo nullum corpus, ſanguinemve eſſe: & more Majorum credimus, Meſſiam non futurum fuiſſe ipſum Deum, ſed ejus unctum & Legatum: Compertum quoque habemus farinæ nihil ineſſe ſanguinis. Teſtamur ad ultimum nos nullo ſanguine opus habere.” His auditis crudelitatis Lipomanianæ & Pontificiæ adminiſtri picem ardentem ori miſerorum infuderunt. Tam horrendum omni ex parte facinus monumentis Romanis inſertum & pro miraculo vulgatum, Regis nomine, ad conciliandam rei fictæ fidem, adpoſito. Id ſcripti à Myſcovio traditum Regi, indignationem & iram ejus excivit, animumque à Lipomano avertit. Huic rex in os dicere non erubuit, ſe facinus illud imane deteſtari; & nequaquam adeò mente captum eſſe, ut hoſtiæ iſti ſanguinem ineſſe credat. ——— Aloyſio Lipoman was the firſt, who bore this office among us; a man, as his actions teſtify, of perverſeneſs and cruelty. Which is the leſs to be wondered at, as nothing is ſo inſolent as a mean man exalted to a high ſtation. For it was ſaid, that it was not known who was his father. No ſooner did he appear in the aſſembly, but he was ſaluted, by the nuncios of the Palatinates, with, Hail offspring of vipers! And indeed Lipoman proved himſelf ſuch. For ſeeing their doctrine concerning the moſt holy ſacrament, as they call it, to be in danger, they, in a general aſſembly of the Roman Catholic prieſts at Lowitz, reſolved to make a ſevere example of ſome one among the vulgar, in order to terrify the reſt; which they thought they might the more ſafely do . . . . . Hence taking occaſion to attack the Jews, who were not only publickly hated, but deſtitute of the defence of innocence, they impriſoned three of them, together with a woman named Dorothea Lazinski. The heads of their accuſation were, that Lazinski, coming to the ſacrament before Eaſter, had ſold the hoſt, which ſhe kept concealed in her mouth, to the Jews; that the latter had pricked it with needles; and thence had collected a veſſel full of blood, which they wanted to cure the wounds occaſioned by circumciſion in infants . . . . . They ſent the king's mandate by horſe-men to Borcus, the governor, ordering him, in obedience to the decree of the apoſtolic nuncio, and the Holy Ghoſt (an't pleaſe you) preſiding in the council of Lowitz, to condemn the Jews to be burnt. Sentence was accordingly paſſed upon the Jews. When they were brought to the ſtake, they made this free and open declaration: “ We never bought the hoſt, nor pricked it with needles; for we by no means believe the body of God to be in the hoſt; nay, we know, that God has no body, nor blood; and, after the opinion of our fore-fathers, we believe, that the Meſſiah will not be God himſelf, but his anointed, and meſſenger: we likewiſe know full well, that there is no blood in bread-corn: and we affirm to the laſt, that we have no need of blood.” When they had ſaid this, the miniſters of Lipoman's and the Papiſts cruelty, poured burning pitch down theſe poor wretches throats: and this horrid act was inſerted in the Roman archives, and publiſhed as a miracle, the king's name being put to it, to gain belief to a fiction. The king being informed of the matter, by letters from Miſcouski, was enraged, and conceived great indignation againſt Lipoman. He even told him to his face, that he deteſted that abominable action, and that he never was ſo ſenſeleſs, as to believe there was any blood in that hoſt.’ Du Sauſſai takes notice, that Lippoman was ſo hated by the ſectaries, that he had like to have loſt his liſe ſeveral times by aſſaſſinations (8). Spondanus (9) pretends, that the miracle, manifeſted at that time on the hoſt in the hands of theſe wretched Jews, was founded on three reaſons: the laſt was, that the nuncio Lippoman, vilified by the libels of the Heretics, and running the riſk of his life, ſtood in need of ſuch a providence, to procure him a greater authority. Staniſlaus Hoſius, biſhop of Warmia, expreſſed great indignation at Peter Paul Vergier, who dedicating a book to the king of Poland, had challenged Lippoman the apoſtolic nuncio to a public diſpute, whereof the king was to be judge (10).

LIPSIUS (Justus) was one of the learnedeſt critics that flouriſhed in the XVIth century. I could relate a great many curious things concerning him; but as others (a) have already collected them, and have not even forgot what relates to his education, and early attainments (b), I think my ſelf obliged to ſpeak only of their omiſſions. One of the greateſt faults Lipſius is reproached with, is his inconſtancy in point of religion [A]. They

They ground that reproach on this, that being born a Catholic, he embraced Lutheraniſm, whilſt he was profeſſor at Iëna (c). Afterwards, being returned into Brabant, he lived there as a Catholic, and then having accepted a profeſſorſhip in the univerſity of Leyden, made profeſſion of what they call Calviniſm. Sicuti & evenit, teſte illius libro de invocanda Hallenſi Maria (1). —— Of this unſettled Pelargic way of thinking in religion was that other Lucian, the ſubtle Epicurean Philoſopher, Juſtus Lipſius, formerly my colleague, and profeſſor of Rhetoric in the univerſity of Iëna, in Thuringia, where he pretended to be very fond of the Lutheran religion, and ſwore that he looked upon the doctrine of Luther to be the one, eternal and, divine truth, and condemned the idolatry and blaſphemy of the Romiſh Antichriſt. But, coming to Leyden, he apoſtatized, like Pelargus, and denied the truth he had acknowledged and approved; tho' this he diſowned, ſaying that he was a Chriſtian, and had neither forſaken, nor denied Chriſt. This I can with truth ſay and affirm of this man. For, when, in the year 1582, in the ſummer ſeaſon, upon my return from Antwerp, I paid him a viſit in the univerſity of Leyden, where he was profeſſor, and asked him what account he could give of his apoſtacy from the true religion, which he had confeſſed at Iëna, in 1572, and from Chriſt, whom he had denied and forſaken; he anſwered me in his own houſe, and in the preſence of Henry Latomus, formerly preacher at Antwerp; my friend Schluſſelburg, once my colleague, I have not denied nor forſaken Chriſt, tho' here I do not profeſs the Lutheran doctrine, but follow the Calviniſts. For all religion and no religion are alike to me: and with me the Lutheran and Calviniſt doctrines walk an equal pace. Being ſhocked at this declaration. I ſaid: my friend Lipſius, if you continue in this opinion, it will go ill with you; and I eaſily believe, ſince you are indifferent to both religions, that you will at laſt be a Papiſt, as you was at firſt. To which he replied, it was equal to him. And ſo it happened; witneſs his book concerning the invocation of the Virgin Mary of Hall.' Obſerve, by the way, in theſe words, the extravagant zeal of a rigid Lutheran. Schluſſelburg calls the change from a Lutheran to a Calviniſt, apoſtacy, and the denying of Jeſus Chriſt. I might cite a great many writers, who, upon the chapter of religion, look upon Lipſius as a weather-cock; but let it ſuffice to produce here the judgment of Boeclerus, and the advice he gives young ſtudents. ‘ Non fuerit operæ pretium, ſays he (2), ſingula examinare, cum potius univerſim monendi ſint Juvenes ſtudioſi, ne tales quæſtiones Lipſio velint magiſtro diſcere, qui ubique ſibi ſimilis eſt, id eſt, in Re Theologica aut quocunque modo ad Religionem pertinente lubricus, anceps, vagus, in omnes formas mutabilis: qui modo aliquid largiri, modo adimere rurſum cupiat, id quod neceſſe eſt accidere homini vera religione ſerio nunquam imbuto, Sacrarumque litterarum penitus experti. —— It would not be worth while to examine particulars, when young ſtudents are rather to be admoniſhed in the general, not to ſtudy ſuch queſtions under the inſtruction of Lipſius, who is every where conſiſtent with himſelf, that is, in matters of Divinity, or any way relating to religion doubtful, wandring, and ready to take any ſhape: who now conſents, now retracts; which muſt neceſſarily be the caſe of a man who never thought ſeriouſly about the true religion, and quite ignorant of the holy writings.'

[B] He diſcovered his bigotry in his printed books.] One of theſe books is intituled, Juſti Lipſii Diva Virgo Hallenſis: beneficia ejus & miracula fide atque ordine deſcripta (3). Another is intituled, Juſti Lipſii Diva Sichemienſis ſive Aſpricollis: nova ejus beneficia & admiranda (4). He adopts the moſt trifling ſtories, and the moſt uncertain traditions that can poſſibly be found upon this ſubject. Some of his friends diſſuaded him from this attempt, alledging the uncertainty of theſe traditions, and the injury he would do himſelf; but all their counſels could not divert him from his enterprize: ‘ At mali aut moroſi quidam & pravè ſapientes non occultè deterrent aut improbant, tanquam à narrationibus parum certis, ut ajunt, & opinione ſæpe nixis. Non debere talibus obſoleſieri auctoritatem noſtram ſi quam habemus, diſſentio (5).' The verſes he made, when he conſecrated his ſilver pen to our Lady of Hall, are ſtrangely ſingular, as well on account of the praiſes he gives himſelf, as the exceſſive homage he pays to the holy Virgin. ‘ Ipſe pennam argenteam (nec potuit pretioſius quidpiam) in templo ante aram Virginis ſuſpendit, & pios hoſce verſus ſubſcripſit:

Hanc, DIVA, PENNAM interpretem mentis meæ,

Per ima quæ volavit & terræ, & maris:
Scientiæ, Prudentiæ, Sapientiæ
Operata ſemper, auſa quæ CONSTANTIAM

‘ He hung up with his own hands a ſilver pen (the moſt valuable gift he had) in the church, before the altar of the Virgin, and wrote under theſe pious verſes:

ſtrangeſt thing of all in his conduct, and which has not been pardoned him, is, that living at Leyden in the external profeſſion of the Reformed Religion, he publickly approved the principles of perſecution, at that time exerciſed all over Europe againſt this very religion. He was ſtrangely confounded, when he was ſhewn the conſequences of his doctrine [C]; and

He left by his will his furred gown to the ſame, our Lady; which gave occaſion to ſay, that he made her this preſent, becauſe the miracles he had ſo much celebrated, were ready to die of cold (7). Some Proteſtants writ with great force againſt him; he let them talk on, and only anſwered one of them in a few words: See his Rejectiuncula, at the end of his Virgo Aſpricollis. He was deſired to defend himſelf againſt the author of the treatiſe De Idolo Hallenſi (8), and againſt Thomſon (9), who confuted him among other things about the Virgo Sichemienſis: but he refuſed to engage in theſe diſputes (10), and acted wiſely. See, in the remark [E], what Baudius ſaid of the books of devotion of this critic. See alſo remark [N].

It muſt not be forgot, that Lipſius was ſaid to have compoſed ſuch books only to convince the world, that he was not lukewarm and indifferent in religion, as many ſuſpected he was (11). It was alſo believed, that theſe works were pure injunctions, and that the Jeſuits extorted them from him. ‘ Κέρκωπες Lojolitæ precibus, quæ vim imperii apud ‘ Lipſium habent, hanc operam ab eo vel extorſerunt, vel eblanditi ſunt; vel utrumque. Nam ut ‘ ipſi hominem totum poſſident, ita ipſe illis εὐσχημόνως nihil negare poteſt (12). —— The artful ‘ Loyolites (Jeſuits) either extorted this work from Lipſius, ‘ by intreaties, which with him carry the force of a ‘ command, or wheedled him into it; or perhaps both; ‘ for as he is entirely devoted to them, he can de- ‘ cently deny them nothing.’ If this was his caſe, he might be compared, to hired mourners, who cried more bitterly than the relations of the dead. The Poet Lucilius takes notice of theſe.

Conductæ flent alieno in funere præficæ
Multo & capillos ſcindunt, & clamant magis.

. . . . As women, who for hire
Mourn at the funeral of one unknown,
And greater marks of grief in public ſhew.

And Horace ſays little leſs:

Ut qui conducti plorant in funere, dicunt
Et faciunt propè plura dolentibus ex animo: ſic
Deriſor vero plus laudatore movetur (13).

As hired mourners, at a funeral, ſpeak,
And act, with more extravagance of grief,
Than thoſe, whoſe hearts a real ſorrow know,
So flatt'ring ſycophants more zeal betray,
Than real friends.

[C] He was ſtrangely confounded, when he was ſhewn the conſequences of his doctrine of perſecution.] See what is found hereupon in the Philoſophical Commentary upon, compell them to come in (14). ‘ I ‘ have ſeen another perplexity, which has relation to ‘ theſe matters, in a treatiſe of Juſtus Lipſius. This ‘ man, having been ruined by the wars of the Netherlands, found a very honourable retreat at Leyden, where he was appointed profeſſor; making no ‘ ſcruple of outwardly abjuring his Popiſh religion. ‘ During that time, he printed ſome books of Politics, ‘ wherein he advanced, among other maxims, that ‘ only one religion ought to be ſuffered in a ſtate, ‘ and no clemency uſed towards thoſe, who diſturbed religion, but that they ſhould be proſecuted with ‘ fire and ſword, that one member may periſh, rather than the whole body. Clementiæ non hic ‘ locus. Ure, ſeca, ut membrorum potius aliquod quam ‘ totum corpus intereat *. This was baſe, for a man ‘ entertained, as he was, by a Proteſtant republic, ‘ which had newly reformed it's religion; for this ‘ was openly approving all the rigours of Philip II, ‘ and the duke D'Alva. It was beſides a horrible ‘ impudence, and execrable impiety, ſince, on one ‘ hand, it might be concluded from his book, that ‘ only the Proteſtant religion was to be ſuffered in ‘ Holland, and, on the other, that the Heathens were ‘ to be commended for hanging the preachers of the ‘ Goſpel. He was taken up upon this head by Theodore Cornhert (15), and puſhed to great ſtraits; for ‘ he was obliged to anſwer by tacking about, and ‘ declaring, that theſe words, Ure, ſeca, were only a ‘ phraſe borrowed from Phyſic, to ſignify, not literally ‘ fire and ſword, but a very ſtrong remedy. All ‘ theſe tergiverſations are to be ſeen in his tract De una ‘ Religione. It is the moſt paltry book he ever writ, ‘ except the impertinent hiſtories and ſilly poems, he ‘ made in his old age, upon ſome chapels of the ‘ Virgin, his wit beginning to be moaped like that of ‘ Pericles, when he ſuffered his neck and arms to be ‘ tricked out with amulets, and womens noſtrums; ‘ being wholly infatuated by the Jeſuits, into whoſe ‘ arms he threw himſelf, when he ſaw, that this little paltry book was looked upon with an ill eye ‘ in Holland; this made him eſcape by ſtealth from ‘ Leyden. To return to this little book; it is a wretched rhapſody of paſſages, which authoriſe all the ‘ heathen impieties, on which was founded the horrible perſecution of the firſt Chriſtians, and of other ‘ paſſages, which ſay the quite contrary. And as the ‘ author durſt not avow the force of theſe two words, ‘ Ure, ſeca, he uſed ſome pitiful diſtinctions, which ‘ came to this, that Heretics ought to be put to death, ‘ but rarely and ſecretly; but as for fines, baniſhments, ‘ marks of infamy, and degradations, they ought not ‘ to be ſpared. All this falls to the ground, by the ‘ reflexions already made hereupon.’ By way of addition to this remark [C], we ſhall relate, more at large, what concerns the diſpute between Koornhert and Juſtus Lipſius.

Koornhert is not the only perſon, who treated him roughly on this ſubject. For the Jeſuit Petra Sancta, having made complaints againſt the author of the Stricturæ (16) Politicæ (17), the anſwer returned him was this (18): ‘ Conquereris de autore notarum ſive ‘ ſtricturarum in proditoriam Juſti Lipſii epiſtolam qui ‘ quum in Belgio fœderato vixiſſet, & Illuſtriſſimorum ‘ Ordinum ſtipendiarius fuiſſet, poſtquam inſalutatis ‘ hoſpitibus bene meritis abiiſſet, ſtylum in eos convertit, & adverſus Rempublicam eorum, conſilia ſubminiſtravit. Quis fuerit autor ſtricturarum illarum, ‘ ſeu notarum fateor me ignorare: ſed quiſquis ille ‘ fuerit, patriæ fuit amantiſſimus, & Lipſii fraudium ‘ callentiſſimus . . . . ‘ a great patriot, and ſaw thro' Lipſius's frauds. I know not whether you, who are ſo fond of Lipſius's works, and ſeem to take a pleaſure in Poetry, will be willing to read thoſe verſes, which, in the year 1579, he prefixed to a book againſt a certain obſcure perſon. They were then publiſhed at Leyden for Andrew Schouten, and ſhew what diſpoſition he either was, or pretended to be of. Hear him:

The weſtern Tyrant's double chains are broke:
By arms your country bravely ye aſſert;
Religion too with vigour ye defend:
But the fierce Spaniard breaks your land's repoſe;
And lo! this wretch religion would diſturb.
Let other arms your country's battles fight;
This thine, Feugræus, to defend the faith,
And by your pen detect it's latent foes;
This task thy office, and thy genius ſuits.

‘ You ſee what Lipſius then thought of the king of Spain, of the Romiſh faith, and of religion; who afterwards became a deſerter of religion, faithleſsly, and thro' a wavering, uncertain, diſpoſition, as Montague expreſſes it.' Theſe verſes of Lipſius diſhonour his memory, when we compare them with his own confeſſion, that he was only a Proteſtant in appearance at Leyden, and that his heart was Catholic. Theſe are his words: ‘ Sed altera calumnia, in religione mutavi. Nego, in ſede veſtra, non in ſenſu fui, & ut in peregrinatione corporis non animi requiem illic elegi. In tempore, ut meum ingenium eſt, quiete-modeſteque me habui: an in ſacra aut ritus veſtros tranſivi? nec impudentia hoc dicet (20). —— Another calumny is, that I have changed my religion: I deny it; I ſat with you, but did not think with you; and, as being upon a journey, I ſought the repoſe of my body, not of my mind. I behaved myſelf, as I always do, quietly and modeſtly. Did I go over to your religious rites? Impudence itſelf will not ſay this.' Let him have done and ſaid what he pleaſed; he and all his apologiſts were unable to elude the proofs alledged, to ſhew that this ſtile anſwered his external profeſſion, as long as he paſſed for a Proteſtant. The author of the Idolum Hallenſe proves, that Lipſius, having proteſted, at Iëna before Tilemannus Heſhuſius, who was then (21), rector of the univerſity, that he ſincerely embraced the Lutheran religion, communicated publickly (22), and in a funeral oration of his, which had been printed, declared, that God had given to his church the houſe of Saxony, to ruin the peſt of the Papacy. ‘ De bello Smalcaldico locutus cauſæ bonitatem à Saxone, fortunam & martem ab Imperatore ſtetiſſe dicit & . . . . Saxonicam generoſam ſtirpem ad Dei hoſtes extirpandos, errores evertendos PESTEM PONTIFICIAM excindendam donatam divinitus & conceſſam ECCLESIAE eſſe (23). It is owned, that he never communicated while he was at Leyden; but it is proved (24), by ſeveral extracts of his letters, that, whilſt he lived there, he looked on the cauſe of the Spaniards as unjuſt, and wiſhed the ruin of it, and that many expreſſions fell from him, which beſpoke him a Proteſtant (25).

Here are ſome farther circumſtances of his controverſy with Theodore Koornhert. When his treatiſe of politics, wherein he approved perſecution on the account of religion, came out in 1589, Koornhert, a great ſtickler for toleration, writ him his opinion of this book, and replied to the anſwers he received, and at laſt publiſhed a book, with the title of Proceſſus contra hereticidium & coactionem conſcientiarum. He dedicated it to the magiſtrates of Leyden, ſent copies of it to the magiſtrates of other towns, and exhorted them to take great care of this writer's opinions. The publiſhing of this book vexed Lipſius; but, as he was a great ornament to the univerſity of Leyden, he obtained of the magiſtrates an act of complaiſance, which might have comforted him. They publiſhed at the town-houſe, that they did not accept of Koornhert's epiſtle dedicatory, and that this author, by dedicating his book to them, did them neither ſervice, nor honour, nor friendſhip; that they did not however prohibit his book, but permitted the inhabitants to read it, and at the ſame time adviſed them to read Lipſius's excellent anſwer. They declared, they had a very particular eſteem for this profeſſor. This act did not fully ſatisfy him, nor was he at all pleaſed at hearing, that Koornhert, being recovered from a long indiſpoſition, was preparing a reply. It is ſaid too, that by the favour of ſome towns, he endeavoured to get the States of Holland to forbid the anſwering his polical writings; but that Gerhard de Lange, Burgomaſter of Tergou, oppoſed it with this reaſon. ‘ If what Lipſius has written be true, he can be but weakly anſwered, and we ſhall be confirmed in the truth, by the very weakneſs of the writings that are publiſhed againſt him; but if any one diſcovers in them, what we do not now perceive, any falſity prejudicial to the country, what harm can there be to correct them?' Lipſius quitted Holland ſoon after, under pretence of taking a turn to the Spaw-waters, for the ſake of his health. Nor did he ever come back thither more, but returned to Popery, and proteſted in a letter, which he writ from Mayence (26), that he had always been of the antient religion, though he had profeſſed another, when he was in places, where the antient was not received. This made many believe him a hypocrite. Some were of opinion, that the diſcontent which Koornhert gave him, and the apprehenſion he had, that the Hollanders, might be worſted in the war againſt Spain (27), made him change ſides. However it be, Koornhert, detained in his bed, and ſeized with a diſtemper, of which he ſoon after died, failed not to go on with his reply, and to finiſh it. His executors got it tranſlated out of Flemiſh into Latin, and publiſhed it (28).

It muſt be obſerved, that Lipſius had let fall ſome words againſt the Spaniſh inquiſition in the firſt editions, but ſtruck them out of the following. Boeclerus had told him his own upon this, in the chapter De nævis Lipſiani operis, which is the fifth of his treatiſe De Politicis Juſti Lipſii. Read theſe words (29): ‘ Illud non omittendum eſt, quæ ſeipſum prodit damnatque Lipſius; æterno cum dedecore famæ, quam unam videtur in omni vita quæſiviſſe. Cum enim in prioribus Politicorum ſuorum editionibus, lib. iv, cap. iv. pro libertate religionis, adverſus Pontificiam crudelitatem & Hiſpanicam inquiſitionem (quam nemo bonus unquam probavit) quædam ſcripſiſſet: in poſterioribus editionibus, tanquam non à religione modo ſed à ſana ſimul mente defeciſſet, partim omiſit ea (ſcilicet quæ in Freinſhemiana editione reponuntur, n. 7, 9. 12). partim ſimpliciter & ingenue dicta mutavit. ———— That muſt not be omitted, in which Lipſius betrays and condemns himſelf, to the eternal diſgrace of his fame, which ſeems to have been the ſole purſuit of his life. For, whereas, in the former editions of his Politics, book iv, chap. iv. he had written in defence of liberty of conſcience, againſt the Popiſh cruelty and the Spaniſh Inquiſition; (which no good man ever approved of) in the later editions, as if he had not only abjured religion, but even his ſenſes, he partly left out what he had written on that ſubject (to wit, what is replaced in Freinſhemius's edition) and partly altered what he had plainly and ingenuouſly ſaid.' Boeclerus mentions ſome other alterations in this man's expreſſions.

[D] He was offered a profeſſorſhip at Piſa, with a promiſe of enjoying his liberty of conſcience.] Acidalius relates (30), that Mercurialis, the negotiator of this affair, told him, that the Great Duke had offered Lipſius a profeſſor's chair in the univerſity of Piſa, with the privilege of believing what he pleaſed in matters of religion, and that this prince had obtained for him a toleration at Rome. At the ſame time Acidalius adds, that a report was ſpread, that this profeſſor had embraced the Romiſh faith in Germany; and affirms, that Lipſius alledged no other reaſon for refuſing the chair at Piſa, than the infirmity of his health, and the diſtance of the place, viæ longinquitatem, & valetudinis imbecilitatem. He was far from alledging his being a Proteſtant; for he was readily enough diſpoſed to the public profeſſion of the Romiſh religion.

Yet by this we ſee that he was looked on in Italy as a very good Calviniſt, ſince his liberty of conſcience was negotiated at Rome. There are two letters of Lipſius (31), from which we may infer, that Acidalius was well informed of what he ſaid; but they do not mention the offer of a liberty of conſcience.

[E] There were ſome Proteſtants, who never would ſecond the paſſion of ſome of their brethren, in defaming this learned man.] One Lydius, a miniſter, deſigning to publiſh the letters which his father had received from Juſtus Lipſius, was earneſtly entreated by Baudius not to do it; by Baudius, I ſay, who underſtanding, that Lydius perſiſted in his deſign, prepared to write againſt him, in favour of Lipſius. ‘Perſtat in incœpto, ut ſermonem tuum audio. Sed quia ſibi ſumit eam licentiam ut faciat quæ ſunt contra morem bonorum, contra fas gentium, contra jus humanitatis: faxo dicat ſe nactum, qui hac in parte cauſam amici & quondam doctoris indefenſam eſſe non patiatur (32). —— He perſiſts in his deſign, as you inform me: but ſince he takes a liberty contrary to the behaviour of good men, contrary to the law of nations, and the rights of humanity, I will make him own he has met with one, who will avenge the cauſe of his friend, and (formerly) teacher.’ Not that Baudius approved Lipſius's two books upon the miracles of the holy Virgin; on the contrary, he ſpoke of them with the utmoſt contempt; but, he thought that letters between friends ought to be an inviolable ſecret (33). ‘Non quod ejus Divas ullo colore defendi poſſe cenſeam, ſed interim non eſt tollenda è vita vitæ ſocietas, quod faciunt qui literas, hoc eſt amicorum colloquia abſentium, foras eliminant . . . (34) Deeſt ſcilicet hoſtis, & ſeges ac materies metendæ gloriæ non ſuppetit, niſi ex labe & ruina celebratiſſimi in literis viri, & honorifice à bonis nominandi, tametſi famam ſuam miſere decoxerit duplici illa publicatione Virginum, quibus ſæpe incolumi authore lumbifragium exoptavi (35). —— Not that I think his goddeſſes can upon any pretence be defended; but in the mean time, ſociety is not to be broke in upon; which they do, who publiſh the private correſpondence of abſent friends . . . . There is no enemy, and pleaſe ye, nor any opportunity of earning fame, but by the diſgrace and ruin of the moſt learned of men, and of whom good men ought to make honourable mention; tho' he miſerably injured his character by that double publication of Virgins, towards whom I often declared my ill wiſhes during the life of the author.’ Tho' Lydius was a great preacher, Baudius hoped to come off cheaply enough with him. ‘Etiamſi multum in concionibus valeas, vereor tamen ut hic ſtare poſſit. Fervida ingenia plerumque violentiam naturæ & profundam ambitionem velare ſolent præclaro ſchemate zeli, quod eſt evirriculum & mantile multarum fraudum. Sed non deſunt nobis rationes quibus ſæculo planum & perſpicuum fiet, Quid ſolidum crepet & pictæ tectoria linguæ (36). —— Though he be a great preacher, I fear he will not maintain his ground on this occaſion. Men of paſſion often cover the violence and ambition of their nature under the fine pretence of zeal, that cloak of many impoſtures. But I can convince the world of the difference between ſincerity and hypocriſy.’ In the ſame letter he informs us, that Scaliger took it very ill, that Thompſon ſhould write ſo violent a book againſt Lipſius. ‘Opus eſt ſane non ineruditum, & quod arguat ſcriptorem multæ lectionis: niſi quod ſupra modum modeſtiæ efferveſcit, quo nomine etiam ſerio reprehenſus eſt ab heroë Scaligero (37). —— It is certainly no unlearned work, and argues a writer of great reading; except that he flies out beyond the bounds of modeſty: for which fault he is ſeriouſly reprehended by the hero Scaliger.’ He ſays alſo, that he is a ſtranger to the laws of humanity, and the rights of literature, who fancies that the learned ought to eſpouſe ſtate wars, and differences in religion, one againſt another, and that, for his part, he ſhall never follow ſuch maxims, as long as he has a grain of good ſenſe left. ‘Non diſſimulo, nec unquam diſſimulabo, intercedere mihi cum Lipſio, extra cauſſam religionis & libertatis, ob quam publice bello decertamus, omnia jura ſummæ neceſſitudinis, quæ cum ullo mortali eſſe poſſunt. Nunquam litarunt Gratiis, & ignorant quid humaniores literæ, quid humanitas ipſa flagitet, qui ob eam rem teſtatas inimicitias promiſcue omnibus indicendas eſſe arbitrantur. In eo cenſu non erit Baudius, quamdiu ſanam animi mentem obtinebit (38). —— I confeſs, nor will I ever deny, that, ſetting aſide the cauſe of religion and liberty, for which we publickly fight, there is the ſtricteſt friendſhip imaginable between Lipſius and myſelf. They, who think that a ſufficient reaſon for quarrelling with all the world, never ſacrificed to the graces, nor know what polite learning and humanity require. Baudius will never think in that manner, as long as he ſhall enjoy a ſound mind.’ Gruterus, who had ſome of Lipſius's letters, would never communicate them to thoſe, who deſired them, with a deſign to make them public. He would not furniſh arms againſt the honour of this learned man. ‘Lipſii epiſtolas amici multi à me petierunt, quibus ſemper negavi, quod nollem quidquam ex iis depromi unde ei aliquid inureretur infamiæ (39). —— Several of my friends have asked me for Lipſius's letters, whom I always refuſed, becauſe I was unwilling any thing ſhould be taken out of them, which might be made uſe of to injure his reputation.’ But Lingelſheim (40) was not ſo nice, ſince, after he had made uſe of ſome of Lipſius's letters, which he had written to Camerarius from Iëna, he offered them to Goldaſt, to be printed (41). Goldaſt had already played Lipſius a trick, which I have mentioned in another place (42).

It muſt be owned, as Baudius ſays, that the laws of generoſity do not permit us to take advantage of what a man may have written as a ſecret to thoſe he correſponded with; the Heathens themſelves were not ignorant of this truth; for obſerve how Marc Antony was cenſured for reading before the ſenate ſome letters he had received from Cicero. ‘At etiam literas, quas me ſibi miſiſſe diceret, recitavit: homo & humanitatis expers, & vitæ communis ignarus. Quis enim unquam qui paulum modo bonorum conſuetudinem noſſet, litteras ad ſe ab amico miſſas, offenſione aliqua interpoſita in medium protulit, palamque recitavit? Quid eſt aliud tollere è vita vitæ ſocietatem, quam tollere amicorum colloquia abſentium? Quam multa joca ſolent eſſe in Epiſtolis, quæ prolata ſi ſint inepta videantur? quam multa ſeria neque tamen ullo modo divulganda (43)? —— He even repeated letters, which he ſaid I ſent him, being a man void of humanity, and ignorant of common life. For who is there ſo little converſant with good men, as, upon a quarrel, publickly to produce and read the letters of a friend? What is it but to deſtroy ſociety, and put a ſtop to the correſpondence of abſent friends? How many jeſts are there in letters, which, when made public, will be thought inſipid? How many ſerious things are there, yet by no means fit to be divulged?’ Several think that this excellent law may be diſpenſed with in favour of religion; that is, when it is in our power to decry a man who has written againſt our religion, or who by his revolt may ſhake the faith of the weak; and thus they make no ſcruple of publiſhing his very billets or notes, if copies of them fall into their hands. They would perhaps be more ſcrupulous, if they were themſelves the perſons, who had received them; for it is not ſo contrary to the law we ſpeak of, to publiſh a letter another has received, as one that is written to one's ſelf. See the advertiſement to The General Conſiderations upon Mr Brueys's book, printed at Rotterdam in 1684. There is a ſecret divulged in it, which Mr Brueys had written to a friend. [F] Some ſay, ſhe was a very ill woman.] ‘The good man Lipſius, who had a naughty wife, has ſaid ſomewhere in his Epiſtles, that there is a fatality in marriage (46).’ Here is the paſſage which Patin refers to: ‘Uxorem duxi, ſays Lipſius (47), mei magis animi quam amicorum impulſu. Sed, ut ille ait (48), τὸ μὲν ἄρ πȣ ἐπέκλωσαν θεοὶ αὐτοί, à Diis fataliter hoc decretum, & concorditer ſane viximus, fructus tamen matrimonii, id eſt liberorum, exſortes. —— I married more to pleaſe myſelf than at the inſtigation of my friends: but, as he ſays, it was ſo decreed; and indeed we live in concord, tho' without the fruit of matrimony, children.’ It was believed by ſome, that Lipſius changed his religion purely from a principle of ambition, and the importunity of his wife, who was ſtrangely ſuperſtitious. Mr Teiſſier (49) aſſerts this upon Scaliger's credit, citing his 120th letter of the ſecond book. I my ſelf have converſed with thoſe, who have told odd ſtories of the croſs-grained humour of this woman. They had them from old men, who had ſeen Lipſius.

Some Merchants of the Low-Countries told Florimond de Remond, in 1600, that Lipſius was married. He wiſhed him joy of it; but Lipſius anſwered him, that the thoughts of being congratulated at this time of day made him laugh, and that he had been a long time in the nooſe. ‘At de conjugio, quod tu à Mercurialibus noſtris audieras, quàm riſum mihi movit? Ego, vir optime, non recens in eam naſſam veni, ſed annos jam vigintiſex cuſtodia hæc me habet. Liberos tamen nullos genui, nec hunc conjugii fructum aut lenimentum Deus dedit (50). —— *As to my marriage, which it ſeems you have heard of, how does it make me laugh? [G] He wrote a very bad hand.] He confeſſes it himſelf, and thereby confutes thoſe, who pretended to have printed from the original the oration de duplici concordia; from the original, I ſay, very fairly written. ‘Ego belle & mundule ſcribo? ſays he (51), Vellem, ſed totam Europam teſtem καλλιγραφίας hujus habeo, & querelas quod autographa mea ægre vel non legant. — I write a fair and neat hand! I wiſh I did; but appeal to all Europe for the beauty of my hand writing, and to the complaints that my munuſcripts are ſcarce, if at all, legible.’ This is confirmed by a paſſage of Gabriel Naudé (52). ‘This worthy ſcholar of our Muretus M. Antonius Bonciarius of Perugia once complained, that he could read but two or three of the firſt lines of the letters Lipſius wrote to him; all the reſt was ſo horribly ſcrauled. [H] His converſation and aſpect anſwered not the idea, the world had conceived of him.] Here is Aubertus Miræus's teſtimony in this point (53). ‘In geſtu, cultu, ſermone modicus fuit: adeo ut plerique, quibus magnos viros per ambitionem æſtimare mos eſt, viſo aſpectoque Lipſio quærerent famam, pauci interpretarentur *. Conſtat certe exteros, quos ab ultimâ etiam Sarmatia, ejus videndi audiendique gratiâ (ut olim magni illius Livii) frequenter veniſſe ſcimus, cum Lipſium viderent, eumdem ſæpè requiſiviſſe. —— His behaviour, dreſs, and converſation were mean: inſomuch that many who are wont to eſtimate great men by the ſtandard of ambition, when they ſaw Lipſius, were diſappointed in their expectations: few formed a juſt idea of him. It is certain, that foreigners, who came, we know, from fartheſt Sarmatia, for the ſake of ſeeing and hearing him (as formerly happened to the great Livy) found their ideas of him not anſwered.’

[I] His friends did not abandon him .... to the cenſures of his adverſaries.] The Jeſuit Scribanius, as Lipſius always expected, appeared in his defence. ‘Heus importune qui jam abeuntem & majora magiſque ſeria meditantem, ſupervacuò laceſſis: ſi opus & uſui fuerit non deerit amica aliqua manus (& Carolum Scribanium ..... deſignabat) quæ Lipſium non patietur inultum (54). - - - Let me tell you (you, who vainly attack him, departing, and meditating greater and more ſerious things) if occaſion ſhall be, there will not be wanting ſome friendly hand (he pointed at Charles Scribanius) which will not ſuffer Lipſius to go unrevenged.’ See his Orthodoxæ fidei controverſa, his Defenſio Lipſii poſtuma, &c. Claudius Dauſqueius, a canon of Tournay, publiſhed, in 1616, a book intituled, D. MARIÆ ASPRICOLLIS ΘΑΥΜΑΤΟΥΡΓΟΥ Scutum .... alterum item J. Lipſii Scutum: utrumque adverſus Agricolæ Thracii ſatyricas petitiones. He means, that he anſwered a book, which George Thomſon, a Scotchman, publiſhed at London in 1606, with this title, *Vindex veritatis adverſus Juſtum Lipſium libri duo. Prior inſanam ejus religionem politicam, fatuam nefariamque de Fato, ſceleratiſſimam de fraude doctrinam refellit. I ſpeak not of thoſe, who have attacked or defended him upon the ſubject of learning. Vincent Contarini, ſucceſſor to Sigonius in the chair of Padua, criticized him (55) learnedly enough in 1609, ‘circa frumentariam Romanorum largitionem & militare Romanorum ſtipendium. - - - - - - In relation to the larges of corn among the Romans, and their military pay.’

Garaſſe, who gave him two bites, was ſturdily repulſed. He pretended (56), that Lipſius's doctrine about fate is a mear chimera without the leaſt foundation, and blamed him (57) for having erected Mauſolæan monuments to his three little dogs, the firſt whereof was called Mopſus, the ſecond Sapphirus, the third Mopſulus, as is ſeen in the book intituled, Deliciæ Chriſtiani orbis. I cannot, continues he, approve all theſe ridiculous and prophane inventions, foraſmuch as this is plainly to declare, though the intention of authors may be very different, Unus interitus eſt hominis & jumentorum, & æqua eſt utriuſque conditio. — Men and beaſts die alike, and the condition of both is the ſame. The cenſurer of this Jeſuit's Doctrine Curieuſe ſtrenuouſly maintains (58), that the deſtiny, taught by Lipſius, is conformable to Thomas Aquinas's notion. He ſays (59), that ‘Aubertus Miræus ..... did not forget the love that Lipſius had for dogs, and even the names of the three, which he cheriſhed above the reſt .... He had cauſed them to be painted in a piece, with the names, age, colour, and ſhag, of each, with ſome verſes underneath, wherein he had no leſs ingeniouſly, than pleaſantly, hit upon verſes and inſcriptions mentioned in the book called Selectæ Chriſtiani orbis deliciæ. This is what Garaſſe takes for a mauſoleum and an epitaph; ſo that whoever has his parrot painted, his dog, his cat, his wife, &c. with an inſcription or verſe, erects an epitaph, a mauſoleum to them.... As for the epitaph of Sapphirus alone, which is found in the ſaid book, Selectæ deliciæ, &c. It is a ſuppoſititious piece, which even the compiler, F. Swertius, durſt not place with the three inſcriptions, which are found under the title Lovanenſia, and which doubtleſs ſome one might eaſily have compoſed by Lipſius's inſcription on his dog Sapphirus, to exerciſe his wit, as plainly appears from the bare reading.’ The cenſurer adds, that the pretended prophaneneſs, which Garaſſe finds in it, is a chimera: he is pretty large upon this, and ſhews the impertinence of the reaſon, founded on the unus eſt interitus, &c. Mr des Marets (60), who thought this criticiſer of Garaſſe to be an anonymous doctor of the Sorbonne, is miſtaken: he [K] He was accuſed .... of plagiariſm, but never would acknowledge the juſtice of the accuſation.] Muretus and Peter Faber were his principal accuſers. The parts of this proceſs have been diligently collected by Mr Thomaſius, in his treatiſe de Plagio literario; and by Mr Crenius in the ſeventh part of his Animadverſiones Philologicæ & Hiſtoricæ.

[M] It is ſtrange that a Latin ſtile, ſo bad as his, ſhould found a new ſect in the Republic of Letters.] ‘ Lipſius has put Cicero out of faſhion. When he was ‘ in requeſt, there were greater maſters in eloquence, ‘ than there are at preſent (62).’ Scaliger ſays this: an evident proof, that the ſect of the Lipſians was very much increaſed. But here we ought to cry out;

O imitatores, ſervum pecus, ut mihi ſæpe
Bilem, ſæpe jocum veſtri movere tumultus (63).

Ye imitators, ſlaviſh herd, how oft
The ſtir ye make excites my ſpleen! how oft Provokes my laughter!

People muſt dote upon ill models, when they can prefer Lipſius's ſtile before that of Paul Manutius, or Muretus; a ſtile, which proceeds by ſtarts and bounces, and is full of points and ellipſes, before a ſtile ſmooth and flowing, and which unfolds every thought. Lipſius is the leſs excuſable, becauſe he changed from a good taſte to an ill one. He wrote well in his youth; as appears by a book he dedicated to cardinal de Granvelle (64), and by the funeral oration of the duke of Saxony. He degenerated as he grew old. ‘ His third century of Epiſtles, ſaid Sca‘ger (65), is good for nothing; he has forgot to ſpeak; ‘ I know not what Latin it is.’ A learned humaniſt thought he did his father, who was a famous divine, ſome honour, by ſhewing he expreſſed a contempt for the ſtile, which Lipſius had brought into faſhion. ‘ Imprimis vero faſtidiebat ſcribendi illam novam for‘mam, quam magnus cæteroquin vir Juſtus Lipſius ‘ ſæculo noſtro obſtruſit, quemque ſervum pecus imita‘tores plurimi arripuerunt, quamvis impari felicita‘te (66). —— But he was particularly diſguſted at ‘ that new way of writing, which Juſtus Lipſius, ‘ otherwiſe a great man, forced upon our age, and which ‘ many have ſervilely imitated, but not with the ſame ‘ ſucceſs.’ He relates the judgment, which James Pontanus, and Marc Velſerus made of the ſame ſtile. ‘ Nos Juſti Lipſii excellens ingenium, ſummamque do‘ctrinam ſuſpicimus, & prædicamus, nec de ſtudiis ‘ noſtris quemquam melius meritum ſtatuimus. Ab ‘ ejus autem idiotiſmo, & excogitata hæreſi in ſcriben‘do, pluribus, & opinor juſtis de cauſis refugimus, & ‘ horremus. Marcum Velſerum ipſi Lipſio amiciſſimum ‘ profitentem meis auribus audivi: malle ſe in ſcriben‘do Muretum, quam Lipſium poſſe exprimere. Adeo, ‘ cujus probabat ingenium, & ſcientiam ſummopere, ‘ ejus novitiam, & plus æquo exquiſitam & affectatam ‘ dictionem non probabat (67). —— I applaud the ‘ great wit and learning of Juſtus Lipſius, and think ‘ no man deſerved better of the learned. But I ſhun ‘ and abhor, for many, and I think juſt, reaſons, his ‘ peculiarity of ſtile, and new manner of writing. I ‘ have myſelf heard Marcus Velſerus, a great friend of ‘ Juſtus Lipſius, declare, that he had rather imitate ‘ Muretus, than Lipſius; blaming his novel and af‘fected ſtile, at the ſame time that he highly applau‘ded his wit and learning.’ He afterwards ſhews how Scaliger, being ready to give up the ghoſt, declared his abhorrence of that affectedneſs in ſtile. He muſt needs take it much to heart, ſince in that condition, in which his attention ought to have been fixed on objects infinitely more important, he would let the company know how much it troubled him. ‘ Jam in a‘gone mortis conſtitutus (ut refert Clariſſimus Daniel ‘ Heynſius, in Epiſtola ad Iſaacum Caſaubonum) hoc ‘ κακόηθες novi ſtili admodum execratus eſt. Sic ‘ enim de eo ſcribit Heynſius: Juſti Lipſii affectatio‘nem in ſtilo vehementer faſtidire ſolebat: in iis præ‘ſertim, quæ ſenex ſcripſiſſet, & nonnunquam literas ‘ ejus cum indignatione legebat; eodem modo te quoque ‘ judicare, certo ſcio (68). —— Upon his death-bed ‘ (as Daniel Heinſius informs us, in a letter to Iſaac ‘ Caſaubon) he expreſſed his abhorrence of that itch of ‘ writing in a new ſtile: for thus Heinſius writes con‘cerning him: He greatly diſliked Juſtus Lipſius's af‘fected ſtile; in thoſe pieces eſpecially, which he wrote ‘ in his old age; and he ſometimes read his letters with ‘ indignation: I know you judge of him in the ſame ‘ manner.’ Henry Stephens publiſhed a book of five hundred and ſixty pages againſt Lipſius's Latin (69); but this book is ſo full of digreſſions, that the author ſeldom comes to his point. However he gives us to underſtand, that he extremely diſapproved Lipſius's ſtile. See, in a book of Balzac (70), the Viri magni judicium de imitatione Lipſianæ latinitatis: ſee alſo the words of Grotius. ‘ Sua quadam eloquentia ple‘roſque alliciens (Lipſius); nam cum floridum ipſi ‘ & profluens natura haud abnegaret, alterum maluit ‘ dicendi genus, conciſum quidem nec ſine feſtivitate, ‘ ſed vere novum obtentu antiqui: quod cum imita‘rentur quibus ingenii judiciique non idem fuit, ad cor‘ruptiſſima quæque deventum eſt (71). —— Lipſius al‘lured many by his eloquence; for nature having formed ‘ him for a florid, copious, ſtile, he choſe another way ‘ of writing, viz. the conciſe, yet not without wit, but ‘ quite new; which when writers of inferior wit ‘ and judgment imitated, they fell into every thing ‘ vitious in writing.’ There is no fear, that ſuch an affectation in French would ever make a ſect, though the preſident de Novion (72) ſhould return into the world.

[N] What Joſeph Hall publiſhed concerning his Hiſtories of the Miracles of the Holy Virgin, deſerves to be related.] Having given an account of a prodigy, which ſerved for the puniſhment of a provoſt, who had cauſed the tongue of a Proteſtant martyr to be cut out, he thus exclaims: ‘ Come now, Lipſius; ‘ go and write the new miracles of the goddeſs, and confirm the ſuperſtition by ſtrange events. All you, who have ſeen it, judge, whether ever the chapels of Hall and of Zichim, have produced ſo remarkable a thing. We every where meet with pilgrims going to pay their devotions towards theſe his ladies: I know not whether I ought to call them two ladies, or rather one in two ſhrines. If they are two, why do they adore but one of them? if they are but one, why does ſhe perform the cure at Zichem, which ſhe cannot at Hall? what great pity it is, that a genius ſo lofty and elevated to the laſt act of his life, ſhould be ſubject to raving. We have cheriſhed and admired, if need were, all the good fruits, and manly offspring of this brain: but who can bear theſe fooliſh virgins, the weak and abortive productions of doating old age? one of his greateſt favourites told me, having heard it from his own mouth, that the elder of theſe two virgins was begotten, conceived, brought into the world, and baptized, by him, in the ſpace of ten days: I believe it, and was not at all ſurprized at it. Theſe acts of ſuperſtition have an inviſible father and midwife; beſides, that it is not fitting that an elephant ſhould be three years begetting a mouſe. It was told me in the ſhop of his Moret, not without ſome indignation, that our king (73) having well conſidered the book, and read ſome paſſages of it, threw it upon the ground, with this cenſure, Damnation to him who made it, and him who believes it. I do not concern myſelf whether it be a true piece of hiſtory, or one of their fables: but I am certain, that this ſentence did not cauſe them ſo much diſcontent, as me joy (74).’

LISMANIN (FRANCIS) a native of Corſica, doctor of Divinity, and a famous Franciſcan (a), entered into the Proteſtant church, but did not ſtop where he ought to have done; for he drove on to Arianiſm. This was done by degrees. He was confeſſor to Bonna Sforza, queen of Poland, and her preacher in the Italian tongue, &c. (b), [A], when John Triceſſius, a man of learning and quality, clandeſtinely ſowed the ſeeds of the reformation at Cracow (c). Liſmanin, much ſhaken by the reading of a book, the queen had given him (d), was confirmed in the ill opinion he had conceived of the church of Rome by ſome conferences with John Triceſſius (e), who beſides lent him the reformers books (f). He ſoon became ſuſpected of Hereſy, but managed it ſo artfully, that the biſhop of Cracow could never convict him of having Luther's and Calvin's books. He avoided the ſnares, which this prelate laid for him at Rome. Liſmanin went thither in 1550 to congratulate the new Pope Julius III, in the name of queen Bonna (g). The biſhop wrote to Rome that he was a ſecret Heretic, and that he ought to be caſt into priſon, and hindered from ever returning into Poland. This advice came a little too late; Liſmanin was already returned to the queen his miſtreſs. When he was arrived at Warſaw, where ſhe reſided, he received letters from Sigiſmond Auguſtus, king of Poland, her ſon, charging him to endeavour to pacify her; for ſhe was much provoked at this prince's marrying Barbara Radzivil [B]. He made three journies to bring about a peace between the two queens [C]. The king was ſo ſatisfied with him, that he promiſed him the

[A] He was confeſſor to the queen of Poland, and her preacher in the Italian tongue, &c.] To explain this etcetera, I ſhall ſet down the liſt of all Liſmanin's titles: Theologiæ Doctor, Monachus Franciſcanus. Circiter anno 1546 jam erat Bonæ Reginæ (matri Sigiſmundi Auguſti Regis) a concionibus Italicis & confeſſionibus ſacris: nec non Franciſcanorum ſeu Minoritarum in Polonia Provincialis, & omnium cœnobiorum monialium regulæ Claræ Ephorus, qui vulgò Commiſſarius dicitur: atque Parochus Chovienſis (1).

[B] . . . . that queen . . . . was provoked at this prince's marrying Barbara Radzivil.] The author I cite, obſerves, that they who began the great work of the reformation in Poland, made a ſtrange falſe ſtep; they oppoſed this marriage of Sigiſmond, whilſt the biſhops, their greateſt perſecutors, gave their conſent to it. By oppoſing the prince's inclinations, and his darling paſſion, they gave him a diſlike to the reformation, while they, who applauded his marriage won his heart, and qualified themſelves for obtaining of him an abſolute liberty of perſecuting the Lutherans. ‘Impediebat veritatis in Regio corde progreſſum Induſtria & vigilantia aſtutiaque Pontificum Romanorum, latera Regia ſemper claudentium, aures ejus occupantium, inſignia Regni & cor Regis, cuſtodiam legum tenentium, oracula Regia edentium . . . . . & quod tum ferè maxime tempori & rebus eorum accommodum erat, matrimonium Regium cum Barbara Radzivilia, Staniſlai Gaofoldi Palatini Trocenſis relicta vidua, fœmina ad invidiam pulcherrimâ initum, approbantium & defendentium. Nam cum multi etiam ex illis qui veritati & reformationi favere cœperant, connubium illud, utpote cum privata & privatim, inconſulto Senatu, contractum deſtruerent, è contra Maciejovius ille, tùm Andreas Lebridovius . . . . . Itaque boni illi Viri, Veritatis fautores graviter in eo, quod in hoc negotio Regi tanto conatu ſe oppoſuerint, erraverant: oſores verò ejus & adverſarii eorum contrariæ patri ſe applicantes Regis gratiam in ſe derivarunt. Adeò & hic verum apparuit illud Chriſti oraculum: filios tenebrarum prudentiores eſſe in generatione ſua quàm filios lucis (2). —— What hindered the progreſs of the truth in the king's heart, was the induſtry, aſſiduity, and artifice, of the Roman Catholics, who were always about the king, engroſſed his ear, had the king's regalia and heart, had the cuſtody of the laws, and gave out his edicts . . . . . . and what greatly forwarded their intereſt at that time, was their approving and defending the king's marriage with Barbara Radzivil, relict of Staniſlaus Gaofold, palatine of Trockie, a moſt beautiful lady. For, when many, even of thoſe, who began to favour truth and the reformation, were for diſſolving that marriage, as having been contracted with a private perſon, privately, and without conſulting the ſenate, and, on the other hand, Maciejovius and Andreas Lebridovius . . . biſhops, and other Popiſh lords, were for confirming it, the king turned his favour and affection from the former to the latter . . . . . Thoſe good men therefore, favourers of truth, were greatly miſtaken in ſo ſtrenuouſly oppoſing the king in this affair; but it's haters, and their adverſaries, taking the contrary part, inſinuated themſelves into the king's favour: ſo that in this caſe likewiſe appeared the truth of that oracle of Jeſus Chriſt: the children of darkneſs are wiſer in their generation, than the children of light.’ If it was not ſo advantageous, it was at leaſt more glorious to the reformers of Poland, to have been ſo impolitic.

[C] He made three journies to bring about a peace between the two queens.] His negotiation was more honourable than ſucceſsful; for if it pleaſed the king, it highly diſpleaſed the queen mother, who was nothing leſs than what her name ſignified (3). ‘Quo officio poſtquam ſuſceptis anno 1551. m. the firſt biſhopric that ſhould be vacant. During theſe tranſactions, Lelius Socinus, who came into Poland in 1551 (b), adviſed Liſmanin to throw off his monk's habit, and retire into the reformed countries, and particularly into Swiſſerland. Liſmanin would have followed this advice, but that he found in the king's mind a ſtrong diſpoſition to a reformation. He cultivated theſe diſpoſitions, and received a commiſſion from him to travel, in order to acquire all the neceſſary knowledge for eſtabliſhing a better eccleſiaſtical government (i) [D]. He ſaw Italy, Switzerland, Geneva, Paris, and faithfully diſcharged his commiſſion; but being returned to Geneva, he there married a wife, by the advice of John Calvin and Socinus, and in ſpite of the moſt judicious remonſtrances of Budzinius, his ſecretary [E]. The king of Poland was ſo angry at this action of his, that he gave over 'negotiated the reconciliation of the two queens, mother and daughter-in-law;) the king from that time made him his favourite.' A panegyriſt of Bonna Sforza obſerves, that ſhe 'entered into the intereſts of the lords and palatines of Poland, who had not approved this marriage, refuſing to ſee either the king, her ſon, or his wife, who wore the Poliſh crown but a little while, dying ſuddenly at Cracow, not without ſuſpicion of poiſon. . . . . . By the death of queen Barbara, the diſſentions and troubles of the kingdom of Poland were pacified, and the king, and queen Bonna, his mother, reconciled (5);' but the hard words ſhe gave him upon that unequal match, returned by language of the ſame kind, quickly broke the peace. 'The queen, after their firſt reconcilement, often reproaching the king, her ſon, that he had married a ſecond time one that was no more than a gentlewoman, widow to a private gentleman, who was not of ſo good a family as that of Radzivil, from which this lady deſcended; Sigiſmond Auguſtus replied too warmly, that he had not ſo much diſhonoured the royal family of the Jagellons, and the crown of Poland, by marrying this beautiful lady publickly, and in the face of the church, in whom the graces of body and mind did recompenſe over and above what was wanting in her birth, or rather in the birth of her firſt husband Gaſtold, as ſhe, who married clandeſtinely, after the death of king Sigiſmond the Great, of ſacred and glorious memory, a man of mean condition, called Pappacoda (6).'

[D] He received . . . . a commiſſion to travel, in order to acquire all the neceſſary knowledge for eſtabliſhing a better eccleſiaſtical government.] Do not imagine, that his credential letters imported, that he had orders to furniſh himſelf with the beſt methods for reforming religion. He had received only a verbal order on this point, and the king did not deſire, that any accounts ſhould be given him of that matter in writing, but only by word of mouth. Notwithſtanding, Liſmanin writ to him about it. The pretence of his voyage was to buy ſeveral good books for the king's library. Nor was this only a pretence; for he was actually commiſſioned to buy books, and bought a great many, which he ſent to Poland (7). 'De negotio religionis amplius colloquentes, decreverunt, ut Liſmaninus, Miniſtri Regii (factorem vulgo vocamus) nomine, Bibliothecam Regiam ſumptibus ejus omni librorum genere inſtrueret, nec non viros doctos & pius adiret, Eccleſias varias, earum inſtituta & ritus ac regendi formas perluſtraret, deque omnibus his à reditu ſuo Regem inſtrueret . . . . (8). Liſmaninus Regi per Literas poſtea totum negotium expoſuit, contra ejus tamen mentem, qui reditum ejus & narrationem, vivæ vocis, non literas & mutam narrationem, expectabat (9).' Liſmanin ſhewed but little diſcretion and conduct in the execution of a deſign ſo important as this was. It muſt not be objected, that Sigiſmond Auguſtus never gave him ſuch a commiſſion; for it is eaſy to prove the contrary. The original letters, which ſeveral miniſters had encloſed to Liſmanin, and which he conveyed to the king of Poland, fell into the hands of Liſmanin's ſecretary, thirty years after the death of this prince, and were made public (10). It is certain, that Geſner, Bullinger, and Calvin, writ to this monarch, and that their letters, with many others, written to the Poliſh lords about the affair of the reformation, ran about the kingdom, and extreamly vexed the good Catholics. 'Urebat malevolos Liſmanini exemplum, ſed & miſſæ virorum præſtantium Conradi Geſneri, Henrici Bullingeri, tùm Joan. Calvini ad Regem literæ, quæ & ad Proceres Regni ac Equites veritatis Evangelicæ ſectatores ſcriptæ per ora & manus plurium ferebantur (11).' It is alſo certain, that his Poliſh majeſty anſwered the letters of, the three doctors I have named. 'Literæ illæ (12) ad Liſmaninum per Budzinium Miniſtrum ejus miſſæ fuere, qui & litteras Regias quibus Geſnero, Calvino & Bullingero reſpondit, ad eos pertulit (13).' My author complains of the perſon, who publiſhed John Calvin's letters. He accuſes him of having ſuppreſſed the praiſes, which Calvin gave Liſmanin in his letters to the king of Poland. 'Moneo amantes veri ex officio viri Chriſtiani & fidelis ſcriptoris, ut qua ratione in legendis celebrium Auctorum ſcriptis, circumſpectos eos eſſe oporteat, videant non bona fide in edendis illis Epiſtolarum gravium apographis ab infeſtis veritati hominibus actum eſſe. Nam ne quid diſſimulem; Epiſtola, quam ad Regem Auguſtum Calvinus Nonis Decembr. CIϽ IϽ LIV. dederat, ſatis cordate contra Pontificiam arrogantiam ſcripta, extat quidem inter Epiſtolas Calvini, pag. 139. ſed Liſmanini nomen initio Epiſtolæ parum candidè agens editor ejus omiſit (14). —— I think it my duty, as a Chriſtian and a faithful writer, to admoniſh lovers of truth to be cautious in reading the works of celebrated authors, ſince certain enemies to truth have acted unfairly in the publication of thoſe letters, For, to conceal nothing, the letter, which Calvin wrote to king Auguſtus, the fifth of December 1554, full of warmth againſt the arrogance of the Roman Catholics, is extant indeed among Calvin's letters, page 139; but the editor has unfairly ſuppreſſed the name of Liſmanin in the beginning of the letter.' He produces a letter of Calvin according to the tenor of the original: If you compare it with that which was printed, you will find many omiſſions in the latter; wherein this whole paſſage is left out (15); 'Equidem optimo viro & fideli ſervo Chriſti Franc. Liſmanino, quum à me conſilium peteret, auctor eſſe non dubitavi, ut iſthuc ſtatim concederet, ſi quis forte opera ejus uſus fuerit, ſaltem pio ejus deſiderio libenter ſubſcripſi: nec veritus ſum ne ejus profectio quaſi intempeſtiva Majeſtati Veſtræ diſpliceat, cujus præſentiam multis modis utilem experientia ipſa oſtendet. Quòd ſi palam à Rege ipſum proferri mox à primo ingreſſu nondum commodum videbitur, mihi tamen per ſacrum Chriſti nomen roganda ſuppliciter & obteſtanda eſt V. M. ut recte currenti ſaltem aliunde patefactam viam curet (16) —— For my own part, when Francis Liſmanin, that very honeſt man and faithful ſervant of Chriſt, conſulted me, I made no ſcruple to adviſe him, immediately to repair thither, if perhaps his aſſiſtance might be wanted; at leaſt I readily came into his pious deſire nor did I fear leſt his going thither a little unſeaſonably ſhould diſpleaſe your majeſty, experience having ſhewed that his preſence is many ways uſeful. But if it ſhall not yet be thought proper, that he ſhould, upon his firſt entrance, appear openly as commiſſioned by the king, yet I humbly implore your majeſty, by the ſacred name of Chriſt, to countenance his right undertaking ſome other way.' This is a convincing proof of the miſſion of Liſmanin, or rather of the commiſſion, which the king his maſter gave him to get intelligence among the reformers, and inſtruct himſelf in the beſt means for reforming Poland. At the ſame time, here is a deplorable inſtance of the frauds made uſe of in the printing of poſthumous books. Whatever diſpleaſes is retrenched. And who can aſſure us there are no additions and alterations made to them?

[E] He married . . . . In ſpite of the moſt judicious remonſtrances of his ſecretary (17).] I grant that our gentleman was ſtrongly perſuaded of the nullity of his vows, and that his ſpirit, no leſs than his fleſh, felt a repugnance to the law of celibacy. Yet it was but fit, he ſhould put off his marriage, till over his project of reformation, tho' Liſmanin had ſent him the letters of ſeveral miniſters upon this affair (k). The firſt ſynod, which was held in Poland (l) by the reformed, writ Liſmanin, who was then in Switzerland (m), a very obliging letter, deſiring him to return. He left Switzerland in 1556, and came back to Poland, where he concealed himſelf ſome time; for he was not ignorant, that there was a ſentence of proſcription againſt him (n). Several great lords interceded for him, ſo that he was ſuffered to ſhew himſelf. He did not at firſt declare for either of the two innovators, one of which (o) maintained, that Jeſus Chriſt was not mediator, according to the divine nature; the other (p) maintained the pre-eminence of God the Father. But after ſome conferences with Blandrata in 1558 [F], he began to doubt of the myſtery of the Trinity; and became ſo ſuſpected of Arianiſm, that he was accuſed in the conſiſtory of Cracow (q). He defended himſelf but ill, and as Blandrata had his favourers, and other diſputes had already divided mens minds, nothing but confuſion enſued in the ſynods. Liſmanin offered a medium for reconciling the parties; which was, that they ſhould ſtick to the authority of four fathers of the church (r), and for this end collected ſeveral paſſages from theſe fathers, which might ſerve for a ſanctuary to various interpretations. This project was rejected; whereupon Liſmanin retired to Konigſberg in Pruſſia, where he died miſerably about the year 1563 (s) [G]. Moſt of thoſe, who ſpeak of him, do not know his name [H].

he had given an account of his commiſſion to the king of Poland. All that is lawful is not expedient: the great matter is to time a thing well. Budzinius repreſented this maxim to his maſter, with great judgment, but found him inflexible, and could not prevail with him to defer his marriage. The Socinian, I am going to cite, judiciouſly cenſures this precipitation, and takes it ill, that Calvin and Socinus's counſels got the better of thoſe of Budzinius. ‘Quod tamen (mandatum regis) paulò poſt neglexit, poſtquàm Genevam reverſus, ne cum horrido cucullo in Poloniam rediret, uxorem duxiſſet, auctore Calvino & Lælio Socino (qui paulò poſtquam Cracoviæ ſementem veritatis jeciſſet, Genevam eodem anno redierat, quâ tamen mox, Calvini ingenium vel non ferens vel metuens, relictâ, Tiguri ſedem fixerat) ſed contradicente Budzinio, miniſtro ſuo, & ob oculos ponente Regis indignationem, qui eum ſumtibus ſuis in exteras regiones ad omnia perluſtranda & exploranda ablegarit, & tantorum conatuum alium eventum quàm Ablegati ſui, ejuſque Monachi, nuptias expectet, fide etiam promiſſi ſibi data, tum & ſucceſſum ejuſmodi matrimonii, quod magis ædificata ſubruere, quam aliquid ædificare poſſit, infauſtum; quod etiam reipſa eveniſſe ſuo loco videbimus. Sed ſurdo cecinit. Namque Monachus cœlibatum, & ſpiritu & carne meritò illum damnante, peroſus, & ad caſtas, intempeſtivas tamen, nuptias properans, quod inſtituit, effectum dedit, & accepta uxore, Genevæ manſit. Quod ejus factum Rex moleſte ferens ab incepto de exploranda religione reſiluit (18). Which command of the king he ſoon after neglected, having, upon his return to Geneva, married a wife, that he might not go back a monk, into Poland: this he did by the advice of Calvin and Lælius Socinus (who, ſoon after he had planted the truth at Cracow, returned the ſame year to Geneva; from whence departing, either becauſe he could not bear, or ſtood in fear of, Calvin's diſpoſition, he fixed his reſidence at Zurich): but his ſecretary Budzinius remonſtrated againſt it, and ſet before him the king's reſentment, who had ſent him at his own expence into foreign countries, to examine and ſearch into every thing, and expected other conſequences of ſuch great undertakings, than the marriage of his agent, and him a monk: he put him in mind likewiſe of his promiſe, and repreſented to him the event of ſuch a marriage, which rather tended to pull down, than to build up; which really came to paſs, as we ſhall ſee in it's proper place. But Liſmanin turned a deaf ear to this remonſtrance. For, tho' a monk, hating celibacy, both fleſh and ſpirit deſervedly condemning it, and haſtening to a chaſt, tho' unſeaſonable marriage, he effected what he had deſigned, and, having taken a wife, continued at Geneva. Which action of his the king reſenting, laid aſide all farther ſearches about religion.’ Correct a fault that is found in John Lætus's Univerſal Hiſtory. He ſays, that Liſmanin left the cloiſter of Cracow, with ſome other monks, to turn Proteſtant (19). Who would not think, on reading this, that this man, and, after him, ſome others of his fraternity, abjured their religion in Poland? whereas the thing was otherwiſe: the Franciſcans of Cracow, who turned Proteſtants, preceded Liſmanin (20). The latter diſſembled, and threw not off the maſk, till he was at Geneva, in his travels, under pretence of purchaſing books for his majeſty's library. His marriage occaſioned Florimond de Remond to ſay, ‘That Francis Liſinan, an apoſtate monk, who afterwards came near to the Alcoran, favoured theſe novelties more from a love for a woman he doted on, than for the ſake of the goſpel (21).’

[F] He had ſome conferences with Blandrata in 1558.] I know not whether Liſmanin had been a a patron of this Blandrata, before his travels above mentioned, and had introduced him to the queen of Poland as a good Phyſician; but this is certain, that he introduced him to a great prince after his return. ‘Ita fors tulit ut Blandrata, qui Medicinam diu in Polonia primum, deinde in Tranſylvania apud Reginas fecerat eò reverteretur: ubi nimium facilè illi aditus ad noſtros patuit, quantumvis à D. Joanne Calvino diligenter præmonitos: illum præſertim in illuſtriſſ. & præſtantiſſ. alioqui Principis cujuſdam gratiam inſinuante Liſmanino quodam Corcyrenſi, magnæ tum apud Polonicas omnes Eccleſias auctoritatis viro (22). —— It ſo happened, that Blandrata, who had been Phyſician to queens, firſt in Poland, then in Tranſylvania, returned thither; where he had too eaſy acceſs to thoſe of our party, tho' diligently cautioned by John Calvin; one Liſmanin, a Corſican, a man of great authority at that time with all the Poliſh churches, recommending him to the favour of an otherwiſe moſt illuſtrious and moſt excellent prince.’ I here obſerve a chronological error of Father Maimbourg. He ſays, that ‘Gentilis being gone to Poland, whither Blandrata had ſent for him, Lelio Socini, a Sieneſe, and Matthew Gribaldus, went to join him, and that Peter Stator . . . . . Liſmaninus . . . . Gomeſius (23). . . . . . . and Okinus, met them, openly to oppoſe the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt (24).’ He puts in the margin the year 1561; but it is certain, that Liſmanin returned into Poland five years before Gentilis was ſent for. It is farther certain, that this was not with deſign to attack the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt; for he did not appear to eſpouſe Arianiſm till after he had ſeen the diſputes of Stancarus, and conferred with Blandrata, who returned into Poland two years after him. As for Paul Goneſius, he did not go to join Gentilis; for he had been in Poland from the year 1556 (25).

[G] He died miſerably at Konigsberg, about the year 1563.] He was ſeized with a frenzy, and threw himſelf into a well, where he was drowned. Some ſay, that his wife, ſhrewdly ſuſpected of giving him horns, was the occaſion of this fatal accident. ‘Regiomonti ubi apud Ducem Boruſſiæ degebat in phreneſin lapſus, (cui à juventute obnoxius erat) in puteum decidit, atque ita ſubmerſus eſt, circa annum ut colligo, 1563. Budzinius cap. 29. hunc caſum narrans, dicit, cùm ea de re ſcrutaretur, relatum ſibi eſſe, uxorem ejus (quæ jam antea adulterio ſuſpecta erat) hujus interitus cauſam fuiſſe (26).’

[H] Moſt of thoſe, who ſpeak of him, know not his name.] We have cited one, who calls him Liſinan. Others call him Liſmannus (27), or Liſmanius (28).

[I] He writ ſcarce any thing.] Here is what we find, on this head, in the Bibliotheque of the Antitrinitarian writers (29). ‘ Literæ ad generoſum Dominum Staniſlaum Ivanum Karninſcium (30), datæ Pinczoviæ die 10 Septembris an. 1561. Apologia hæc excuſa eſt typis, anno 1565. — Manuſcript letters to Staniſlaus Ivan Karninski, dated at Pinczow, the tenth of September 1561, in which he oppoſes the opinion of Stancarus, and, by many teſtimonies of the Fathers, proves, that the Father is the cauſe and origin of the Son, and therefore greater: moreover he clears himſelf from the charge of Arianiſm; and accuſes Stancarus of Sabellianiſm. From this time, taking a handle from this letter, Gregory Paul began more ſtrongly to urge the ſupremacy of God the Father, in the church of Cracow; as Budzinius relates, who inſerted the ſaid epiſtle in the twentieth chapter of his Hiſtorical Work, a ſhort explanation of the doctrine of the moſt Holy Trinity, written againſt Stancarus, and ſome others; to which is prefixed an apologetical epiſtle to king Sigiſmond Auguſtus, June 1. 1563; *written at Cracow. It was ſubſcribed likewiſe by Felix Cruciger, ſuperintendant of the churches of Leſſer Poland, and about thirty other elders and miniſters; among whom was Gregory Paul, elder in the diſtrict of Cracow. I ſhall, for the ſingularity of the matter, recite the words, which ſhew Liſmanin's deſign of terminating the differences of the miniſters by the authority of the Fathers. ‘ Liſmaninus tamen ſtudia redintegrandæ concordiæ vel ſtabiliendæ rei reſumere: media ad hanc rem obtinendam idonea quærere: ad ultimum quatuor illorum Eccleſiæ quarti Seculi Doctorum, Ambroſii, Hieronymi, Auguſtini, & Chryſoſtomi auctoritatem quaſi partibus diſſidentibus conciliandis commodum medium proponere: hinc centonem ex illis conſuere. LISOLA (FRANCIS DE) became famous by his embaſſies to ſeveral courts of Europe. He was a native of Bezançon, and entred into the emperor's ſervice about the year 1639 (a). From that time to his death, he moſt zealouſly ſtuck to the intereſts of the Imperial court, and employed all the talents of his pen, and all the vigilance of an able ſtateſman, to the advantage of the houſe of Auſtria. He was not above thirty years old, when he was reſident in England from the emperor Ferdinand III (b). He diſcharged this employment ſo well, that he was continued in it above four years. He was envoy-extraordinary at the court of Spain, at the time of Philip IVth's death in 1665 [A]. The book, which he intituled Bouclier d' Etat & de Juſtice, — The Buckler of State and Juſtice, is a very good one [B]. Here he ſolidly anſwers what France had publiſhed about the rights of the queen to ſeveral ſtates of the Spaniſh monarchy in the year 1667. I do not doubt but he is the author of ſeveral pamphlets againſt France, which are commonly aſcribed to him; but I believe too, that ſeveral others are fathered on him, in which he was not concerned; the common artifice of Bookſellers to give a run to a pitiful piece. He made himſelf odious to France by this way of writing; and ſome Frenchmen have abuſed him in their pamphlets. They complain of his paſſionate ſatirical humour, which ſpared not the perſon of the Moſt Chriſtian king. He defended himſelf very ſeriouſly upon this head [C]. I do

[A] He was embaſſador-extraordinary at the court of Spain, at the time of Philip the fourth's death in 1665.] The count de Chavagnac obſerves (1) that the baron de Liſola had put a ſtop to the concluſion of the marriage of the Infanta with the emperor, ‘ and had obliged the king, before his death, by an expreſs article, to keep up an army in the hereditary countries, to ſuccour Flanders, the Milaneze, and the emperor: count Marſin was to be general of it.’ The count de Chavagnac was to command under Marſin: he adds, that the baron received orders to go over into England (2), and went on board a pink at Barcelona, in order to go to Final; that he croſſed Piedmont, and came to Franche Comté with his wife and daughter (3), who is one of the worthieſt perſons in the world (4).

[B] The book, he intituled, the Buckler of State and Juſtice, is a very good one.] Here is what Mr de Lyonne writ about it to the king, his maſter; ‘ I had forgotten to ſay, concerning a book the Spaniards have publiſhed, intituled, the Buckler of State and Juſtice, (which muſt be of Liſola's compoſition) in anſwer to the tract concerning the right of the queen, that it is Van Beuningen's opinion, that this book has fully and convincingly deſtroyed all the king's pretenſions to the Franche Comté, Namur, Limbourg, Haynault, Artois, &c. ſo as no good reply can be made on our part; inſomuch that the king, as he ſays, has only remaining, his pretenſion to Brabant, by right of devolution; from whence he concludes, that he ought only to demand a ſatisfaction anſwerable to that pretenſion, and that, having promiſed it ſhould be moderated, he now draws this conſequence, that Franche Comté, and ſome other places, ought to ſatisfy his majeſty (5).’ The poſtſcript Mr le Tellier underwrit to this place of Mr de Lyonne's diſpatch, by the king's order, has theſe words. There is ground to hope, that Van Beuningen's opinion concerning this book will not be followed.

[C] He defended himſelf very ſeriouſly upon this head.] His words are theſe; ſpeaking of himſelf in the third perſon. ‘ He diſcovers in all his actions a very particular eſteem for the French nation; he acknowledges it to be one of the nurſes of arts and ſciences, polite in it's diſcourſe and writings, agreeable in converſation, fruitful of great men, abounding in good ſoldiers, induſtrious, brave, and laborious. His ſentiments of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty proceed even to admiration; he ſpeaks of him on all occaſions, with as much reſpect as his own ſubjects can do; he praiſes with all poſſible commendation the glorious regulations he has made in his kingdom, and if he could ſee him apply his great genius and power to leſs dangerous and more diſtant conqueſts, his moſt ardent wiſhes ſhould attend his deſign (6).’ Let us ſee do not think any one has written againſt him in a more ingenious and ſmart manner than Mr Verjus (c) [D]: it was to retort groſs injuries. Let us not forget, that Mr de Liſola was honoured with the title of baron. He died before the opening of the conferences of Nimeguen. He would doubtleſs have been plenipotentiary of his Imperial majeſty, and poſſibly would have been more ſucceſsful than his ſucceſſors, in retarding the treaty of peace. It is ſaid he was fitter to continue a war than to conclude it [E]; and he had ſuch a faculty of alarming mens minds, that he animated to a confederacy even thoſe, who had the greateſt inclination to ſtand neuter. I am far from affirming, what many have ſaid, that he made no ſcruple of diſperſing in ſeveral courts, as from intercepted letters, I know not how many ſchemes, and projects of alliances, and inſtructions to ambaſſadors, which ſhewed, that France deſigned to ſwallow up all Europe; which pieces, as they ſay, were forged in his own ſtudy. I would require ſtrong proofs of this, before I gave credit to it. Beſides, though theſe frauds paſs well enough upon the people, ad populum phaleras; would ſee how he juſtifies himſelf upon the ſubject of libels (7). ‘This writer accuſes him of an unreaſonable affectation to appear in public by his writings, and I can ſay, with all thoſe who know him, that it is one of his greateſt averſions: tho' in the whole courſe of his life, he has employed his leiſure hours in compoſing many works, from which he might have expected as great approbation, as from thoſe he was obliged to make public; yet the ſollicitations of his friends could never conquer the reluctance he ever had to the appearing in print, and, except the Buckler of State, which he was obliged to publiſh, with a diſpatch, which did not permit him to poliſh it as he could wiſh, no other piece of his writing has come out with his privity and conſent. It is true, the avarice of the Bookſellers has put them on collecting ſome indigeſted fragments of two or three other of his works, which they ſent to the preſs with ſo many faults, that the author himſelf can hardly know them; but he has reaſon to complain, that the malice of ſome, and the ignorance of others, frequently father on him off-ſprings, which he never produced (8), and which have characters ſo contrary to his, that if the world would do him juſtice, they would readily own, that they are ſuppoſititious.’

That I may not reſume this another time, let me here recite his anſwer to the reproaches of avarice and violence. ‘He attacks him in his greateſt ſtrength, when he charges him, in covert expreſſions, with being gained by the States, and acting through a principle of intereſt and ambition; this is miſunderſtanding both his genius, and that of the United Provinces. He is as little of a humour to receive, as they are to give; it is not the way of popular republics to be ſo profuſe .... (9). Indeed, every one knows the baron de l'Iſola's little application to his fortune, and that he is daily ſubject to the reproaches of his moſt intimate friends, for the extreme negligence he ſhews in his own concerns. The preſent condition he is in, after the fair opportunities he has had to enrich himſelf, evidently proves, that he has hitherto laboured more for the public than for himſelf. Some miniſters of France could give an authentic teſtimony of his way of receiving offers of that nature; all the Imperial court will teſtify in his behalf, that for above three years he has been ardently ſolliciting his maſter to grant him a little retreat, as the price of all his ſervices, in which he might ſpend the reſt of his days at eaſe, free from the hurry of affairs. If the offices of his enemies could procure him that happineſs with his maſter, to which he only aſpires, they might rid themſelves of him more handſomely, and with a better conſcience, than by that cowardly and unworthy way of abuſes and calumnies: I know, he would think himſelf obliged to their hatred, and would heartily ſay, Salutem ex inimicis (10).’ This is what concerns the accuſation of avarice; let us proceed to the ſecond head. ‘As to his conduct in public affairs, all the miniſters of the emperor can bear him faithful teſtimony, that he never propoſed any thing violent or unjuſt, and always promoted union and moderation, while France went upon the antient maxim, Divide & Impera. In all the controverſies that have come before him, he has employed his utmoſt pains and ſtudy in ſeeking ways of accommodation; he has reconciled the elector of Brandenburg and the king of Poland, and found no obſtacle to his negotiation, but what the miniſters of France were the authors of. All the world knows how much he facilitated the treaty of Oliva, with what earneſtneſs he laboured for thoſe of Portugal, and Aix la Chapelle, and the pains he took to ſtrengthen them, by a ſolid guaranty. He has frequently ſollicited defenſive leagues, which are the foundations of the peace and ſecurity of ſtates: he has always diſſuaded the offenſive, as much as poſſible, which may raiſe jealouſies, and create new troubles; nay, he grants, that he wiſhes the preſervation and welfare of the United Provinces, becauſe he looks upon them as the bulwark of the empire, the ſtrongeſt ſupport of the Netherlands, and the mediators and guarantees of peace (11).’

[D] No one wrote againſt him in a more ingenious .... manner, than Mr Verjus.] They aſcribe to the baron de Liſola a little book intituled, la Sauce au Verjus (12), a piece extremely ſevere againſt the perſon, whoſe name is alluded to. This alluſion, and the whole title of this libel, have highly diſpleaſed Father Bouhours: I ſhall relate ſomewhat at large what he has ſaid upon it; in which we ſhall find the proof of what I advance, that this writing was fathered on Mr de Liſola. ‘A punſter will not ſcruple to play upon a name in abuſive writings. He will intitle a libel, la Sauce au Verjus, and afterwards ſay, that grapes, which can never ripen, are good to make verjuice. France approves theſe deſigns by her miniſter at the court of Brandenburg, and the ſauce is like to be none of the beſt, ſince they have put in it too much verjuice. A man muſt have a very bad taſte, to be pleaſed with ſuch kitchen-wit. Nothing diſguſts more, than theſe inſipid alluſions, which have neither wit nor beauty in them; and I do not know, whether I ſhould not reliſh the impertinence of that famous preacher, altogether as well, who preaching before a great prince, and taking for his text, Omnis caro fœnum, began thus, Monſieur, foin de vous, foin de moi, foin de tous les hommes, omnis caro fœnum *. But to ſpeak ſeriouſly, the foolery of the miniſter of Vienna, and the preacher of Paris, are much alike: the one offends the majeſty of the empire, by a fooliſh and ridiculous pun, while he pretends to ſupport it; the other diſhonours the ſacred word of God, by a vile and buffoon expreſſion. Both affront the dignity of our language, which will not ſuffer abſurd and groſs jeſting (13).’

pacific princes ſuffer themſelves to be caught by them? He had the misfortune to diſguſt the king of Poland [F], as I ſhall ſay below, citing Mr de Wicquefort. He was believed to be the author, and principal director of the deſign, which was executed in Cologn on the perſon of prince William of Furſtemberg [G], during the conferences of the peace the fourteenth of February 1674.

[F] He had the misfortune to diſguſt the king of Poland.] Mr de Wicquefort tells us this, in a way which gives us ſome touches of our baron's character. 'I will add to the example of Appelboom (15), that of Francis Baron de Liſola, the emperor's embaſſador at Warſaw. This miniſter, who was a man of parts, had made himſelf at firſt very acceptable to the king and queen of Poland, and had done them important ſervices, till, ſeeing, in the year 1661, that the queen took upon her to elect a ſucceſſor in the king's life-time, and laboured to get a French prince elected, he openly enough oppoſed the intrigues that were carrying on, in order to it, amongſt the ſenators. The queen, who could not be ignorant of it, and, who was at leaſt as fit to reign as the king, cauſed the biſhop of Warmia, and the palatine of Pomerania, to tell Liſola, that the cabals he made in the kingdom, hindered their majeſties from admitting him any more to audience. Liſola, to ſound their intention, and to know whether there was any thing in it more than perſonal, and whether the prohibition extended to the negotiation he was employed in by the emperor, his maſter, demanded to ſee the king, who ordered him to be anſwered, that, if he had any propoſition to make, he might do it in writing. Liſola refuſed it, and gave advice of the whole matter to the court of Vienna, from whence an anſwer was returned, that the emperor was aſtoniſhed at the proceeding of the king of Poland, and that, before he had taken a method ſo contrary to the good underſtanding, which ought to be betwixt neighbouring princes, and ſo near relations, and even to the law of nations, he ſhould have made his complaints. The king of Poland wrote afterwards to the emperor upon this ſubject, and his reſident Veſpaſian Landſcoronski ſeconded by his offices the reaſons of the king, his maſter; but the emperor, whoſe intereſt it was to hinder the election of a French prince, approved the conduct of his embaſſador. However, conſidering that he could do him no more ſervice in a court, to which he was become unacceptable, he recalled him at his own inſtance, and under another pretence. Liſola departed without taking leave of the king and queen, and the emperor has ever ſince employed him in negotiations of the greateſt importance, to which he applied himſelf with great ability, though frequently with little ſucceſs (16).' The author of the Curious Treatiſe upon the ſeizing of the Prince of Furſtemberg (17), confeſſes, that Liſola was unfortunate; yet he gives him great encomiums; and, as all that he ſays is ſerviceable to the hiſtory of this baron, I ſhall produce a long fragment of it (18). 'Liſola believed theſe things; but we have our (19) evaſions it is true, that as he was feared whilſt alive, we are content to attack him after his death; which is neither generous nor honeſt, and ſhews our weakneſs or our fear .... I could give a hundred inſtances of it (20), if neceſſary, to ſhew, that this man was falſly accuſed by thoſe, who durſt not look him in the face, if he were alive. Mr d'Ambrun (21) ſpeaks more modeſtly, and all he objects to him, is, that he calls him an author, known by his invenomed writings againſt France, yet without cenſuring them; ſo ſtrong was his genius, and ſo admired by all who judged ſoundly of things. He had an inconceivable force of wit, a great preſence of mind, a vaſt penetration, a vaſt reach of underſtanding, dexterouſly aſſaulted, or defended himſelf, was a maſter of politics, acquainted with all it's ſprings, a man of zeal, wrote excellently and eaſily and ſhort, publiſhed curious pieces, when no body believed he had ſo much as begun them ... (22) but with theſe eſſential qualities, Liſola was unfortunate, and died perpetually thwarted, when the emperor, moved by his ſervices, and to make him a juſt recompence, recalled him to Vienna, feeding him with many fair hopes. He ſhone, being near his end, like the glare of a ſtar that vaniſhes away, after having enlightened all the earth.'

[G] He was believed to be the author of a deſign, which was executed ..... on the perſon of prince William of Furſtemberg.] The French always ſuppoſed, as an unqueſtioned fact, that the baron de Liſola was the promoter of this deſign. He is thought to be the true author of a book, which juſtifies that action. Deckherus thus ſpeaks of it. 'Gulielmi Principis Furſtenbergii detentio, ad Cæſaris authoritatem, tranquilitatem Imperii, Pacis promotionem, juſta, perutilis, neceſſaria: authore Chriſtophoro WOLTFANGO, Anno MDCLXXIV publicata, illuſtri ſtylo, experientia profunda, conſummata eruditione prorſus excellens, ab orbe erudito adſcribi meruit Præ-Illuſtri Antonio PERIANDRO, Rhæto; qui ſuceptam modeſtam nominis detectionem gratioſe interpretari non dedignabitur: Cauſa enim ibi pro honore Imperatoris & Salute Imperii magnifice defenſa; neque ſtyli Mars Venuſque PORTNERUM ſerio diſſimulare viſi; quamvis hodie Illuſtrem Dom. Franciſcum Baronem DE ISOLA, negotiatoribus irritæ pacis immixtum, authorem videre & eligere, maluerint (23). —— The detention of William prince of Furſtenberg, juſt, uſeful, and neceſſary, to the authority of the emperor, the tranquillity of the empire, and the promoting of peace: being publiſhed by Chriſtopher WOLTFANGUS in the year 1674; and in beauty of ſtile, profound experience, and conſummate learning, altogether excellent, it deſerved to be aſcribed by the learned world to the moſt illuſtrious Anthony PERIANDER, a Griſon; who will not diſdain to interpret favourably the modeſt detection undertaken of the name: for the honour of the emperor; and ſafety of the empire, are therein pompouſly defended; and the ſtrength and beauty of the ſtile ſeemed to claim PORTNER as it's author; tho' at preſent, they chuſe to aſcribe it to Francis baron D'ISOLA, one of the miniſters for negotiating a peace.' I ſhall occaſionally ſay, that he aſcribes to the ſame author an anonymous book againſt France, printed about the year 1673. His words are theſe: 'Eodem tempore prodiit Conſilium ſtatus ſecretius Regis Galliarum, Gallice & Germanice manifeſtatum: die Franzoſiſche Rathſtube; non ſine veri conjectura, ſuæque rei, inde ſpe, hinc metu, à Germanis arreptum, à Gallis cum indignatione rejectum: ut ex libello nuper in contrarium edito Dominum Franciſcum Baronem de ISOLA authorem incuſante, curioſo noſtræ Reipublicæ Vindici pateſcit (24). —— At the ſame time was publiſhed, in French and German, the Conſilium ſtatus, &c. die Franzoſiſche Rathſtube; not without a conjecture of the truth; and greedily ſeized by the Germans, thro' alternate hope and fear, but rejected with indignation by the French: as appears to the curious defender of our republic, by a book lately publiſhed on the other ſide, accuſing the author Francis baron de ISOLA.'

He left among his papers a Latin tranſlation of the epiſtles of St Chryſoſtom, that of Euripides, and of Athenæus, &c. (5).

We ſhall have no good opinion, either of his capacity, or his latinity, if we conſult the three firſt chapters of the firſt book Variarum Lectionum ex adverſariis Jacobi Gretſeri a Georgio Stengelio Selectarum (6), or if we obſerve what the journaliſts of Trevoux have informed the public of. They ſay, that Mr Tollius had reaſon to treat as unfaithful and childiſh Theodorus Studita's Latin verſion of the Teſtament, which he inſerted with the Greek in his Inſignia Itineris Italici, in 1696. They add, 'that 'the tranſlator ſeems to have taken leſs pains to explain the Greek, than to render his own Latin 'inexplicable: he applied himſelf more to ſearch 'after uncommon Latin words, than to acquaint him'ſelf with the ſenſe of the Greek words:' but they are greatly ſurprized, that Mr Tollius ſhould 'miſtake a tranſlation in ſuch a ſtile as this, for a work 'of Father Sirmond, many of whoſe pieces he con'feſſes he had read. How came he not to perceive 'the difference between this obſcure, affected, latinity, 'and Father Sirmond's ſtile, which is always perſpi'cuous, nobly ſimple, and elegant without affecta'tion?' They obſerve, that 'the real verſion which 'this Father made of Theodorus Studita's Teſtament, 'was printed in the year 1696, in the edition of the 'works of Father Sirmond, in five volumes in folio: 'but that it had already appeared in the ninth volume 'of Baronius's Annals, at the year 826, number 50. 'That which Mr Tollius aſcribes to Father Sirmond, 'had been publiſhed ever ſince the year 1602, under 'the name of it's true author John Livineius.' They conclude, that it did not become Mr Tollius to exclaim, 'that he had diſcovered too late, that the 'learned Jeſuit underſtood neither Greek, nor Latin, 'and that the eſteem he is in, is owing only to pre'judice (7).'

In truth, it is a groſs miſtake, and which would give Mr Tollius great uneaſineſs, if he were alive. We may ſee by this, how dangerous a work criticiſm is; for if we are unacquainted with certain particular facts, all other points of knowledge will not prevent our judging wrong of things.

LIZET (PETER) firſt preſident in the parliament of Paris. I mention him, only to illuſtrate ſome things which Mr Moreri has not ſufficiently enlarged upon. They relate to Peter Lizet's diſgrace [A], and to his books of controverſy [B]. He died the ſeventh

[A] Peter Lizet's diſgrace.] It is ſpoken of in Moreri's Dictionary, in ſuch a manner, as to make ſome think, that the ducheſs de Valentinois, and the cardinal de Lorrain, were the promoters of it, as two different cauſes. This is miſleading the reader: for the cardinal and ducheſs ought to be conſidered, in this point, but as one ſole cauſe. The cardinal intereſted the ambition and avarice of this lady, in the deſign he had formed of diſcharging thoſe from places, who did not pleaſe him; and afterwards he picked a ſham quarrel with Peter Lizet, the conſequences of which were, that this firſt preſident quitted his place (1). The Guiſes were angry with him, becauſe he oppoſed the giving them the title of prince, in parliament (2); and beſides, the cardinal of Lorrain would have a man in that poſt, who ſhould refuſe him nothing. The quarrel he picked with Lizet was this: he accuſed him of having ſpoken inſolently in his majeſty's council. The foundation of the accuſation was, that Lizet would not give his vote ſtanding, and uncovered, in a council, where the cardinal preſided. He boldly declared, that he ſaw no perſon preſent, who deſerved ſuch a ſubmiſſion from him. But he did not maintain the firſt reſolution; he quitted his poſt, like a coward, and even went and threw himſelf at the cardinal's feet, ſetting forth his poverty, and ſupplicating his compaſſion (3). That poverty was to his glory, and, if he had not tarniſhed it by ſo mean a ſubmiſſion, he might be looked on as one of thoſe noble patriots, who appeared at the head of the firſt parliament of France. He was not maſter of a foot of land, after he had been twenty years firſt preſident; the very houſe where he lived was not his own. The compaſſion they had for his poverty procured him the abby of St Victor, by the ceſſion of Lewis de Lorrain, cardinal de Guiſe (4). Father du Breul, citing Thuanus, relates the thing, as if all this were tranſacted the ſame day, and at the ſame ſitting; but Thuanus ſays no ſuch thing, but inſinuates the contrary. However let us ſet down Father de Breul's words. 'The preſident Thuanus . . . . elegantly 'deſcribes the cauſe of this judge's quitting his place of 'firſt preſident, and accepting the abby of St Victor, 'whether he asked it, or whether it was offered him; '(for he could not be diſplaced, except for a crime 'puniſhable with death). Being called, ſays he, to the 'privy-council (where the cardinal de Lorrain preſided 'with an authority equal to that of a vice roy) and be'ing required to ſpeak his opinion frankly, anſwered, 'I ſee no body in this place, before whom I ought to 'give my opinion ſtanding, and uncovered. At which 'the ſaid cardinal, finding himſelf touched, proceeded 'to ill language, calling him arrogant, and threatening 'him with the king's diſpleaſure. Which ſo ſhook this 'good old man of ſixty eight years of age, and too 'timorous, that he did not perſevere in his reſolute 'anſwer, but, on the contrary, threw himſelf at the 'cardinal's feet, and begged his pardon, Ex viro con'greſſu primo, mulier poſteriore factus. He did not 'however fail to aſſert his integrity and innocence, and 'to proteſt, that, in the three years he had been coun'ſellor in parliament, twelve years advocate to the 'king, and twenty years firſt preſident, he had not ac'quired as much land as his feet ſtood upon; and that he 'rented his very houſe of the abbot of St John des Vig'nes de Soiſſons, ſituate at Paris, in St James's Street, 'near St Yves's church. Which houſe retained the 'name of the ſaid abbey, till the time of the alienations 'of the eſtates of the church, when Monſieur James 'Legier, treaſurer to cardinal Charles de Bourbon the 'elder, purchaſed it (5).' Here are ſeveral things, which are not to be ſound in Thuanus, ſome of which are undoubtedly true; for it is certain, that Lizet was counſellor in the parliament of Paris three years, &c. His epitaph declares it. 'Qui olim ob heroicas animi 'ſui dotes, vir ſingulari memoria, & ſumma juris pru'dentia in ſupremum Pariſienſis centuriæ Senatum à 'Rege Lodoico XII. adſcitus, Senatoris munere tri'ennio functus eſt. Deinde Triumviratus Regii Ad'vocati munus XII. annis Duce Franciſco I. feliciter 'obivit. Ac demum ob ſuæ vitæ integritatem, in ſum'mum Curiæ Magiſtratum evectus, Juſtitiæ habenas XX. 'annorum curriculo ita moderatus eſt, ut qui Religioſæ 'domus Abbas, volente Henrico ſecundo, fieret, dig'nus omnium calculo videretur (6). ——— Who, on 'account of his heroic qualities, being a man of a 'ſingular memory, and great skill in the law, was 'raiſed by Lewis XII to a ſeat in the parliament of 'Paris, which he held three years. Afterwards, he 'practiſed for twelve years with ſucceſs, as king's ad'vocate, under Francis I. And laſtly, being made firſt 'preſident, on account of his honeſty, he held the reins 'of juſtice with ſuch moderation, during a courſe of ſeventh of June 1554, at ſeventy-two years of age. Conſult his epitaph at the 322d page of the Antiquities of Paris. He took prieſt's orders in the year 1553 (a). I have ſpoken of him in the remark [E] of the article BEDA, on occaſion of the divorce of the queen of England. Conſult the notes upon Sanci's Catholic Confeſſion, at the 424th page of the edition of 1699, and the 185th and 507th pages of Henry Stephens's Apology for Herodotus (b), where he ſpeaks very ill of this preſident's morals.

' twenty years, that, in the opinion of every one, he was ' deſervedly raiſed, by Henry II. to be abbot of a re- ' ligious houſe.' By this epitaph Mr Moreri is convicted of two falſhoods, contained in theſe words. He was made one of the king's council in 1515 (7), and two years after was honoured with the poſt of the king's attorney-general.

[B] His books of controverſy.] Mr Moreri's indulgence could not ſtand it out here againſt the deciſive ſentence of Thuanus; he has acknowledged, that theſe books were unworthy of Peter Lizet's reputation. Let us ſee what Thuanus ſays of them; ' In quo (Sanvi- ' ctoriano cœnobio) reliquum ætatis exegit extrema ' clauſula minime priori vitæ & famæ reſpondente, ' dum litterarum ſacrarum homo rudis, Theologicis li- ' bris in illo otio ſcriptis ſe deridendum propinavit; ' quibus contrario ſcripto artificioſe ridiculo ſub Bene- ' dicti Paſſavantii nomine à Theodoro Beza, ut credi- ' tur, reſponſum eſt (8).' Father du Breul pretends, that Peter Lizet wrote part of theſe books of controverſy before his retreat to St Victor's. ' The ſaid Li- ' zet, ſays he (9), being ſtill the king's attorney, wrote ' a book, in which he demonſtrates, that the Bible ' ought not to be tranſlated into French. And while ' he was preſident he wrote ſix books, De Mobilibus ' Eccleſiæ perceptionibus (10). Afterwards he compo- ' ſed three books: the firſt concerning Auricular Con- ' feſſion, the ſecond, that a monaſtic life is not re- ' pugnant to the liberty of the goſpel. The third is ' intituled, Concerning the Blindneſs of our Age.' If Father du Breul be not miſtaken, Thuanus is guilty of a conſiderable fault. It is certain, that all theſe five books, which this Father gives the titles of, were publiſhed together in two volumes (11), after Lizet had retired to the abbey of St Victor; for there was an edition of them at Paris, in 1551, and another at Lyons, in 1552. The Oxford catalogue makes mention of the latter in theſe words, De S. Scripturis in linguas vulgares non vertendis per modum dialogi. De auriculari confeſſione. De monaſtico inſtituto. De hujus Sæculi cæcitationi & circumventione. De mobilibus Eccleſiæ præceptionibus. What I am going to copy, will increaſe the difficulties. ' Petri ' Lizetii Juriſconſulti, dum ſequentem componeret li- ' brum, in ſupremo Francorum conſiſtorio regii Ad- ' vocati, & poſtea Abbatis commendatarii Sancti Vi- ' ctoris, ſummique Senatus Pariſienſis Protopræſidis, ' de mobilibus Eccleſiæ præceptionibus tractatus, ſex ' libros continens. Ejuſdem de ſacris utriuſque inſtru- ' menti libris in vulgare eloquium minime vertendis, ' rudique pleb haudquaquam invulgandis, Dialogus ' inter Pantarcheum & Neoterum. Ejuſdem de auri- ' culari confeſſione, lib. 1. De monaſtico inſtituto, ' lib. 1. De hujuſce ſæculi cœcitate ac circumventione ' dialogus inter ſpiritalem & mundanum. Quæ omnia ' excudit Lugduni, in 4. Sebaſtianus Griphius, 1552 ' (12).' Soon after theſe books came out, Beza, who was then a young man, took a fancy to turn them into ridicule, by a very humorous burleſque, in which he ſuppoſes, that Magiſter Benedictus Paſſavantius, being ſent to Geneva, by Peter Lizet, to learn what was ſaid of his books, gives an account of his commiſſion. This piece ought to be placed among the Juvenilia Theodori Bezæ. See the new letters againſt Mr Maimbourg's Calviniſm, pag. 144, and the notes upon Sanci's Catholic Confeſſion, pag. 424. of the edition of the year 1699.

I hope it will not be thought amiſs to produce here Mr Arnauld's judgment upon Peter Lizet's work concerning the tranſlating the ſcripture into the vulgar tongue. ' There is but one point, ſays he (13), where- ' in they can, it may be, with any foundation com- ' plain, that I have unjuſtly treated Mr Mallet. Which ' is, that I may have mentioned him in ſome places, ' as if he was the firſt author of a great many imperti- ' nences, which I have ſince diſcovered he might have ' taken from a pitiful book, which I had not then ' ſeen. But I am willing to give them an example ' of what a man ought to do, when he has commit- ' ted a fault. I therefore acknowledge, that I was to ' blame to look upon Mr Mallet as the firſt author of ' all the extravagancies, his book is full of. Some ' indeed are his own, and thoſe are the groſſeſt. But ' I have diſcovered by the book I juſt now hinted at, ' that he often has only blindly followed five or ſix au- ' thors of the laſt age, whoſe works it is the ſcandal ' of ours to preſerve, ſo unworthy are they of the ' care that has been taken to reſcue them from that obli- ' vion, in which ſome of our anceſtors, wiſer than ' we, had ſuffered them to be buried.' Mr Arnauld here ſpeaks of a certain collection of ſeveral tracts, the firſt whereof is Peter Lizet's. He explains this in another book, in which he tells us (14), that the aſſembly of the clergy of France, made an order in the year 1660, ' at the requeſt of Mr d'Attichi, biſhop of ' Autun . . . . . . to print, at the expence of the ' clergy, a collection of authors of the laſt age, who ' have condemned the verſions into the vulgar tongue, ' both of the ſcripure and divine offices. And in- ' deed, adds he, this book was printed with this ſcanda- ' lous title. Collectio quorundam gravium authorum, ' qui ex profeſſo, vel ex occaſione, ſacræ Scripturæ, aut ' divinorum officiorum, in vulgarem linguam tranſlatio- ' nes damnarunt. And with this running-title, Collectio ' autorum verſiones vulgares damnantium. It is a ' medley of the moſt impertinent authors, that have ' written upon this ſubject, mingled with ſome good ' ones, but who ſay nothing of what the title of ' this collection imports, or who ſay quite the con- ' trary. It is a book of preſident Lizet's, which wholly ' turns upon this fooliſh notion, that, when the Bible ' was tranſlated into Latin, in the beginning of the ' church, there was two ſorts of Latin, one conform- ' able to the rules of Grammar, which was only un- ' derſtood by the learned, and the other not tied to ' thoſe rules, which was the only one the people un- ' derſtood, and that the Latin verſions of ſcripture ha- ' ving been made in this firſt ſort of Latin, was not pro- ' perly a verſion into the vulgar tongue; which this ' preſident, become an abbot, extends to all other ' languages.' Mr Simon (15) had nothing to ſay in defence of this bad writer.

The Epitomy of Geſner makes mention of two other books of Peter Lizet: one De autoritate Eccleſiæ, & poteſtate Papæ; the other De Hæreticis, & eorum pœnis. After his death was printed (16) his treatiſe of the Method of proceeding, both in the Inſtitution and Deciſion of Criminal and Civil Cauſes, together with the Form and Manner of taking Informations in the ſaid Civil and Criminal Cauſes. La Croix du Maine, who tells me this, did not know that Lizet died in 1554. He make him flouriſh in 1557 (17).

LOGES (Mary Bruneau (a), Lady des) was one of the moſt illuſtrious women of the XVIIth century. She was married, in 1599, to Charles de Rechignevoiſin, Eſq; lord des Loges, who, four years after, was made gentleman of the king's bed-chamber in ordinary. She died the ſeventh of June 1641, and was buried in a place ſhe had choſen her ſelf, at two hundred paces diſtance from la Pleau, a houſe in Limouſin. Her zeal for the Proteſtant religion, which ſhe made a conſtant profeſſion of all her life, her piety, and greatneſs of ſoul, appeared with a new luſtre, towards the end of her life; the laſt years whereof, and ſome others, had been exerciſed by ſeveral domeſtic troubles troubles [A]. This doubtleſs occaſioned her making juſt reflexions on the nothingneſs of creatures. She had nine children [B], and a ſiſter that was married to Mr de Beringhen [C]. The remarks will inform us, what eſteem ſhe was in, not only with the greateſt wits, ſuch as Malherbe and Balzac [D], but alſo with the greateſt princes [E]. We ſhall relate a curious ſtory, which Mr Menage has rectified [F]. Mr de Wicquefort obſerves, that Madam des Loges had a great aſcendant over the duke of Orleans, for which reaſon, the aſſemblies were forbid, which were uſed to be held in her houſe (b).

[A] She met with ſeveral domeſtic troubles.] It is the common fate of perſons of her ſex, who diſtinguiſh themſelves by a great genius, improved by ſtudy, if they engage in conjugal bonds. They ought not to do it; there are others enough beſides them, who would take care the race of mankind ſhould not fail. It is much if their country does not do them the ſame injuſtice, which Seneca ſpeaks of with regard to Cato (1), of not knowing the value of the treaſure it poſſeſſes. That which their country does not always do, a huſband does much leſs.

[B] She had nine children.] There were but five of them alive, three ſons and two daughters, when ſhe died. One of the ſons bore arms in Holland (2), and married a gentlewoman there, of the family of Vander Myle. There are only ſome daughters from that marriage.

[C] .... and a ſiſter that was married to Mr de Beringhen.] The marquis de Beringhen proceeded from this marriage, who died at eighty nine years of age, in March 1692, after having been for a long time firſt maſter of the horſe to the king. This alliance gave very illuſtrious grand-nieces to our Madam des Loges, by the marquis de Beringhen's ſiſters. The author of ſeveral books lately publiſhed, with the title of Voyage d'Eſpagne, &c. is one of them. There are two others (3), who, out of zeal to the Proteſtant religion, have quitted all the advantages of their country, and who, by their piety, give a luſtre to all the other excellent qualities that they are enriched with.

[D] She was in great eſteem .... with Malherbe and Balzac.] To have a juſt idea of the ability and wit of Madam des Loges, we need only conſider, that Malherbe was one of her moſt aſſiduous courtiers, and conſtantly viſited her every other day (4). Mentioning Malherbe, is mentioning a man, who never praiſed, nor hardly eſteemed, any body, and who is one of the firſt and greateſt maſters that has formed the taſte and judgment of our nation, with reſpect to ingenious performances. Balzac was at leaſt equal to Malherbe, and has perhaps more contributed than he to that politeneſs, which is ſpread over the kingdom; however, he was equally an admirer of the lady we ſpeak of. The letters he writ to her are a public teſtimony of it; and his eſteem for her, does as well appear by what he ſaid of her to his friends, as by what he wrote to her. He confeſſes, in one place of his works, that if he was grown more ſparing of his praiſes, he was chiefly obliged for it to the good advice ſhe gave him. 'The good Madam des Loges, ſays he (5), gave me ſome terrible reprimands upon this ſubject ſome time before her death. She upbraided me, that I was the dupe of all reigns (they are her very words); that I laviſhed my praiſes upon all thoſe who made a ſhew of any worth; that I was too credulous with reſpect to others, upon the firſt glimpſe of goodneſs, the bare appearance of virtues, and ſo forth.' In another place (6), where he thunders againſt burleſque, which was grown too much in faſhion, to the great grief of thoſe, who had acquired glory by a grave ſtile, he does not think he has ſufficiently fulminated that fundamental hereſy in his empire, unleſs he condemns it by a decree of this lady. 'This ſort of raillery, ſays he, ſavours more of comedy than converſation, and more of farce than comedy. This is not rallying like a gentleman. Madam des Loges uſed to ſay, that ſhe ſhould be as pleaſed to ſee a drunken man, or bravado, acted ... Nay, more, ſhe ſaid, ſhe looked upon ſuch jargon, as ſhe would upon a wooden ſword by a man's ſide, and meal upon his face.' Mr de Bautru, who was not naturally a great admirer (7), doubtleſs admired this lady, ſince, to ſhew a man's want of addreſs, who could not profit by the converſation of the wits, by putting them upon things worthy of them, he makes uſe of theſe four examples:

Il mene aux Allobroges
Balzac, Boiſſat, Conac, & Madame Des-Loges (8).

I do not believe, that they, who are ſkilled in proofs, can doubt of the extraordinary merit of this lady, after having conſidered what I have ſaid.

[E] .... but likewiſe with the greateſt princes.] Balzac ſhall be my witneſs. 'If you do not know, ſays he (9), Urania, the nymph I have ſo much praiſed, and whom I bitterly lament, I muſt tell you, it is my good deceaſed friend, Madam des Loges, who in her life-time was called more than once, and by more than one academiſt, the celeſtial, the divine, the tenth muſe, &c. who was eſteemed within and without the kingdom, by crowned heads, by the demi gods of our age, by the duke of Orleans, the king of Sweden, the duke of Weimar, &c. I am of opinion, that the verſes, which celebrate her memory (I ſpeak of the eloquent Urania) are full as good as thoſe, which one Antipater, a Sidonian, made upon the death of the learned Sappho.'

[F] I ſhall relate a curious ſtory, which Mr Menage has rectified.] It is an adventure, which has been publiſhed two ſeveral ways. Mr de Balzac tells it thus, in his thirty ſeventh dialogue.

'Malherbe was one of the moſt aſſiduous in making his court to Madam des Loges, and viſited her conſtantly every other day. One of thoſe days, finding upon the table in her cloſet du Moulin the miniſter's great book againſt Cardinal du Perron (10), and being ſeized with a poetical enthuſiaſm upon the bare reading of the title, he called for pen, ink, and paper, and wrote down theſe ten lines:

Quoy que l'Auteur de ce gros livre
Semble n'avoir rien ignoré,
Le meilleur eſt toûjours de ſuivre
Le Prône de nôtre Curé.
Toutes ces doctrines nouvelles
Ne plaiſent qu'aux folles cervelles;
Pour moi, comme une humble brebis,
Sous la houlette je me range:
Il n'eſt permis d'aimer le change,
Que des femmes & des habits.

This author may pretend to know
More than a thouſand others do;
I follow what our parſon preaches,
Believing only as he teaches.
I leave theſe novelties to thoſe,
Who turn with ev'ry wind that blows.
My ſhepherd humble I obey,
Nor ever from his flock do ſtray.
No change a man of prudence knows,
But in his women, and his cloaths.

'Madam des Loges, reading Malherbe's verſes, and fired by honour and zeal, took the ſame pen, and on the other ſide of the paper wrote theſe other verſes:

C'eſt vous dont l'audace nouvelle
A rejetté l'antiquité,
Et du Moulin ne vous rapelle
Qu'à ce que vous avez quitté.
Vous aimez mieux croire à la mode:
C'eſt bien la foy la plus commode,
Pour ceux que le monde a charmez.
Les femmes y ſont vos idoles:
Mais à grand tort vous les aimez,
Vous qui n'avez que des paroles.

'Tis women only you adore,
And bow to their almighty pow'r.
Yet vain your worſhip, ſince, at moſt,
But empty talking is your boaſt.

‘The concluſion of theſe two epigrams will doubtleſs pleaſe the prophane, and thoſe who ſet up for galants. For my part, I hold, that in matters of religion, the comic ſtile is always to be avoided. The firſt is not grave enough for a man, who ſpeaks in earneſt, and the other is too light for a woman, that ſpeaks to a man.’

Mr Menage thinking, that the matter thus happened, printed this ſtory in his obſervations upon Malherbe's poems, juſt as Mr de Balzac had told it. But mind what he has put at the end of this book.

‘Since this note was written and printed, I have been informed by Mr de Racan, that it was he, who made theſe verſes, which Mr de Balzac aſcribes to Malherbe, and that Madam de Gombaud made thoſe which he aſcribes to Madam des Loges, and that the thing happened in this manner. Madam des Loges, who was of the pretended Reformed Religion, had lent Mr de Racan, du Moulin the miniſter's book, called le Bouclier de la Foi, (The Shield of Faith), and had obliged him to read it. Mr de Racan, having read it, made this epigram upon it, which Mr de Balzac has altered in many places.

Bienque du Moulin en ſon livre
Semble n'avoir rien ignoré;
Le meilleur eſt toûjours de ſuivre
Le Prône de noſtre Curé.
Toutes ces doctrines nouvelles
Ne plaiſent qu'aux folles cevelles.
Pour moi, comme une humble brebis
Je vais où mon Paſteur me range,
Et n'ay jamais aimé le change
Que des femmes & des habits.

‘Having communicated it to Malherbe, who came to ſee him at that time, Malherbe wrote it with his own hand in du Moulin's book, which he returned at the ſame time to Madam des Loges, as from Mr de Racan. Madam des Loges, ſeeing theſe verſes written with Malherbe's hand believed them to be his; and as ſhe was extremely zealous for her religion, would not ſuffer them to remain unanſwered. She therefore deſired Mr de Gombaud, who was of the ſame religion, and of equal zeal, to anſwer them. Mr de Gombaud (I know it from himſelf) who believed, as Madam des Loges did, that Malherbe was the author of thoſe verſes, anſwered them by the epigram, which Mr de Balzac attributes to Madam des Loges, and which he thinks too light for a woman who ſpeaks to a man. This is not the firſt time that Mr de Balzac has aſcribed to this lady verſes ſhe had no hand in; for in one of his letters he makes her the author of the ſong of the dying lover, the burden whereof is,

Ah c'en eſt fait! je cede à la rigueur du ſort,
Je vais mourir; je me meurs; je ſuis mort;

'Tis done; my deſtiny is on my head;
I'm going to die; I die; and now I'm dead.

‘which was written by the deceaſed Mr Habert Ceriſi, one of the fineſt wits of our age.’

A SHORT Reflexion on the preceding paſſage.

Who ſees not in all this an inſtance of hiſtorical uncertainty? Mr de Balzac thought he had communicated to his friend a moſt certain fact, an incomparable piece of ſecret hiſtory, and infinitely valuable to all the lovers of what we call perſonalities. He had perſuaded all his readers of it. Mr Menage, having inſerted it in one of his books, was juſt upon diſperſing it far and wide, when by chance Meſſieurs de Racan and de Gombaud, being ſtill alive, diſſabuſed Mr Menage, before his obſervations upon Malherbe were ſold off; and thus the public came to be undeceived. If theſe two gentlemen had been dead, without ſpeaking of this to Mr Menage, or if they had ſpoken of it at another time, the firſt narration would perhaps ſtill have had intire credit. How many other facts are there, and much more important, which paſs from age to age, and from generation to generation, no body diſcovering their falſhood; for want of fortuitous occaſions, like the converſation of Mr Menage with Racan and Gombaud? However, Madam des Loges is cleared of compoſing verſes in too light a ſtrain. It cannot be denied, that Balzac was in the right, to think the end of the epigram too little conſiſtent with the modeſty and purity which ought to reign in all the writings of the fair-ſex. Not that we muſt eſpouſe the haſty and too rigid maxim of thoſe, who pretend, that a woman, who ſhould tax a man with having nothing but words, would as good as declare that ſhe was concerned ſhe had not got, or did not daily get from him, ſomething more real. This maxim is extravagant and falſe; but who would not wonder at Mr de Racan, if it were true, that he was the author of Malherbe's Life (11), printed with ſome little tracts in 1672; who would not wonder, I ſay, that he ſhould tell Mr Menage of Balzac's miſtake, and yet inſert all Balzac's ſtory (12) in Malherbe's Life, without rectifying it in the leaſt?

LOGNAC, or LOIGNAC, or LONGNAC, or rather LAUGNAC [A], made himſelf extreamly conſiderable in the reign of Henry III, and had a great ſhare in that prince's favour. He was brave, and in this point had firmly eſtabliſhed his reputation by ſome duels, and quarrels, which the houſe of Guiſe had brought upon him [B], and

[A] LOGNAC .... or rather LAUGNAC.] It will appear by the following remarks, that theſe four ways of writing this gentleman's name, are found in our hiſtorians. The laſt is, I think, the beſt, as being that which Dupleix, who was of the ſame country, has uſed; and it is known, that the dipthong au, is very common in the proper names of that country. This diphthong is pronounced like an o at Paris, and in the neighbouring provinces: and hence the authors put an o, and not an au, in the firſt ſyllable of the name of this favourite of Henry III. I ſhall obſerve by the way, that one muſt be very attentive, who would undeſtand the Latin tongue, ſpoken by the Pariſians; for they pronounce in the ſame manner aurum and borum, auris and oris, and thus of ſeveral other words.

[B] He had eſtabliſhed his reputation by ſome duels, and quarrels, which the houſe of Guiſe had brought upon him.] The baron de Biron (1) had a quarrel in 1585, ‘with the Sieur de Carency, eldeſt ſon to count de la Vauguyon .... for the heireſs of the houſe of Caumont, whom both pretended to. This quarrel ended by a duel of three againſt three; Biron, Loignac, and Janiſſac, on one ſide, killed Carency, d'Eſtiſſac, and la Baſtie (2).’ The author, I have this from, relates in another hiſtory (3); ‘that after the duke of Eſpernon was retired to Angouleme, the king having given the place of firſt gentleman of his chamber to the Sieur de Loignac, this gentleman was as a mark, at which, by the inſtigation of the duke of Guiſe, all the princes of the league diſcharged their envy. The chevalier d'Aumalle, a little before the death of the duke of Guiſe, returned to Paris, and, before he came there, had contrived a quarrel with the ſaid Sieur de Loignac, upon the ſubject of ſome amorous affair, which commonly happens amongſt young gentlemen. Loignac was brave, a man well ſkilled in arms, and who had come off in ſeveral duels; his quality of firſt gentleman of the bedchamber gave and in which he came off honourably. He was captain of the forty-five gentlemen [C], choſen for the greater ſecurity of Henry IIId's perſon. He was alſo maſter of the wardrobe (a), and gentleman of the chamber to this prince (b). It is generally agreed, That he encouraged him to rid himſelf of the duke of Guiſe [D], and was preſent at the execution; but as to the manner of his being an accomplice in it, it is not ſo generally agreed [E]; nor are the hiſtorians any better agreed about his diſgrace: for ſome only ſay, he was turned out becauſe he aſked a government; and others, That he had a government given him on purpoſe to remove him from court [F]; adding, that, by the treachery of

‘ gave him a right to fight duels with ſtrangers of the greateſt quality, and decline them with ſuch as were not of his own quality. This grudge therefore, and the picking a quarrel on a love affair, made Loignac conclude, that the duke of Guiſe, and the princes of the league, were reſolved he ſhould not long enjoy the advantages the king's favour gave him.' We find in d'Audiguier (4) more circumſtances, than in Cayet, of Biron's and Carenci's duel.

[C] He was captain of the forty five gentlemen.] Let us cite Mezerai, who tells the reaſon of raiſing this new company. ‘ Eſpernon raiſed to the higheſt degree of favour, in which Joyeuſe began to decline, ceaſed not to ſpur on the king to the ruin of the Guiſes; and they, in revenge, having ſworn his deſtruction, formed ſeveral conſpiracies to compleat it. He had the policy to perſuade the king, that they were all intended againſt his ſacred perſon; and by this means induced him to guard himſelf with the famous band of forty five, which he himſelf choſe perhaps with a deſign which the event will diſcover. They were all Gaſcons, whom the hopes of puſhing their fortune made capable of every thing. Lognac was their captain (5).'

[D] It is generally agreed, that he encouraged Henry III, to rid himſelf of the duke of Guiſe.] ‘ At the ſame time the duke of Nevers, and Lognac, captain of the forty-five, were continually exaſperating him; the duke of Nevers, becauſe he irreconcileably hated the duke of Guiſe, and Lognac, becauſe, having in ſome ſort ſucceeded to Eſpernon's favour, as a ſecond to Bellegarde, couſin german to this duke, he knew that the houſe of Guiſe, a conſtant enemy to favourites, would not long ſuffer him in this poſt (6).'

[E] The manner of his being an accomplice in the murder of the duke of Guiſe, is not agreed on.] Some authors ſay, that the duke ‘ ſeeing the council had not yet met, was paſſing to the king's chamber, and croſſing the gallery which led to it, and entering into his majeſty's chamber, he ſaw the Sieur de Longnac ſitting upon a trunk, his arms a-croſs without ſtirring. He had long ſuſpected, that the Sieur de Longnac had undertaken to kill him, and thinking that he was poſted there to attack him; he reſolved impetuouſly to fall upon him, and laying his hand to his ſword, drew it half out; but the Sieur de Longnac, and ſome others, ſeeing him make ſuch an attempt, at the king's chamber door, prevented him, and immediately threw him down, and diſpatched him with their ſwords, without giving him time to ſpeak a word. This is the opinion of thoſe who have written the hiſtory of theſe matters, as printed at Geneva (7); but the opinion of the league is quite contrary (8).' The relation I have mentioned above (9), imports, that Loignac ſtaid with his ſword (10) in the chamber, where the execution was to be performed, and where the king had placed eight of the forty-five. Theſe eight had each a dagger. The duke of Guiſe entering into the chamber, ſaluted thoſe that were there; ‘ who roſe up, ſaluted him at the ſame time, and followed him as out of reſpect; but when he was within two ſteps of the door of the old cabinet, ... he was ſuddenly ſeized by the arm by the Sieur Montſery, the elder . . . . . . who at the ſame time ſtabbed him with his own hand in the breaſt, ſaying, ha! traytor, thou ſhalt die. At the ſame inſtant the Sieur Des Effranats ſtarted up, and the Sieur de St Malines gave him another ſtab with his dagger in the breaſt, and the Sieur de Loignac run him into the loins (11).' Other relations ſay, ‘ that nine of the forty five came from behind the tapſtry, where they were concealed; and that the duke of Guiſe, ſeeing near the chimney, Longnac, whom he knew to be his mortal enemy, made ſome ſteps backward to draw his ſword; that he at firſt got rid of the aſſaſſins; and that Longnac, perceiving that he came directly to him, gave him a thruſt in the belly, on which he fell down, and died ſome moments after (12).' Davila ſuppoſes, that Lognac did not wound him at all, and that he only puſhed him back, ſeeing him come forwards to him; that after this repulſe, the duke, who had received ſeveral wounds, fell down, and died. ‘ Dopo molte ferite nel capo, e per ogni parte del corpo urtato finalmente da Lognac, al quale s'era impetuoſamente auventato, cadè innanzi alla porta della guardarobla, & ivi ſenza poter proferir parola fini gli ultimi ſoſpiri della ſua vita (13).' Thuanus affirms, that Loniac ſeeing him come up to him in a menacing poſture, oppoſed him with his ſword in the ſcabbard, and made him fall (14). He was only ſpectator of the tragedy, if we depend on Thuanus's relation. He was leaning on a trunk, when the duke diſingaged himſelf from the aſſaſſins, and came up to him, as it were, with a deſign to fall upon him: ‘ Cum in Monpeſatum Loniacum, qui cum Rogerio Bellagardio Termo in cubiculo aderat, arcæ genu altero innixum protenſis brachiis & contractis pugnis tendere videretur, quaſi ipſum petiturus (15).' Dupleix is more poſitive; he makes the eight alone do the execution. ‘ Laugnac not being one of thoſe, whom the king had choſen, did not ſtrike him, tho' he was particularly his enemy: However he had offered his majeſty to attack him in a ſingle combat. But the king thought there would be as much hazard as courage in that, and would not ſuffer him (16). I have read this laſt circumſtance in no other Hiſtorian; the offer made to Henry III of taking off the duke of Guiſe by a duel, being conſtantly aſcribed to Grillon. Davila relates, that Grillon making this offer, upon refuſing the commiſſion to kill the duke, left the king in an extreme perplexity, which laſted till Lognac had promiſed him to ſee the execution done. I relate the words of this Hiſtorian, becauſe they contribute to the hiſtory of our Laugnac. ‘ Laſciò il Rè grandemente dubbioſo di quello doveſſe operare, e ſtette in queſta perpleſſità ſino al giorno vigeſimo primo, nel quale confidato il negotio a Lognac uno de' gentilhuomini della camera ſua, il quale gia dal Duca di Gioioſa era ſtato introdotto alla Corte; e per la gratia per le maniere, e per la gentileſſa de' coſtumi gia cominciava ad avanzarſi al luogo de' Mignoni, egli ſenza molto riguardo promiſe con alcuni delli quarantacinque, che dependevano ſtrettamente da lui di eſeguire prontamente queſto fatto (17). ——— He left the king in great perplexity, till the twenty firſt day, when, truſting the buſineſs with Lognac, one of the gentlemen of his chamber, who had been introduced to court by the duke of Joyeuſe, and had ingratiated himſelf by his polite behaviour, he immediately promiſed him, with the aſſiſtance of any one of the forty five, who depended upon him, to ſee it executed.'

[F] Some ſay, he was turned out becauſe he asked a government; and others ſay, that a government was given him on purpoſe to remove him from court.] ‘ The Sieur de Loignac, a great favourite of the king . . . . importuned him to give him a government, and a place of ſecure retirement, becauſe of the enmity the houſe of Guiſe bore him: his majeſty asking him, if he had no other reaſon, than that, to ask of him a place of retreat; Loignac anſwered, no, and that the enmity of the houſe of Guiſe was reaſon enough. Get you gone immediately out of my court, ſaid the king to him, and let me never ſee you more, ſince you deſire any other ſecurity than being near my perſon; I have not been miſtaken in my opinion of you, I much ſuſpect that you are tainted with ingratitude, and have forgotten the obligations you are under for the benefits I have conferred on you. Loignac, receiving an anſwer from the king ſo contrary to his expectation, immediately left Blois, du Guaſt, he loſt his government, and was forced to retire to Gaſcony, his native country. He was there killed ſome time after. Thuanus and Davila ſeem to ſay, that he was with the king, when the monk, James Clement, aſſaſſinated that prince (c). I do not know whether

‘ and paſſing through Amboiſe, retired into Guienne, where he was killed ſoon after by a piſtol-ſhot, as he came out of his caſtle, to go a hunting, by a gentleman his neighbour, with whom he had a quarrel (18).’ This is Peter Victor Cayet's relation, which at once ſhews what I have elſewhere promiſed (19), and is alſo an inſtance that Henry III, on ſome occaſions, knew how to ſhew reſolution and greatneſs of mind. The following relation is very different.

‘ The king, at the beginning of the year 1588, had made two maſters of his wardrobe, the lords de Bellegarde and de Longnac; the former from a natural affection he had for him; the latter at the preſſing inſtance of the duke d'Eſpernon: but as that affection, which ſprings from our own nature, takes deeper root, than the liking entertained upon the recommendation of others: ſo he began to be weary of Longnac, eſpecially after the death of the duke of Guiſe, and the more becauſe he had been the firſt, who induced the king to command this murder, which ſucceeded ſo unfortunately; ſo that from thenceforward he began to look on him with an ill eye. I can aſſure you of one thing, that, three weeks before he left the court, an experienced courtier ſaid to me: obſerve this gentleman; as good a face as he ſets upon the matter, he is totally routed. For entering publickly into the king's cabinet, to keep up his good opinion with the people, he immediately comes out by the back door, and retires to his chamber, quitting the field to Monſieur de Bellegarde. The king, who would not entirely diſcontent Longnac, had formerly given him the government of Anjou and Touraine; and he had often told him, that he ought to retire thither; but he, foreſeeing, that if he left his place, he ſhould only be a governor in parchment, and that they, who had the governments of the towns, would have all the power, remained ſtill at court with the king; who at laſt, not able to bear the ſight of him any longer, told him, that he had frequently enough declared how little ſatisfaction he received from his preſence; ſo that he might take his choice, either to go off immediately, or never appear before him more but on Fridays, a day he ſet apart to do penance. Longnac, ſeeing himſelf totally cut off from his maſter's favour, and no hopes of any longer reſpite, began to act the part of a deſperate man, who meditated nothing but revenge: a deſign, however, which he did not execute, but has ſince been very well managed by another hand. He poſted away one fine night, and retired to Amboiſe (20).’ This was a town of his government, and where du Guaſt, whom he looked on as his creature (21), commanded. He was very well received, and propoſed to du Guaſt the deſign of making an advantage of having the priſoners of Henry III in their power (22). The court ſuſpected this conſpiracy, and entered into a kind of negotiation to prevent the conſequences: Lognac proteſted, that he would moſt faithfully preſerve the town, the caſtle, and the priſoners, for the king. But to ſay truth, he reckoned without his hoſt; for he had put a thought into du Guaſt's head, who knew very well how to make his advantage of it (23). ‘ There were in the caſtle two companies; that of du Guaſt, and another . . . . . Du Guaſt, by a bold ſtroke of policy, gives a falſe alarm, and makes Longnac believe, that there were people ravaging on the other ſide of the bridge, who attempted to make themſelves maſters of it, and that it would not be amiſs to play them a trick. Longnac, whoſe hands itched to be doing ſomething, and who did not at all miſtruſt du Guaſt, undertook to clear the coaſt: he marches out of the caſtle, followed by the other company, and ſoon finds there was nothing at all in it. But at his return, thinking to enter at the place where he marched out, he found the gates ſhut againſt him, and all his company. You may judge what a miſerable condition he was in, to find himſelf firſt thruſt out of his maſter's favour, and next out of the only place where he propoſed to himſelf ſome conſolation in his diſgrace. Seeing himſelf thus tricked, he was forced to reſume the old road to his houſe in Gaſcony, and his company of ſoldiers, that of Blois. Du Guaſt excuſes himſelf (as I have learned from his own mouth) by alledging he had certain advice, that Longnac came to Amboiſe, with a deſign to kill him, and make himſelf abſolute maſter of the place. And that, to avoid this danger, he was willing to prevent him (24).’ We ſhall make a reflexion below upon this excuſe of du Guaſt.

Were I to chuſe between Victor Cayet's and Stephen Paſquier's accounts, I ſhould not imitate Mr Varillas, who gives the preference to the former, without ſaying one word of what is contained in the latter. He relates (25) the agreement made by du Guaſt with the league for delivering the priſoners, and the conditions upon which Henry III made that compact miſcarry, by granting du Guaſt conſiderable advantages, and then adds, that ‘ the counter blow of theſe two compacts rebounded upon Longnac . . . . . The king was inſenſibly grown cold to him; and though his majeſty had hitherto held the balance between Bellegarde and him, as he had formerly done between the dukes of Joyeuſe and Eſpernon; he now on a ſudden inclined wholly on Bellegarde's ſide, by refuſing Longnac the poſt of maſter of the horſe, to give it the other. The diſcontent this gave Longnac made him deſire his majeſty, too plainly . . . . . that for his loſt favour he would be pleaſed to give him a place of ſecurity for his retreat.’ Mr Varillas afterwards relates the anſwer which Cayet ſuppoſes the king made. This is all his account. How many eſſential circumſtances are here wanting; and what did he think of, in connecting Laugnac's diſgrace with the baſe dealing of du Guaſt? to what purpoſe is this? the omiſſion of facts, which might ſerve to connect theſe things, and furniſh a reaſonable tranſition to an Hiſtorian, is not the leaſt of his faults. Nothing is more worthy of a critic's intention, than ſuch omiſſions; and nothing more proper to mend the taſte and judgment of an author, than to be admoniſhed of this kind of miſtakes.

Obſerve theſe words of Thuanus (26): ‘ Tum, that is when James Clement ſtabbed Henry III with a knife, Mompeſacus, Loniacus, & Joannes Levius Mirapicenſis, qui aderant, hominem ictu regis attonitum ſuperanti ira penſum humi ſternunt, ſtatim innumeris vulneribus confoſſum interficiunt. —— Then Mompeſat, Loniac, and John marquis de Mirepoix (who were preſent) in a rage, knocked down the aſſaſſin, who ſtood aghaſt when he had ſtruck the king, and, giving him innumerable wounds, killed him.’ Davila ſays (27) that Mompeſat, Lognac, and the marquis de Mirepoix, gentlemen of the bedchamber, threw James Clement's body out at the window. I believe that, in both theſe Hiſtorians, the comma between the two firſt names is a fault: for Mompezat was one of our Lognac's names (28); but if they mean by their Loniacus, and Lognac, him whom I treat of in this article, they are in an error: he was no longer at court.

By the way, du Guaſt deſerved no credit, when he alledged the excuſe, which Paſquier relates. The action, he would excuſe, looked ſo black, ſo infamous, ſo perfidious, that there is no lie, but he muſt have invented to cover it. And it is the common cuſtom of thoſe, who are guilty of ſuch crimes, to maintain that, without that, they had been ruined, and that they had moſt certain advice of deſigns formed againſt their life. They do not always lie; but moſt commonly they do; and this is ſufficient to render all apologies of this kind ſuſpected of impoſture, unleſs they are built upon undoubted evidence. It was not impoſſible that Laugnac ſhould take meaſures to ſupplant the other; for there were few honeſt men at that time, either at court, or in the league; but the preſumption is wholly againſt du Guaſt; he was a diſhoneſt man, an arrant villain, and ſhewed it ſoon after; ſince, notwithſtanding all his obligations to Henry III, who had loaded him with favours, he treated with the league for the ſurrendering the priſoners, whom that prince had given him the charge of; and he had actually delivered them, if the king had not prevented him by advantageous offers. Unfortunate prince! who was obliged to recompenſe the

LOLLIUS (MARCUS) conſul of Rome in the year 733. The emperor Auguſtus gave him great marks of his eſteem; for he not only honoured him with the government of a noble province (a) in the year 719, but made him alſo governor to Caius Cæſar, his grandſon, when he ſent this young prince into the Eaſt, to ſettle the affairs of the empire on that ſide. Lollius's conduct in this expedition betrayed the ill qualities, which he had all along politickly concealed under the falſe appearance of virtue. His diſſimulation was ſo well acted, that, tho' avarice was his reigning paſſion, he was ever thought impregnable to money [A]. The exceſſive free-gifts, which he extorted in his expedition with the young Cæſar, loſt him that falſe reputation (b). He diſcovered ſome other of his faults in the ſame employment; for, in order to make himſelf more neceſſary, he fomented the quarrel between Tiberius and Caius Cæſar [B]; and was ſuſpected of being a ſpy of the king of Parthia, to retard the concluſion of the peace. Caius diſcovered this treachery [C], when he came to diſcourſe with this monarch in an iſle of the Euphrates (c), which made him conceive ſuch an averſion for this governor, as drove him to deſpair; for he killed himſelf

Though a court-poet makes little conſcience of beſtowing elogies on men that are thought unworthy of them, yet we muſt believe, that Horace here governs himſelf by appearances; that is, that he proportions his praiſes to the eſteem the perſon praiſed was then in; for we learn from a famous hiſtorian, that this Lollius concealed his evil qualities to a wonder. ‘ Sub Legato M. Lollio homine in omnia pe‘ cuniæ quam recte faciendi cupidiore, & inter ſum‘ mam vitiorum diſſimulationem vitioſiſſimo (2). —— ‘ Under the lieutenant M Lollius, a man in every ‘ thing more fond of money than of behaving well, ‘ and, under the higheſt appearances of virtue, the ‘ moſt vitious of men.'

[B] He fomented the quarrel betwixt Tiberius and Caius Cæſar.] This we may infer from theſe words of Suetonius (3): ‘ Namque privignum Cajum orien‘ ti præpoſitum, cum viſendigratia trajeciſſet Samum ‘ (Tiberius) alieniorem ſibi ſenſit ex criminationibus ‘ M. Lollii comitis & rectoris ejus. —— For Tibe‘ rius, having paſſed over to Samos, to pay a viſit to ‘ his ſon in-law Caius Cæſar, who had the care of the ‘ Eaſt, found his affections alienated from him by the ill ‘ offices of Marcus Lollius, his companion and governor.' This appears ſtill more plain by the teſtimony, which Tiberius gave Quirinus, governor of Caius Cæſar. ‘ Datuſque rector C. Cæſari Armeniam obtinenti Ti‘ berium quoque Rhodi agentem coluerat, quod tunc ‘ patefecit in Senatu, laudatis in ſe officiis, & incu‘ ſato M. Lollio quem autorem C. Cæſari pravitatis ‘ & diſcordiarum arguebat (4). —— And being ap‘ pointed governor of Caius Cæſar, who was ſet over‘ Armenia, he had made his court likewiſe to Tiberius, ‘ who reſided at Rhodes; which he then made appear ‘ in the ſenate praiſing his ſervices done to himſelf, ‘ and accuſing Marcus Lollius of inſtigating Caius Cæ‘ ſar to miſbehaviour and falling out with him.'

[C] Caius diſcovered this treachery.] Conſider theſe words of Paterculus. ‘ Quo tempore M. himſelf [D]. He had vanquiſhed the Beſſi in the year 738 (d), and, carrying the war immediately into Germany, received an affront there; but he had his revenge [E], and obliged the Germans to make peace. Marcus Lollius, his ſon, was conſul, we know not in what year, and left a daughter, who was wife to Caligula [F], as I obſerve in the remarks [G].

[D] Lollius killed himſelf.] This we learn from Pliny. ‘ M. Lollius infamatus regum muneribus in ‘ toto Oriente interdicta amicitia à C. Cæſare Auguſti ‘ filio venenum biberet (6). —— Marcus Lollius, having loſt his reputation by receiving bribes from kings, ‘ all over the Eaſt, and being diſcarded from the friend- ‘ ſhip of Caius Cæſar, the ſon of Auguſtus, drank poiſon.’ Solinus ſays the ſame thing (7). Paterculus, who was nearer that time, doubts whether Lollius killed himſelf: Cujus mors intra Paucos dies fortuita an voluntaria fuerit ignoro (8); but he ſays, that Lollius lived but a ſhort time after the interview of Caius Cæſar, and the king of Parthia. Suetonius ſeems to make Lollius live ſome time after his diſgrace; for he ſays, that Caius Cæſar, being angry with Lollius, was reconciled to Tiberius, and conſented, that he ſhould be recalled to Rome. Is (Caius Cæſar) forte tunc M. Lollio offenſior, facilis exorabiliſque in vitricum fuit (9).

[E] He received an affront there, but had his revenge.] The ſhame was greater than the loſs, in our Marcus Lollius's misfortune (10). The eagle of the fifth legion was loſt in it (11). Euſebius, not mentioning any diſgrace of Lollius, affirms, that the Germans were beaten in the fourth year of the CXCth Olympiad. Scaliger (12) pretends, that Euſebius is miſtaken, both as to the fact, and as to the year; but ſince Dion affirms, that the Germans, being informed of Lollius's warlike preparations, and the march Auguſtus was making with an army into Gaul, retired into their country, made peace, and gave hoſtages (13), it is probable, they had been beaten in an encounter, as Euſebius ſuppoſes.

[F] His ſon was conſul (14) . . . . and left a daughter . . . . wife to Caligula.] There are ſeveral authors, who ſay, that Lollius, governor to Caius Cæſar, was father to this young lady (15); but it is falſe. Lollia Paullina was grand-daughter to this Lollius. This we find in Pliny (16) in expreſs terms, and we may moreover ſolidly infer it from her competition with Agrippina, when the queſtion was about remarrying the emperor Claudius. All the ladies that were eminent for their birth, their beauty, and their riches, entered the liſts on this occaſion (17); at laſt the diſpute was reduced to this, whether Agrippina was to be preferred to Paullina, or to Ælia Petina. Judge then, whether this can agree with a woman about fifty years of age. Paullina could not be much younger, if ſhe was daughter to our Marcus Lollius who departed from Rome with his pupil, about the year 751, and died two years after; but the diſpute I ſpeak of was in the 801ſt year of Rome. It is not eaſy to decide, whether he, to whom Horace addreſſes the ſecond and eighteenth epiſtle of the firſt book, is the ſame, to whom he addreſſes the ninth ode of the fourth book. Mr Dacier, who affirms it, muſt ſuppoſe, that theſe three pieces are addreſſed to Marcus Lollius, governor to Caius Cæſar. He believes alſo, that Lollius had this charge, when Horace writ the eighteenth epiſtle to him, which he ſuppoſes we may date from the 742d year of Rome (18). There are two things to be obſerved againſt this. I. No hiſtorian makes mention of Lollius's having this charge, before this young prince was ſent into the Eaſt. II. It is no way probable that if Horace had written an epiſtle to the governor of Caius Cæſar, he would have hinted at nothing that related to this honour. Now it is certain, there is nothing in this epiſtle to ſhews us, that Lollius was judged worthy of having the education of the emperor's grandſon committed to him. Where is the poet, who would preſume to give advice to the governor of the preſumptive heir of a great empire, without inſinuating at leaſt, that he ſpeaks to a man moſt qualified to give leſſons to others upon Social Virtue (19), and who actually inſtructed a young prince, by the choice of a great monarch? For the ſame reaſon, I am perſuaded, that Lollius was not governor to the young Cæſar (20), when Horace addreſſed the ninth ode of the fourth book to him. Could the poet omit the compliments due to him on that head? Beſides, Horace addreſſes himſelf to a man, who had born arms in his youth, in Auguſtus's expedition againſt the Cantabrians.

> Militiam puer, & Cantabrica bella tuliſti,
> Sub duce, qui Templis Parthorum ſigna refixit,
> Et nunc, ſi quid abeſt, Italis adjudicat armis (21).

> When young, you ſerved in the Cantabrian war,
> Under that chief, who in the Parthian temples
> His ſtandard fix'd, and now, if ought be wanting,
> To crown the glory of the Roman name,
> Adjudges it to the Italian arms.

This people was ſubdued in the year 729, when our Lollius was governor of Galatia. Hence Father Noris (22) makes it appear that Horace wrote not the aforementioned epiſtle to Lollius, Caius Cæſar's governor. It will not avail Mr Dacier to ſay (23), that Aguuſtus undertook his firſt expedition againſt the Cantabrians in the 726th year of Rome, and that this expedition laſted four years, and that Puer often ſignified a grown man; and that Lollius's age was diſpenſed with, when he was made conſul in the year 732; all this doth not weaken Father Noris's proof. Let us ſay then, with this learned author, that Horace did not write the ſecond and eighteenth epiſtle of his firſt book to Lollius, Caius Cæſar's governor, as Glandorpius has pretended, at the 547th page of his Onomaſticon, but to this Lollius's ſon.

[G] As I obſerve in the remarks.] Here I ſhall give the article of LOLLIA PAULLINA, grand-daughter to our Marcus Lollius. Her firſt huſband's name was Caius Memmius Regulus, who was conſul, when Sejanus was put to death. Some time after, being at the head of an army (24), he received orders to bring his wife to Rome, to be married to the emperor Caligula, I ſay, to be married to him: for this prince, having heard, that Lollia Paullina's grand-mother had been a prodigious beauty immediately commanded Memmius to come to Rome, to give him his wiſe in marriage, and behave himſelf in the ceremony, as a father, who marries his daughter. ‘ Lolliam Paullinam C. Memmio Conſu‘ lari exercitus regenti nuptam facta mentione aviæ ‘ ejus, ut quondam pulcherrimæ, ſubito ex provincia ‘ evocavit, ac perductam à marito conjunxit ſibi.’ This is what Suetonius ſays in the twenty fifth chapter of Caligula's life; and here is what Euſebius ſays in his chronicle: ‘ Cujus Memmii Reguli uxo‘ rem duxit, impellens eum ut uxoris ſuæ patrem eſſe ‘ ſe ſcriberet (25). — He married the wife of Memmius ‘ Regulus, obliging him to ſign himſelf his wife's father.’ If you deſire to ſee a note of Caſaubon upon this place of Suetonius, read what follows, and remember, that what he relates from Dion, is in the fifty ninth book, pag 745. ‘ Ait Euſebius, ſcriberet, ‘ nempe in dotali inſtrumento, nam ut omnia acta ‘ legitime viderentur, omnia ſolennia ſunt ſervata. ‘ Maritus igitur pro patre fuit, qui eam Cajo deſpon‘ ſavit, dotem dixit, & ad novum maritum perduxit. ‘ Auctor Dio. Hinc intelligimus Suetonii ſequentia ‘ verba, perductam à marito conjuxit ſibi. —— ‘ Euſebius uſes the term ſcriberet (ſigned or ſubſcrib‘ ed himſelf) to wit, in an inſtrument of dower; for ‘ that every thing might ſeem to be tranſacted in form ‘ of law, all the forms were preſerved. The huſband ‘ therefore acted the father; who betrothed her to ‘ Caius, aſſigned the dowery, and brought her to her ‘ new huſband. Dio tells us this. Hence we under- ‘ ſtand Suetonius's words perductam, &c.’ This happened the 791ſt year of Rome. Caligula, quickly diſguſted with Paullina, divorced her under pretence of barrenneſs (26), and commanded her never more to have to do with any man. Miſſam fecit interdicto cujuſquam in perpetuum coitu (27). Nine years after this divorce, Paullina diſplayed all her charms, to ſupplant her rivals with the emperor Claudius, whom ſhe would gladly have married; but her faction was not ſo ſtrong as Agrippina's. ‘ Cæde ‘ Meſſallinæ

Meſſallinæ convulſa principis domus orto apud libertos certamine quis deligeret uxorem Claudio cœlibis vitæ intoleranti, & conjugum imperiis obnoxio. Nec minore ambitu feminæ exarſerant, ſuam quæque nobilitatem, formam, opes contendere, ac digna tanto matrimonio oſtentare. Sed maxime ambigebatur inter Lolliam Paullinam, M. Lollii conſularis filiam, & Juliam Agrippinam Germanico genitam: huic Pallas, illi Calliſtus, fautores aderant: at Ælia Petina è familia Tuberonum, Narciſſo fovebatur. —— The death of Meſſalina ſhook the emperor's houſe, a conteſt ariſing among his freed-men, who ſhould chuſe a wife for Claudius, who was grown weary of living ſingle, and was fitted for the government of wives. Nor did the ladies burn with leſs rivalſhip, each claiming the honour of his bed on account of birth, beauty, and wealth. But the greateſt rivalſhip lay between Lollia Paullina, daughter of Marcus Lollius, formerly conſul, and Julia Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus: Pallas favoured the latter, and Calliſtus the former; but Narciſſus eſpouſed the cauſe of Ælia Petina, of the family of the Tubero's.' Thus Tacitus ſpeaks in the firſt chapter of the twelfth book of his annals. The favourite, that was for Paullina, alledged, that, as ſhe had no children, ſhe would be a very good ſtep mother to Claudius's children; ' Calliſtus, continues the ſame Tacitus . . . . longe rectius Lolliam induci quando nullos liberos genuiſſet, vacuam æmulatione, & privignis parentis loco futuram.' But the favourite, who acted for Agrippina, alledged better reaſons: ſo that Claudius declared for her. This triumph ought to have effaced the hatred, which Paullina's competition had excited in Agrippina's breaſt; yet the happy rival left no ſtone unturned to deſtroy the unfortunate; ſhe had her accuſed of conſulting the augurs, and the oracle of Apollo, about the emperor's marriage: the trial ended in a decree, which condemned Lollia Paullina to baniſhment, and the confiſcation of the beſt part of her eſtate. They left her but about 130 thouſand crowns. Tacitus's words, which I am going to cite, will tell us ſomething of Paullina's parentage. ' Atrox odii Agrippina, ac Lolliæ infenſa, quod ſecum de matrimonio principis certaviſſet; molitur crimina, & accuſatorem, qui objiceret Chaldæos, magos, interrogatumque Apollinis Clarii ſimulachrum ſuper nuptiis Imperatoris. Exin Claudius inaudita rea, multa de claritudine ejus apud ſenatum præfatus, ſorore L. Voluſii genitam, majorem ei patruum Cottam Meſſallinum eſſe, Memmio quondam Regulo nuptam (nam de C. Cæſaris nuptiis conſulto reticebat) addidit pernicioſa in Rempub. conſilia, & materiem ſceleri detrahendam. Proin publicatis bonis, cederet Italia. Ita quinquagies ſeſtertium ex opibus immenſis exuli relictum (28). —— Agrippina mortally hated Lollia, becauſe ſhe had been her rival in the emperor's marriage: ſhe forged accuſations, and ſuborned an accuſer, to charge her with conſulting wizards, and the oracle of Apollo Clarius, concerning the emperor's marriage. Upon this Claudius, without hearing the accuſed, having enlarged upon her high birth before the ſenate, telling them that ſhe was daughter of a ſiſter of L. Voluſius, that Cotta Meſſalinus was her great uncle, and that ſhe had been formerly married to Memmius Regulus (for he purpoſely ſaid nothing of Caius Cæſar's marriage) added that it was neceſſary to prevent the ill deſigns of this lady againſt the government. Upon this, her goods were confiſcated, and ſhe was baniſhed Italy; and but 130000 crowns of her immenſe fortunes were left her.' Agrippina's hatred being ſuch, as was not be ſatisfied without the death of her rival, cauſed her to be murthered in her exile (29); and, to be well aſſured, that it was Paullina's head, that was brought her, which ſhe could not eaſily diſtinguiſh, ſhe opened her mouth, knowing this lady had ſomething remarkable in her teeth. Ἤδη δὲ τινας καὶ τῶν ἐπιφανῶν γυναικῶν ζηλοτυπήσασα ἔφθειρε, καὶ τήν τε Παυλίναν τὴν Λολλίαν, ἐπειδ᾽ ἐλπίδα τινὰ εἰς τὴν τοῦ Κλαυδίου συνοίκησιν ἔσχηκεν, ἀπέκτεινε. τὴν τε κεφαλὴν αὐτῆς κομισθεῖσαν αὐτῇ μὴ γνωρίσασα, τό τε στόμα αὐτῆς αὐτοχειρίᾳ ἠνέῳξε, καὶ τοὺς ὀδόντας ἐπεσκέψατο, ἰδίως πῶς ἔχοντας. Multas illuſtres & nobiles fœminas nonnulla invidia perdidit: in quarum numero fuit Lollia Paulina: quæ ab ea propterea necata eſt, quod ſe Claudio nupturam eſſe aliquando ſperaverat: cujus caput ad ſe perlatum quum non agnoſceret, os ejus manu ſua aperuit, ut dentes inſpiceret quos illa non perinde ut cæteræ ſolent habuerat (30). By the ſum that Paullina had left, we may judge ſhe was extremely rich; but we ſhall know this better, if we conſider the prodigious coſtlineſs of her clothes. Pliny, who had ſeen her, ſays, that even on occaſions, which were not the moſt pompous, ſhe wore in her dreſs, and on her head, jewels, to the value of four millions of crowns. ' Lolliam Paulinam, quæ fuit Caji principis matrona, ne ſerio quidem ac ſolenni cærimoniarum aliquo apparatu, ſed mediocrium etiam ſponſalium cœna, vidi ſmaragdis margaritiſque opertam, alterno textu fulgentibus, toto capite, crinibus, ſpiris, auribus, collo, manibus digitiſque: quæ ſumma quadrigenties H-S. colligebat: ipſa confeſtim parata nuncupationem tabulis probare. Nec dona prodigi principis fuerant, ſed avitæ opes, provinciarum ſcilicet ſpoliis partæ. Hic eſt rapinarum exitus: hoc fuit quare M. Lollius infamatus regum muneribus in toto Oriente, interdicta amicitia à Cajo Cæſare Auguſti filio venenum liberet, ut neptis ejus quadringenties H-S. operta ſpectaretur ad lucernas (31). —— I have ſeen Lollia Paullina, who was Caius Cæſar's wife, not on a ſolemn occaſion, but at the celebration of ſome mean marriage, her whole head, hair, cap, ears, neck, hands, and fingers, covered with emeralds and pearls, to the value of four millions of crowns; the purchaſing of which ſhe was ready to prove by bills and receipts. Nor were they the gifts of a prodigal prince, but hereditary wealth, acquired by the plunder of provinces. This is the event of rapine: it was for this reaſon, that M. Lollius, who had loſt his reputation by taking bribes from kings all over the Eaſt, being diſcarded from the friendſhip of Caius Cæſar, the ſon of Auguſtus, poiſoned himſelf, that his neice, covered with the value of four millions of crowns, might make a ſhow at an entertainment.' I have ſaid in another place (32) that archbiſhop Uſher is miſtaken, in ſaying, that this woman was married to Caius Cæſar, grandſon to Auguſtus.

In the beginning of his ſtudies, he run through all the inconveniencies, which generally attend ſcholars, who are as he was, the ſon of a poor peaſant [A]. He lived ſometimes with his father, ſometimes with an aunt, ſometimes with with an uncle, always grappling with ill fortune, and conſtrained to divide himſelf betwixt the labours of tillage, and the leſſons, which the miniſter of the place gave him. At laſt, when he had attained to fifteen years of age, he ſtole from his father's houſe, and went to Vibourg, where there was a college. There he ſpent eleven years, and, tho' he was forced to earn his bread by his labour, he followed his ſtudies with extreme application [B], and, amongſt other ſciences, made a great progreſs in Mathematics. After this, he viſited the univerſity of Copenhagen, and in a year's time got the eſteem of the profeſſors to ſuch a degree, that they earneſtly recommended him to the illuſtrious Tycho Brahe. This recommendation had a good effect. Longomontanus was very well received by this famous Aſtronomer, who then lived in the iſle of Huen. I ſpeak of the year 1589. He lived with him eight years, and was very uſeful to him, either in obſerving the ſtars, or in making calculations, and proved himſelf ſo exact, ſo able an Aſtronomer, and ſo laborious, that Tycho Brahe conceived a moſt particular eſteem and affection for him (c), and having quitted his own country, to ſettle in Germany, paſſionately deſired to have him along with him (d). This appears by letters he wrote to him in 1598, and 1599 (e). Longomontanus complied with this deſire of Tycho Brahe, and went to him at the caſtle of Benach, near Prague (f). He was a great help to him in all his aſtronomical labours; but being deſirous of a profeſſor's chair in Denmark, Tycho Brahe conſented to deprive himſelf of the company and ſervices of this diſciple, and gave him a diſcharge (g), filled with ſuch marks of eſteem, as turned greatly to his glory. Nor did he forget to furniſh him with large ſupplies for the expences of his journey. Longomontanus, returning into Denmark, fetched a great compaſs, to ſee the places, from which Copernicus had contemplated the ſtars (h). He met with a kind patron in the chancellor (i); and, after having for ſome time enjoyed an honourable employment in his family (k), he was promoted to the profeſſorſhip of Mathematics, in the univerſity of Copenhagen, in the year 1605. He diſcharged it worthily to his death, which happened the 8th of October 1647 (l). He had loſt his wife ten years before, who was ſiſter to Gaſper Bartholinus (m). The books he left behind him diſcover his great capacity [C]. He amuſed himſelf with finding out the ſquaring of the circle, and pretended he had found it: he was vigorouſly attacked on that account by an Engliſh Mathematician [D]. Here is a man, that may be compared to the philoſopher Cleanthes (3).

[C] The books he left behind him ſhew his great capacity.] Here is the catalogue of them (4): Syſtematis Mathematici pars I. ſive Arithmetica, Hafn. 1611 in 8vo. Cyclometria è Lunulis reciprocè demonſtrata, Hafn. 1612. This is the liſt we find in Albert Bartholin's treatiſe de Scriptis Danorum. It is not compleat. There are many philoſophical, aſtronomical, and chronological diſſertations, wanting which Longomontanus had opened in diſputations, in his auditory, at ſeveral times. You will find the catalogue of them in a book, which Mr Mollerus has intituled, ad librum Alberti Bartholini de ſcriptis Danorum poſthumum hypomnemata hiſtorico-critica paucula è plurimis ſelecta (5). You will alſo find there (6), that Witte (7) had no reaſon to aſcribe to George Lewis Frobenius, Longomontanus's Cyclometry, printed at Hamburgh, without the name of the author, in 1627. The manuſcript of Longomontanus's apology which he made for Tycho Brahe, againſt Craigius a Scotch Phyſician, was depoſited in the hands of George Frommius, who ſucceeded him in the chair of Copenhagen (8). I do not think it was ever printed. Tycho Brahe preſſed him in 1598 to haſten the concluſion of it, than it might ever as an appendix to his treatiſe upon Comets (9); for it is was upon that ſubject that Craigius attacked him in the year 1592, in a book intituled, Capnuraniæ reſtinctio, ſeu cometarum in ætherem ſublimationis refutatio (10).

[D] He pretended to have found out the quadrature of the circle, and was attacked by an Engliſh Mathematician.] Mr Baillet has mentioned this diſpute. ‘ Mr Des Cartes ſays he (11), was drawn into ‘ an engagement among the chief Mathematicians of ‘ Europe, partaking in the famous diſpute, which aroſe ‘ that year betwixt Longomontanus and Pell, about the ‘ ſquaring of the circle. Longomontanus . . . . . had ‘ undertaken to demonſtrate the quadrature of the circle, that rock, on which the greateſt genius's have ‘ hitherto ſplit; nor was he more ſucceſsful in his attempt than others before him, notwithſtanding the ‘ good opinion he had entertained of his labour. ‘ Dr John Pell, an Engliſhman profeſſor of mathematics ‘ in the college of Amſterdam (12), immediately diſcovered a great deal of falſe reaſoning in it, and † ‘ ſeeing that the point of the difficulty conſiſted in ‘ the proof of one ſingle theorem, he firſt made the ‘ demonſtration of it by himſelf, and reſolved to propoſe the thing to all the ableſt Mathematicians of ‘ his acquaintance, and deſired their opinion of it. ‘ They who examined it ‡, and ſent him their demonſtrations, were Meſſieurs Roberval, le Pailleur, ‘ Carcavi, Mydorgius, and Father Merſennus, who ‘ was returned from his travels into Italy, about the ‘ beginning of July: lord Cavendiſh, and Mr Hobbes ‘ of England, John Adolphus Taſſius, a Mathematician ‘ of Hamburgh, John Lewis Wolzogen, a free ‘ baron of Auſtria, gentleman of the bed-chamber to ‘ the king of Poland, a Carteſian in Philoſophy, and ‘ a Socinian in religion; Father Bonaventure Cavalieri, an Italian, profeſſor of Mathematics at Bologna: Mr Golius, profeſſor at Leyden, and ſome ‘ other Dutch Mathematicians. Mr Des Cartes alſo ‘ ſent to Dr Pell, a ſhort demonſtation upon the ſame ‘ ſubject, which ſerved much to authorize what he ‘ had advanced againſt Longomontanus.’ Mr Mollerus reports (13), I. that Longomontanus boaſted, even in his his epitaph, that he had found out the quadrature of the circle, and that Gaſper Bartholinus made a poem, to congratulate him upon it; but that Thomas Bartholinus, Gaſpar's ſon, was of a different judgment, and found, in Longomontanus's enterprize, more ingenuity and labour, than good ſucceſs. II. That Claudius Hardy, counſellor in the Chatelet at Paris, refuted (14) Longomontanus's paralogiſms. Mr Mollerus had before obſerved, that Longomontanus's friends confuted his antagoniſts upon other points. Peter Bartholinus, his diſciple, anſwered, in 1632 (16), the objections of Martin Hortenſius, inſerted in the preface of Philip Lansbergius's commentary de motu terræ diurno & annuo. George Frommius, in his treatiſe de mediis ad Aſtronomiam reſtituendam neceſſariis, publiſhed in the year 1642, made the apology to the Introductio in Theatrum Aſtronomicum; a work that Longomontanus had publiſhed againſt John Baptiſta Morin, in 1639. But as to the quadrature of the circle, they could not juſtify him. His labours were not ſo ſucceſsful. ‘Haud æque felices fuerant Longomontani Conatus Cyclometrici, circa veram Circuli Quadraturam, Scopulum tot Ingeniorum Subtilium Naufragiis infamem (17). Longomontanus's attempts to meaſure the circle, were not equally ſucceſsful, with regard to it's true quadrature, that rock on which ſo many ſubtle genius's have ſplit.’

[E] He altered ſomething in Tycho Brahe's ſyſtem. I think the reflexion of a modern author . . . . worth relating.] ‘There was a fourth ſyſtem, which Longomontanus, one of Tycho Brahe's chief diſciples deſigned to bring into vogue, by taking ſomething from all the reſt, and endeavouring to avoid the ſtrongeſt objections againſt them. He ſaw, that, in that of Tycho, the inconceivable rapidity of the fixed ſtars, and, in that of Copernicus, the immenſe ſpace he put between the heaven of Saturn, and the fixed ſtars was ſcarce ſufferable; to remedy both which inconveniencies, he made a ſmall change in Tycho's ſyſtem, by giving the earth a diurnal revolution about it's own axis, by which means the planets, the ſun, and fixed ſtars, did not move round the earth in twenty four hours, but each planet made it's revolution gently from weſt to eaſt; and the fixed ſtars had their ſlow motion round their orbit in 25000 years, as the moon performs her's in twenty ſeven days, the ſun in a year, and others in proportion to their diſtance, and the greatneſs of their circle. But though this ſyſtem, which was only a ſmall reformation of Tycho Brahe's, without diſconcerting any of it's parts, might be defended by very good reaſons; yet becauſe of the little credit of it's author, and the great reputation of thoſe that preceeded him, very few applauded it; ſome holding, that if the earth be in the center, it muſt be immoveable; but if it does move, that it's motion muſt be like that of the other planets. In a word, it was believed, that, he who formed this ſyſtem upon the other two, which at that time divided all the learned, only did it through the natural inclination men have to be always refining upon others, though theſe reformations generally end in ſpoiling the whole; they who endeavour to reconcile two oppoſite opinions, taking a leſs reaſonable method, for the moſt part, than that which they refuſe to ſubmit to (18).’

Theſe laſt words are capable of a large and fine comment, which might be filled up with many reaſons and examples.

LONGVIC (JAQUELINE DE) (a) ducheſs of Montpenſier, was a lady of great merit [A], and great intereſt [B], about the middle of the XVIth century. She was the youngeſt

[A] She was a lady of great merit.] Thuanus makes a very honourable mention of her. ‘Sub id tempus Jacoba Lonviana Montpenſerii uxor V. Kal. Sept. ex tabe deceſſit, virili animo & prudentia ſupra ſexum inſignis, quæ ſemper publicæ tranquillitati ſtuduerat, & ſi diutius vixiſſet, motus qui poſtea ſecuti ſunt impeditura credebatur (1). —— About that time Jaqueline de Longvic, wife of the duke of Montpenſier, died of a conſumption; a lady of a manly genius and prudence above her ſex, who always conſulted the public tranquillity, and, if ſhe had lived longer, would, it is thought, have prevented the commotions, which afterwards followed.’ The preſident de la Place gives her no leſs glorious a character. ‘If ſhe had lived longer, ſays he (2), it is thought ſhe would have prevented the enſuing troubles, becauſe ſhe was on the one hand well beloved, and in credit with the queen, and, on the other, the king of Navarre was very much obliged to her; who ſerved as a bond of union, and of peace, and amity, between them. She was a woman of good underſtanding, and very well verſed even in ſtate affairs.’ It was to her the archbiſhop of Vienne (3) addreſſed himſelf, as to the laſt reſort, when he ſaw they were going to ruin the princes of the blood, in the reign of Francis II. He diſpatched a perſon to her, to tell her, that, if ſhe did not keep the promiſe ſhe had made of oppoſing the deſigns of the houſe of Guiſe, all was loſt (4). The preſident de la Place, who relates this matter at large, has a ſmall fling by the by at the ducheſs; but he inſinuates, that it was more owing to the conſtable of Montmorency, than to her, that the miſchief was not remedied. ‘The ſaid lady of Montpenſier, ſays he (5), having heard his propoſition, though ſhe was ſomewhat timorous, diſmiſſed the ſaid perſon, who had ſpoken to her, to go to the bath of Aſpac (6), in the country of Liege; who paſſing to Meru, upon St Martin's day following, ſpoke to the ſaid conſtable, but to little purpoſe.’ We ſhall ſee below (7), that ſhe was blamed for having ruined all by the advice ſhe gave the king of Navarre.

[B] . . . . and great intereſt.] It is believed (8), that, had it not been for her intereſt, the duke of Bouillon would not have kept the government of Normandy, after the death of Henry II, as he did. But let us hear Brantome; he will tell us a great deal of this lady's intereſt. Having told the reaſons, why, in the reign of Francis I, the duke of Montpenſier had ſo little ſucceſs, with reſpect to his pretenſions to the eſtate of the conſtable Charles de Bourbon, he adds (9): ‘In king Henry's time, he enjoyed ſome part of it by means of Madam Jaquette de Long-Vic, of the family of Givry, deſcended from that of Chalon, and from the palatines of Burgundy. This lady, ducheſs of Montpenſier, in king Francis's reign, for reaſons and cauſes at that time talked of, the duke of Orleans ſerving her, what harm was there in all this? (Monſieur de Roſtain, who is ſtill alive, knows it well) had great credit at court; but ſhe could do nothing in this ſucceſſion for the reaſons I have given; beſides that ſhe was young, and at that time had not near ſo much wit as ſhe afterwards had. In king Henry's time, ſhe was in great favour; for ſhe grew more politic, and gained a great aſcendant over the queen. King Francis II came afterwards to the throne; and then too ſhe was in great power; for I have ſeen her manage ſo well the king and the queen, as twice with my own eyes to obſerve, that the king recommended the cauſe of the ſaid lady, who did all, and her huſband little, and ſollicited for her againſt his own intereſt. This was very common at court; inſomuch that once the cardinal of Lorrain, ſpeaking to the gentlemen youngeſt daughter to John de Longvic [C], lord of Givry, and was married, in 1538, to Lewis de Bourbon, the ſecond of the name, duke of Montpenſier (b). She was firſt favourite to Catherine de Medicis; and had ſhe been alive at the time, when this queen gave into intrigues, which had like to have ruined the kingdom, ſhe would perhaps have made her take better reſolutions (c). It is poſſible too, that her good counſels and addreſs might have had no effect on a ſoul of ſuch a temper, whoſe ambition was like a devouring fire. Be it how it will, ſhe died juſt before the breaking out of the great troubles on account of religion, the twenty-eighth of Auguſt 1561. She openly made appear, during a tedious ſickneſs, what her huſband had long ſuſpected of her; to wit, that ſhe was a Proteſtant [D]; and doubtleſs it was her private inſtructions, which ſowed in the ſoul of ſome of her daughters the ſeeds of reformation, which brought forth fruit ſome time after: for Frances de Bourbon, her eldeſt daughter, who was married, in 1558, to Henry Robert de la Marc, duke of Bouillon, openly profeſſed the Proteſtant religion, and the incredible pains her father took to reclaim her [E] produced no effect. Charlotte, this duke's fourth daughter, had been put into a convent, againſt her mother's opinion [F], who had a mind to marry her to the duke de Longueville. She was abbeſs of Jöüare; but as that kind of life did not comport with the inſtructions ſhe had received from her mother, nor perhaps with her own inclinations, ſhe eſcaped into Germany in 1572, where ſhe abjured Popery, and was married two years after to the prince of Orange. Of the three other daughters of Jaqueline de Longvic, and the duke of Montpenſier, two perſevered in ‘men of the robe in the name of the king, who had ſent for him to his palace of Cluny, when the king went to Orleans, recommended to them the right of the ſaid lady, (who was then preſent) even ſo far as to ſay, that the king would gratify her in that; that he renounced his part and right to that inheritance, and that he would have no part nor portion of it, and that they ſhould manage the matter as little to his intereſt as they could. In fine, this princeſs and prince, and their adherents, ſo laboured and ſollicited, and pleaded, that they have come in for a ſnack of every thing, except the duchy of Chaſtelleraut, which the former kings would never part with, but added to their own eſtate, which they ſince gave as a portion to their natural ſiſter legitimated, whom we have heard long called Madam de Chaſtelleraut, at preſent Madam d'Angouleſme.’

Upon this teſtimony I think I have a right to charge Father Anſelme with a falſhood, in ſaying (10), ‘that king Francis I. reſtored to the duke of Montpenſier a good part of the inheritance of the houſe of Bourbon, as the duchy of Chaſtelleraut, the county of Foreſts, and the barony of Beaujelois, and Dombes, and alſo the county of Montpenſier, which was afterwards made a duchy and peerdom, in 1538, to which was joined the dauphiny of Auvergne, with the lordſhip of Combraille, in the year 1543.’ Thuanus agrees incomparably better with Brantome, than with this father; for he affirms that Charles de Marillac wrote to the ducheſs, in 1560, that the time was come, in which ſhe was obliged to act againſt the houſe of Guiſe, ſince ſhe had recovered the country of Beaujolois and Dombes, and that ſhe had promiſed to act, provided right was done her husband as to the inheritance of the conſtable (11). It had been abſurd to talk to her in this manner, if the reſtitution had been made in Francis the firſt's time. I know not how we are to believe what Mr Varillas ſays (12), that the ducheſs fixed her husband in the intereſt of the Guiſes, who did not miſtruſt this duke, but ſuffered him to live at court, when they baniſhed thence the other princes of the blood, both becauſe they knew, he perfectly hated the Calviniſts, as alſo becauſe all the world knew, that Jaqueline de Longvic, his wife, abſolutely governed him, and that this princeſs was ſo intimate with the queen mother, that ſhe would never do any thing, but what her majeſty pleaſed (13). This was the place for this author to ſay what he has ſaid in the life of Charles IX, concerning this ducheſs's Huguenotiſm; but a man does not always know, when he writes one book, what he knows when he compoſes another, and hence come ſo many different hypotheſes of Mr Varillas.

[C] She was youngeſt daughter of John de Longvic.] Frances de Longvic, her elder ſiſter, was wife to admiral Chabot, and left ſome children (14). Father Anſelme therefore has very improperly ſaid, that Jaqueline was heireſs to John de Longvic. He gives the ſame title to Frances. The expreſſion would not be juſt, though their father's eſtate had been divided between them.

[D] Her husband had ſuſpected . . . . . that ſhe was a Proteſtant.] Let us ſee what the preſident de la Place ſays of it (15). ‘She deſired, that the duke de Longueville might marry her third daughter (16), deſigned by her father for a nun at Frontevault, to the great regret of the ſaid lady, as ſhe gave her huſband to underſtand in her laſt diſcourſes, diſcovering to him, what he had before ſuſpected, that ſhe was a Proteſtant, which ſhe had ſufficiently diſcovered during her ſaid illneſs, which was long, being at Fontainbleau, and the king at Rheims, in order to his coronation, where ſhe deſired a miniſter of the ſaid religion to confer with her about points of conſcience. Malo, being ſent to her, refuſed to adminiſter the ſacrament of the Lord's Supper to her, which ſhe deſired, foraſmuch as ſhe was alone, and had no body to communicate with her; arguing that this ſacrament was not inſtituted to be particularly adminiſtered, like baptiſm, but rather to be communicated to many of the faithful at once; with which, however, ſhe could not be contented, deſiring by any means to make declaration of the religion, in which ſhe reſolved to die.’ Thuanus (17) relates the ſame thing in ſubſtance. Mr Varillas (18) has purely and ſimply eſpouſed it: an evident ſign that he did not believe it was a Huguenot ſtory; for if he had he would have made a long parentheſis to tell us ſo.

[E] Frances . . . . . her eldeſt daughter . . . . . Her father took incredible pains to reclaim her] Among other things, he cauſed two doctors of the Sorbonne, and two miniſters, to diſpute before her, in July and Auguſt, 1566. This conference could not be held at Montpenſier houſe, becauſe this prince would oblige the miniſters not to pray to God before the action, which they would not conſent to. The conference therefore was broke off; but it was again agreed upon ſome time after, and executed at the houſe of the duke of Nevers. I ſpeak of it in another place (19). The two doctors were Simon Vigor; and Claude de Sainctes; the two miniſters were Spina and Sureau. They ſpent a great many words in replies, rejoinders, &c. and afterwards in printed accounts, in which each party aſcribed the victory to itſelf; but the ſucceſs of the miniſters was, that the ducheſs continued theirs, which was the prize of the conteſt. The contrary happened in the diſpute between the biſhop of Meaux, and Mr Claudé: Mademoiſelle de Duras adjudged the victory to the Catholic champion.

[F] Charlotte . . . . . had been put in a convent, againſt her mother's opinion.] This gives me an occaſion to touch upon a contradiction of Thuanus. He ſays in his twenty eighth book, that Jaqueline de Longvic was diſpleaſed at the cloiſtering of her daughter Charlotte, for two reaſons; one, that ſhe was deſigned for the duke de Longueville; the other, that ſhe had already ſhewn her repugnance to a religious life (20). In the fifty firſt book, he ſays, that ſhe bred her in the Proteſtant religion, but ſecretly, through fear of her husband;

If Jaqueline had converted her huſband, ſhe had ſaved a great deal of Proteſtant blood, and a great deal of miſery to ſome of her own ſex ; for he uſed them with the utmoſt ſeverity, as we may read in Brantome (f). Their ſon, though a good Catholic, did not follow the leaguers. Had this lady only procured to France, a chancellor of ſo much merit, as Michael de l'Hoſpital [I], her memory ought to be bleſſed for it ; for it was not poſſible to make choice of a better ſubject than he, and no body could have ſo well ſupported the monarchy in ſo dangerous a conjuncture. husband ; and that afterwards this Charlotte, being ſcarce a year old, was put into the convent of Joüare ; Vix annicula in Jovarienſe Monaſterium conjecta. If ſhe was but one year old, what has been ſaid of her inſtruction, and the marks of her repugnance, is falſe and impoſſible. Doubtleſs this Hiſtorian muſt have had ſome diſtraction of thought, which was not common to him, or what is more probable, he muſt have underſtood by annicula an age more advanced than one year. But can we find good authorities for this ſenſe of the word ?

[G] One of her daughters married the duke of Nevers's ſon.] He was called the count d'Eu. I do not find at what time he married ; but I diſtruſt Father Anſelme, who ſays (21), 'That Anne de Bourbon 'was married by contract the ſixth of September, 1561, 'to Francis (22) de Cleves the ſecond of the name, duke 'of Nevers, and that ſhe died without children, 'in 1572.' For what probability is there, that this princeſs was married eight or nine days after her mother's death ? I inſiſt not on what the preſident de la Place ſays (23), that the duke de Nivernois died a little after the marriage of Henry de Cleves, his ſon, with Anne de Bourbon ; from whence we muſt conclude, that this marriage preceded the death of the ducheſs of Montpenſier, if we did not take notice, that they who fix the duke of Nevers's death to the thirteenth of February 1561, followed the cuſtom, which was not aboliſhed at that time, of beginning the year at Eaſter (24). Now upon that foot it is plain, the duke died after Jaqueline de Longvic, and ſo the preſident de la Place does not contradict Father Anſelme. I had rather depend upon Brantome, who ſays, that the count d'Eu went into Spain to marry the princeſs Anne. 'He was, ſays he (25), in my opinion, the 'fineſt prince I ever ſaw, and the moſt affable and 'amiable ; we reckoned him ſo amongſt us, and when 'he went into Spain (26), to marry Madam, his wife, 'daughter to the duke of Montpenſier, he was there 'alſo as much eſteemed, both by the court, and all 'the country.' Whom ſhall we believe, Brantome, who ſays the princeſs was married in Spain, or Thuanus, and the preſident de la Place, who ſay, the former, that after her return from Spain, ſhe married Henry duke of Cleves ; the latter, that the ducheſs her mother recalled her from Spain, to marry her to this Henry ? Thuanus, who obſerves, that ſhe died a little after her marriage, might have ſaid as much of her husband, who was killed at the battle of Dreux by the going off of a piſtol of the duke of Guiſe's cornet. This is what Brantome ſays of it ; but d'Aubigné (27) tells it otherwiſe, and gives us to underſtand, that this young duke of Nevers had the knowledge of the truth. It is probably for that reaſon, that Jaqueline de Longvic was willing he ſhould marry her daughter. Beza ſpeaks of the death and religion of this duke ſomewhat at large (28) ; and obſerving, that the marquis of Iſles, his brother, and the marchioneſs, his wife, aſſiſted at the exerciſe of piety with him, and received the ſacrament all together on Eaſter-day the twenty ninth of March 1562 (29) ; obſerving this, I ſay, without ſaying a word of the ducheſs, we might conclude, that ſhe died a little after her marriage, as Thuanus has advanced, did we not ſee two authors againſt him ; one is Father Anſelme, affirming that this lady died in 1572 ; the other is Brantome, who ſpeaks of her as the widow of the count d'Eu, afterwards duke of Nevers (30), when he gives the liſt of the ladies of Catherine de Medicis's court.

[H] Queen Elizabeth . . . . . loved her intirely.] Brantome informs me (31), 'that this daughter to the 'duke de Montpenſier, a moſt prudent, moſt virtuous, 'and fine princeſs, and reckoned for ſuch in France and 'Spain, had been bred ſome time in Spain with queen 'Elizabeth of France, and had the place of her cup-'bearer, the queen being ſerved by her ladies and maids 'of honour, and each having a place.' This queen gave her a diamond worth between 1500 and 2000 crowns. A miſtreſs of count d'Eu, declaring a great deſire to have that ring, as ſhe ſaw it on the count's finger, eaſily obtained it, and wore it always for his ſake. The counteſs, whom her husband had made believe he had loſt or pawned his diamond, ſaw it in the hands of this gentlewoman, whom ſhe knew to be her husband's miſtreſs, and turned her head aſide, and never ſaid a word of it to either of them. Brantome has reaſon to praiſe her for it ; but what an inſtance of corruption is here ! This count lived but a ſhort time after his marriage, and yet was unfaithful to his wiſe.

[I] She procured to France the chancellor . . . . de l'Hoſpital.] Thuanus (32) acquaints us with that particular, after this manner : 'Id autem factum Jacobæ 'Lonvianæ Montpenſerii uxoris commendatione quæ 'in Catharinæ amicitia præcipuè florebat, excelſo in'genio mulier, & quæ creſcentem Guiſianorum po'tentiam ſuſpectam habebat. Illa Catharinam Guiſia'norum violentiam jam expertam proprio metu incen'debat, & ad imperium anhelanti certiſſimam viam 'oſtendebat, ſi aliquem deligeret cujus ſalutaribus 'monitis eorum perniciosa conſilia revinceret. —— 'That was done at the recommendation of Jaqueline de 'Longvic, who was chief favourite of Catherine de Me'dicis, a woman of a great genius, and who ſuſpected 'the encreaſing power of the Guiſes. This lady inſpired 'Catherine, who had already experienced the violence 'of the Guiſes, with her own fears, and ſhewed her the 'moſt infallible way to empire, if ſhe made choice of 'ſome perſon, by whoſe prudent counſels ſhe might tra'verſe their pernicious deſigns.' See an ample paraphraſe of this Latin in Varillas's Life of Francis II (33), where we find alſo (34) how this ducheſs of Montpenſier contributed to ſave the prince of Condé's Life in the ſame reign. This hiſtorian is not ſo favourable to her, in Charles the ninth's Life. He makes her the cauſe of the king of Navarre's renouncing the regency, in favour of the queen-mother. 'The perſuaſions, 'ſays he (35), of the ducheſs of Montpenſier, who 'was called the Siren, carried it above the remon'ſtrances of the Montmorenci's, the Chatillon's, the 'Calviniſts, and the moſt zealous Catholics . . . The 'eaſineſs of this prince was the cauſe or occaſion of 'all the miſeries that France ſo long groaned under.' But ſince he confeſſes, that the conſtable and the admiral, 'inſtead of diſſuading him from ſo ſcandalous an ac'quieſcence, confirmed him in it for this ſole reaſon '(36), that his inconſtancy would too much perplex 'them, and that they could more eaſily manage the 'queen, after having obliged her by a benefit ſo 'conſiderable, as was that of inducing the firſt 'prince of the blood to give up the regency to her,' there is not ſo much reaſon to exclaim againſt the negotiation of this ducheſs. Thuanus does not blame her (37).

LONGUS, a Greek ſophiſt, author of a book intituled Ποιμενικὰ, that is to ſay, Paſtorals [A], which is a romance upon the amours of Daphnis and Chloe. Mr Huet (a) biſhop of Avranches, who was a great judge in moſt things, has ſpoken well enough of this book; but he obſerves ſeveral faults in it, the greateſt of which doubtleſs conſiſts, in the obſcenities that are found in it [B]. This is ſtill more remote from the politeneſs of our romances, than the conduct of Longus's ſhepherdeſs; ſhe loves too haſtily, and grants her kiſſes too ſoon [C]. Longus is thought to have introduced that ſilly idea of gallantry

[A] He is author of a book, intituled Ποιμενικὰ, i. e. Paſtorals.] The word Paſtoralia, which Mr Moreri read in Voſſius, made him think this book was in verſe; Longus, ſays he, left four books of paſtoral verſe, or eclogues, which Godfrey Jungerman has tranſlated into Latin, with his notes upon them, and has dedicated this work to his couſin Lewis Camerarius. Longus's paſtorals are in proſe: the Latin tranſlator's name is Godfrey Jungerman; and it was needleſs to obſerve, that he dedicated this book to Lewis Camerarius, his couſin. Voſſius, from whom Moreri has taken this particular, had reaſons for this clauſe in his book, taken from the time and place in which he writ; for this Mr Camerarius was well known in Holland, where he had been embaſſador from the king of Sweden: which Voſſius did not fail to add (1). Moreri, who had not the ſame reaſons, ought to have omitted that particular, or at leaſt have ſaid all that Voſſius did. Thus he would have given occaſion to his readers to form ſome idea of the perſon, to whom the tranſlation of Longus was dedicated. Greater men than Moreri have thought, that the paſtorals I ſpeak of were in verſe. Malincrotius was under this miſtake (2), as Mr Konig obſerves (3), who for his own part was ignorant, that before Jungerman's edition, (he calls him Jugerman) theſe paſtorals had appeared in Latin.

[B] . . . . . the greateſt fault of which conſiſts in the obſcenities that are found in it.] I believe it was on this account that Mr Huet did not finiſh the Latin tranſlation; for he tells us, that he began it in his youth, before he perfectly knew the character of the book, how much the reading it might corrupt young men, and how unfit it was for old. ‘Quum puer eſſem, hunc ‘autorem Latine interpretandum ſuſcepi, cum nondum ‘ſatis haberem exploratum, quid in eo laudabile eſſet, ‘quid vitioſum; & quantum ejus lectio pueritiæ dam‘noſa ſit, quam parum etiam ætati provectiori decora ‘(4).’ This reaſon hindered not a profeſſor of Franeker from tranſlating this romance, and publiſhing it with learned notes in 1660. He was apprehenſive of the cenſure of ſome, whoſe auſtere and moroſe humour cannot bear that any one ſhould publiſh adventures of a bad example. Obſerve how he is beforehand with them. His words deſerve relating, becauſe there are ſeveral authors, whoſe virtue and prudence might be conteſted, did we not oppoſe this buckler of Longus's tranſlator to the ſurly and malignant criticiſm of theſe pretended Cato's. ‘Dicam hic quod ſentio, ſays he (5), ‘Non feram judices noſtra in causâ, Caperatâ fronte ‘Catones, qui ſine dubio me altum ſtertere, aut cucur‘bitas pingere mallent, quàm tanto conatu, tam imma‘nes nugas agere, vitioque fortaſſe mihi vertent, quod ‘logos hoſce amatorios (quid enim quæſo eſt, quod ‘non vellicare malignitas poſſit?) haud tamen illepi‘dos, nec inficetos, latine converſos, grandior ætate, ‘καὶ γεγονὼς μὲν ἡλικίας ἤδη πρόσω, in lucem ‘edere ſategerim. O formidabilem cenſorum ſeverita‘tem! Quorum cenſura actum erit de Homero, ho‘mine ab ipſis gratiis ficto, venereos amores, adulte‘ria, inceſta, ſcelera prolixè deſcribente: quem tamen ‘Alexander tanti fecit, ut ſuo pulvillo noctibus ſingulis ‘ſubdiderit: Actum de Ariſtophane, quem nihilominus ‘Johannes ille Antiochenus, ſummorum Theologorum ‘lumen, qui propter aureum eloquentiæ flumen, Chry‘ſoſtomi cognomen obtinuet, nocturna diurnaque ver‘ſaſſe manu, à viris fide dignis memoriæ proditum eſt. ‘Nullum equidem poetarum invenias, quin multa mul‘torum ſcelera neſaria narret, non quidem ad bonos ‘labefactandos, corrumpendoſque mores; ſed potius ad ‘eoſdem emendandos, atque flagitia illa deteſtanda, a‘bominanda. Multo minus vitilitigatores, (quorum ‘ſeges in hoc ſeculo denſa eſt) homines, ut Plinius ait, ‘ad venena natos, qui nullum aliud abominati ſpiritus ‘præmium novere, quam odiſſe omnia: At potius re‘rum humanarum æquos mihi æſtimatores exopto. — ‘I will here ſpeak what I think. I will not be judg‘ed by thoſe rigid cenſors, who, no doubt, had rather I ‘were faſt aſleep, or employed in the moſt trifling man‘ner, than that I ſhould take ſo much pains to play the ‘fool; and who will perhaps cenſure me (for what can‘not ill-nature find fault with?) for tranſlating into ‘Latin, and publiſhing, at my advanced age, theſe amo‘rous pieces, which yet they allow to be elegant and ‘witty. O the formidable ſeverity of theſe cenſors! ‘Even Homer muſt fall before them, a writer formed ‘by the Graces themſelves, but who deſcribes, at length, ‘intrigues, adulteries, inceſts, and baſe actions: whom ‘yet Alexander ſo eſteemed, that he laid his works every ‘night under his pillow. Nor can Ariſtophanes eſcape, ‘whom nevertheleſs Johannes Antiochenus, one of the ‘greateſt Divines, who, by the golden flow of his elo‘quence, obtained the ſirname of Chryſoſtom, was perpe‘tually converſant with, as credible authors relate. ‘You will find no Poet, who does not relate many in‘famous actions, not with the view of corrupting good ‘manners, but rather to amend them, and excite an ‘abhorrenee of ſuch actions. Much leſs will I be judg‘ed by cavillers, (of which there is a plentiful crop in ‘the preſent age) men, as Pliny ſays, born to poiſon, ‘who knew no other reward of an abominable diſpoſi‘tion, than to hate every thing. I rather chuſe to be ‘tried by impartial judges of human affairs.’ This commentator ſaw himſelf indiſpenſibly obliged to touch upon Longus's impurities; but he did it with ſhewing his averſion to them. What could he do more? ‘O‘pus alioqui tam obſcenum eſt, (as Mr Huet ſays) (6), ‘ut qui ſine rubore legat eum Cynicum eſſe neceſſe ſit. ‘A work otherwiſe ſo obſcene, that he, who can read it ‘without bluſhing, muſt neceſſarily be a Cynic.’ This otherwiſe refers to a great fault he had before obſerved; viz. that Longus begins his book with the birth of his ſhepherd and ſhepherdeſs, and continues it to their marriages, their children, and old age (7), which is tranſgreſſing the rules of this kind of writing. They ought to wind up on the wedding-day, and ſay nothing of the conſequences of marriage. The heroine of a romance, with a big-belly, or lying-in, is a ſtrange image.

[C] Longus's ſhepherdeſs grants her kiſſes too ſoon.] You do not read above five or ſix pages, before you find Daphnis raviſhed with the pleaſure of a kiſs from his ſhepherdeſs. Τοῦτο φίλημα καινὸν, ſays he, ἐκπηδᾷ μου τὸ πνεῦμα, ἐξάλλεται ἡ καρδία, τήκεται ἡ ψυχὴ, καὶ ὅμως πάλιν φιλῆσαι θέλω, Hocce oſculum admirabile eſt; quippe ſpiritus meus exultat, cor exilit, anima liqueſcit: attamen iterum ſuaviari cudio (8). —— This kiſs is admirable; for my ſpirit leaps up, my heart dances, my ſoul melts: yet I deſire to kiſs again. A chaſm, in the ſame page, does not hinder our underſtanding the circumſtances of this kiſs. A little after, we find him handling his ſhepherdeſs's breaſts (9), without any coineſs on her ſide. This poor girl, ſeeing him ſtark naked melts with deſire: ſhe ſaw nothing but what was amiable in him; ſhe was ſo little ſtartled at this object, that ſhe boldly approached it, and having kiſſed her ſhepherd, helped him on with his cloaths. Ἡ μὲν γὰρ γυμνὸν ὁρῶσα Δάφνιν, ἐπανθοῦν ἐνέπιπτε τὸ κάλλος, καὶ ἐτήκετο, μηδὲν αὐτοῦ μέρος μέμψασθαι δυναμένη . . . . ἡ δὲ, τὴν ἐσθῆτα αὐτοῦ λουομένου καὶ γυμνωθέντος ἐνεδύετο, πρότερον καὶ αὐτὴ φιλήσασα. Illa enim nudum conſpicata Daphnidem, effloreſcentem in ejus pulchritudinem incidit, atque contabuit, cum nullam ejus partem vilipendere poſſet (10) . . . . At illa viciſſim, dato oſculo, veſtem illius, jam loti atque denudati, induebat (11). Theſe things would be monſtrous in the romances of our times. People will not forgive the marquis d'Urfé, the little favours he makes Celadon obtain. The pleaſure he procures him of ſeeing Aſtrea naked, is charged on him as an unpardonable crime. Here are the words of the accuſation, in which Aſtrea ſpeaks. ‘It is you, ſays ſhe (12), caſting her eyes upon ‘d'Urfé; it is you that are the author of the injury ‘I complain of; your raſh pen has made blots in my gallantry, which we meet with in ſome Romances: the ſhepherdeſs fills out drink, drinks a little firſt, and afterwards preſents the glaſs to the ſhepherd, in ſuch a manner, that he muſt apply his lips preciſely to the part, where ſhe had applied her's [D]. None of the antients mention Longus, which is the reaſon why we cannot tell when he lived. We have ſeveral editions and ſeveral tranſlations of his work [E].

ſtory, which wound me in the tendereſt part. I do not pretend to be more nice than others, continues ſhe; I excuſe amorous tranſports, when proceeding from a pure paſſion; a kiſs genteely ſnatched, never ſhocked my modeſty, and I know there are little privacies, which love inſpires, and reaſon does not condemn. But when I conſider, that I am one of the three ſhepherdeſſes, which you preſent ſtark naked before Celadon, with what face can I behold an adventure ſo injurious to my honour? And ought I not to believe, that you have an ill opinion of my virtue, or elſe took me for a ſlave, which you meant to ſell to this ſhepherd? I believe, without flattery to my beauty, that my face alone was ſufficient to make a conqueſt: there was fire enough in my eyes to melt a ſtubborn heart, and I can without vanity ſay, that my nakedneſs was not eſſentially neceſſary to my victory.’ This is too common a fault in the Greek romances (13). The women make the firſt advances, and the men are too reſerved. Mr Huet acknowledges, that this conduct of the men is commendable, according to the rules of morality; but juſtly maintains, that it is abſurd according to the law of romance. Prior amat Hyſmina, ſays he (14), ſpeaking of Euſtathius's book, where the hero anſwers nothing to a declaration of love made by his heroine: Prior amorem & fatetur & offert ſine modeſtiâ, ſine pudore, ſine arte: Atque his blanditiis neque monetur Hyſminias, neque reſpondet. Laudabile id quidem eſt, ſi ad leges Moralis Philoſophiæ; ineptum ſi ad Romanenſia præcepta exigatur. See, above (15), Theagines rallied for giving Chariclea a box on the ear, becauſe ſhe would kiſs him. We may ſay, that Madam de Scuderi is the firſt, who delivered romance from an œconomy, injurious to her ſex, and to decorum in general. She feared ſhe might be taxed with innovating, in giving her heroines a deal of modeſty, and her heroes the ſofteſt paſſions; and therefore thought herſelf obliged to give the reaſons of her conduct, in the preface to her Ibrahim, which is the firſt of her romances; theſe are her words (16): ‘You will ſee here, reader, if I miſtake not, the decorum of things and conditions exactly enough obſerved; for I have put nothing in my book, but what the ladies may read, without looking down and bluſhing. If you do not find my hero perſecuted by women, diſtractedly in love with him, it is not that he is leſs amiable or unworthy of their love, but it is that I might not treſpaſs againſt decency in the character of the ladies, and againſt probability in that of the gentlemen, who rarely act the cruel part, and cannot act it with a good grace. In fine, whether things ought to be thus, or whether I have judged of my hero by my own weakneſs; I was not willing to put his fidelity to that dangerous trial, and have contented myſelf not to make him an Hylas, without making him an Hippolytus.’

[D] The ſhepherd applies his lips preciſely to the place, where the ſhepherdeſs had applied her's.] Mr Huet's tranſlator explains this after the following manner (17). ‘Ab hoc (Longo) (18) Euſtathius ſumſiſſe videtur hoc elegans urbanitatis genus, quâ Hyſminam pocula miniſtrantem induxit, & qua parte poculi labra delibans labris ſuis ipſa tetigerat, eadem Hyſminiæ bibituro tangenda leniter offerentem. —— Euſtathius ſeems to have taken from this Longus that politeneſs, with which he introduces Hyſmina ſerving the cup, and offering Hyſminias, who is about to drink, that ſide of the cup, which ſhe had juſt touched with her own lips.’ Euſtathius might have traced this fine gallantry higher; for we find it in Lucian. This ſcoffer introduces Juno, reproaching Jupiter with drinking Ganymede's leavings, and applying his mouth preciſely to that part, which Ganymede touched with his. Ἐνίοτε δὲ καὶ ἀπογευσάμενος μόνον, ἔδωκας ἐκείνῳ. καὶ πιόντος ἀπολαβὼν τὴν κύλικα, ὅσον ὑπόλοιπον ἐν αὐτῇ, πίνεις, ὅθην καὶ αὐτὸς ἔπιε, καὶ ἔνθα προσήρμοσε τὰ χείλη ἵνα καὶ πίνῃς ἅμα, καὶ φιλῇς. Interdum autem ubi ſolum deguſtaſti, porrigis ipſi: deinde ipſo bibente calicem arripis, & quantum in ipſo reſtat, ebibis, qua parte ipſe bibit, & ubi labia applicuit, ut & bibas ſimul, & oſculeris (19).

In Ovid's time, the ladies did not preſent the glaſs, out of which they had drank, but the galant endeavoured to take it from them, and applied his lips to the ſame place where they had applied theirs. It is a precept of Ovid.

Pocula, quaque bibet parte puella bibas (20).

Be firſt to ſnatch the goblet from her lip,
And drink yourſelf, where you beheld her ſip.

I believe this is ſtill the faſhion in ſome countries. Moliere introduces the practice of it in one of the ſcenes of his Etourdi (Blunderer) (21).

St Jerome, deſcribing the impertinencies of lovers, ſays nothing of this; but he comes pretty near it; for he ſpeaks of eatables, which were preſented after they had been taſted (22); ‘Crebra munuſcula & ſudariola, & faſciolas, & veſtes ori applicitas, & oblatos & DEGUSTATOS cibos, blandaſque & dulces literulas ſanctus amor non habet. Mel meum, lumen meum, meum deſiderium, omnes delicias, & lepores & riſu dignas urbanitates, & cæteras ineptias amatorum in comœdiis erubſcimus. —— Divine love has nothing to do with frequent preſents, handkerchiefs, garters, and garments kiſſed by the lover; with food offered, and firſt taſted; or with Billet-doux. We are aſhamed of my honey, my light, my deſire, and all the delicacies, the repartees, and ridiculous politeneſs, and other fooleries of lovers in comedies.’ He ſays in another place (23), ‘ſpectabis aliena oſcula & PRAEGUSTATOS cibos, —— You will ſee another's kiſſes, and food firſt taſted.’ Here is the precept of Ovid.

Et quodcunque cibi digitis libaverit illa,
Tu pete: dumque petes, ſit tibi tacta manus (24).

And bruſh her hand in reaching to the meat.

[E] There are ſeveral editions, and ſeveral tranſlations of his work.] This romance, tranſlated into French by Amiot, was printed at Paris in 1559. Laurence Gambara made a verſion of it, or rather a paraphraſe in Latin verſe, which is much blamed by Voſſius (25). He obſerves, that Gambara not only changes, adds, and retrenches, ſeveral things, but alſo frequently miſtakes Longus's meaning. Godfrey Jungerman's verſion in proſe is incomparably better. It was printed at Hanau with the Greek text, and notes, in 1605. There had been before this a verſion of it at Heidelberg, in 1601 (26); and before that, the work had been printed only in Greek at Florence, by Philip Juncta, in 1598, from the manuſcript of Lewis Alamanni's library, with Raphael Columbanus's notes. There is mentioned an 8vo edition, of it in Greek and Latin, by the Commelins in 1606. I have ſaid ſomething above (27), of the Franeker edition. I cannot comprehend what induced Voſſius to ſay, that Gambara had tranſlated Longus 170 years ago; for it would from thence follow, that it was of above two hundred years ſtanding now (28); and yet Thuanus places Gambara's death in the year 1586 (29). It is true he makes him ninety years of age; but it is ſo much the more impoſſible to adjuſt Voſſius's reckoning by this, as it is certain, that Gambara ſet about this work in his old age (30), and whilſt cardinal de Granvelle, to whom he had dedicated it, was viceroy of of Naples. Mr Teiſſier (31) does not mention Longus's tranſlation in the catalogue of Gambara's works.

LORME (Philibert de) one of the beſt architects of France, in the XVIth century, was a native of Lyons. He was almoner in ordinary to Henry II, and to Charles IX (a), and abbot of St Eloi of Noion (b); and of the ſaints Sergius and Bacchus of Angers (α). Thus his abbies are called (c), by Antony Mizaldus, in the epiſtle dedicatory of the Nova & mira artificia comparandorum fructuum, dated at Paris the firſt of November 1564. He is called abbot of Livry in Ronſard's life, and it is added, that he had a quarrel with this great Poet [A], in which Catherine de Medicis ſaid he was to blame. He publiſhed ſeveral books of Architecture, the titles whereof you may ſee in la Croix du Maine.

[A] He had a quarrel with Ronſard,] This Poet made a ſatire ‘ called la Truelle croſſee, The trowel croſiered, in which he blamed the king for giving benefices to Maſons and other mean perſons, in which he particularly taxes one de Lorme, architect of the Tuilleries, who had obtained the abbey of Livry, and of whom we have a tolerable book of Architecture. And it will not be unſeaſonable to obſerve here the malevolence of this abbot, who, to revenge himſelf, one day, cauſed the gate of the Tuilleries to be ſhut againſt Ronſard, who followed the queen mother; but Ronſard, who was ſatirical and biting when he pleaſed, immediately wrote with a pencil upon the door, which the Sieur de Sarlan cauſed preſently to be opened, theſe words in capital letters. FORT. REVERENT. HABE. The queen returning and ſeeing this writing, in the company of learned men, and of the abbot de Livri himſelf, would know what was the meaning of it. Ronſard, after de Lorme had complained, that this inſcription reflected on him, gave the interpretation; he owned, that by a harmleſs irony, he had made that inſcription for him, reading it in French *, but that it agreed better to him reading it in Latin; they being the firſt words curtailed of a Latin epigram of Auſonius, which begins Fortunam reverenter habe, cautioning him, by it, to look back to his firſt and vile fortune, and not ſhut the door againſt the muſes. The queen aſſiſted Ronſard in his revenge; for ſhe ſharply reprimanded the abbot de Livri, after ſome laughter, ſaying aloud, that the Tuilleries were dedicated to the muſes (1).’ Du Peyrat relates this ſtory, and adds a preamble to it, much to the prejudice of our de Lorme, and which perhaps is not well grounded; for the author of Ronſard's life has not made the like reflexion, though it might have ſerved as a farther juſtification to Ronſard. However, theſe are du Peyrat's words: ‘ as the modeſty of this chaplain to William the conqueror, king of England, procured him the honour of the biſhopric of Mans, and the praiſe of every body; the inſolence, on the contrary, and the pride of an eccleſiaſtic of the chapel of the queen-mother, Catherine de Medicis, expoſed him to the laughter of the court, and of this great princeſs: he was called Philebert de Lorme, who, having by his miſtreſs's favour obtained the abbey of Livri, utterly forgot his former condition; and his arrogance occaſioned the great Ronſard, the French Homer, to write a ſatire againſt him, called la Truelle croſſée (2). - - - The trowel croſiered. He gives the two verſes of Auſonius, whereof we have only the three firſt words in Ronſard's life. See the margin (3).

LORME (N. de) one of the moſt famous Phyſicians of France, towards the end of the XVIth century, and the beginning of the XVIIth, was of Moulins in the Bourbonnois. He was firſt Phyſician to queen Mary de Medicis, and after he had long followed the court, retired to Moulins on account of his old age, and there quietly enjoyed the glory he had acquired [A]. I do not know the time of his death, and I might have made this article longer, if Mr Patin had publiſhed the book he deſigned [B]. Our de Lorme left a ſon, whoſe reputation did not fall ſhort of his father's, in the profeſſion of Phyſic. He practiſed in Paris with great ſucceſs [C], and beſides did great honour to his art by his own long life. Being loaden with years, he ſtill found himſelf vigorous

[A] He retired to Moulins, on account of his age, where he quietly enjoyed the glory he had acquired.] The letter, which the Sieur Bachot writ to him, and publiſhed before his book of Vulgar Errors (1), contains as follows. ‘ If you like it, thoſe muſt be very nice, who will not like it; ſince our kings, queens, princes, and princeſſes of France and Lorrain, have for ſo long time had, and ſtill have, ſuch an eſteem for you, and your merit, that nothing had been able to withdraw you from their ordinary ſervice, but an inability to follow the court, which your great and happy old age, ſtill more loaden with honours than years, has brought you to. When you retired ſatisfied, and as it were ſatiated, with ſo many honours to your own houſe, and native country, every one ſaw the honour, which our moſt auguſt king Lewis the Juſt did you, in his victorious return from Languedoc in December 1622, together with the queen his mother, by taking their lodgings with you in the beginning of the year 1623, as a teſtimony of their benevolence.’

[B] I could have made this article longer, if Mr Patin had publiſhed the book he deſigned.] He would have inſerted in it the elogy of the Phyſician, who is the ſubject of this article. ‘ I formerly collected ſeveral memoirs for compoſing the Latin elogies of the French, who have been famous in their reſpective ſciences, in imitation of Scævola Sammarthanus, upon which I deſigned to work next winter evenings; but the great number of my patients make me fearful; for which reaſon I dare not give an abſolute promiſe. You would oblige me, if you would deſire Mr de Lorme, that he would be pleaſed to ſend me ſome memoirs concerning his father, whom I know to have been a great man, and of whom I have ſomething material, which I will boldly inſert, concerning the diſtemper of Mary de Medicis, in which Mr du Laurence diſapproved bleeding, being deceived by a paſſage of Hippocrates, who ſays, that we are not to bleed in a flux, fluente alvo venam non ſecabis; and, on the contrary, Mr de Lorme maintained, and preſſed phelebotomy (2).’ Patin adds, that three Phyſicians of Paris were conſulted, and confirmed Mr de Lorme's advice. The queen-mother was let blood and recovered . . . . I deſign, ſays he, to make my elogies finer, and more curious, and hiſtorical, than thoſe of Sammarthanus, nor ſhall they be inferior to his, except in expreſſion (3).’ It is a misfortune, that he did not execute, this good deſign.

[C] His ſon . . . . practiſed in Paris with great ſucceſs.] Bachot, in the letter above-cited, expreſſes himſelf thus, ſpeaking to M. de Lorme the father. I give you an account of the ſubject of this work, which you have encouraged by your advice, if you pleaſe to look favourably on it; as alſo your ſon, one of the ſoundeſt and fineſt wits of his age, and of this century, in our profeſſion, as he is acknowledged by all the court, and by this populous city of Paris. Bachot writ this in 1626. He prefixed to his work a letter, vigorous enough to be willing to marry again [D]: This we find in Guy Patin's letters. I have heard ſay, that he actually did marry, and choſe a very young and pretty woman, and it was thought that this would ſerve to haſten his death; but on the contrary it only occaſioned the death of his young wife. She got a phthiſic by her good old man's ſide, and never could be cured of it [E]. This Mr de Lorme was a man of admirable converſation [F]. He had been Phyſician to Gaſton, of France, duke of Orleans, but did not keep that employment long (a). He was much longer Phyſician at the waters of Bourbon. We ſhall ſee below, that he died in 1678 [G].

letter, which de Lorme, the ſon, his relation, Counſellor to the king, and his Phyſician in ordinary, had written to him, ſending him a ſonnet of his making (4). Note, that he engaged Mr Gaulmyn, his couſin, to write Latin verſes in the praiſe of this treatiſe of Bachot. They are printed before the book.

[D] Being loaden with years he found himſelf vigorous enough, to be willing to marry again.] We ſhall cite a paſſage upon this, with all it's circumſtances. I take it from a letter of Guy Patin dated the eighteenth of June 1666. When you told Mr de Lorme, that Mr Blondel would prove that Antimony was poiſon, you ſay he took a great leap. It is very well, if, at his age, he can leap ſo, and God be praiſed, that he ſtill is able to leap; but Antimony has made a great many fall, who will never get up again, nor leap more. God preſerve him, and bring him from Bourbon in good health; and ſince he has a mind to marry again, I wiſh him ſuch a wife, as he would chuſe. There is nothing like dying by a fine ſword. He muſt enter with honour into the holy ſynagogue (5). In a letter of the twentieth of October, the ſame year, he ſpeaks thus (6); I hear that Mr de Lorme is gone from Lyons, and is returning to Bourbon or Moulins, where he has a deſign to marry again. He does well, if it be for the health of his ſoul; for as for his body, I believe he has hardly any need of this piece of furniture. This deſign was neither executed, nor quitted, when the ſame Patin writ the letter, in which are theſe words. 'I ſaw very lately Mr de Lorme, who was a little indiſpoſed, but with the ſame vigour of mind, as when in perfect health. So very old as he is, it is ſaid, he has a mind to marry again, and that ſome body encourages him in this folly, to bring him to the triumvirate, which will be a dangerous yoke to him, and perhaps fatal; I wiſh it may be for the good of his ſoul, and for the warmth of his feet (7).' He afterwards mentions the epigram of Stephen Paſquier, which we have ſeen above (8). This letter is dated from Paris the fourteenth of January 1670. It proves that Mr de Lorme lived then in that city, and that he had been twice married.

[E] His wife got a phthiſic by her good old man's ſide, of which ſhe could never be cured] Tho' upon the hopes of a large jointure, ſhe reſolved upon the condition of the Shunamite (9), yet ſhe had reaſon enough to afflict herſelf upon ſeeing the ill effects of this function, and how contagious an old man's bed is to a young woman. Several Phyſicians maintain, that it is good for a decrepit man to lie with a fat and plump child, but that it is dangerous to the child to have ſuch a bed-fellow. Nevertheleſs, the fate of our de Lorme's wife is what very ſeldom happens. And ſo the hopes ſhe might have entertained of being very ſoon a young, blooming, briſk, rich widow, had not been raſh and inconſiderate; as for him if he did not pay his tribute to old age by the decay of his memory (10) and of his learning, he paid it another way, that is by the folly of marrying again. So true it is, that old age is a toll, which admits no abſolute exemption: there are many reaſons to be urged pro and con upon the queſtion, whether ſuch marriages, as Mr de Lorme's, are worſe than thoſe of Publicius and Septicia, two very old perſons. Valerius Maximus tells us, that Auguſtus annulled Septicia's will by which ſhe left all her goods to Publicius, in prejudice of her children by a former huſband. And the ſame author extols the juſtice of this decree to the ſkies. 'Si ipſa æquitas hac de re cognoſceret, poſſetne juſtius aut gravius pronuntiare? Spernis quos genuiſti: nubis effœta; teſtamenti ordinem violento animo confundis: neque erubeſcis ei totum patrimonium addicere, cujus pollincto jam corpori marcidam ſenectutem tuam ſubſtraviſti (11). —— If equity herſelf was to take cogniſance of this matter, could ſhe pronounce with more juſtice or weight? You deſpiſe thoſe you have given birth to: you marry, when paſt child-bearing you violently confound the order of your will; nor do you bluſh to bequeath your whole patrimony to him, whom you married in your old age.' We ought perhaps, amongſt Chriſtians, to annul, more commonly than we do, thoſe matches, which join together, either two extreams of the ſame character, or two oppoſite ones, two decrepits, or old age with the flower of age.

[F] Mr de Lorme was a man of admirable converſation.] Two paſſages of Guy Patin ſhall ſerve for the preſent comment. I yeſterday (12) viſited Mr de Lorme at his houſe: he received me very kindly, and we diſcourſed together a good hour, we were neither of us mute; he is admirable in his converſation, as well as in every thing elſe; he has a wonderful memory for his age of eighty five. I think he will die as he lived, with his Antimony in his heart and head, and yet what comforts me, is, that I hope he will never take any, having ſo little need of it (13). Some weeks after, he paid him another viſit. I yeſterday ſaw Mr de Lorme, whoſe underſtanding is ſtill clear, and memory prodigious; theſe two faculties he poſſeſſes in great perfection, and ſavour nothing of age; but I will not anſwer for the reſt. Maximus eſt aretalogus. I am told, he has no good hand at practice; notwithſtanding his pretended and myſtical Polypharmacy; he is of a powerful converſation; he knows a great many good things, and expreſſes them wonderfully well; and, which is more, he is very reſerved, when the queſtion is about the merits of ſeveral learned men, that have lived in France for this hundred years paſſed: he happily mixes his judgment with his charity; nemini facit injuriam, nulli quidquam detrahit debitæ laudis: Take him altogether, he is a great man, who for his perfections is greatly indebted to God and nature: I only wiſh he were not ſo great a romancer, when the point is to praiſe ſome, who do not altogether ſo well deſerve it; but I believe he does this on purpoſe that he may not be thought vain-glorious or ſlighting, and this in ſome reſpects is commendable (14). From the firſt of theſe paſſages we may infer, that he was born in 1584.

[G] He died in the year 1687.] My proof ſhall be taken from a paſſage of the Mercure Galant. 'We have loſt a Phyſician, as old as he was famous; it is Mr de Lorme, who always did that which is paſſed into a proverb againſt the Phyſicians, and which never fails of being objected to them, Phyſician cure thyſelf. He brought into faſhion a Tiſan, which was called the Bouillon-rouge, (red broth), by which thouſands have found benefit. The great ſums he ſpent in experiments are tokens of the care he took not to be ignorant in any part of his profeſſion; he died at the houſe of the marſhal Crequy, where he lived, and was above an hundred years old; he was ſtill very lively, and I have ſeen ſome well turned verſes of his, which I am aſſured he made within theſe fifteen days (15).' I do not think he was above an hundred, and I rather adhere to Mr Patin's calculation, according to which he died in the ninety fourth year of his age.

LORRAIN (CHARLES DE) cardinal and archbiſhop of Rheims, ſon to Claudius, firſt duke of Guiſe, was born in February 1525 (a). He was a perſon of very great abilities; but abuſed them to the great prejudice of France [A], in order to gratify his inſatiate thirſt of riches and preferments. He ſtept into a very ample ſucceſſion of benefices in 1550, by the death of cardinal John de Lorrain, his uncle [B], whoſe debts he never paid [C], though he had promiſed the creditors he would. At the ſame time he inſinuated himſelf, by ſordid condeſcenſions, into the favour of the ducheſs of Valentinois (b), and obtained ſo exorbitant an authority, as to raiſe to the nobleſt offices of the kingdom, the perſons, who were at his devotion. He did not always ſtay, till places were vacant, knowing very well how to diveſt the poſſeſſors. The firſt preſident of the parliament of Paris ſadly experienced it (c). This cardinal, who, in Henry the ſecond's reign, had an almoſt boundleſs power, found himſelf ſtill more powerful under Francis II, when he, and the duke of Guiſe, his brother, governed the whole kingdom at their pleaſure, under pretence, that they were uncles to the young queen Mary Stuart. He made a great figure at the conference of Poiſſi, by his eloquence and learning, and it is very probable that he conſented to the holding that aſſembly, only to have an opportunity of ſhewing his eloquence and wit [D]. He made a great figure likewiſe in the council of Trent; but [A] He was a perſon of very great abilities, but abuſed them to the great prejudice of France.] Here is the character Mr de Mezerai gives of him: ' The cardinal was a man made all of fire, always in action, ' and continually forming intrigues and factions for the ' raiſing his family; as capable of a quick invention of ' them, as his elder brother was of a prudent execution: extremely bent upon heaping up wealth, lofty ' in words, and vindictive; neverthelеſs cloſe, timorous, and diſſembling, except in the reſentment of ' injuries: as for the reſt, a man who by the help of ' the learning he had acquired, and by the charms of ' eloquence, which were natural to him, had that advantage of making himſelf heard by every body (1).' If you would have a copy of this character, read only what follows. ' This prince, whoſe name is ſo famous in hiſtory, and who had a mind extremely ' lively and penetrating; a temper ardent, impetuous, ' violent; a rare natural eloquence; much more learning than could be expected in a perſon of his quality; ' and which his eloquence made appear much greater ' ſtill than it really was; the boldeſt man in his cabinet, in imagining and enterpriſing great things and ' vaſt deſigns; but the moſt timerous and diſpirited, ' when he came to the execution, which he ſaw to be ' full of danger; he had all his life an unbounded paſſion for the greatneſs of his family (2).' Theſe words of Mr Maimbourg precede the paſſage, in which he relates, how this cardinal formed in the council of Trent the firſt plan of the league.

[B] He came to a very ample ſucceſſion of benefices in 1550, by the death of . . . . his uncle.] Cardinal John de Lorrain had ſought his eſtabliſhment in France, in imitation of the duke of Guiſe, his brother, and had made it in contempt of the ſacred canons, and the moſt antient laws of the church. He was at the ſame time archbiſhop of Lyons, Rheims, and Narbonne, biſhop of Metz, Toul, Verdun, Teroüane, Luçon, Alby, and Valence, and abbot of Gorze, Fécamp, Cluny, and Marmoutier (3). His nephew did not ſucceed him in all theſe preferments, but he did in the greateſt part (4). The biſhopric of Metz was given to Robert de Lenoncourt, who not long after contributed greatly to the reducing this city under the power of France (5).

Cardinal John de Lorrain experienced, that his ſucceſſor would not wait till his death, to enjoy his ſpoils. Read what follows. ' O baſe and deteſtable ' ingratitude, not having patience, till the deceaſed ' cardinal de Lorrain, his uncle, by whoſe favour he ' came from the college of Navarre to court, a man, ' as to ambition, of a quite different temper from his ' nephews, ſhould enrich him with his ſpoils by his ' deceaſe; he (6) ceaſed not to draw every thing that was ' poſſible for him under his wing, by an importunity ' next a-kin to violence, and found a way of making ' him deſire to remove from court, furniſhed him ' with ſuch ſervants as he thought fit, and deprived ' him of others that were moſt faithful to him, under ' any pretence he pleaſed, and ſo managed matters, ' that it was not his fault that he was not ſtripped to ' his ſhirt, when at laſt a ſudden death carried him ' off in his return from the election of Pope Julius III (7).' This is taken from a remonſtrance addreſſed to the princes of the blood, and inſerted by Lewis de Reynier, Sieur de la Planche, in his Hiſtory of Francis II.

Having, by ſervile compliances, inſinuated himſelf into ' the favour of the ducheſs of Valentinois, who was the ' king's ſole favourite, he perſuaded her, in order to ' get the management of affairs into his own hands, ' to, &c.*' [D] He conſented to the holding that aſſembly, only that he might have an opportunity of ſhewing his eloquence and wit.] Mr Varillas confeſſes, that this cardinal deſired it, out of the too good opinion he had of his own eloquence, and a deſire of diſputing with thoſe, who had employed all their time in the ſtudy of controverſy (9). Mr Maimbourg maintains, that this is one of thoſe ill-natured conjectures, which have been ſo commonly made to the diſadvantage of this great prelate, whom they would on this occaſion tax with vanity. If he had had as much power, adds he, as he had in the preceding reign, he would doubtleſs have hindered the holding this conference (10). I believe ſo to; for, in the preceding reign, he would never have ſuffered, that the Calviniſts ſhould have liberty to complain; but whatever change there was in his intereſt, he had ſtill credit enough to have broken off the conference, if it had diſpleaſed him. Had not he been the cauſe, by the remonſtrances he made to their majeſties at the head of the clergy (11), why they durſt not maintain the firſt edict of January (12), that was favourable to the Huguenots, and why they went in perſon, and ſat in the parliament of Paris to find out new expedients? Had not he been the cauſe, that the reſolutions, which were taken in this aſſembly, produced the edict of July, ſo terrible and ruinous to the Proteſtants? Had he not thereby triumphed over the queen-regent, ſupported by the prince of Condé, the admiral de Coligni, and the chancellor de l'Hoſpital? when a man could do all this, it could not be very difficult, methinks, to hinder the conference of Poiſſi. It is therefore probable, that the cardinal de Lorrain, proud of ſo fine an occaſion of diſplaying his learning and eloquence, contributed much to the holding this conference. Beſides that he was aſſured, the doctrine of the Calviniſts would be there condemned by the biſhops, which would adminiſter new arms to the zealous and perſecuting Catholics.

They, who know this cardinal's vanity by the ſymptoms he diſcovered of it in the council of Trent, will doubtleſs blame Mr Maimbourg. At the concluding of the council, they were willing to imitate the cuſtom practiſed in the Eaſtern church of acclamation and prayer,

he did not maintain the liberties of the Gallican church, with ſo much vigour, as the court of Rome apprehended (d) [E]. He found it more for the intereſt of his family to deal civilly with the Pope. His credit, which had ſuffered a ſhort eclipſe by the death of the duke of Guiſe, his brother, ſhone out again ſome time after [F]. He was looked upon as the principal author of the war of Italy, in which the duke of Guiſe had like to have loſt his whole reputation. I ſhall cite upon this occaſion a paſſage of Brantome, that deſerves to be read [G]. I ſhall cite another paſſage from him, which ſhews the vanity of this cardinal, that is to ſay, the haughtineſs with which he ſpoke to the ducheſs of prayer, and the cardinal (13) of Lorrain not only took the pains of compoſing theſe acclamations, but alſo of pronouncing them, which made him univerſally cenſured of vanity (14), that function, which had been fit for a deacon (and which heretofore had been always performed by deacons) ſeeming but little becoming a cardinal prince. A man, that was capable of falling into ſo childiſh an oſtentation, in all probability deſired to enter the liſts with the miniſters, in preſence of all the court, in order to ſhew his wit and eloquence. He was ſo addicted to the government of the ſtate, and political intrigues, that he had reaſon to apprehend, he was thought a bad divine. Indeed he might believe, that the world would excuſe him for having forgot the notions he had learned at the ſchools; but the more probable it was, that his profound skill in politics made the world believe, that he was not well verſed in controverſial matters, the more he was perſuaded that it would be to his glory, to ſhew he underſtood them thoroughly, and that he could diſcourſe eloquently and learnedly upon them. Here then is the rock that his vanity ſplit upon, and, we may ſay that one vanity cured another; for if he had not had the ambition to have it ſaid, that he excelled even in things the moſt remote from his continual occupations, he would but too much have deſpiſed the rank and birth of the miniſters to have vouchſafed to enter into a regular diſpute with them. I wiſh Montagne had ſpoken of him in that chapter of his Eſſays (15), in which he obſerves, that ‘ it moſt ‘ frequently happens, that every one chuſes rather to ‘ diſcourſe on another's profeſſion than his own, looking upon that as ſo much new acquired reputation. ‘ Obſerve how Cæſar expatiates, in deſcribing to us ‘ his inventions of building bridges and contriving engines, and how ſhort he is, where he ſpeaks of the ‘ offices of his own profeſſion, of his valour and conduct as a general. His exploits prove him to be a ‘ very excellent general, but he would make himſelf appear an excellent engineer, an accompliſhment ſomewhat foreign.’ Divinity, you will tell me, is a cardinal's profeſſion: I anſwer, this admits too many exceptions, and if he be a cardinal prince, or a firſt miniſter of ſtate, Divinity is no more his profeſſion, than that of the general of an army.

[E] He did not maintain, at the council of Trent, the liberties of the Gallican church, with ſo much vigour as the court of Rome apprehended.] ‘ The cardinal of Lorrain arrived at Trent, attended by a great ‘ number of biſhops, and took upon him ſuch authority, that the Pope, growing jealous of him, called ‘ him, amongſt his friends, the little Pope beyond the ‘ mountains. He knew, that he came with an intention to act in concert with the Imperialiſts, to procure ſome ſatisfaction to the Lutherans, (whom he ‘ deſired to draw off from the Huguenots, he and his ‘ brother having to that purpoſe diſcourſed with the ‘ duke of Wirtemberg, and other princes of this faith ‘ at Saverne) for which reaſon he had taken care to ‘ fortify himſelf againſt him, by a great number of Italian biſhops, whom from all parts he ſent to Trent, ‘ before this cardinal arrived there. Some months after ‘ his arrival, two great pieces of news came to the ‘ council; one concerning the death of the king of ‘ Navarre, the other, at ſome months diſtance, of the ‘ winning the battle of Dreux: both which made the ‘ cardinal believe, that his brother would become maſter of France; and this conſideration much heightened his power in the council, and by conſequence that ‘ of the embaſſadors, with whom he had been well ‘ united from the beginning. They propoſed therefore, according to the commiſſion they had received, ‘ thirty four articles of reformation . . . . The cardinal ‘ of Lorrain had doubtleſs ſtrongly ſupported them, ‘ if the death of the duke of Guiſe had not happened; ‘ but as the good fortune of this brother had elevated ‘ his courage, the loſs of him infinitely caſt him down; ‘ he thought of nothing now but of compromiſing matters with the Pope, and abating of his great deſigns; he ‘ obliged all the biſhops of his faction to abate too. ‘ Thus the legates, and other creatures of the court of ‘ Rome, remained maſters of the council, and got a ‘ great many things to paſs according to their intentions (16).’

[F] His credit . . . . ſhone out again ſome time after.] Here is one ſign of it. ‘ The guards, deſigned for ‘ the ſecurity of the cardinal of Lorrain, had orders ‘ not only to attend him into the Louvre; but alſo not ‘ to leave him at the altar; thus to mingle the ſmell of ‘ gun-powder and match with the odour of the incenſe, ‘ and other ſacred perfumes (17).’ It was Charles IX, who granted him this favour, as Mr Auberi obſerves (18), ſpeaking of a privilege much like that granted to cardinal de Richelieu.

REFLEXIONS on the wars adviſed by churchmen.

[G] I ſhall cite a paſſage of Brantome, upon the war of Italy, that deſerves to be read.] ‘ Theſe two faults ‘ happened by the means of people, who would handle ‘ arms, whilſt they knew nothing of the profeſſion. ‘ And for this reaſon this great duke of Guiſe, after he ‘ had been very much diſappointed in his Italian expedition, frequently ſaid, I love indeed the church of God; ‘ but I will never undertake any conqueſts upon the ‘ word and faith of a prieſt. Deſigning hereby to reproach Pope Caraffa, called Paul IV, who had not ‘ made good what he had promiſed, by great and ‘ ſolemn aſſeverations; or elſe the cardinal his brother, who was gone to get intelligence, and to ‘ ſound matters, as far as Rome, and afterwards had ‘ very raſhly puſhed his brother upon it. It may be ‘ ſuppoſed, that my lord of Guiſe meant it of both; ‘ for as I have heard ſay, the duke frequently repeated ‘ ſuch ſayings before the cardinal, who, thinking it was ‘ a ſtone thrown into his garden, was enraged at it, ‘ and could hardly curb his paſſion (19).’ The two faults, Brantome ſpeaks of, are thoſe of Lewis king of Hungary, and Don Sebaſtian king of Portugal. ‘ Lewis ‘ died in a battle which he fought againſt the Turks, not ‘ ſo much out of any reaſon, as through the perſuaſion ‘ and obſtinacy of a cardinal, who governed him very ‘ much, alledging, that he ought not to diſtruſt the ‘ power of God, and his juſt cauſe; that though he ‘ ſhould have, as we may ſay, but ten thouſand Hungarians, being ſo good Chriſtians, and fighting in ‘ God's cauſe, he might expect to defeat a hundred ‘ thouſand Turks: and he ſo drove, and hurried him ‘ to this engagement, that he loſt the battle; and, ‘ attempting to retreat, he fell into a bog, and was ‘ ſmothered. The ſame happened to the laſt king of ‘ Portugal, Sebaſtian, who miſerably loſt his life, when, ‘ not having ſufficient forces, he hazarded a battle with ‘ the Moors, who were three times ſtronger than he, and ‘ this upon the perſuaſion, the preachings, and obſtinacy of ſome Jeſuits, who laid before him the power ‘ of God, who by his look alone was able to confound ‘ all the world, though they ſhould be armed againſt ‘ him; as doubtleſs it is a moſt true maxim; however we ought not to tempt nor abuſe his power; ‘ for he has ſecrets that we are ignorant of. Some ‘ have ſaid, that theſe Jeſuits did this, and ſaid it with ‘ a good intention, as it may be believed; others, ‘ that they had been ſuborned and bribed by the king ‘ of Spain, thus to deſtroy this young and courageous king, and full of fire, that he might the more ‘ eaſily ſeize his dominions, as he afterwards did (20).’ For one reader, who will blame me for having drawn out this remark to ſuch a length, by reciting theſe two particulars more than a hundred will thank me heartily: it is to oblige ſuch, that I ſometimes give a greater extent to my remarks, than the text requires; they experience with pleaſure, that they meet with more things by the way, than they expected.

of Savoy, kiſſing her by main force [H]. Note, that the kiſs, he ſtruggled for, was a kiſs of ceremony; he loved alſo other kiſſes [I], as Brantome informs us. I have elſewhere ſpoken (e) of his hatred to the Proteſtant religion, and the ſatirical writings he was expoſed to on this account. I might alſo have obſerved, that he was compared to Seneca in one of theſe ſatires [K]. He was turned into ridicule, for ſome time, on his receiving an high affront at Paris, from the mareſchal de Montmorenci [L]. He died the 26th

[H] The haughtineſs which the cardinal ſhewed to the ducheſs of Savoy, kiſſing her by main force.] He had naturally a great reſpect for the ladies (21). But he forgot this reſpect, and not without reaſon, towards the ducheſs of Savoy, Donna Beatrix of Portugal. Paſſing once through Piedmont, in his journey to Rome, for the ſervice of the king his maſter, he viſited the duke and ducheſs; after having diſcourſed ſome time with Monſieur the duke, he waited on the ducheſs in her chamber, intending to ſalute her, and, as he approached, ſhe, who was arrogance itſelf, offered him her hand to kiſs. The cardinal, reſenting this affront, advanced to kiſs her lips, and ſhe continued to run back, when loſing all patience, and coming up cloſer to her, he took her by the head, and, in ſpite of her, kiſſed her two or three times, and though ſhe ſcreamed, and cried out in the Spaniſh and Portugueſe way, ſhe was forced to ſubmit. How comes it, ſays he, that you uſe this behaviour to me? ſhall not I, who kiſs the queen my miſtreſs, the greateſt queen in the world, kiſs you, who are but a little dirty ducheſs? I would have you know, that I have lain with as fine ladies, and of as good families as yourſelf. Poſſibly he might ſay true. This princeſs was to blame in carrying it ſo high towards a prince of ſo great a houſe, or even to a cardinal, conſidering the high rank they bear in the church, and eſteem themſelves on a level with the greateſt princes in Chriſtendom. The cardinal was to blame, in taking ſo harſh a revenge; but it is grievous to a noble and generous heart, of whatever profeſſion, to receive an affront.

(21) Ibid. pag. 364.

[I] He alſo loved other kiſſes.] The following paſſage is a piece of a comedy, which the people of the world act: by the people of the world, I mean ſome princes of the church, as well as the moſt worldly laymen. Let us hear Brantome ſpeak: he will tell us, that the cardinal de Lorrain was no leſs liberal in point of charity, than galantry: ‘ Moſt liberal, ſays he (22), I may call him, ſince he had not his equal ‘ in his time; his expences, his gifts, and bounties, ‘ have teſtified it, eſpecially his charity towards the ‘ poor; he generally carried a great bag, which his ‘ valet de chambre, who kept his money for his little ‘ pleaſures, failed not to fill every morning with three ‘ or four hundred crowns; and as often as he met ‘ with any poor body, he put his hand in the bag, ‘ and what he took out at adventure he gave, without ‘ picking or chuſing. It was of him, that a poor blind ‘ man ſaid, (when paſſing thro' Rome, and being asked ‘ an alms, he, according to his cuſtom, threw the ‘ beggar a handful of gold) crying out aloud, O tu ‘ ſei Chriſto, O veramente el Cardinal di Lorrenna: that ‘ is, Either thou art undoubtedly Chriſt, or the cardinal ‘ de Lorrain. If he was an alms-giver, and charitable ‘ that way, he was alſo very liberal to other perſons, ‘ and eſpecially towards the ladies, whom he eaſily ‘ caught with this bait; for money was not ſo plen- ‘ tiful in thoſe times, as it is at preſent; and for their ‘ part, they were more fond of junketing and fine ‘ cloaths. I have heard ſay, that when any new maid ‘ came to court, or lady that was handſome, he pre- ‘ ſently came and accoſted her, telling her he himſelf ‘ would have the managing of her. A fine manager in- ‘ deed! I believe the trouble was not near ſo great, as ‘ managing a wild filly: for at that time it was ſaid, there ‘ was hardly a lady or maid of any ſtanding at court, or ‘ newly arrived, that was not kiſſed, and caught by the ‘ magnificence of the cardinal; and few or none left this ‘ court, either women or maids, with unſpotted honour. ‘ Their coffers and large wardrobes were then to be ‘ ſeen crouded with more gowns, petticoats, gold and ‘ ſilver, and ſilk, than thoſe of the queens and princeſſes ‘ of this time. I ſpeak from my own knowledge of ‘ two or three, who had gained all this by their bo- ‘ dies, their fathers, mothers, and husbands, having ‘ never been able to furniſh them with ſuch ſtore.' The ſame Brantome affirms (23), that the baſtard daughter of this cardinal, called Arne (§ α), followed the princeſs Elizabeth, daughter to Henry II, and wife to Philip II, into Spain, and was married to Beſme, he who aſſaſſinated the admiral.

[K] He was compared to Seneca in a ſatire.] We need not wonder at it, when we know, that the author of the Parallel took this Philoſopher for a wicked man. Let us cite Montagne's words: they are worthy of his good taſte: ‘ Among a thouſand little books, ‘ ſays he (24), diſperſed by thoſe of the pretended ‘ Reformed religion, in defence of their cauſe, which ‘ now and then came from a good hand, and which it ‘ is great pity was not employed on a better ſubject, ‘ I have formerly ſeen one, which, to lengthen and ‘ fill up the ſimilitude, he pretends to find between ‘ the government of our poor deceaſed king Charles IX, ‘ and that of Nero, draws a parallel between the de- ‘ ceaſed cardinal of Lorrain and Seneca, and com- ‘ pares their fortunes, they having been both the ‘ firſt in the government of their prince, as alſo their ‘ morals, conditions, and deportment. In my opinion ‘ he does great honour to the cardinal; for though ‘ I am one of thoſe, who greatly eſteemed his wit, ‘ his eloquence, his zeal for religion, and the ſervice ‘ of his king, and his good fortune in having been ‘ born in an age, in which it was ſo new a thing, ‘ ſo rare, and withal ſo neceſſary to the public good, ‘ to have an eccleſiaſtical perſon, of ſuch extraction ‘ and dignity, capable of, and ſufficient for his poſt; ‘ yet, to confeſs the truth, I reckon his capacity ‘ nothing near ſo great, nor his virtue ſo clean and ‘ entire, nor ſo unſhaken, as that of Seneca. Now ‘ this book, I ſpeak of, to obtain it's end, gives a ‘ very injurious deſcription of Seneca, borrowing theſe ‘ reproaches from Dion the Hiſtorian, on whoſe teſti- ‘ mony I in no wiſe depend.'

[L] He received an high affront from the mareſchal de Montmorenci.] Though Charles IX had forbad the wearing of arms, yet the cardinal de Lorrain came to Paris with a great retinue of armed men, and pretended to enter the city with this guard. ‘ He had a ‘ permiſſion, ſealed with the great ſeal, for riding with ‘ armed guards (25). The mareſchal de Montmorenci, ‘ governor of Paris, knew it very well; but expected, ‘ that the cardinal ſhould have made him a compli- ‘ ment upon it; and he ſent to him an order, by ‘ the provoſt of the mareſchals, to command his ‘ people to lay down their arms. The cardinal, neg- ‘ lecting it, ſtill rode on. The mareſchal, well at- ‘ tended, went to meet him, and attacked him in ‘ St Denis's ſtreet. . . . . . The cardinal's attendants ‘ diſperſed here and there, and he himſelf eſcaped ‘ into a ſhop with his nephew (26). In the evening, ‘ they all came together to Clugny-houſe, which was ‘ the cardinal's lodging. The next day, the mareſ- ‘ chal paſſed backwards and forwards in a kind of bra- ‘ vado before his gates. . . . . . The provoſt of the ‘ merchants, in behalf of the parliament, accommoda- ‘ ted this affair: he obtained of the cardinal, that he ‘ would quit the town, and of the mareſchal, that he ‘ would ſuffer this prince to have armed guards, ac- ‘ cording to the permiſſion of the king, of which he ‘ ſhewed him the copy (27).' The reader will be better pleaſed with Mr le Laboureur's account of it (28). ‘ He ordered that the cardinal ſhould be civilly told, ‘ that he would not receive him in that warlike equi- ‘ page, and the contempt ſhewn to the meſſage, obli- ‘ ged him the more to come to extreams, which was ‘ to repel force by force, and do his duty in putting ‘ his guard to the ſword, unleſs they diſarmed; and ‘ this was done without any other loſs, than that of ‘ one of the cardinal's men, who put himſelf in a ‘ poſture of defence, upon which the cardinal, who ‘ not being ſo valiant, though more violent than his ‘ brothers, was ſo frighted, that he ran and hid himſelf ‘ in a ſhop in Iron-ſtreet, near which the skirmiſh happen- ‘ ed. He was afterwards conducted to his houſe, which ‘ was Clugny-Houſe, where he remained ſome days, ‘ without ſhewing himſelf, and at laſt retired by night

26th of December, 1574. You will find very curious things concerning his death, in the Journal of Henry III (f). The queen of Scotland, his niece, was politic enough to elude the deſign he had of keeping her jewels [M]. I forgot to obſerve, that he was the principal promoter of an edict, which made the parliament of Paris of half a year's continuance [N]. This laſted not long. We are told, that the prediction of an Aſtrologer gave him frequent fears, and contributed much to the pains he took to get the wearing of arms prohibited, in the reign of Francis II. The paſſage, I ſhall alledge on this occaſion,

‘ to his archbiſhopric of Rheims, to meditate more ſecurely his deſigns of revenge, not public, as his friends hoped, but ſecret and cloſeted, ſuch as are the reſentments of thoſe of his condition, when they can make their particular quarrel an affair of ſtate. This adventure was publiſhed throughout Europe, and the Huguenots forgot it not in their libels, and particularly in a complaint they put in the cardinal's mouth, of the little aſſiſtance that was lent him for the execution of his deſigns, wherein he ſpeaks thus :

Meſmes Paris entier, duquel le Comperage
Envers mon ſere & moy obligeoit le courage,
Me delaiſſe du tout. Je le puis voir ainſi
Quand pres St Innocent me fit Montmorency
Deſcendre de viſteſſe, & gagner une porte,
Ma garde deſarma, & mit à pied ; de ſorte
Qu'elle ainſi me miſe en blanc grand deſhonneur en a Et. . . . .
Ah ! que j'ay de dépit qu'en abaiſſant ma corne
Il me fit en public recevoir telle eſcorne,
Sans que de ſe mouvoir nul homme fit ſemblant
En toute la Cité, & que d'un cœur tremblant
A luy le lendemain j'envoyay me ſoumettre,
Le requerant vouloir octroyer & permettre,
Me retirer armé, de crainte des Mutins.
Ce que de luy encor tant brave je n'obtins,
Ains m'en allay de nuit, emmenant un bon nombre
Des miens ; ſi qu'en fuyant avois peur de mon ombre.
Oh ! quel eſtois je lors, ô combien different Eſtoit Charles nouveau, de ce Charles Parent
De l'eſpouſe à François ! Oh que cette nuit coye
Differoit du plein jour auquel remply de joye,
Je condamnay en Roy, inique & déloyal,
A la cruelle mort le juſte Sang Royal.

E'en Paris caſt me off, that once reſpected
Me and my brother. Then I found it ſo,
When Montmorency, near St Innocent's,
Made me diſmount in haſte, and to a ſhop,
For refuge fly ; my guard, unhors'd,
And ignominiouſly threw down their arms.
. . . .
How did it gall me, thus to be affronted,
In public too, and not a citizen
Stir to my aid ; nay to be forc'd, next day,
With trembling heart to ſend a low ſubmiſſion,
And humbly to entreat his worſhip's leave,
Arm'd to retire, for fear of mutineers :
Yet this he haughtily refus'd to grant.
So that I fled by night, my ſervants with me,
So ſcar'd, that my own ſhadow frighted me.
What was I then ? alas ! how different
From Charles, related to king Francis' queen !
A night how different from that full day,
When joyous, like a king, unjuſt, diſloyal,
I ſat in judgment on the royal blood,
And ſentenc'd many to a cruel death.

Immediately there came out a letter (29), which was preſently confuted (§ β). This letter was deſigned to juſtify the cardinal, and contained ſeveral reproaches againſt the houſe of Montmorency, and the admiral de Coligni. The anſwer was very ſmart ; it proceeded from a better pen than that of the cardinal's apologiſt. Thuanus makes mention of ſeveral pieces publiſhed pro and con, upon this affair, and which had been multiplied ad infinitum, if the parliament of Paris had not forbidden the ſale of ſuch books. The ſame Hiſtorian obſerves, that Lewis Reynier, Sieur de la Planche, was reckoned the author of the firſt piece that appeared, which was a relation of the fact in favour of the mareſchal. He obſerves alſo, that this mareſchal had not acted like a good Politician, ſince he choſe rather to provoke a moſt powerful enemy, by a great, but not very prejudicial affront, than ruin him entirely. Momorantii prudentiam plerique tunc requirebant, qui potentes inimicos leviſſimo damno irritare, quam perdere cùm poſſet, maluerit. The prince of Condé blamed him for this conduct (30), and often ſaid, that if Montmorency only meant to divert himſelf, he did too much ; and if he was in earneſt he did too little (31). Perhaps this prince would not have been ſorry, whilſt he had no hand in it, to have been rid at once of ſo formidable a family.

The ſame year the cardinal of Lorrain involved himſelf in a controverſy, in which he did not ſucceed. The ſcene of this quarrel was the Pais Meſſin, where Salcede, who was bailiff of it, vigorouſly oppoſed the enterprizes of the cardinal. This was called the cardinal's war, of which there was ſpeedily printed a relation.

[(§ β) It was printed at Antwerp, by William Richman, in 8vo, and containing but 27 pages. It is dated from Paris, the ſecond of April, 1564, before Eaſter. The anſwer to it is intituled, A reply to the Letter of Charles de Vaudemont, Cardinal of Lorrain, whileome imaginary prince of the kingdoms of Jeruſalem and Naples, duke and earl, by fancy, of Anjou and Provence, and at preſent a meer gentleman of Hainault, 1565, in 8vo. It is extreamly full of ſpirit, and contains very curious things, eſpecially in relation to the genealogy of the Chatillons and Lorrains, and touching the cauſes of the hatred between admiral de Coligni, and the duke of Guiſe. It is a pity the author of this piece is unknown : perhaps it is the Sieur de la Planche's, whom Mr BAYLE ſpeaks of a little after ; but be the author who he will, he was certainly a good writer. I only wiſh he had not highly approved and commended the aſſaſſination of Poltrot. ‘ Are you comparable, ſays he to the cardinal *, for counſel, reſolution, authority, conduct, experience, and bravery, to the tyrant Francis, your brother ? Meray †, our deliverer, has left us a noble and divine example to follow. I know very well, that he need not be as cruel as you are ; but I deny, that it is cruelty to do juſtice on a tyrant, who had neither pity nor humanity.’ What have the moſt furious leaguers ſaid more in favour of the Jaüreguys, and the Clements ? does not this ſhew that paſſion blinded the writers of both parties ? the title of this anſwer is very particular, and perhaps Mr du Bouchet copied after it, when he made this : An Anſwer to the petition, which Mr de Pranzac, imaginary prince of the blood, fancies he preſented to the king ; Paris, Jaquin, 1667, in folio. REM. CRIT.]

[M] The queen of Scotland eluded the deſign he had of keeping her jewels.] Mary Stuart, after the death of Francis II, her huſband, went over to Scotland. The cardinal of Lorrain, her uncle, was of opinion, that it was her beſt way to depoſit her jewels with him, till fortune had decided the ſucceſs of her voyage ; but ſhe knowing very well his intentions, anſwered him, that whilſt ſhe hazarded herſelf to all the dangers of the ſea, ſhe ſhould be to blame, in being more concerned for her jewels than her perſon. See in the margin Thuanus's words (32).

[N] He was the principal promoter of an edict, which made the parliament of Paris, of half a year's continuance.] Thuanus ſpeaks of it under the year 1554, and obſerves, that John Daurat, preceptor at that time to the king's pages, made verſes a little too bold, to flatter the cardinal of Lorrain. He compared the parliament to Plato's Androgynus. ‘ In eam rem Joan. Auratus, tunc aulicorum puerorum præceptor & mox occaſion, will inform us, that the inſult he received in coming out of a courtezan's houſe [O], obliged him to bring back the court to St Germains, in contempt of an antient cuſtom. Let us not forget, that he preached on ſeveral occaſions; but good God! in a ſtrain how remote from the ſpirit of the goſpel. He handled things according to the tenor of the Alcoran, as a true ſucceſſor of Mahomet, and not of the Apoſtles; he preached nothing but war, and the effuſion of blood [P]; but while he expreſſed this barbarous zeal againſt the Proteſtants of France, he gave penſions to ſome Proteſtants in Germany [Q]. A new farce!

'profeſſor regius, vir divini ingenii, carmen elegantiſſimum, ſed petulanti libertate, in gratiam Cardinalis Lotaringi, qui negotium illud urgebat, conſcripſit, quo ampliſſ. ordinem Androgyno Platonico comparat (33).' Note, that Paſquier obſerves, that things were reduced to their former condition at three years end (34). Thuanus ſays the ſame.

[O] The paſſage I ſhall alledge on this occaſion, will inform us, ... the inſult he received in coming out of a courtezan's houſe.] The cardinal 'going very early out of the houſe of the handſome Romania, a renowned courtezan in Henry's time, who lodged in St Catherine's-ſtreet, had like to have been handled very roughly by ſome ruffians, who generally wait for ſuch adventures. At which his ſanctity being alarmed, and perſuading himſelf, and giving out, that the Heretics laid ambuſhes for him, he led the court to St Germains, and cauſed the queen-mother, who would not on any account leave the king, her ſon, for ever ſo little a time, to break the cuſtom hitherto inviolable, which obliged the queens, upon their huſband's deceaſe, not to ſtir out of their chamber for forty days, nor ſee the light of the ſun or the moon till he was buried. Preſently after, when the ſtrangers were gone, he put out an edict, forbidding the carrying any arms, and eſpecially piſtols and arquebuſſes, under great penalties, revoking all particular and preceding permiſſions, to whomſoever granted, unleſs they were newly confirmed by the king, ſo that only the Guiſes, and their friends remained armed. Beſides, ſuſpecting the cloaths that were then in faſhion, as long cloaks (35), and large breeches (and indeed they were too exceſſive; for the cloak reached below the calf of the leg, and without ſleeves, and the breeches were an ell and a half large or five quarters) (36) they induced the privy-council to forbid the wearing them, foraſmuch as arms might be eaſily concealed under them. And it was ſaid, that the cardinal took that matter more to heart upon the account of a necromancer, who had prognoſticated to him at Rome, that he ſhould be killed by an arquebuſs, out of envy, and by the enemies he ſhould have in France, upon his being exalted to the higheſt degree of honour, which gave him, great trouble and uneaſineſs (the true wages of thoſe, who go to conjurers,) even while all things bowed and ſubmitted to him (37).' The hiſtorian who furniſhes me with this narrative, ſays, that the Guiſes did not appear at the magnificent entrance of Francis II at Orleans, the eighteenth of October, 1560. And it was ſaid it was for fear of meeting with ſome deſperate fellow; becauſe a Magician (as we have ſaid) had foretold to the cardinal at Rome, that his brother and he ſhould die a violent death and be killed by arquebuſſes, ſo that to avoid this, they were afraid of ſuch aſſemblies, though they had forbidden the wearing any piſtols and arquebuſſes, upon pain of death (38). Note, that the magician's prediction proved falſe, for the cardinal did not die a violent death.

[P] He preached nothing but war and effuſion of blood.] The witneſs I ſhall produce, is neither a libeller, nor a Huguenot, but the famous Stephen Paſquier. 'Becauſe, ſays he (39), the miniſters gained the people before, by ſermons and exhortations, ſo the cardinal of Lorrain, thought to do the like amongſt us. He firſt preached in the church of Notre-Dame, to an incredible affluence of auditors, and afterwards in the church of St Germain de l'Auxerrois. All the holy-days and octaves of Corpus-Chriſti-day, every other turn, he preaching one day, and the Minime (40), of whom I have ſpoken above; admoniſhing the people above all things, rather to die, and to ſpill the laſt drop of their blood, than engage againſt the honour of God and his church, to ſuffer any other religion to prevail in France, beſides that which our anceſtors ſo ſtrictly and religiouſly obſerved. I thought it as great a novelty to ſee a cardinal preach, as a miniſter a little before. He has very much animated the people to arms. The pens even of the poets engaged in the ſame. In ſhort, there is nothing trumpeted but fire, war, murther, and deſolation.' If you would ſee what were the fruits of theſe ſanguinary ſermons, conſult the ſame Paſquier (41). It would be impoſſible to tell you what barbarous cruelties are committed on both ſides; where the Huguenots are maſters, they deſtroy all the images, (the antient bulwark of the common peoples devotion) demoliſh ſepulchres and tombs, and even paſſing through Clery, have not ſpared that of Lewis XI; plunder all the goods conſecrated and devoted to churches. By way of retaliation the Catholics kill, murther, drown all that they know to be of this ſect, and the rivers overflow with them. Not but that amidſt this, ſome execute their private revenges upon their enemies, on pretence of the public quarrel. And tho' the heads ſeem not to approve ſuch actions, yet they let them paſs by connivance and diſſimulation. Peace is better than war.' Though at preſent the readers ſee theſe things only at a diſtance, they cannot chuſe but conceive ſome indignation againſt this barbarous ſermon-monger, and eſpecially when they conſider his character. He was a great cardinal, who run no risk in kindling a civil-war in all the corners of the kingdom. He was certain always to follow the court ſecure from any danger or trouble: and that whilſt the provinces were a theatre of bloodſhed, he could wallow in pleaſures; that his luxury, his pomp, his feaſting, his love intrigues, would ſuffer no interruption. This is a ſubject of ſcandal, which muſt prodigiouſly encreaſe the horror ſuch an incendiary-preacher gives all truly Chriſtian ſouls; a trumpeter of war, of torments and butchery; a man who, properly ſpeaking, is not of Jeſus Chriſt's religion, but of Saturn, and who indeed practiſes the ſame which the prieſts of Carthage did antiently to the honour of this falſe god. They ſacrificed men to him, and imagined, that their religion required ſuch victims (42).

[Q] He gave penſions to ſome Proteſtants in Germany.] The names of them were found in the book of accounts of this cardinal's ſteward. A book of Zanchius proves it. 'Certum mihi eſt, quod jam dicam coram Deo; Audivi ex viro harum rerum perito, & fide digno, ſe in libro Theſaurarii illius cardinalis Lotharingi, paucis ante annis vita defuncti, nonnullorum Germanorum Theologiæ Doctorum & Paſtorum nomina vidiſſe: quibus penſiones annuæ, ex Archiepiſcopatu præſertim Metenſi aſſignabantur. In quem vero finem non fuiſſe ſcriptum (43). —— This I am certain of, which I declare in the preſence of God; I have heard from a a man perfectly verſed in theſe matters, and one worthy of credit, that he had ſeen in the accounts of the treaſurer of this cardinal of Lorrain, a few years before his death, the names of ſome German divines and miniſters, who had annual penſions aſſigned them out of the revenues chiefly of the archbiſhopric of Metz, but on what account was not ſet down.' There is no doubt but the cardinal propoſed to himſelf to keep up the diviſion betwixt the Lutherans of Germany, and the doctors of Geneva; but this was however but an ill way of maintaining his own religion. It was pure Machiaveliſm. Compare with this what I have ſaid in another place (44).

I have mentioned ſome ſermons of this cardinal: Languet's letters inform us, that they were not diſapproved by the Proteſtants, and that this cardinal was ſuſpected of Lutheraniſm. It was in the year 1561, that he preached them at Rheims, in Lent. 'Cardinalis Lotharingicus à rigidioribus Pontificiis accuſatur Lutheraniſmi. LOTICHIUS (Peter) abbot of the convent of Solitar, in the county of Hanaw (a) in Germany, was born in the year 1501. He quited the ſchools of Leipſic at ſixteen years of age, in order to devote himſelf to a monaſtic life in the convent of Solitar. He received prieſts orders in 1523, and peaceably performed the functions of it till 1524, that is, till the peaſants war forced him to take ſanctuary with his abbot and fraternity, under the counts of Hanaw. The abbot bringing back his ſociety to the monaſtery, after theſe furious troubles were appeaſed, committed the care of his church to Lotichius (b); who having read Luther and Melanchthon's books, found himſelf capable of preaching, and doing all the other functions of his place better than before. The abbot died in 1534, and Lotichius, who ſucceeded him, thinking in good earneſt to reform that abbey, opened a ſchool in it, in which a great number of young people were inſtructed, ſeveral of whom became miniſters of the Goſpel, after having continued their ſtudies at Wittemberg and Marpurg. He openly eſtabliſhed the Proteſtant religion in his monaſtery, and in all the places depending upon it, in 1543, and wrote a fine Latin letter to the abbot of Fulda, to juſtify his conduct. He was the principal cauſe of the couragious reſolution, which the neighbouring miniſters took to reject the Interim in 1549. The reſt of his life anſwered his great zeal by acts of piety and charity. His church, his ſchool, and ſeveral learned men, experienced the effects of his liberal temper. He died at the count of Hanaw's, the twenty-third of June 1567. His body was buried two days after, in the abbey of Solitar (c).

LOTICHIUS (Peter) nephew to the former, took the ſirname Secundus, that he might not be miſtaken for his uncle. He was born at Solitar the ſecond of November 1528. His father (a), though he was only an honeſt country man, deſigned him for a ſcholar; and we need not wonder at it, conſidering what we have ſaid of the abbot Lotichius. This uncle having obſerved, by the progreſs his nephew made at Solitar ſchool, that he was very well qualified for the Sciences, reſolved to take a very particular care of him, and ſent him to Frankfort, where Micyllus taught the Belles Lettres with great reputation. After having learnt there a great deal of Latin and Greek, and much better the rules of Poetry, to which his genius ſtrongly inclined him; he was ſent to Marpurg in 1544, and afterwards to Wittemberg, whither Melanchthon and Camerarius drew a great reſort. The young Lotichius quickly gained the friendſhip of theſe two famous profeſſors, as alſo that of George Sabinus, a celebrated poet, and of ſeveral other learned men. The war which broke out in Saxony in 1546, obliged Melanchthon and his colleagues to quit Wittemberg. The firſt retired to Magdeburg (b), and was followed thither by our Lotichius; but when he left that place to ſeek a better retreat, Lotichius, inſtead of following him, took up arms. This kind of life did not intirely break off his commerce with the Muſes, nor did it laſt long [A]; for we know that in the year 1548, he lived peaceably among his books at Erfort. A little after he returned to Wittemberg, whither the peace had permitted Melanchthon to go and continue his function. He there finiſhed his ſtudies of philoſophy, and afterwards went into France, in quality of governor to the nephews of Daniel Stibar, dean of the chapter of Wirtzburg, a man of great merit, and an intimate friend of Joachim Camerarius. It was in the year 1550 that he began this journey, which laſted near four years [B]. He made a long ſtay at Montpellier; and probably he and his pupils would

You, amidſt arms, were my delight,
  My vacant hours for you reſerv'd;
I, even in camps, could poems write,

For the reſt, he did not make much more than one campaign, ſo that the author, cited by Mr Baillet, had no reaſon to ſay in general, that what is remarkable is, that Lotichius compoſed his verſes in the tumult of a camp, and under arms (2).

[B] His journey to France . . . . . laſted near four years.] This was the whole time of the journey (3). Now as they firſt ſaw Paris, Rouen, Diepe, Lyons, and went for the moſt part on foot (4), having but one horſe among eleven of them to carry their cloaths; it is certain they ſtaid not at Montpellier four years, as an ingenious man has ſaid (5). They lived there above two years. Cum biennio jam atque eo amplius forte in Academia Mompeliana vixiſſent, ſays Hagius in the 47th page.

would have ſuffered ſeveral inſults (c), for having eaten meat in Lent, if Cluſius, who lodged at Rondelet's, had not interceded for them with a Dominican, who performed the office of inquiſitor. They were diſcharged for a ſum of money. He was ſcarce returned into Germany but he thought of travelling into Italy. He made this journey, as he had done that to France, at the expence of Daniel Stibar; but he had the misfortune of getting acquainted with too many people. He lodged at Bologna, with a young canon of Munich, who though he had a complaiſant landlady at home, made love abroad (d). The landlady being deſperately in love, and alſo jealous, prepared a philtre for him; but by misfortune Lotichius finding his ſoop too fat, changed it for that of the canon [C], and grew immediately mad upon it. He was relieved by vomiting up a part of the potion, which however threw him into a malignant fever that made his nails fall off, and had like to have coſt him his life. Hubert Languet, his good friend, travelling into Italy, found him in this miſerable condition at Bologna. The poiſon operated ſo violently upon Lotichius, that every year he had ſome returns of his firſt malady, till at laſt he died of it. Before he left Italy, he took his degree of doctor of Phyſic at Padua. Some time after his return into Germany, he was invited to Heidelberg to be profeſſor in that faculty; he accepted of this invitation, and went to Heidelberg in 1557. He there got the eſteem and favour of the elector Palatine, Otho-Henry, and of every body elſe; and as he had all manner of reaſon to be ſatisfied with his employment, he refuſed the offers that were made him at Marpurg, of a place of profeſſor of Phyſic or Poetry. He did not long enjoy that pleaſant ſtate; being attacked with his old diſtemper in the beginning of November 1560, and died the ſeventh of the ſame month, he was a man of admirable converſation, and was candor and ſincerity it ſelf (e) [D]. A collection of his poems were publiſhed in 1561 [E]. It contains ſo many love-verſes, that it was thought the author wanted ſome apology on that account. Hagius undertook it [F]. [D] . . . . he was candor and ſincerity itſelf.] His Hiſtorian gives a moſt remarkable proof of it. [E] A collection of Lotichius's poems were publiſhed in 1561.] Joachim Camerarius wrote the Epiſtle Dedicatory, in which he gives Lotichius the character of the beſt Poet, that his age, and Germany had ſeen. After this edition, many others were made with the addition of ſeveral poems. Thuanus (8), who has put three years betwixt Lotichius's death, and the publication of his poems by Camerarius, is two years miſtaken in his reckoning. Moreri has copied this fault, and has added a little anachroniſm of his own on the day of his death, which happened not as he ſays, on the twenty fourth of October, but on the ſeventh of November. Thuanus, who has placed his death on the firſt of November, is not without fault. Freherus (9) alſo reckons three years betwixt Lotichius's death, and the edition of his poems. Thuanus (10) has placed this Poet below Eobanus Heſſus. Camerarius pretends, that if the latter was alive, he would have owned himſelf inferior to Lotichius. ‘Sed & Eobanus & Sabi-‘nus, ſi viverent, cum omnia in Lotichii ſcriptis mag-‘nopere probarent, tum elegantia & ſuavitate atque ‘exprimendi vetuſtatis ſimilitudinem contentione, ſe ‘ab hoc alicubi ſuperari non negarent (11). ——— ‘But Eobanus and Sabinus both, if they were now li-‘ving, as they were great admirers of Lotichius's wri-‘tings, ſo they would not deny that in elegancy and ſoft-‘neſs of expreſſion, as alſo in a happy manner of imita-‘ting the Antients, they were each of them excelled by ‘him.’ Hagius affirms, that the greateſt Poets of Germany have publickly acknowledged the particular eſteem they had for Lotichius's verſes; and pretends, that, in the common opinion, Lotichius equalled the moſt excellent Poets, both antient and modern, and was preferable perhaps to ſome of the Antients; he cites Paul Meliſſus's verſes, in which the ſuperiority is given to Lotichius, above all the German Poets, with reſpect to elegy. Melchior Adam (12) is ſomewhat unexact in his abridgment of this place, ſince he makes Hagius ſay, that the greateſt men, and particularly George Sabinus, John Stigelius, George Fabricius, Poſthius, and Meliſſus, have given Lotichius the ſuperiority with reſpect to elegiac verſe. Hagius at the moſt makes only Poſthius and Meliſſus give him this ſuperiority; he ſays nothing of the other three, either expreſly or implicitly that can relate to this matter.

I thought that the edition of Lotichius's poems procured by Camerarius in 1561, was the firſt; but Mr Kortholt (13) has been pleaſed to inform me, that there was printed at Paris in 1551, by Vaſcoſan, Petri Lotichii ſecundi elegiarum liber, & ejuſdem carminum libellus ad D. Danielem Stibarum equitem Francum. The letter he writ me thereupon is ſo miſlaid among my papers, that when I was reviſing this article, I could not find it; however I remember he gave me ſeveral paticulars of this edition, and told me, among other things, that the dream I ſhall ſpeak of below (14), is not found in it. Mr Kortholt acquainted me alſo that he had inſerted ſeveral things concerning our Peter Lotichius in his diſſertation de enthuſiaſmo poetico, printed at Kiel in 1696.

[F] Hagius undertook the apology of his love-verſes.] He confeſſes (15) that being very young he made frequent reflexions with ſome ſort of ſurprize, on the perpetual complaints with which the Poets fill their verſes; as that they burn with love, that they are pierced with Cupid's darts, and that they find no remedy for theſe conſuming flames.

(15) In Vita Lotichii.

Mille fatigatus rerum diſcrimina vici,
  Sæpe graves æſtus, frigora ſæpe tuli:

  Nec deſideriis fortior eſſe meis.

A thouſand changes I have born,
  And colds, and heats, I have endur'd,
Yet Cupid doth my courage ſcorn,
  Nor are his flames by patience cur'd.

After theſe verſes of Lotichius, he cites three of Virgil's.

Aſpice aratra jugo referunt ſuſpenſa juvenci,
Et ſol creſcentes decedens duplicat umbras.
Me tamen urit amor, quis enim modus adſit amori?

Releas'd from toil the ſteers brought home the plows,
The ſetting ſun the length'n'd ſhadow ſhows,
Me love ſtill burns for love no limit knows.

ſomething ſurprizing in it; it turns upon a dream, which ſeems to be a prediction of the ſacking of Magdeburg [G]. I ſhall make ſeveral remarks on this ſubject, which yet

He adds, that having aſked ſome Poets the meaning of theſe things, Lotichius anſwered him, that it was the fire of divine, and not venereal, love, that burnt the Poets.

Cur vatum pars magna ſuos decantet amores
Miraris, Hagi candide, & cauſſam rogas?
Accipe, non illos Veneris fax improba, verum
Æterni amor generoſus urit numinis.

That of their loves ſo many Poets ſung,
You wonder, Hagius, and demand the cauſe.
They were not by a luſtful paſſion ſtung,
But love divine unto their verſe gave laws.

This anſwer is ridiculous; it was treating Hagius as a child. He does not ſpeak of it as he ought to do; for he only ſays, that Meliſſus explained to him all the myſtery much better (16). Meliſſus repreſented to him, that if any thing was capable of attracting hearts, and conveying invincible charms into the very marrow, it is the love that is kindled by a modeſt and chaſt object. The pureſt heaven, adds he, formed this love, and aſſigned it inflamed hearts for it's throne (17). The ſtars take care to keep up this fire; and as the Poets receive the influences from heaven, which inſpire their Poetry, we need not wonder that they have ſo lively a ſenſe of the fire of love; for theſe influences having the ſame origin as love (18), both kindle and keep it up.

Sic propagare laborat
Indita naturæ ſemina quiſque ſuæ.

Each but endeavours to make thoſe things grow,
The ſeeds of which kind nature did beſtow.

To reduce this explication to plain human language, and to it's juſt ſimplicity, we muſt ſuppoſe that Meliſſus meant, that the ſame complexion which diſpoſes a man to Poetry, diſpoſes him to love. This propoſition is not eaſy to be made out; for beſides that there are many perſons, who have a talent at Poetry without being of an amorous conſtitution, it is certain there are innumerable people who cannot make a verſe, and yet are more furiouſly tormented with the fire of love than thoſe whoſe poems are the moſt amorous. How many love-verſes are printed, which are only witty conceits? A Poet never ſo little touched, appropriates to himſelf whatever he finds in the moſt paſſionate elegies; he tries even to carry things higher than what he has read; he invents new turns, and ſtudies the moſt mournful characters. His deſign is to make his verſes admired; to exerciſe his vein upon thoughts, which at once give a reputation to his poetical wit, and flatter the object of his paſſion. There are even ſome who are free from love, when they compoſe this kind of verſes. Beza was one of them. ‘ Iſtos bonos viros non pudet quicquid de poeticæ Candidæ amoribus luſi, (luſi autem certè pleraque, veteres illos imitatus, priuſquam etiam per ætatem, quid iſtud rei eſſet intelligerem) ad caſtiſſimam & lectiſſimam, fœminam accommodare. Id autem non aliter ſe habere quàm dico, non ii tantum teſtari poſſunt quibuſcum per id tempus vixi, verum etiam res ipſa declarat: quum nullos unquam liberos ex uxore ſuſceperim, in meis autem illis carminibus, Candidam pregnantem ſuperis commendem: quod tum mihi nimirum illud fictitium argumentum, ut alia ſubinde multa, occurreret (19). ——— Thoſe good men are not aſhamed to apply to a moſt chaſt and excellent woman, what I have ludicrouſly written on Candida; for certainly I ſaid moſt of thoſe things in jeſt, and in imitation of the antients, being at that time ſo young, as not to know what the thing meant. That what I ſay is really true, I can not only prove by the teſtimony of thoſe with whom I lived at that time; but I can appeal to thoſe very verſes, for the thing ſpeaks itſelf. I never had any children by my wife, and yet in theſe verſes I recommend the pregnant Candida to the favour of heaven, becauſe that fictitious ſubject then ſtruck my mind as many others have done at other times.’ You have in theſe laſt words an inſtance of the conduct of Poets; they give themſelves imaginary ſubjects, that they may have an opportunity of ſaying witty things. But let us come to Lotichius's apology.

He had four miſtreſſes ſucceſſively; for whom he made a great many verſes (20): he never propoſed, as they ſay, to obtain any criminal favours from them, but it is only from himſelf, a witneſs in his own cauſe, that we know this. ‘ Non fecit id non honeſte, quia & caſte amavit Lotichius & ſine crimine ac ſcelere: ſi modo caſtiſſimi Poetæ verbis verſibuſque dignamur aliquam habere non dubiam fidem, ſic etenim ipſemet de amoribus ſuis canit, & Claudia ſua.

‘ There was nothing of diſhoneſty in this, for Lotichius loved chaſtly, and without crime or guilt, if we allow the words and verſes of a moſt chaſt Poet credit, when they are expreſs, for thus himſelf writes of his paſſion, and of his Claudia.

My boſom burns with no diſhoneſt love,
But happily a virtuous paſſion prove.

The apologiſt obſerves, that the privileges of Poetry allowed Lotichius to exerciſe his muſe upon earthly beauties, it being an art which is exerciſed in the contemplation, and explication of all that is beautiful in the univerſe. ‘ Fecit Lotichius id primum jure poetices optimo, ad quam ſcilicet rerum omnium pulcherrimarum quæ magna hac univerſitate orbis continentur, cœleſtium terreſtriumque ſpectabilium formarum contemplatio, commentatioque rite pertinet.’ Moreover, as he was civil and polite, he applied himſelf to write love-verſes, and would not deprive himſelf of this piece of galantry, which alſo was uſeful towards poliſhing his muſe. ‘ Ex quo illud ſaltem conſecutus eſt commodi, ut molles amores cantando mollius carmen deduceret.’ In fine, he wanted this agreeable diverſion to baniſh the melancholy thoughts with which he was diſturbed (22).

[G] The fourth elegy of the ſecond book . . . . . turns upon a dream, which ſeems to be a prediction of the ſacking of Magdeburg.] That is, of the dreadful ſacking which this town ſuffered in 1631, being taken by the Imperial forces. Mr Morhof has made the following obſervation. ‘ Illud ſingulare in hoc viro & propemodum divinum eſt, ac plus quam Poeticum ἐνϑουσιασμὸν arguit, quod in Elegia 4. lib. 2. ad Joachimum Camerarium ſcriptâ triſtiſſima obſidionis & expugnationis Magdeburgenſis fata integro ſeculo prædixerit. Res omnino notatu digna, ac elegia illa pulcherrima eſt. Hæc ille aurea carmina, quod mireris, inter armorum ſtrepitus ipſe miles ſcribebat (23). ——— This was certainly ſingular in the man of whom we are ſpeaking, and ſhews ſomething in him divine, at leaſt far beyond a poetic enthuſiaſm, that in the fourth elegy of his ſecond book, addreſſed to Joachim Camerarius, he predicted the unfortunate ſiege and hapleſs taking of Magdeburg, a whole age before it came to paſs. A thing juſtly deſerving notice, the elegy it ſelf being alſo very beautiful. Theſe golden verſes he compoſed while a ſoldier, and incommoded with the din of arms which is alſo ſomewhat ſtrange.’ Lotichius in a dream ſaw a great town beſieged, and a young woman, who called herſelf the protectreſs of the place, complaining of the cruelties that ſhould lay it waſte, and reduce it to a heap of yet are rather conjectures, than an explication which fully ſatisfies me. of aſhes. He does not name this town, nor know whether it was upon the Rhine, or the Danube, or the Elbe, but he believes it was upon the Elbe. However, he muſt have characteriſed Magdeburg, ſince this elegy is intituled, De obſidione urbis Magdeburgenſis. There is doubtleſs ſomething ſurpriſing in this, though it muſt be owned, that the condition the Poet was then in, diminiſhes the wonder. He was in the army of the league of Smalcald (24), probably rather expecting the good ſucceſſes of Charles V, than thoſe of that league. His imagination extended itſelf to all the poſſible conſequences of Charles the fifth's victory (25). Perhaps this ſuppoſition might have intermixed with his dream, that the emperor would ſeverely chaſtiſe Magdeburg, if the confederate army was beaten. The Poet immediately prepared to deplore the miſeries of a ſtormed town; and one of his fictions was, that the tutelar goddeſs makes her complaints, &c (26). When we awake, we eaſily confound the images, becauſe we forget their order: thoſe eſcape us which were the bond of connexion; and hence we imagine, that the ideas, which we ourſelves have linked to one another, came all at once by inſpiration. It is almoſt as eaſy to form ſyſtems about general affairs ſleeping as waking; abundance of people having read great news in a Gazette, draw an admirable plan of the conſequences it will produce. In a quarter of an hour, they conduct the victors to the capital city of the vanquiſhed; they fancy to themſelves thrones overturned, and all Europe changing it's face at once; and if they are Poets or Orators, they add to all this the ſketches of a fine poem, or of an eloquent oration; they have the figures ready in their heads, and repreſent to themſelves the very mien and words of the deputies, who come to deliver up the keys of the towns. We may be certain, that at every hour of the day, ſuch things as theſe are rolling in ſome peoples brains: the ſoul, when they ſleep, is no leſs exerciſed with reſpect to theſe chimeras; it draws imaginary ſchemes. Such was perhaps the caſe of Lotichius that night. I have given the reaſon why, when he awaked, he could not perceive that he was the author of this train of viſions, as they who build caſtles in the air whilſt awake, know and perceive themſelves to be the true authors of them, without the aſſiſtance of any foreign intelligence ſtriking in with them to reveal futurities; which is alſo the reaſon why they draw no preſages from them.

This is an obſervation that might be made upon admitting Mr Morhof's ſuppoſition, namely, that Lotichius had this dream before the battle of Mulberg, in which the confederate army was beaten by Charles V. But this ſuppoſition having no foundation, I ſhall chuſe rather to ſay, that Lotichius dreamed thus, during the ſiege of Magdeburg, in the year 1550, or 1551. It was eaſy to imagine that Maurice, elector of Saxony, who commanded the ſiege for the emperor, would take the town, and treat it cruelly. Lotichius poſſeſſed with this fear, imagined the ſacking of the town in a dream, and fell into poetic fictions. He failed not to introduce the tutelar goddeſs, who made proteſtations of her innocence and fidelity, tho' the emperor expelled her from her habitation, &c. The next day he found this ſubject ſo fit to be handled in verſe, that he made an elegy upon it, which he himſelf intituled, De obſidione urbis Magdeburgenſis. I believe indeed, he imagined there was ſomething prophetical in this dream, which proceeded from his not remembering the beginning of it, and not knowing that he had tacked all theſe viſions himſelf, as the newſmongers do theirs, in ſtarting all the conſequences they are pleaſed to ſuppoſe to ſieges and battles (27). Now as the ſiege of Magdeburg, was terminated, not by taking of the town, but by a treaty of peace, Lotichius doubtleſs undeceived himſelf; he diſcovered the falſity of his dreams, but his verſes were preſerved and publiſhed after his death. But who knows whether he did not feign that he dreamed this? Do not poets daily give themſelves this liberty? after having well conſidered this, I think it more probable, that he did not dream what he related; but, like other poets, feigned he dreamed thus.

Since the firſt edition of this work, I have been informed by a letter from Mr Kortholt (28), of ſome particulars, which oblige me to conſider this matter over again. In the firſt place, it is certain, that the elegy De obſidione urbis Magdeburgenſis, is not found in the collection of poems, which Lotichius cauſed to be printed at Paris by Vaſcoſan, the epiſtle dedicatory whereof, is dated from Paris the thirteenth of February 1551. If he dated it according to the ſtile at that time received in France, it was in February 1552. He knew then, that the town of Magdeburg was no longer in fear; being delivered from the ſiege by a treaty of peace in November 1551 (29). If he dated it beginning the year with January, the ſiege of Magdeburg ſtill continued, and was far from being ended. Whatever ſtile he made uſe of, it is plain, he ought not to have publiſhed the poem in diſpute at that time; the elegy, I ſay, in which he is ſuppoſed to ſpeak of the ſacking and burning of Magdeburg; and though we ſhould be certain, that he had already compoſed it, we ſhould yet believe he would have been very cautious of inſerting it in the edition of his Latin poems. In the ſecond place, Mr Kortholt, who underſtands poetry very well, and who has collated the ſeveral editions of Lotichius's poems, finds a great difference betwixt that of Paris 1551, and thoſe that followed the death of the author. He finds Lotichius but a mean Poet in the Paris edition of his poems (30), compared to what they are after they had been corrected, and in compariſon of the new poems added to Camerarius's edition. In a word, he finds, that Lotichius in 1551, was not capable of compoſing ſo excellent an elegy as that de Obſidione Urbis Magdeburgenſis. We muſt conclude then, that it was made when this town was out of danger, and therefore the dream that threatned it with an entire deſtruction, cannot be explained by the hypotheſis I have alledged. It is a matter which has relation to the time to come, and conſequently to the ſacking of Magdeburg in 1631, as Mr Morhof pretends. To this I have two replies to make.

I. Firſt I ſay, that whether Lotichius writ this elegy whilſt he bore arms, or compoſed it during the ſiege of Magdeburg, and that either in conſequence of a dream, or under the fiction of a pretended dream, he ought not to have inſerted it amongſt the pieces which he publiſhed at Paris in 1551. I have given the reaſons for this already. But he was not obliged to burn it; he therefore probably preſerved it, and having afterwards given it ſome new touches, and poliſhed it over and over, he worked it to that perfection which he was not able to give it when his poems were firſt printed. Age, ſtudy, and labour, had improved his muſe; he changed into an excellent elegy, what at firſt was but an indifferent poem. It was found among his papers after his death as he had perfected it by his corrections, and it was ſent to his friend Camerarius to be printed with his other writings (31). Theſe are very probable conjectures, and therefore thoſe I propoſed in my firſt edition, loſe nothing of their due weight. Poets, naturally fond of their own works, would not willingly deſtroy what they have once writ; but carefully preſerve it, even when the occaſion is paſſed; eſpecially when they perſuade themſelves, that they have treated a ſubject well, and that it was very capable of ornaments. Mr Menage having heard that Mr Corneille was dead, compoſed an epitaph for him, which he thought a good one, and would not loſe the public honour of it, even after he knew that Mr Corneille was not dead. He preſerved this piece ſo carefully, as to inſert it in the editions of his poems, and even after his enemy Cotin had ſeverely rallied him for it. Here follows his raillery, which I believe contains a falſe ſuppoſition; for I am perſuaded, the news of Mr Corneille's death was actually ſpread abroad. It is above ten years ago, ſays Cotin (32), ſince Menage made Corneille's epitaph, though Corneille be not yet dead, having collected out of the Greek and Latin poets, abundance of thoughts upon the death of a great Poet, he killed his good friend to exhauſt his common place, he made him die of a Peripneumony. Let it be obſerved, that the ſubject of Lotichius's elegy was very proper to inſpire the author with compaſſion; it is favourable to the poetic art, and therefore the preſervation of Magdeburg was not likely to make him ſuppreſs that piece of poetry.

II. But let us grant, that Lotichius had written nothing like this, when this great town was out of trouble, and the peace of Paſſau had ſecured the Proteſtants ſtrange, that Julius Cæſar Scaliger ſhould no where praiſe Lotichius [H]. We ſhould have more reaſon to wonder at it, had not Lotichius's reputation been chiefly founded upon the works that were not printed till after Scaliger's death; but this critic's ſilence is not ſurprizing, ſince the firſt editions of Lotichius's poems (f) are much inferior to that which it was impoſſible for him to have any knowledge of (g).

teſtants of Germany; yet muſt we however in the ſecond place ſay, that the dream of the author has nothing extraordinary in it. We muſt remember one thing, which cannot well be called into queſtion, which is, that Poets frequently work upon ſubjects of pure invention; they deſcribe ſhipwrecks which they have not ſeen, and which never were; they feign, as they think fit, times, places, conſequences, and incidents. They do the ſame with reſpect to the taking of towns. Theſe are ſubjects, which can exerciſe their talents to advantage; they make choice of them, not only when they are awake, but alſo when they ſleep. If their nocturnal viſions lead them to a beſieged town, they fancy a general aſſault, the beſieged forced to give ground; the town carried, plundered, burnt &c. If it be a town, which they are greatly concerned for, their poetical fancy is heated; they deplore the misfortune, they form the draught of a poem; and when wearied with the dream, they awake, and know not whether it be a natural, or an extraordinary one; however they take pen in hand, and give a poetical deſcription of the viſion. It ſometimes happens, that they have ſuch ſort of viſions, only becauſe the day before, they had meditated upon the deſcription of the ſacking of a town. Experience informs us, that thoſe objects which poſſeſs our thoughts in the day time, commonly preſent themſelves to our minds the night following, and there are thoſe who ſooner light on a fine turn of poetic thought, whilſt they ſleep, than when they are awake. Their dreams are vehement, and move and agitate the ſpirits with a prodigious force. They find themſelves, as they awake, in a commotion which aſtoniſhes them, they perceive ſomething wonderful in it, which they think deſerves cultivating, and immediately fall to verſifying. If you examine all theſe things well, you will find a foundation for conjectures upon the natural cauſes of Lotichius's elegy. Apply to this what Lucretius ſays,

Et quo quiſque fere ſtudio devinctus adhæret,
Aut quibus in rebus multum ſumus ante morati
Atque in qua ratione fuit contenta magis mens,
In ſomnis eadem plerumque videmur obire:
Cauſidici cauſas agere, &c. . . . . (33).

Whatever moſt employs our waking thought,
Back to the mind in midnight dreams is brought.
Then Lawyers plead . . . . .

Le us go on with our conjectures. There are few who have not obſerved, that they have often dreamed of the ſame thing; as that they were attacked by robbers, that lightning fell into their chamber, that a mutiny happened in a town, &c. The return of the ſame dreams is more common, when the objects make a lively impreſſion, and when the conſtitution of the brain gives way to their making well-purſued and deep-printed tracks. It is probable, that during the ſiege of Magdeburg, Lotichius had a dream that repreſented the ſacking this town, and, purſuant to it, fell to making verſes the next day, or a few days after. If the town had been taken and ſacked, he had publiſhed them doubtleſs at the ſame time; but hearing in his travels the news of the peace, he laid by his poem. We may ſuppoſe at three or four years end, the ſame dream returned; the traces it had left the firſt time, formed a channel, the mouth of which was open'd by the tumultuous and irregular agitation of the animal ſpirits; but this irregularity hindered not their running along the ſame tracks; and thus the view of the ſacking of Magdeburg was renewed. Lotichius thinking it perhaps myſterious, new-poliſhed his verſes, amplified them, and put them in the condition in which the public has ſeen them. I do not know but he might have been afraid, from his love for Magdeburg, that this new dream was prophetical and ſupernatural; but, in my opinion, he ought not to have thought it more ſo now than at the firſt time, where, according to the uſual courſe of dreams, he might fancy the burning of a town which was actually beſieged. Should a Poet, out of a witty conceit, make an elegy at this time, reſembling that of Lotichius, it might well enough happen before eighty years come about, that the town he ſung of to divert himſelf, may be bombarded and ruined.

[H] It was thought ſtrange that Julius Cæſar Scaliger has not praiſed Lotichius.] You will find at the end of the text to this article, the reaſons why we are not to wonder at Scaliger's ſilence. However, let us hear Mr Morhof's complaint. ‘Fuit Phœnix Poetarum Germaniæ Lotichius, omnibus exteris ſi non ſuperior, certe æqualis. Hujus tamen vel ipſis Germanis pene ignotum nomen eſt: exteri nullam ejus mentionem faciunt. J. C. Scaliger cum cenſuram Poëtarum Germanorum inſtituit in Hypercritico ſuo ne verbulum quidem de hoc noſtro, qui tamen omnibus cæteris erat anteferendus (34). —— Lotichius was the Phœnix of the German Poets, and as to the foreign ones, if he does not excel them all, he is at the leaſt equal to any. Yet the Germans themſelves ſcarce know any thing of him; ſtrangers have never mentioned him. Julius Cæſar Scaliger, in the cenſure of the German Poets, contained in his Hypercitic, ſays not one word of our author, notwithſtanding that he ought to have been preferred to them all.’

LOTICHIUS (CHRISTIAN) younger brother to the preceding, diſcovered in his infancy no leſs diſpoſitions to ſtudy, than he. Therefore his uncle, the abbot, having firſt cauſed him to be diligently inſtructed in his ſchool of Solitar, ſent him afterwards to Wittemberg, to ſtudy Philoſophy there, and eſpecially Divinity. It was not in this univerſity, but in that of Heidelberg that he took his maſter of arts degree in 1549, after which his uncle gave him the charge of his church and college. Whilſt he was thus Vicar to the abbey, he was deſired by ſeveral learned men, to collect all the poems of Lotichius Secundus, and publiſh them, with an exact hiſtory of the life and ſtudies of this illuſtrious brother. He was working upon it, when the death of the abbot Lotichius, his uncle, interrupted that work in 1567. It was in his power to ſucceed him in his abbey; for they who had the right to elect, declared for him; but he rather choſe to reſign his pretenſions to his brother in-law Sigefridus Hettenus, miniſter of the church of Groningen. He could not have long enjoyed the dignity of abbot, if he had accepted it, for he died in 1568. He made verſes with pretty good ſucceſs. A collection of his poems was printed in 1602 (a), by the care of John Peter Lotichius, his grandſon, who joined them with his own. I have not found in Freherus, who furniſhes me with this article, that the poems of Lotichius Secundus, and our Chriſtian Lotichius were ever printed together (b).

LOTICHIUS (John Peter), grandſon to the former, made himſelf known by a great number of books which he publiſhed both in verſe and proſe. He was a Phyſician by profeſſion, and well verſed in Human Literature. The commentary upon Petronius, which he publiſhed at Frankfort in 1629, anſwers theſe two qualities [A]. The reward he received for the dedication of his epigrams, was very ſlender [B]. He was invited to Rintell, to be profeſſor of Phyſic (a).

[A] The commentary which he publiſhed on Petronius anſwers theſe two qualities.] For he there explains by itſelf, whatever is in Petronius, relating to Phyſic; and afterwards, in another part, gives critical and philoſophical notes upon the ſame author. He appears to have more reading, and memory, than penetration and judgment. See what an opinion Goldaſt had of this commentary: ‘Mitto tibi Lotichii commentaria in Petronium cum aliorum notis . . . . vides quantum abs tuo inſtituto ac judicio Lotichius diſſideat. Volebam hominem amicum hac occaſione ad lectionem veterum Medicorum deducere, quorum illum prorſus expertem & negligentem eſſe advertebam. Sed judicio deſtitutus nec in bonis auctoribus verſatus, nobis undiquaque compilavit quæ ad grandiendum librum convaſare ex Cornucopia, Calepino, Textoris officina, Eraſmi Chiliadibus & conſimilibus ſcriptis poterat, ut tandem monſtroſum, horrendum, & inſanum magnum iſtud commentum pareret. Adeo ſibi philautia placet, ut etiam ſordes ſuas putet mera olere cinnama (1). ——— I ſend you Lotichius's commentary on Petronius, with the notes of others . . . . You ſee how far Lotichius falls below you in knowledge, and judgment; I would have adviſed this man, as a friend, to take this occaſion to make himſelf acquainted with the ancient Phyſicians, becauſe to me he appears to have been very negligent in that reſpect; but wanting judgment, and being not at all verſed in good authors, he raked together whatever might fill his book, from the Cornucopia, Calepine, Textor's Officina, the Chiliads of Eraſmus, and ſuch like authors, by which means his commentary is rendred of a monſtrous and frightful ſize. In fine, he is ſo full of himſelf that he thinks nothing nauſeous can come from him.’ This judgment is very ſevere, but I think it more reaſonable than that of Guy Patin, and I admire that a man, who was incomparably more inclined to deſpiſe authors than eſteem them, ſhould ſpeak ſo much to the advantage of this commentary on Petronius. ‘Lotichius, formerly a Phyſician, and at preſent a Hiſtoriographer, has wrote two volumes in folio, Rerum Germanicarum, and perhaps the third is alſo printed; if you have them, ſend them to me. Let me know likewiſe if he has reprinted his Petronius, in folio, much enlarged, as he deſigned long ago. This laſt is an excellent book, and the author a very learned man. He had deſigned to have reprinted it here, with all his additions, in folio; but I anſwered him it was impoſſible, there being too many Monks, Jeſuits, and others, enemies to good letters in this place, who would think that they had merited heaven if they had hindered ſuch an impreſſion (2).

[B] The reward he received for the dedication of his epigrams was very ſlender.] He not only dedicated them to Maurice, landgrave of Heſſe, but alſo gave him a copy of them with his own hand. The prince thanked him by an epigram (3), and that was all the preſent he made him. This was imitating a great emperor (4). He who furniſhes me with this particular, ſays alſo, that he dedicated a great number of books to princes and republics, without ever getting a penny for them.

LOUDUN, in the upper Poictou [A], in the confines of Anjou and Touraine, and the dioceſe of Poitiers, is a very antient town, though we muſt not give too much credit to the opinion of the common people, who aſcribe the founding of it to Julius Cæſar (a). It became conſiderable in the civil wars of the XVIth century [B], as well on account of its caſtle, which Lewis XIII demoliſhed in 1633 (b), as for its ſituation. The duke of Anjou in vain attempted to make himſelf maſter of it in 1569 (c), but the king of Navarre reduced it twenty years after with the greateſt eaſe (d). There are ſeveral convents in it: that of the Carmelites is the rendezvous of ſeveral devout perſons, who go thither on pilgrimages to our Lady of Recouvrance (e). That of the Urſulines became extreamly famous, when, in 1633 and 1634, there was ſo much talk of the poſſeſſion of ſeveral of theſe Nuns [C]. The Proteſtants about this time loſt the college

[A] In the upper Poictou.] Coulon, in the index of his book of the rivers of France, places Loudun in Touraine. Mr de Marolles is in the ſame error, when he ſays (1) that Loudun is part of Touraine, tho' the Loudunois be in the dioceſe of Poitiers. He ought to have ſaid, that Loudun was alſo in this dioceſe. The truth of the matter is, that the election of Loudun depends on the generality of Tours.

[B] It became conſiderable in the civil wars of the XVIth century.] Here is a little ſtory that does honour to this town: d'Aubigné relates (2), that in 1569, Pluviaut, at the head of a company of ſixty lances, being in ſight of Anville, where the duke of Anjou was quartered, ‘ſaw eighty horſemen come forth, who were the braveſt of the court, as the Guiſes, Briſſac, Pompadour, Fervaques, Lanſſac, Jerſſai, Fontaine, and others. He reſolutely ſtood them, the fight was obſtinate, and twice renewed; but not one of Pluviaut's men quitted his poſt. D'Andelot appearing with twelve troops of horſe, obliged the courtiers to retire, leaving two of their men dead upon the ſpot, and carrying off ſeveral wounded. They had a mind to know who they were that they had fought with. La Curée-Jerſaut, who with Clermond, la Barbée, and other bold adventurers, gloried in following this captain on extraordinary occaſions; inſtead of naming theſe gentlemen, anſwered, it was the company of Pluviaud; and Lanſſac replying, What the Sieurs of Loudun? moſt of them being of this place, and of quality. The duke of Guiſe cried out, Let us change this diſcourſe, they are all true gentlemen.’

[C] The poſſeſſion of ſeveral Nuns of Loudun.] I have ſpoke amply of them in another place (3); but I did not then know a thing which I have read a few days ago, and which I ſhall mention, after having occaſionally taken notice of a fault of Father Labbe. He ſays (4), that in 1566, ‘the poſſeſſed Nuns of Loudun, ſo famous, was diſpoſſeſſed by the holy Euchariſt, in preſence of above ten thouſand men, and among others, of Florimond de Remond, who ſoon after, of a Huguenot became a Catholic.’ Inſtead of Loudun, he ſhould have ſaid Laon, which is an epiſcopal town in Picardy: it was there that Florimond de Remond ſaw this famous poſſeſſed perſon, as he relates in two places of his works (5). Spondanus (6) relates this fact, and uſes the word Laudunum, which probably led Father Labbe to believe, that this adventure happened at Loudun. Mr Moreri has committed the ſame fault in the article of FLORIMOND DE REMOND.

It is affirmed in Mr d'Artagnan's Memoirs, that Grandier was one of cardinal Richelieu's unhappy Victims. ‘Some body had perſuaded him that Grandier was a Sorcerer, and had poſſeſſed the Nuns of Loudun with a legion of devils. Upon this accuſation the Sieur de Lauberdamont, at the head of his delegates, againſt the opinion of a great many of his judges, had him condemned to be burnt alive. He frankly told them, to oblige them to ſubſcribe to ſo unjuſt college which they had there [D]. The laſt national ſynod was held in this Town, from the tenth of November, 1659, to the tenth of January, 1660. Loudun has been the birth-place of ſeveral learned men, as Salmon Macrinus, Scevola Sammarthanus, Julius Cæſar Bulengerus, Iſmael Bulialdus, Urbanus Chevreau, &c. Some call it Juliodunum in Latin; but that is not it's true name [E]. The Geographer du Val (f) was in the wrong, to ſay, That it has the title of a duchy; if he had conſulted Moreri, he would not have expreſſed himſelf in the preſent tenſe. That lady of the family of Rohan, in whoſe favour Moreri ſays, the duchy was erected, is the lady de la Garnache, of whom I have ſpoken in her place.

‘ unjuſt a ſentence, that if they oppoſed it ſo vigorouſly as men of honour ought to do, they ſhould have commiſſaries appointed to try them, who would ſoon convict them of being accomplices in his witchcrafts, ſince he was no more a Sorcerer than they might be. He was much more in the right in talking to them after this manner, than in reſolving to put an innocent man to death. All poor Grandier's crime was his debauching theſe Nuns; and if he had poſſeſſed their bodies with any devil, it could be no other than that of impunity (7). Now as theſe judges had been to ſee theſe Nuns as well as he, and might as eaſily have lain with them, for they were very far from being veſtals, they heſitated for ſome time what they had beſt do; but being at laſt prevailed upon, they choſe to ſhew themſelves unjuſt in condemning an innocent perſon, rather than put themſelves in his place by endeavouring to ſave him; for after all, they might have been accuſed of Sorcery as well as he, and no one knows what might have happened, his eminence being abſolute as he was (8).’ I am far from warranting the truth of this, nor can I perſuade myſelf that Laubardemont ſpoke thus to the judges. He was a wicked man, you will tell me; tranſeat, be it ſo; but that had not ſufficed cardinal Richelieu, he muſt have had ſenſe and addreſs beſides; but what can be more improbable than to ſay, that a preſident of a commiſſion is ingenious in wickedneſs, and yet ſpeaks as this man is made to ſpeak in d'Artagnan's Memoirs. This, in my opinion, is foiſted in, either by him who has put theſe Memoirs in order, or rather by the corrector of the preſs (9). Be it how it will, Mr d'Artagnan would give no great credit to the ſtory; for at the time of this poſſeſſion at Loudun, the figure he made, and the places he frequented, could only afford him the moſt uncertain and popular reports in this matter. But let us not loſe time in apologizing for ſo brave a man as he was. He does not want it: the Memoirs that have been publiſhed under his name are ſuppoſititious from the beginning to the end; they come from the ſame author who publiſhed the Memoirs of Mr L. C. D. R. of which I ſhall ſpeak in another place (10).

A CONFIRMATION of what has been ſaid of a pretended apparition of the confeſſor of the nuns of Loudun.

I have in another place (11) ſaid a thing that ſeemed incredible to ſome people, which is, that the prieſt Grandier might have appeared in the chamber of a Nun, as a ſpectre reſembling the deceaſed confeſſor of the Urſulines, I muſt now add a word or two, to make my opinion more credible. Nothing can be more proper for my purpoſe, than the abjuration made at Rome within theſe two years (12), by a bare-footed Auguſtine-Frier, who had been guilty of Molinoſiſm. He was convicted of having deceived Father Benignus by counterfeit revelations: he endeavoured to perſuade him, that the things he had told him on ſeveral occaſions, were true and holy, and that he was a ſaint greater than any in heaven. For this he referred himſelf to the teſtimony of St Gaetan, and ſhewed himſelf to Father Benignus, in the figure of this ſaint. He alſo contrived falſe apparitions of the Holy Virgin, and made uſe of artificial illuminations, and many changes in the tone of his voice. Let us ſet down the words of his abjuration: ‘ Confeſſaſti che le Viſioni ſuccedenti erano opere tue, e parimente le Revelationi del Padre Benigno, mentre tu gl' appariſti con l'habito di S. Gaetano, con un belliſſimo e candidiſſimo giglio in mano, e barba poſticcia. Il tutto faceſti e operaſti per far gli credere che le coſe dette da te in piu e diverſi occaſioni erano veridiche e ſante, e che tu eri un ſanto maggior di tutti i ſanti che ſtanno in cielo. Faceſti apparire la Beatiſſima Vergine à forza di lume contraſacendo la voce hora in un modo, e hora nell' altro, e per queſti tuoi e altri miſteri il ſudetto Padre Benigno credeva fermamente a queſte tue viſioni, e viſitationi celeſti, e che dio non le concedeva ſe non a te puramente.’ Dr Silveſtre (13) returning from Rome, communicated to me a manuſcript copy of the act of the Inquiſition, in which are theſe words; it is intituled, Riſtretto de l'Abjura ſemipublica ſeguita nel' ſant' Officio in perſona di Fra Pietro Paulo di S. Gio: Evangeliſta Romano al Sacello di Caſa Graniſi, in eta d'anni quaranta, inquiſito altre volte nella Cita di Napoli, e in quella di Spoleti. I paſs over the infamies this Monk was convicted of as a Quietiſt, and the abominable impurities he confeſſed he had committed with his female votaries. They make one's hair ſtand an end, and ſhew at the ſame time, that ſince the Inquiſition was ſatisfied with condemning a bare-footed Auguſtine Frier, only to perpetual impriſonment, it ought to be acknowledged, on ſome occaſions, a tribunal of extraordinary clemency and gentleneſs. But leaving theſe reflexions, I content myſelf to ſay, that by facts undoubted and judicially atteſted, we know that the ſecret of repreſenting the dead, and counterfeiting apparitions of the Holy Virgin, is a thing known and practiſed in the monaſteries. Why then ſhould we deny that the curate of Loudun appeared to a Nun, as her deceaſed confeſſor? I could never perſuade myſelf, that all the ſtories of the apparitions of the Holy Virgin, with which abundance of books are ſtuffed, are either fictions or meer illuſions; there is a great deal of reality in theſe ſtories. The impoſtors perſonally enter the chambers, and actually pronounce words in what name and figure they pleaſe: vapours and fits of the mother, do not make the Nuns ſee and hear this or that. Their ſenſes are really affected by the objects; all the deception conſiſts in their attributing to the divine favour, what only depends on human artifice. The engaſtrimythes, thoſe who ſpeak from their bellies, and who ſo well manage the air in their lungs, that their voice ſeems to proceed from a cave or a garret, are very fit for theſe little myſteries; they are very ſerviceable people; and by their means many are made to believe, that the dead ſuffer much in purgatory, and come to deſire their heirs to cauſe maſſes to be ſaid for them. Obſerve the exceptions which I mention in the marginal note (14).

[D] The preſidents loſt the college which they had there.] The Hiſtorian of the Edict of Nantes relates (15), That the Reformed of Loudun had loſt their college in the year 1635, and that Laubardemont had lodged the pretended poſſeſſed Nuns there. After that they were never able to get their poſſeſſions reſtored, nor to recover the money it had coſt them. But the court being at Loudun, in 1650, they applied themſelves to the preſident Molé, who was then keeper of the ſeals. The reſult was, that at the deſire of the queen, they were contented with a ſum much below the price of their college, which was offered them in the name of the Urſulines. This ſum pretty nearly equalled the fourth part of the value of the buildings, and was not one half of the intereſt. See in the ſame author (16), the treachery made uſe of to endeavour to deprive them of the exerciſe of their religion.

[E] Some call it in Latin Juliodunum (§ α), but that is not it's true name.] Mr Valois the younger, ſays (17) that Macrinus and Scevola Sammarthanus, were the firſt, or two of the firſt, who by a poetical licence called Loudun Juliodunum, to make their country participate in the glory of Julius Cæſar. According to him, it's name is Caſtrum Lanſdunum, that of Loſdunum is later. Some have alſo given it the name of Laucidunum, Laudunum, and Lodunum. William le Breton has given it this laſt name, in the eighth book of his Philipeis.

[(§ α) Fauchet, book iv, chap. xiv, of his Antiquities, thinks that Loudun might be a certain place of Touraine, which was, ſays he, antiently called Caſtrum Julicenſe. And he alſo obſerves, that this place was cal-

LOUET (GEORGE) a counſellor of the parliament of Paris, made a collection of arrets, which was printed at Paris after his death. Sieur de Rochemaillet took care of that edition in the year 1609 in 4to, and dedicated it to Anthony Seguier, who had given the manuſcript, and who was preſident of the parliament of Paris.

LOYER (PETER LE) counſeller in the preſidial court at Angers, was born in the village of Huillé, in Anjou, the twenty-fourth of November 1540 (a). He was one of the moſt learned men of his age [A], and at the ſame time one of the greateſt viſionaries that ever lived. He perfectly underſtood the Oriental tongues, but was ſo infatuated with Hebrew etymologies, that he made himſelf ridiculous [B]. He alſo pretended to find, in Homer, whatever he had a mind to [C]. He found in him the village of his birth, and his own name; and, for fear he ſhould be taxed with boaſting of an extraordinary knowledge, he declared it was the grace of God, that wrought in his mind all theſe wonderful effects. We ſee, in his book of Spectres, a prodigious reading; but, as learned as he was, and that with ſo great a mixture of madneſs, he was entirely unknown to Voſſius and Colomiés [D]. The latter has not inſerted him in [A] He was one of the moſt learned men of his age.] This is what Mr Menage ſays of him. ‘Erat quidem ‘Loerius Græcè, & Latinè, Hebraïcè, Arabicè, & ‘Chaldaïcè doctiſſimus, ſed Juris in quo verſabatur, ‘planè ignarus (1). —— Loyer was indeed moſt learned ‘in the Greek, Latin, Hebrew, Arabic, and Chaldee ‘tongues; but in Law, which was his profeſſion, quite ‘ignorant.’ There are abundance of people of this character: they are ignorant of nothing, but of what they ought to know beſt. A counſellor, as he was, ought to have underſtood the Law, and had nothing to do with Hebrew or Arabic; and yet he was ignorant in the Law, and deeply learned in the Oriental tongues. Let us go on with the praiſes Mr Menage has given him (2). ‘Excepting theſe viſions, Peter le Loyer ‘was a great man. He was one of the beſt read men ‘in the world, as his works declare, his Colonies, his ‘Spectres, his Paraphraſe on the Magnificat. He like‘wiſe had a taſte for the Belles Lettres. He wrote ‘Greek, Latin, and French verſes: when he ſtudied ‘the Law at Toulouſe, he carried the Eglantine gar‘land in the Floral games (3). He made a comedy in ‘French verſe, called La Néphélococugie, upon which ‘Ronſard made this ſtanza.

LOYER, ta docte Muſe n'erre
De batir une Ville en l'air,
Où les Cocus puiſſent voler:
Pour eux trop petite eſt la terre.

You build a town for cuckolds in the air,
'Cauſe earth's too little to contain 'em here.

[B] He was ſo infatuated with Hebrew etymologies, that he made himſelf ridiculous.] In his books of the ‘Idumean Colonies (4). . . . he derives from the He‘brew or Chaldee tongues, not only the names of the ‘cities of France, but even thoſe of the villages of ‘Anjou; of the hamlets, houſes, barns, fields, and ‘meadows. I ſhall therefore ſay, theſe are his words, ‘at pag. 217, that the village of Huillé (his birth-place) ‘is derived from Ahalé, or Oholé of Ezekiel, which is ‘Ada, or Gada, the wife of Eſau, and mother of Eli‘phaz. Near Huillé, about half a mile on the river ‘Loire, there is, on a hill, a little hamlet, called Baſſe‘tas, which I derive from Baſſemath, and Baſſemtis, ‘another wife of Eſau, and mother of Raguel, grand‘mother to Jerah, and great-grand-mother to Job (5).’ Mr Menage, having given three or four other inſtances of the ſame ſtamp, adds, ‘all the book is filled with ‘ſuch obſervations; which makes me boldly ſay, that ‘we are not much the worſe for the loſs of ten or ‘twelve volumes of other books of Colonies of the ſame ‘author (6).’ I do not know but Mr Bochart wiſhed that the loſs had been more general.

[C] He pretended to find, in Homer, whatever he had a mind to.] ‘(7) This Peter le Loyer found every ‘thing in Homer. He found in one ſingle verſe his ‘own Chriſtian name, the name of his family, the ‘name of the village where he was born, the name of ‘the province in which this village lay, and the name ‘of the kingdom which contained this province. In ‘a thing ſo incredible as this I ſpeak of, I am obliged ‘to give here his own words in his Idumean Colonies.’ “After this great prophecy, which is wholly owing to “me, Homer comes to ſpeak this verſe *, addreſſing “himſelf to Ulyſſes:

ἕκηλος.

“And no body, ſays Anticlea's ſhade to her ſon U“lyſſes, has yet thy (Loyer) reward, in all reſpects “happily repoſed; and what follows, which bears “another meaning. In all this long verſe you will “exactly find,

Πέτρος Λωέειος, Ἀνδένκαος, Γάλλος, Ὑλεὶν.

“That is to ſay, Peter Loyer, Angevin, Gaullois, “d'Huillé. There is neither more nor leſs in it; let “who will make the trial. This I offer to defend to “all that read me; and why ſhould not I defend what “is notoriouſly my own in Homer? there is no ſatiſ“faction in a thing, which is not one's own, or doubted “to be one's own. Now Homer attributes this verſe to “me, and by ſo doing he makes it mine, and not ano“ther's. And whatever way we turn this verſe in Ho“mer, it will ſtill be mine; and I can claim it for my “own. There are three letters, which remain in this “whole verſe, which perhaps may be ſaid to be ſuper“fluous, but they are not ſo. Theſe are the numeral “Greek letters, α, χ, κ, which denote the time when “the name ſhould be revealed, which is contained in “this verſe of Homer, to wit, the year of Chriſt 1620. “And what is there leſs ſuperfluous? Now this is ſuf“ficient, as to what concerns my ſelf; which I do not “relate for the glory I hope from it; but rather be“cauſe I cannot and ought not to be ſilent as to what “has been revealed to Homer concerning me. This “will ſerve moreover to ſtrengthen my work con“cerning the originals, migrations, and colonies of “people, which had been reſerved for me. Homer “in vain concealed the origin of many nations, under “the cover of fables; ſince there was to be one, in fu“ture ages, who ſhould diſcover what he had attempt“ed to conceal. I do not boaſt, for all this, to know “more than other men. But who will withſtand the “grace of God, co-operating in me? This is what Ho“mer diſcovered, even to the naming the little village “where I ſhould receive my birth, that I might not “glory in my weakneſs and meanneſs, but rather in “God, who makes me what I am, and renders me “ſo potent and vigorous, in that he comforts me “(8).” Nothing could be left out of this long paſſage, where every thing ſhews ſo learned and ſingular a madneſs.

[D] He was unknown to Voſſius.] I have read, in one of his letters (9) a conjecture, which fully diſcovers his ignorance in this point. He believes that Loerius de Spectris had been ſaid, inſtead of Lavaterus.

in his Gallia Orientalis. Peter le Loyer died at Angers, 1634, in the eighty fourth year of his age (§ α).

Gabriel Naudé, doing him juſtice, as to his reading and knowledge, openly laughs at his notion about Orpheus, the greateſt Sorcerer that ever lived, ſaid he, and the greateſt Necromancer, whoſe writings were only ſtuffed with the praiſes of devils, as particularly of Jupiter Alaſtor, the revenging and exterminating devil. See alſo the Chevræana, page 30. of the ſecond part.

I had forgot to ſay, that the verſes, which he made in his youth, did not preſage that he would be one day what he became. They did not threaten him with the fate of Poſtel and Cahier, learned men and fools (b). They were ſprightly, genteel, ingenious, and pleaſant [E], and by this one would have conjectured, that, if he applied himſelf diligently to learning, he would have acquired a literature polite and ſeaſoned with agreeableneſs, and not a moroſe pedantic knowledge. That kind of genius, which immediately inclines to ſport and toy with the Muſes, is generally a preſervative againſt the ill effects of too ſtrong an application to ſtudy. It ſpreads a politeneſs over the learning a man acquires, be it ever ſo profound, and prevents a great and extenſive reading from ſtifling and oppreſſing with it's weight natural vivacity and reaſon. Our Loyer was an exception to this general rule. He ſpoiled by his ſtudies the good fund of wit nature had given him, if Greek ſhook his brain, Hebrew compleated it's overthrow.

[E] The verſes he compoſed in his youth . . . . were ſprightly . . . . ingenious, and pleaſant.] The pieces, which we find in a book intituled (10) The Works and Poetical Miſcellanies of Peter le Loyer of Anjou. Together with the comedy Nephelococugy, or CLOUD OF CUCKOLDS, no leſs learned than facetious, are theſe: the Loves of Flora: ſome Odes: ſome Idylls: firſt and ſecond grove of the Art of Love: Sonnets political or miſcellaneous: the Dumb mad, a comedy: the comedy Nephelococugy: the Sports and Paſtimes of youth. There are ſome Greek and Latin poems in this collection, but not many. The Elegia Virginis vetulæ, fol. 250, is very diverting. The author dedicated his book to Mr de la Valette the younger (11), gentleman in ordinary of the king's bed-chamber: the Epiſtle Dedicatory is dated from Paris the ninth of September, 1578, and informs us, that it was the firſt time the author publiſhed his poems. Ayant pieça dans Tholoſe à la pourſuite de mes eſtudes . . . . in the printed copy, to a eſté de ce monde (12) incluſive; and again to (13) Et puis que celuy excluſive. . . . . Ainſi quelque temps, j'allay ſupprimant & cachant . . in the printed copy, to Le ſujet lequel y eſt excluſive.

I know not how to reconcile this either with La Croix du Maine (14), or with Du Verdier Vau-Privas, the one of whom affirms, that Peter le Loyer publiſhed, at Paris, in 1576, a work of his in French verſe, intituled, Erotopegnia, or Love's Paſs-time. The other, after having particularized the pieces contained in the collection above-mentioned, adds theſe words; he had before ſent into the world part of the ſaid compoſitions under the title of Erotopegme (15), or Love's Paſs-time, in 8vo, printed by Abel l'Angelier 1576 (16). If theſe two authors are not miſtaken, Peter le Loyer was very bold, or rather very impudent, ſince he dared to ſay, that he deferred the publication of his poems till 1578. Could he well imagine, that Mr de la Valette, a lover of Poetry, knew nothing of the edition of 1576? Du Verdier Vau-Privas has inſerted in his work (17) three ſonnets of Peter le Loyer, four epigrams, ſeveral tetraſtichs of the grove of the Art of Love, and ſeveral fragments of the Cloud of Cuckolds. Theſe fragments are portraits, in which the character of ſeveral ſorts of perſons is ſatirically repreſented. I am ſurprized he did not make choice of the epigram in the 121ſt leaf. The reader will excuſe me, if I recite it, ſince it is an imitation, or tranſlation, of the Latin verſes which I have cited in the article LYCURGUS (18).

Epigram on a lady unfortunate in a husband.

in the printed copy, to (19) alluſions, excluſive.

There are ſome coarſe expreſſions in the paſſage, which Du Verdier has taken from the Nephelococugy; but as inſupportable as they appear at preſent, they are honey in compariſon of ſeveral other paſſages of the ſame comedy, which are frightfully obſcene. Le Loyer juſtifies himſelf the beſt he can in his preface. He ſays, that his friends have aſſured him, that the learned and benevolent reader will eaſily excuſe a little polite ſmut mixed with learned and ſerious matters. . . . in the printed copy, to Comique (20) incluſive.

He confeſſes, that Plutarch . . . . . (in the book of the compariſon of Menander and Ariſtophanes) has compared the comedies of the latter to the wanton loves of a ſhameleſs harlot; but he appeals from this ſentence, and, after having ſpoken of the merit of Ariſtophanes, he goes on thus (21): If any Cato's will cenſure my book. . . . .
in the printed copy, to Continuant ainſi, excluſive.
To idcirco veniſti, citation (22), and in the margin.

Theſe excuſes do not juſtify his having followed to exceſs the cuſtom of his time. His comedy, which is full of invention, and ſeaſoned with a good deal of ſprightlineſs and wit (23), would without doubt be better, if there was leſs obſcenity in it, and if all the deſcriptions or portraits reſembled the following, in which there is nothing offenſive to chaſt ears:

Le cruel Mars eſmouvant les Courages
Aux fiers combats - - - - - -

The cruel mars rouzing their courages
To combats fierce.

in the printed copy, to (24) Or maintenant que, excluſive.

Note, that all the poems of du Loyer are very obſcene. He had a ſiſter who wrote four very ſenſible verſes, which ſhe prefixed to his poetical works:

Si vos amours ſont du tout vrayes,
Vous eſtes malheureux vray'ment,
Mais ſi elles ſont pures bayes,
Que ſert feindre tant de tourment?

If your amours are real quite,
In truth you are a wretched wight;
But if they're ſhams, and nothing more,
Why feign you pains, you never bore?

There it was that he writ his book of ſpiritual exerciſes [B]. Having embarked at Barcelona, for his voyage to Jeruſalem, he arrived at Cajeta in five days, and, being unwilling to continue his enterprize, without receiving the

[A] He imitated, as near as poſſible, the laws of antient chivalry.] One of the learnedeſt men of this age has jeſted upon this, in a manner worth the relating. ‘The firſt thing to be obſerved in him (1), ſays he (2), ‘is, that he was converted by reading the legends of ‘the ſaints, as Don Quixot was to knight-errantry, by ‘the reading of old romances . . . . . His countryman ‘was never more touched with the adventures of the ‘firſt knights, than Ignatius with the hiſtories of St ‘Dominic and St Francis *. For theſe were they, ‘which affected him moſt; and before he would take ‘a fixed reſolution of running through the world, as a ‘religious knight-errant, he repreſented to himſelf the ‘difficult adventures of theſe two illuſtrious heroes, ‘and found he had courage enough to undergo the like. ‘Thus in a fit of zeal †, he leaped one night out of ‘bed, and fell on his knees before the image of the bleſſed ‘Virgin, and in that poſture vowed himſelf her knight; ‘which is ſo conſiderable a circumſtance, that I wonder Maffæus has omitted it, together with the ſtrange ‘noiſe which was heard in the houſe, the rocking of ‘the chamber, and the clattering of all the glaſs-windows, which happened at that time; a ſure ſign, ‘ſays Orlandinus, that the devil bad him then farewel. ‘After this, the Virgin appeared to him, with great ‘glory, holding her ſon in her boſom, which ſo encouraged him in his firſt deſign, that, a little after he ‘took his journey to Monſerrat, a place of great devotion to the Virgin. In his journey thither, he ‘had like to have begun his firſt adventure by fighting with a Moor, who confeſſing, that the bleſſed ‘Virgin remained a Virgin, till her child-birth, denied, that ſhe continued ſo afterwards. For St Ignatius, reflecting whoſe knight he was, grew ſo enraged, that he thought himſelf abſolutely obliged to ‘revenge upon the Moor, the affront he had done his ‘miſtreſs; but conſidering a little what was beſt to be ‘done, and the Moor taking another road, he left the ‘affair to the judgment of his mule; and throwing ‘the bridle upon her neck, reſolved to be the death ‘of the offender, if at the firſt croſs-way ſhe took the ‘road which he had taken. The good mule, knowing full well her maſter's intention, turned out of the ‘great road, and took that of Monſerrat; where, as ‘ſoon as he was arrived, he performed a remarkable ‘ceremony, which was this. Ignatius, as Orlandinus ‘and Maffæus ⸸ expreſsly ſay, having read in books ‘of Chivalry, that the antient knights taking upon ‘them that honourable employ, were wont to watch ‘all night in their arms, thought himſelf obliged to ‘begin in the ſame manner: he hung up his ſword ‘and bayonet before the altar of the Virgin, put on ‘his accoutrements, and, inſtead of glittering armour, ‘took a long robe, of very coarſe cloth, girding it about him with a thick cord, to which he faſtened a ‘water bottle; inſtead of a lance, he took a plain ſtaff, ‘walking with an oſier ſhoe on one foot, and the other naked, without making uſe of a head-piece ‘that he might be expoſed to the injuries of the weather. Before he entered the town, he faſtened all his ‘veſtments, which he had procured by the way, to ‘the pummel of his ſaddle, ſays Maffæus ‡, for fear ‘the people ſhould think him in his right ſenſes, and ‘did not put them on, till he came to the place, ‘where, by the laws of Chivalry he was to watch, ‘thus accoutred. Being come to the appointed place, ‘he put them on, and watched, ſay they, ſometimes ‘ſtanding, and ſometimes on his knees, thus conſecrating himſelf, with all his might, to the ſervice of the ‘bleſſed Virgin. This done, he departed early in ‘the morning, which is a neceſſary circumſtance to ‘knight-errants, and came to Monreſa, where he ‘lodged in the hoſpital of the town, letting his hair ‘and nails grow, begging from door to door, faſting ‘always ſix days a week, diſciplining himſelf thrice a ‘day, being ſeven hours a day in vocal prayers and ‘ſleeping on the bare ground, the better to prepare ‘himſelf for all adventures in his expedition to Jeruſalem.’

[B] His book of Spiritual Exerciſes.] He compoſed it in Spain, in 1522, and publiſhed it at Rome in 1548, tranſlated into Latin by Andrew Fruſius, and with the approbation of Paul III. They, who wonder how he could read the lives of the ſaints, during the cure of his broken leg, foraſmuch as he had ſcarce learned his A. B. C. (3), may with much more reaſon wonder, how he could compoſe the book of exerciſes, in the time of his ignorance, did they not know, what Lewis du Ponte affirms, that God revealed theſe exerciſes, to St Ignatius, and that the holy Virgin helped him to compoſe them. ‘Refert Ludovicus de Ponte, vir omni exceptione Major, in vita P. Balthaſaris Alvarez, c. 43. fidâ traditione inde uſque à P. Jocobo Lainio, altero Societatis Jeſu Præpoſito Generali, acceptum haberi, ‘Deum hæc exercitia Sancto Patri Noſtro revelaſſe: ‘imo per Gabrielem Archangelum non nemini fuiſſe ‘à Deipara Virgine ſignificatum, ſe patronam eorum, ‘fundatricem, atque adjutricem fuiſſe, docuiſſeque Ignatium, ut ea ſic conciperet; quo nomine ſe huic operi dediſſe initium (4). ——— Lewis de Pont, a man ‘of unqueſtionable credit, relates, in the life of Balthaſar Alvarez, ch. 43, that it was handed down ‘by faithful tradition by Father James Lainez, the ‘other general of the order of Jeſus, that God revealed theſe exerciſes to our holy father; and that ‘the archangel Gabriel had ſignified to a certain ‘perſon from the Virgin Mother of God, that ſhe ‘had been their partoneſs, ſounder, and helper; and ‘that Ignatius had begun to compoſe them by her aſſiſtance.’ About an age after, an indictment of theft was publickly brought againſt the founder of the Jeſuits on occaſion of this work (5): it was maintained, that he was not the author of it. The accuſer was a Benedictin. This was an affront to Paul III, and to the congregation of rites; for this Pope expreſsly affirms the contrary in his approbation of the book; and when the cardinal Francis Mari del Monte reported, before Gregory XV, the proceedings of this congregation, with reſpect to the canonization of St Ignatius, he declared, that the book of Spiritual Exerciſes was the work of him whom they were about to canonize. The Benedictins, of the congregation of Monte Caſſino condemned, in a general aſſembly (6), the book, in which St Ignatius was accuſed of plagiariſm (7). Innocent X, put the matter out of doubt, as Father Southwell pretends: for this Pope inſerted, in the Roman breviary, a preciſe teſtimony, that Ignatius was author of the exerciſes. ‘Nunc extra omnem Controverſiam Catholicis certa eſſe debet (ea ‘res) poſtquam in Breviarium Romanum eſt relata ‘atque in lectionibus toti Eccleſiæ propoſitis auctoritate Innocentii X. the Pope's benediction, he came to Rome (d), from whence, after he had paid his reſpects to Hadrian VI, he took his way to Venice. Here he imbarked, the fourteenth of July 1523, and arrived at Joppa the laſt of Auguſt, and at Jeruſalem the fourth of September, the ſame year. Having ſatisfied, in this country, his devout curioſity, he returned to Venice, from whence he parted, to go on board at Genoa, in his return to Barcelona, where he fixed his abode for ſome time, as a moſt convenient place, for the deſign he had of ſtudying the Latin Tongue. I ſay nothing of the miraculous adventures of his voyage [C]; I ſhould never have done, ſhould I copy his hiſtorian on this head. He began the rudiments of Grammar in 1524, and finding, that the reading a book of Eraſmus cooled his devotion [D], he would no longer hear that writer mentioned;

‘man, without any learning, compoſed that admirable book of exerciſes, approved by the judgment of the Apoſtolic ſee, and by it's general uſefulneſs.’ Alexander VII confirmed the ſame thing by a brief of the twelfth of October, 1657, wherein he grants a plenary indulgence to all who ſhall make uſe of St Ignatius's ſpiritual exerciſes (9).

The two Bibliographers of the ſociety have not done the Benedictin the honour to name him; but we know from other hands, that he was called Conſtantinus Caetanus. He pretended, that a Benedictin, called Garcias Ciſneros, was the true author of the ſpiritual exerciſes, which have paſſed under the founder of the Jeſuits name, and that three monks of Monte Caſſino gave the ſame St Ignatius the book of conſtitutions of the ſociety of Jeſus, when he went to them, whilſt he was meditating the deſign of a new order. This Benedictin, who thus brings St Ignatius into the number of Plagiaries, backs his proof with the teſtimony of a famous Jeſuit, whoſe ſenſe he has miſtaken: for this Jeſuit only ſays, that the founder of the Benedictins aſſiſted St Ignatius with his divine illuminations, for the forming the conſtitutions of the ſociety. Is this ſaying, that three monks of St Benedict dictated theſe conſtitutions to Ignatius, as to an amanuenſis; ‘Dixi Societatem JESU videri charam S. Benedicto, in cujus ſinu Lutetiæ primùm delineata ſit; & poſtmodùm Caſſini ſancto fundatori illuc digreſſo, Sanctiſſimus Patriarcha illius loci præſes, multa lumina & cœleſtes afflatus exoraſſe viſus eſt. Hoc Caëtanus ad exceptas inibi per S. Ignatium à tribus Monachis Conſtitutiones Societatis JESU traxit; quaſi quod dixi, S. Benedictum, (ut pium eſt arbitrari,) cœleſtem lucem, hærenti in æde ſua S. Ignatio eſſe apprecatum, idem ſonet, quòd tres Monachos nigros dictaſſe S. Ignatio, velut amanuenſi, ſuas Conſtitutiones (10). —— I ſaid, that the ſocieey of Jeſus was favoured by St Benedict, in whoſe boſom it was firſt planned, at Paris; and afterwards at Monte Caſſino, the moſt holy Patriarch of that place, prayed for much illumination and heavenly inſpiration on the holy founder, who was come thither. This, Caetanus pretends, implies, that St Ignatius received there the book of conſtitutions of the ſociety of Jeſus from three Monks; as if my ſaying, that St Benedict (as we ought piouſly to ſuppoſe) prayed for cæleſtial light on St Ignatius, reſiding in his houſe, was the ſame thing, as if I had ſaid, that three Monks dictated to St Ignatius, as to an amanuenſis, his conſtitutions.’ Note by the way (11), that the ſame Benedictin maintains, that the Jeſuit, he cites, committed a mortal ſin in putting any other name than his own in the title page of his book (12). A Jeſuit, called John Rowe, has treated this accuſer of Ignatius very roughly. It remains, that I ſay ſomething concerning the book of exerciſes. They tried to get it condemned in Spain, in 1553. Melchior Canus was very active in it, and the archbiſhop of Toledo would not have been ſorry that it had ſucceeded; but the doctor, he conſulted, was of another opinion. This is what the Jeſuits ſay: but who knows whether they ſpeak truth? ‘Inventi ſunt qui .... anno 1553 eum librum non allatrarent modo, ſed & morderent, Thomas quidam Pedrovius, alienæ ea in re voluntatis adminiſter, & Melchior Canus, cujus ſuggillationes, & obelos, cum Paſchali Mantio Ord. Prædicatorum, Complutenſi Theologo primario, exhibuiſſet Joannes Siliceus Præſul Toletanus, qui librum illum cupiebat ab eo improbari, reſponſum retulit, nihil eſſe in ſic diſpuncto libro damnatione dignum, præter Cani diſpunctiones, & ſuggillationes, ut ad illum annum recitat Orlandinus, addito pergravi Bartholomæi Torris, poſtea Canarienſis Præſulis elogio eorumdem exercitiorum (13). —— Some there were, who, in the year 1553, vented their ſpleen againſt that book; among theſe, one Thomas Pedrovius, employed in that affair by ſome other perſon, and Melchior Canus, whoſe cavils againſt it, when John Siliceus, Archbiſhop of Toledo, who was pleaſed that he diſapproved that book, had ſhewn to Paſchalis Mantius, of the order of preaching Fryars, and a divine of the firſt rank at Complutum, he received for anſwer, that there was nothing worthy to be condemned, in this ſo much cenſured book, but the cenſures and cavils of Canus; as Orlandinus relates under that year, adding the weighty encomium of Bartholomew Torres, afterwards biſhop of the Canaries, on thoſe exerciſes.’

Some other works are attributed to the ſame author, a letter de religioſa obedientia ad Luſitaniæ ſocios ac filios, written from Rome the twenty ſixth of March, 1553: it has been inſerted in the Bibliotheca Patrum. A letter de religioſa perfectione ad Hiſpaniæ ſocios, written the fourth of March 1547, was printed in Latin, in the collection of the letters of the generals of the Jeſuits. There is another Latin verſion of them (14) printed at Cracow, in 1607, in the collection intituled, Theſaurus ſpiritualium rerum ad Societatem Jeſu pertinentium. A letter to Claudius king of Æthiopia, dated the twenty ſecond of February, 1555. It is found in the Hiſtory of the Jeſuits, written by Orlandinus, and elſewhere. He had written a book upon the Trinity before he began to ſtudy. It is not known how this book came to be loſt. No body doubts but he is the author of a book, called Conſtitutiones Societatis Jeſu decem in partes diſtributæ. But ſome believe, that James Lainez is the author of the declarations that are joined to it. Father Southwell confutes this opinion (15). This book of Conſtitutions, &c. was printed firſt at Rome by the Jeſuits, in 1558, in 8vo, It has ſince been publiſhed in the ſame place, in Latin, and in Spaniſh, in folio, 1606. The Latin verſion was made by John Polancus, ſecretary to the author (16).

[C] I ſay nothing of the miraculous adventures of his voyage.] The bare recital of his extatic viſions would make a very long remark, did I trouble my ſelf to relate all that are found in his hiſtory. See Dr Stillingfleet (17), who draws from thence a good proof, that the Inſtitution of the Jeſuits, as well as other monks, is founded on Fanaticiſm. He cites Melchior Canus, who ſays that Loyola fled from Spain for fear the inquiſition, which ſuſpected him of the hereſy of the illuminate, ſhould impriſon him (18). Melchior Canus adds, that Loyola told him a thouſand impertinent things concerning his virtues, and his revelations, and ſpoke of one of his comrades as a great ſaint. This pretended ſaint, being interrogated by Melchior Canus, vented ſeveral hereſies through meer ignorance. Loyola, to excuſe him, alledged, that he was not a Heretic, but a Lunatic, who had his lucid intervals, and who at that time, by reaſon of the new-moon, was not a good Catholic: ‘Cum aliquando Romæ eſſem, Innicum iſtum videre mihi libuit: qui in ſermone ſine ulla occaſione cœpit ſuam commemorare juſtitiam, & perſecutionem, quam paſſus eſſet in Hiſpania nullo ſuo merito. Multa etiam & magna prædicabat de revelationibus, quas divinitus habuiſſet, idque nulla ejus rei neceſſitate: quæ fuit occaſio, cur eum pro homine vano haberem, nec de revelationibus ſuis quicquam ei crederem .... (19). Quendam ſociorum pro ſancto prædicare cœpit, qui cum accitus veniſſet, illico hominis non ſatis incolumi capite mihi ſuſpicionem movit: cumque de rebus divinis eum percunctatus eſſem, multa hæretica reſpondit, quippe qui idiota, planeque rudis & indoctus eſſet. Innicus ejus cauſa confuſus, iſte, inquit, non eſt hæreticus, ſed fatuus, credoque eum lucida habere intervalla, jamque adeo propter conjunctionem Lunæ non eſſe uſquequaque Catholicum (20).’

tioned; but betook himſelf to Thomas à Kempis. At two years end, he was thought to have made a ſufficient progreſs, to be admitted to lectures of Philoſophy; accordingly he parted for Complutum in 1526. His mendicant life, his equipage, and that of his four companions, who had already eſpouſed his fortune, together with the inſtructions he gave the people, who crouded about him, obliged the inquiſition to examine what he meant. The matter went ſo far, that he was caſt into priſon [E], from whence he was not releaſed, but upon condition, that he would forbear venting his opinions for four years (e). This injunction was no way ſuitable to his deſign; not willing therefore to ſubmit to it, he retired to Salamanca, where he continued to diſcourſe upon matters of devotion. He was impriſoned afreſh, and ſet at liberty again on the ſame conditions, as at Complutum. Then he determined to go to Paris. He arrived there in the beginning of February 1528, with a firm reſolution to ſtudy hard; but the miſery, he was reduced to, having obliged him to beg his bread in the ſtreets, and put himſelf into St James's hoſpital, extreamly croſſed his deſign. He tried ſeveral expedients to remove all theſe obſtacles; but as faſt as he got clear of one difficulty, he was involved in others; for it was obſerved, that the zeal, with which he exhorted young people to ſpirituality, made them betake themſelves to a very odd way of life. He was accuſed before the inquiſitor of the faith; and narrowly eſcaped being whipped in the college of St Barbara [F]. All theſe difficulties did not diſcourage him; he went through his courſe of Philoſophy, and Divinity, and gained over a certain number of companions, who engaged themſelves by vow to a new life. This they did in the church

Militis Chriſtiani. It is univerſally looked upon as a piece, in which purity of ſtile is joined with the beſt rules of Chriſtian morality. However, Loyola did not reliſh it; it was an ice that damped his fire of divine love; he took an averſion to it. and would never read this author's writings; nor was he willing his diſciples ſhould read them. Ribadeneira tells us this particular. ‘ In hac ſtudiorum palæſtra verſanti, ‘ pii quidam ac docti viri conſilium dederunt, ut ‘ Eraſmi Roterodami, qui eo tempore bonæ Latinitatis auctor habebatur, libellum de milite Chriſtiano ‘ legeret, ut ſermonis ſcilicet elegantiam cum pietate ‘ conjungeret. Cujus conſilii Confeſſarius etiam ad ‘ reliquos auctor acceſſit. Quod cùm Ignatius ſimpliciter feciſſet, obſervavit illius libelli lectione refrigeſcere in ſe ſpiritum Dei, & devotionis ſenſim ‘ ardorem reſtingui. Qua re animadverſa, librum de ‘ manibus omnino abjecit, & ita eſt averſatus, ut nec ‘ ipſe amplius legerit illius auctoris libros, & paſſim in ‘ Societate noſtra legi vetuerit (21).’

[E] The matter went ſo far, that he was caſt into priſon.] Before it came to this, enquiry had been made about his life and doctrine, and he had only been enjoined to wear ſhoes and ſtockings, and not oblige his companions to go barefoot. But when it was obſerved, that a widow and her daughter had undertaken a pilgrimage on foot, and begging, Ignatius, who had been their caſuiſt, was much exclaimed againſt. Hereupon he was impriſoned. I do not wonder the alarm was taken, when people reflected on the great aſcendant this man had gained over the fair ſex. People continued to flock about him in his priſon, to hear him diſcourſe; and there were a great many perſons of quality of both ſexes (22), who offered him their good offices; but he thankfully refuſed them. Being asked, whether he had adviſed the widow's pilgrimage, he anſwered, that, on the contrary, he had diſſuaded her from it, fearing that the young woman, who was very handſome, might be expoſed, during theſe travels, to ſome accident (23). The ſentence was pronounced the forty ſecond day of his impriſonment, and he was diſcharged (24). He was treated more ſeverely at Salamanca (25).

[F] He narrowly eſcaped being whipped in the college of St Barbara.] Mind this account of Mr Jurieu (26). ‘ He came to Paris in 1528, and, being conſcious of his ignorance, he entered himſelf in Montaigu college; he there began again his ſtudies, put ‘ himſelf into the ſixth claſs, to learn his Grammar a ‘ ſecond time, and deſired his maſter to ſet him a task, ‘ and whip him, as he did the other ſcholars, when ‘ he could not ſay his leſſon. He was then thirty ſeven years old: a pretty ſight, to ſee this venerable ‘ ſaint's ſhirt taken up amidſt a company of boys, who ‘ were ſpectators of the comedy . . . . (27). We ‘ have already ſeen, how, after this, at thirty ſeven ‘ years of age, he cauſed himſelf to be whipped ‘ in Montaigu college, before the little boys.’ Here are two thing affirmed; one, that Ignatius not only deſired his maſter to whip him, but that he was actually whipped; the other, that this paſſed at Paris, in Montaigu college. I think here is a miſtake as to both theſe facts, and that it is better to keep to the following narrative. ‘ Being returned to Barcelona, ‘ he began his Grammar at thirty years of age (28); ‘ but, as Maffæus ſays *, he could ſcarce ſay amo, but ‘ his mind was wandering I know not where, and ‘ always filled with ſo many viſions, that he could ‘ not remember one ſingle word of what he learned. ‘ This obliged him, with great humility, to beg his ‘ maſter on his knees . . . . . that he † would pleaſe ‘ punctually to keep him to a leſſon, as he did the ‘ other ſcholars, and whip him ſoundly, if he did not ‘ give a good account of it (29).’ You ſee, that all is reduced to a bare reſolution of ſuffering the laſh, in caſe he did not learn his leſſon, and that this paſſed at Barcelona, when he was but thirty three years of age, and not at Paris, when he was thirty ſeven. I know indeed, that, at Paris alſo, Ignatius was willing to ſubmit to the laſh; but this was after he had underſtood, that the principal of the college (30) had reſolved it ſhould be given him: and he felt ſome ſtruggles between the fleſh and the ſpirit, before he could reſolve to ſuffer that ignominy (31). Beſides, it was not at Montaigu college, but at St Barbara's that they reſolved to whip him, and the reaſon was, not for any neglect of his leſſon, but becauſe there were ſcholars, who renounced their exerciſes, to practiſe the counſels of Spirituality, with which he infatuated them. Now the principal of the college was ſo far from executing his reſolution, that, on the contrary, upon his hearing Ignatius ſpeak, he caſt himſelf at his feet, to beg his pardon. ‘ Quid multa? prehenſa manu Goveanus, ad cœnationem Ignatium adduxit; hic repente ſe, omnibus inſpectantibus, illi ad pedes abjicit; lachrymis veniam petit: ‘ ſe nimis credulum, illum virum ſanctum clamat, ‘ qui non intentati cruciatus terrore, ſed Dei tantum honore tangatur (32). —— In ſhort, Govea took ‘ Ignatius by the hand, and led him to ſupper: then ‘ in the ſight of the whole company, he fell at his ‘ feet, and begged pardon with tears, calling himſelf ‘ over credulous, and Loyola a holy man, who was ‘ not touched with the dread of threatened puniſhment, ‘ but only with the honour of God.’ Note, that Ignatius ſtudied the Latin tonge in Montaigu college (33), but I have not read, that he went through all his claſſes, beginning at the ſixth, as Mr Jurieu affirms. It is true, it would be excuſable to infer this from theſe words of Maffæus, ‘ Igitur ad montis acuti ‘ Collegium itare quotidie, atque inter procacium ‘ puerorum greges matura jam ætate vir Grammatica rudimenta repetere non dedignatus eſt (34). —— ‘ Therefore he condeſcended to go daily to Montaigu ‘ college, and, tho' advanced in years, to begin again ‘ the rudiments of Grammar among a parcel of unlucky ‘ boys.’ See Paſquier, who pleaſantly ridicules Loyola's ſtudies and ignorance (35). Little did he then imagine, that this man would ſoon be invoked: he expoſed himſelf to the fault of Non putaram (36). I will make a reflexion hereupon in the remark [Y].

church of Montmartre, the fifteenth of Auguſt 1534; and they renewed their engagement twice ſucceſſively in the ſame place, and on the ſame day, and with the ſame ceremonies. At firſt there were only ſeven, reckoning Loyola himſelf among them; but afterwards they became ten. It was determined among them, that Ignatius ſhould return into Spain, to regulate ſome affairs there; that afterwards he ſhould go to Venice; and that they ſhould leave Paris the twenty fifth of January 1537, to go and meet him. He came into Spain in 1535, where he preached repentance [G], and was followed by prodigious crowds of hearers. He remembered the affairs his companions had recommended to him, and in due time paſſed by ſea to Genoa, and from thence travelled to Venice, where they all met him on the eighth of January 1537 (f). During the time that he waited for them, he was not idle: he gained ſouls, and got acquainted with John Peter Caraffa [H], who was afterwards Pope. Being engaged by vow to make a voyage to Jeruſalem, they prepared to go thither; but they were deſirous before all things to ſalute the Pope, and obtain his benediction and permiſſion. They went therefore to Rome, and obtained their deſire. Being returned to Venice with a deſign to go on board, they found no opportunity: the war with the Porte had put an entire ſtop to the tranſportation of pilgrims. Hereupon, rather than be idle, they reſolved to diſperſe themſelves in the towns under the Venetians juriſdiction. They preached in the ſtreets, and afterwards went into the univerſities, to gain the ſcholars; and at laſt returned to Rome. There it was that Ignatius formed the plan of a new ſociety, which Pope Paul III confirmed in the year 1540, with ſome limitations, and in the year 1543 without limitations. He was created general of this new order in 1541, and fixed his head quarters at Rome, whilſt his companions diſperſed themſelves throughout the earth. Here he applied himſelf to ſeveral things, as in converting the Jews [I], reforming the women of a bad life [K], or the care of orphans. He found himſelf ſoon expoſed to the moſt

[G] Where he preached repentance.] He exclaimed, among other things, againſt the concubinage of the prieſts, which was hardly looked upon as ſhameful at that time; for their ſervant maids confidently aſſumed the head-dreſs of married women, and behaved themſelves to them, as if they had been their lawful huſbands. Ignatius got very ſevere laws made againſt this corruption. 'Quibus quidem operibus & vitæ exemplo, prudentiaque tantum apud illos homines profecit, ut errores multos corrigeret; vitia, quæ in ſacerdotum etiam mores irrepſerant, & longa jam conſuetudine honeſtatis nomen obſederant, emendare non deſtitit: multaque conſtituit, quæ ad hominum mores conformandos, pietatemque augendam pertinerent. In his ſeveræ leges fuerunt ejus opera latæ à magiſtratibus, de alea, de concubinatu ſacerdotum. Nam cum patrio more Virgines, quoad viro traderentur, capite aperto eſſent, peſſimo exemplo multæ, cum apud clericos turpiter viverent, perinde caput obnubebant, ac ſi legitimo eis matrimonio junctæ fuiſſent: quibus fidem, quaſi maritis, præſtabant. Quod nefarium inſtitutum, ac ſacrilegum, funditus tollendum curavit (37). —— By which works, and the example of his life, and his prudence, he ſo gained upon thoſe men, that he corrected many errors; nor did he ceaſe to amend the vices, which had crept even into the morals of the clergy, and through long cuſtom bad, as it were, ceaſed to be ſcandalous: he likewiſe made many regulations, tending to the well ordering their manners, and the encreaſe of piety. Among theſe, the magiſtrates, at his inſtigation, publiſhed ſevere laws, concerning gaming, and the concubinage of the clergy. For it being the cuſtom of the country for maidens, till they were married, to have their heads uncovered, many, who lived in criminal converſation with clergymen, veiled themſelves, as if they were lawfully married to them, thus ſetting a moſt ſcandalous example. This wicked and ſacrilegious practice he took care to put a ſtop to.'

[H] He got acquainted with John Peter Caraffa.] Who was Pope under the name of Paul IV, and who had then joined himſelf with ſome other votaries (38), to form the congregation called the Theatins. Theſe, in this laſt age, have had a great quarrel with the Jeſuits. See the uſe Mr Arnaud makes of it. 'One may judge, ſays he (39), ſpeaking to the Jeſuits, how little touchy you are, by that ſharp and harſh way, wherewith your writers (40), have treated the Theatins, for having ſaid, in the Life of the bleſſed Cajetan, that St Ignatius, four or five years before the eſtabliſhment of your ſociety, living with the Theatins at Venice, when he came thither from Spain, in the year 1536, was ſo edified, and affected with the ſanctity of his hoſts, that he deſired to be received among them: but that the bleſſed Cajetan would not grant his requeſt, becauſe God had acquainted him, that he would found another order, more given to action. Be this true or falſe, could it be a juſt ground for flying into ſuch a paſſion, and continuing ſo hot a war for near thirty years together; were it true, that you are ſo little ſenſible, as you ſay, of what only affects the reputation of your ſociety?' Spondanus (41) obſerves, that John Sleidan, and ſome others after him, have falſly ſaid, that the Jeſuits were founded by this John Peter Caraffa. The truth, adds he, is, that as the Jeſuits came into the world a little after the Theatins, and almoſt in the ſame habit, they were called Theatins, which name they ſtill retain in Spain and Italy. If, in requital, the name of the Jeſuits was given the Theatins, we might leſs wonder at Sleiden's aſſertion. The author, I have ſo often cited, acknowledges, that theſe two orders of regular clergy came ſo ſoon after one another, and were alike in ſo many things, that the name of Theatins was often given to the Jeſuits. 'A quibus vulgi errore falſa Theatinorum in nos eſt appellatio, cognomenque tranſfuſum. Nam cùm ordo uterque, noſter & illorum, clericorum Regularium ſint, eodemque fermè tempore nati, neque habitu valde diſſimiles, populus rudis externa ſpecie deceptus, alienum nomen noſtris impoſuit, Romæ primùm; unde in alias deinde urbes influxit, & in remotas etiam provincias penetravit (42).'

[I] He . . . employed himſelf . . . in converting the Jews.] He entertained in the houſe of the Jeſuits ſome Jews, who had been baptized, and, by his earneſt ſollicitations, obtained, that all Jews, who embraced the true faith, ſhould be entertained in a certain houſe appointed for that purpoſe. At his requeſt, Pope Paul III decreed, that they ſhould preſerve all their goods, and that, if they were children, who were converted without their fathers and mothers conſent, they ſhould have the whole patrimony (43). And as to goods acquired by uſury, the true owner of which was not known, it was ordered, that they ſhould be given to the converted Jews. Julius III, and Paul IV, added a new order, which was, that all the ſynagogues of Italy ſhould be taxed every year in a certain ſum, to be applied to the maintenance of theſe proſelytes (44). The French converters have imitated part of theſe orders in our days.

moſt outragious calumnies [L], which did not however hinder his purſuing whatever might contribute to the glory and eſtabliſhment of his order. There were thoſe of the other ſex, who were willing to ſubmit to his diſcipline [M]; but the trouble, which the direction

‘ving by proſtitution, (for, at that time, there was a greater licentiouſneſs of manners in the city, which, through the vigilance of the holy Pontiffs, was afterwards ſuppreſſed by ſevere laws) and the city itſelf was become a neſt of whores.’ At that time their number was prodigious: they, who would quit this infamous way of life, were received into the convent of the Magdalenes, provided they obliged themſelves to a perpetual cloiſter, and to the vows of the order. This condition, which was ſomewhat hard, retarded the fruits, that might be expected from the inſtitution of this convent; it excluded all married women, and all maids and widows, who would willingly have quitted their wicked courſe of life, but could not ſubmit to the laws of a long penance. There were therefore two ſorts of debauched women, which were to be taken care of. They, who feared the reſentment of their husbands, had need of a place of retreat, where they might be in ſafety, till they had made their peace with them. They, who would quit criminal, without renouncing honeſt pleaſures, had need alſo of ſome place that was not a convent, where they might have a ſubſiſtence, when they gave over the trade of a courtezan. For which reaſon, Ignatius cauſed appartments to be built in the church of St Martha, in which a new ſociety was founded for this kind of penitents (46). ‘Permultæ ex iis nuptæ ſunt, quæ hoc perfugio excluduntur: quibus tamen locus aliquis dandus eſt, quo ſe recipiant, dum maritis reconciliantur, ut à vitæ honeſtate, quam petunt, abſit periculum. Porro aliæ emergere quidem ex fæcibus illis vellent, ſed non continuo ſe diuturnæ pœnitentiæ dedere: neque ſi ut peſſima fugiant paratæ ſunt, ſectari idcirco optima concupiſcunt: quibus receptum ad tempus dari Cœnobii illius (47) leges non ſinunt. Ignatius igitur, ut omnium ſaluti conſuleret: & ne qua eſſet, quæ victus quærendi difficultatem ſuæ turpitudini prætexeret, locum peropportunum inſtituendum curavit, quod omnium eſſet commune perſugium (48).’ He was the firſt bountiful contributer to this building: his example was followed by ſeveral, and eſpecially by Leonora Oſoria, wife to John Vega, embaſſador of Charles V. It was a very edifying ſight, to ſee the general of the Jeſuits, at the head of a band of whores, leading them either to St Martha's church, or to women of qualities houſes, who undertook to have them inſtructed. ‘In hoc autem divæ Marthæ Cœnobium, mulierculas à turpi quæſtu abductas ipſemet ſæpenumero, ne perirent, vel in matronæ alicujus honeſtæ domum, inſtituendas ad virtutis ſtudium, id ætatis vir, & Generalis Præpoſitus deducebat (49).’ When he was told, that the pains he took, to convert theſe proſtitutes, was loſt labour, ſince they were hardened in ſin, and would quickly return to their vomit, he anſwered, that he ſhould think all the labour of his life well employed, if he could cauſe theſe creatures to abſtain only one night from offending God; and though he was perſuaded, that the next day they would fall again into their infamous practices, yet he would not ceaſe to labour with all his might to ſave that ſmall ſpace of time (50). ‘Cum autem Ignatio objiceretur, in curandis hujuſmodi mulierculis malè operam poni, quippe quæ in vitiis jam occalluiſſent, facileque reverterentur ad vomitum: Minimè ſanè, inquit Ignatius: ſed ſi omnibus meæ vitæ curis, atque laboribus id poſſim efficere, ut vel unam noctem peccato vacuam præterire iſtarum aliqua velit; omnes ego quidem nervos contendam, ut vel illo tam exiguo tempore Deus ac Dominus noſter non offendatur: etiam ſi ſciam illam ſtatim ad ingenium redituram (51).’ As he was careful to remedy the paſſed, he did not forget to prevent the evil to come. He knew, that the honour of many maids is in danger, either becauſe they are poor, or becauſe their mothers take not ſufficient care, or even turn procureſſes for them: he therefore got a convent built, whither the young women ſhould be removed, who were in this danger. ‘Illud etiam excogitavit, in lubrico verſanti virginum pudicitiæ qua ratione ſuccurreret: ne videlicet puellaris caſtitas, aut matrum turpitudine incuriave defloreſceret, aut paupertate. Quamobrem præclarum, omnique laude dignum Cœnobium conſtructum eſt, Sanctæ Catherinæ, ut vulgo vocant, de funariis: in quod, tanquam in aſylum arcemque transferuntur adoleſcentulæ, quæ in periculo pudicitiæ verſantur (52).’

[L] He found himſelf expoſed to the moſt outrageous calumnies.] Ribadeneira does not enter into particulars, and I do not think there is any book extant, in which theſe calumnies are particularly related. I ſhall only ſay, with this Hiſtorian, that Ignatius having cauſed a married woman to be put into the hoſpital of St Martha, who had ſuffered herſelf to be carried off by her galant, expoſed himſelf to the indignation of this raviſher, who, being a very paſſionate man, was not content to throw ſtones all night at the houſe, where his miſtreſs was ſhut up, but moreover defamed the Jeſuits all over the city, and diſperſed a hundred Paſquils againſt them. He accuſed them of all ſorts of diſorders, and of the moſt impious and filthy crimes. He ſo prejudiced the city of Rome againſt them, that they durſt hardly ſhew themſelves; for they every where met with thoſe, who inſulted and curſed them. I ſhall ſet down Ribadeneira's words, that I may not be thought to amplify. ‘Ut erat vir acer, ac ferox, & in ipſum Sanctæ Marthæ Cœnobium furere nocturnis lapidationibus cœpit, & in noſtros iniquis criminationibus debacchari: multaque in vulgus ſpargere, quæ non ſolùm falſa eſſent, ſed dictu etiam turpiſſima. Eoque proceſſit (gratia fortaſſe, qua valebat plurimum, & autoritate fretus) ut Ignatii nomen publicè inſectaretur, & laceraret: & ea noſtris per ſe, & ſuos coram objiceret, quæ honeſtè audire non poſſent. Famoſos præterea libellos confecit, & vulgo jactavit, quibus multa nefaria, & impura, multa impia, & ſcelerata continebantur: ut noſtris vix in publicum prodire, vix cum hominibus de ipſorum ſalute agere liceret: ita aut conviciis ab improbiſſimo quoque, aut maledictis excipiebantur (53).’ Ignatius petitioned the Pope to name commiſſioners for examining theſe accuſations. They were examined by the governor and by the vicar of Rome, who, in their ſentence, given the tenth of Auguſt, 1543, declared, that they were all calumnies. There was a prieſt at Rome, who terribly blackened the reputation of the Jeſuits. He accuſed them of Hereſy, and of revealing the ſecrets of confeſſions, and of committing things not fit to be named, and which made Ignatius deſerve to be burnt. See in the margin Ribadeneira's words (54), who obſerves, that this prieſt was ſuſpended, and deprived of his benefices, and condemned to perpetual impriſonment, for crimes which time at laſt revealed. As for his accuſations, the Jeſuits did not complain of them, but ſuffered them to drop unanſwered.

[M] There were ſome of the other ſex, who were willing to ſubmit to his diſcipline.] You will hardly find any order of Monks, but what has convents for maids; and I queſtion, whether you can name a founder, who in his life-time had not female votaries, who conſtantly attended him. Ignatius had his; but he did not conſent to the forming nunneries, which ſhould embarraſs his rules. Iſabella Roſella, his benefactreſs, was ſo deſirous to ſee him again, that ſhe came from Spain to Rome, to put herſelf under his diſcipline. She, and ſome others, obtained leave of the Pope to make the ſame vows as the Jeſuits (55). Ignatius did not oppoſe it, till he had experienced the prodigious trouble they gave him. Perceiving then, that this would only incommode his ſociety, he repreſented his reaſons ſo urgently to the Pope, as to get a diſcharge from this burden. ‘Mirum eſt trium mulierculararum gubernatio, quantum illi moleſtiæ & occupationis paucis diebus attulerit. Ergo Pontificem Maximum docet, quanto ea res impedimento Societati ſit futura: orat, obſecratque Pontificem, ut ſe præſenti moleſtia, Societatem metu perpetuo liberet: neque permittat noſtros homines, aliis in rebus magnis, utilibus, neceſſariis occupatos, hac mulierum cura minus neceſſaria implicari. Quod utique Pontifex, rationes Ignatii probans, Societati dedit: literaſque Apoſtolicas ſcribi juſſit, quibus noſtri in perpetuum ab onere Monialium eximuntur, & quarumcunque mulierum cura ſub obedientia noſtrorum in communi, vel alias vivere volentium, anno 1547 13. direction of three women had given him, obliged him to deliver his ſociety for ever from this incumbrance. Having gotten his order confirmed by Pope Julius III, in 1550, he had a mind to lay down his generalſhip; but the Jeſuits would by no means conſent to it. So he kept that poſt to his death, which happened on the laſt day of July 1556 (g). The author, whom I cite, having honeſtly owned, That his St Ignatius had not the gift of miracles, and having even prevented the objections, which were to be feared on this head, had no doubt a hint given him, that he had gone too far, and that it was not prudent to make ſuch conceſſions in the face of the World. However it be, he retracted it in a new book, and mentioned I know not how many miracles wrought by the Founder of his order [N]. They are gone ſo far as to pretend, that the

He therefore acquaints the Pope, what an incumbrance that affair was like to prove to the ſociety: he begs and intreats the Pope to free him from the preſent trouble, and the ſociety from perpetual fear; and that he would not permit our brethren, employed in other matters of great and neceſſary importance, to be taken up with the leſs neceſſary care of women. The Pope, approving Ignatius's reaſons, granted the ſociety this favour, and ordered apoſtolical letters to be written, exempting us for ever from the burden of Nuns, and the care of any women, who might be willing to ſubmit to our diſcipline in common, or to live elſewhere, in the year* 1547. May the 20*th. But Ignatius, not ſatisfied with this, that he might entirely guard againſt this danger, obtained the ſame grant from the ſame Paul III, in the year* 1549; that we might not be obliged to undertake the care of any Nuns, or religious women whatever, by apoſtolical letters obtained, or hereafter to be obtained; unleſs making expreſs mention of that indulgence, and of our order.'

For the reſt, it was not by way of precaution, in point of chaſtity, that he was willing to be rid of this ſex; for if we believe Hiſtorians, the holy Virgin granted him the gift of continence to ſuch a degree, that from the time he became her knight, to his death, he felt not the leaſt ſymptom of an immodeſt temptation. He might therefore ſafely converſe with the women, and preſerve himſelf as untouched in the midſt of all theſe flames, as the three Jews in the Babylonian furnace. His greateſt intimacies with the ſex would not have been a matter that could juſtify one's telling him,

In that reſpect he had the gift of the Hirpæ (58). What is ſaid of ſome enchanted ſoldiers, that they are in no danger, though expoſed to a furious ſtorm of musket-ſhot, is an image of Loyola's continence. The moſt laſcivious oglings, the moſt tender careſſes, and in general, all the artillery woman could employ againſt his virtue, would have found it impenetrable: always provided that we refer ourſelves to Maffæus's words (59): I have read a parallel of Luther and Loyola (60), in which it is obſerved, that Luther, without any extraordinary grace, lived in a chaſt celibacy to forty two years of age, and, being afterwards married, neither blemiſhed his modeſty, nor piety; and that, after all, Loyola's chaſtity deſerved no commendation, ſince there is no virtue, but what proceeds from a victory diſputed with the paſſions (61).

[N] He retracted it . . . . and mentions I know not how many miracles of the founder of his order.] The thirteenth chapter of the fifth book of St Ignatius's Life, written by the Jeſuit Ribadeneira is very remarkable: he begins with this objection (62). 'If all you have been ſaying be true, whence comes it that Loyola's ſanctity was not confirmed by miracles, like thoſe of ſo many other ſaints? The author anſwers, Who hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath been his counſellor? God alone works wonderful things, and as it is he alone performs them, he alone knows the proper time, and place, in which miracles ought to be wrought, and by whoſe prayers. Ut ſolus ille hæc poteſt efficere, ita ille ſolus novit quo loco, quo tempore miracula & quorum precibus facienda ſunt (63).' He adds, that all ſaints have not had the gift of miracles, and that thoſe, who have been moſt eminent for the greatneſs, or number of their miracles, have not, for all that, excelled the others in holineſs of life. For it is not by miraculous, but charitable actions, that we are to judge of a perſon's ſanctity. This he proves from the authority of St Gregory, from reaſons drawn from Scripture, and from example. 'Neque omnes ſancti viri miraculis excelluerunt: neque qui illorum aut magnitudine præſtiterunt, aut copia, idcirco reliquos ſanctitate ſuperarunt. Non enim ſanctitate cujuſque ſignis, ſed charitate æſtimanda eſt (64).' He makes it appear by Scripture, that the gift of miracles is granted ſometimes to falſe teachers, and in a very few words expoſes to view the ſtrength of whatever the Proteſtants can urge againſt thoſe, who upbraid them, becauſe Luther and Calvin had not this gift. I ſay not this, adds he, to extenuate this virtue, but to let the prudent reader underſtand, that all this muſt be referred to the good providence of God, who diſtributes his gifts according to his own good pleaſure. He afterwards aſſigns ſome reaſons, for which God might think fit, and that even in favour of the Jeſuits, to deny their founder this gift of miracles. We muſt hear himſelf. 'Hæc dixerim non ut miraculorum vim elevem, ſed ut prudens lector intelligat, rem totam Deo committendam: qui dona ſua unicuique diſtribuit, prout vult. Potuit ille, pro ſua occulta ſapientia, noſtræ hoc imbecillitati dare, ne miracula unquam jactare poſſemus. Potuit utilitati, ut authore inſtituti noſtri minus illuſtri, à Jeſu potius, quam ab illo, nomen traheremus: & noſtra nos appellatio ſacra moneret, ne ab illo oculos unquam dimoveremus: quem non ſolum, ut communem humani generis liberatorem ac Principem, ſed etiam, ut præcipuum Ducem colere, atque imitari debemus, minimam hanc Societatem ſui nominis glorioſo titulo decorantem. Potuit hoc etiam tribuere temporibus, quibus hæc miracula neceſſaria non ſunt (65). —— I ſay this, not to leſſen the efficacy of miracles, but that the prudent reader may underſtand, that the whole matter is to be referred to God, who diſtributes his gifts to every one as he pleaſes. He might, of his unſearchable wiſdom, deſign to put it out of the power of our weakneſs to boaſt of miracles. He might in this conſult our profit, that, the founder of our order being the leſs illuſtrious, we might take our name from Jeſus, rather than from him; and that our ſacred appellation might put us in mind, never to turn our eyes away from him, whom we ought to worſhip and imitate, not only as the common Saviour of mankind, but as the chief God, who vouchſafes to adorn our humble ſociety with the glorious title of his name. He might likewiſe in this conſult the times, in which theſe miracles are not neceſſary.' Laſtly, he ſays (66), that the manner of the inſtitution of the ſociety of the Jeſuits, it's prodigious growth, and the miracles wrought by ſome of it's members, are a convincing proof, that it is the work of God, and is a ſufficient ground for aſcribing the glory of miracles to the life of it's founder. Thus the antient fathers have obſerved, that the ſpeedy propagation of the Goſpel throughout the world, though the inſtruments God made uſe of had nothing conſiderable in them, according to the world, and though it met with the moſt violent oppoſition, is ſo bright a miracle, as would alone be ſufficient to prove the divine original of Chriſtianity. The Proteſtants alledge the ſame thing, when they are asked, what miracles miracles Luther and Calvin wrought to ſupport their miſſion. Let us once more cite Ribadeneira. ‘ Quid admirabilius, ſays he (67), quam militarem hominem, ferro & caſtris aſſuetum, à ſpiritu Dei alienum, ita immutatum, ut non ſolum ipſe Chriſto militaret, ſed ſacræ militiæ anteſignanus eſſet, & princeps? Quid inuſitatius, quam tot homines ingenio, ſtudio, ætate florentes, ab Ignatio egeno ac deſpicato, nulla magna vel literarum ſcientia, vel ſermonis elegantia & copia, huc adduci potuiſſe, inſtitutum ut vitæ curſum abrumperent, ſpes ſuas prodigerent, paupertatis, dedecoris, atque ignominiæ ſeſe telis objicerent, & tot laborum periculorumque offerent incurſibus? —— What can be more wonderful, than that a military man, accuſtomed to arms and camps, and a ſtranger to the Spirit of God, ſhould be ſo changed, as not only to fight under Chriſt's banner, but himſelf to become the leader and head of the ſacred warfare? what more uncommon, than that ſo many men, famous for wit and learning, and in the flower of their youth, could be prevailed upon by Ignatius, a poor, deſpiſed wretch, with no great learning, and as little eloquence, to break off their courſe of life, give up all their hopes, expoſe themſelves to the darts of poverty, diſgrace, and ignominy, and voluntarily ſubmit to ſo many labours and dangers.’ He has forgot one circumſtance, which in ſome reſpects, does exceedingly heighten the wonder, to wit, that there appeared in Loyola's life, from his travels to Monſerrat, till the time of his fixing at Rome, ſo many marks of extravagance, and ſo many ſymptoms of a mind diſordered, ſtupified, overwhelmed by fanaticiſm, that it is ſtrange, men of ſolid ſenſe, ſuch as Lainez and Salmeron, ſhould have adhered to him, and that his order ſhould ſo ſoon have over-topped all the reſt. But if we turn the perſpective, we perceive, that this very thing leſſens the wonder; for nothing is ſo likely to deceive, as that which appears ſupernatural in madneſs, extravagancy, and foolery. However it be, we have here a famous Jeſuit, his cotemporary (68), who plainly confeſſes, that his founder wrought no miracles, but he did not maintain this opinion till his death: for he changed his note in another book (69). It is true, moſt of the miracles he relates were wrought by Ignatius after his death: thus he ſpeaks (70). ‘ Quia vero poſtremo quinti libri capite de miraculis breviter egimus quaſi nulla feciſſet, aut ad demonſtrandam ejus ſanctitatem neceſſaria non eſſent, ſtatui nunc ea paullo fuſius exponere, non omnia quidem (res enim nimis in longum excurreret) ſed partem duntaxat eorum quæ Deus efficere per ſervum ſuum dignatus eſt. Quamvis enim, cum anno 1572. primum vitam ejus latine ſcriberem, alia nonnulla miracula ab eo facta noviſſem, tamen adeo mihi certa & explorata non erant, ut in vulgus edenda mihi perſuaderem; poſtea vero, queſtionibus de ejus in divos relatione publice habitis, gravibus & idoneis teſtibus fuerunt comprobata. Enimvero Deus ut ſervum ſuum extollat in terris tam frequentibus eum in dies miraculis dignatur, ut mearum partium eſſe ducam litteris hic mandare nonnulla è publicis actionibus ſumta. —— Becauſe, in the laſt chapter of the fifth book, I have briefly treated of miracles, ſuppoſing that he did none, or that they were not neceſſary to demonſtrate his ſanctity, I have determined, in this place, to treat more at large of them, not of all (for it would be too tedious) but part only of thoſe, which God vouchſafed to perform by his ſervant. For though, in the year 1572, when I firſt wrote his Life in Latin, I knew that he had performed ſome other miracles, yet I was not ſo fully informed concerning them, that I could perſuade myſelf to publiſh them: but afterwards, when his canonization was publickly talked of, they were confirmed by ſufficient witneſſes. And indeed God granted his ſervant to perform ſo many miracles, to exalt him in the earth, that they think it incumbent on me to commit to writing ſome few of his public actions.’ Note, that he ſpeaks only of the firſt edition, which was of the year 1572, and ſays nothing of the ſecond, which was of the year 1587, and which was much enlarged by him. He added ſeveral particulars, which he had learned afterwards, either from the teſtimony of ſome perſons of great authority, intimate friends of Ignatius, or the certainty whereof he had diſcovered by a ſevere examination, though he had looked upon them as doubtful before. ‘ Multa mihi neceſſario addenda judicavi. Primùm nova quædam, quæ poſt libellum excuſum, graviſſimi viri, & Ignatio valde familiares, & ante Societatem conditam intimi neceſſarii, quaſi teſtes oculati de ipſo Ignatio nobis retulerunt. Tum alia, quæ dubia antea mihi erant, & diligenti poſtea inquiſitione inveſtigata, certa eſſe comperi (71).’ Hence we conclude, that St Ignatius's miracles were things, of which his friends had not informed Ribadeneira, during the fifteen years, which paſſed between the two editions, nor what the author could clear from uncertainty in that interval of time. Nevertheleſs he aſſures us, that, in the year 1572, he was informed of ſome miracles wrought by this founder, but not with all the certainty neceſſary to publiſh them. Amongſt the things, of which he was not at that time perfectly aſſured, there were undoubtedly none, the certainty whereof he ſought after more diligently, than that of the miracles of his apoſtle: ſince therefore he continued to ſay, in the edition of 1587, that the bleſſed Ignatius had wrought no miracles, it neceſſarily follows, that his ſtricteſt ſearch had afforded him nothing certain upon that head; for if it had afforded him any certainty, he would, in the ſecond edition, have added this grand article with more concern, than thoſe other things, which he did add, only becauſe, of uncertain, as they had been before, they were now become certain, by the exact care he took to be informed about them. Farther, would a Jeſuit, who had known, in the year 1572, that his founder had wrought miracles, and who only forbore inſerting them in a public work, becauſe his intelligence in that point was not ſo ſure as it ought to be; would he have plainly owned, I ſay, that his founder wrought no miracles? would he have argued with ſo much concern upon it? would he have anſwered objections againſt it ſo elaborately? his duty doubtleſs had been to be ſilent, till he was fully informed, and there is great probability, that Ribadeneira would have taken that method, and that all he has ſaid, by an after-game, is inſincere and full of ſhifts; nor ſhould it be omitted, that nothing was ſo capable of being ſet in a full light during the interval of time between thoſe two editions, as Loyola's miracles, ſurprizing facts, which make a deeper impreſſion than any others, and ſpread from place to place with greater noiſe. Would the intimate friends, the inſeparable companions of Ignatius, have ſaid nothing of them to Ribadeneira, they, who told him ſo many other things, of which he was not informed in the year 1572; and which he added to his book in 1587? This, to ſay no worſe of it, makes all the miracles ſuſpected, which have been publiſhed, and pretended to have been wrought by Ignatius, before the ſecond edition of Ribadeneira. The other miracles of the ſame ſaint are very numerous, if we take the word of his good friends. See the two following remarks.

[O] It is pretended, that the words of Virgil, in his mouth, had the power of diſmaying devils, and forcing them to cry out for quarter.] The ſtory goes, that Ignatius Loyola had no ſooner repeated the place in Virgil, where it is ſaid, that Æneas and Dido entered into a cave, but the poſſeſſed woman, who prayed him to ſuccour her, was thrown upon the ground, the devil leaving her, and begging the favour not to be ſhut up in the eternal cave. He obtained leave to ramble where he pleaſed, provided he would never poſſeſs any man or woman more. ‘ Haſenmüllerus enim in Hiſtor. Jeſuit. cap. 8. pag. 296. ex Turriano refert, quod aliquando Romæ ſœmina quædam à Diabolo obſeſſa Ignatium Lojolam ſecuta ſit, & clamarit: Tu ſolus me liberare & juvare potes. Tunc Lojolam recitaſſe verſum Virgilii: Speluncam Dido, Dux & Trojanus eandem. Qua voce audita Dæmonem mulierem proſtraviſſe ac egredientem clamaſſe: O fili Lojola, tu ceu Leo me ad ſpeluncam inferni abire cogis, ſed rogo te, ne me æternæ ſpeluncæ injicias. Poſtea Ignatium illi dixiſſe. Vade quocunque volueris, modo nullum amplius hominem obſideas; ac ſtatim Dæmonium magno cum ſtrepitu egreſſum

But let them do what they will for him, nothing will be ſo wonderful in his hiſtory as the prodigious growth of his order in ſo few years, both in the old world and in the new, in ſpite of the ſtrongeſt oppoſition of it's adverſaries. I believe never any ſociety had ſo many enemies, within and without, as the Jeſuits have had, and ſtill have; and yet their authority, which is ſo ſuddenly grown to a very high pitch, ſeems rather to increaſe daily, than decline. The books, that have been publiſhed againſt them, would make a large library of themſelves. [P] Innocent X, and Clement IX, increaſed the honours of this new ſaint.] I ſhall make uſe of the words of Father Nathaniel Southwell. ‘ Eundem (Ignatium) Officio Eccleſiaſtico ubique terrarum coli juſſit Innocentius X. P. M. ſub ritu ſemiduplice die 29 Octobris anno 1644. Auxit cultum Clemens IX. P. Alphonſus de Andrada mentions ſeveral others, which were wrought at Munebrega, in Arragon, where they worſhip a miraculous image of St Ignatius (75). A paper image of the ſame ſaint has bled very lately at one of the fingers, in a town of Sicily. We have a book upon it, printed at Palermo, in 1668. ‘ His conſimilia narrantur contigiſſe in Sicilia Regalbuti Dioceſ. Catanenſis, ubi Imago papyracea S. Ignatii anno Dom. 1666. è digito fudit prodigioſe ſanguinem, & hæc omnia examinata accurate, atque ab Epiſcopo loci illuſtriſſimo D. Fr. Michaele Angelo Bonadies, olim Generali Seraph. Ordinis S. Franciſci de obſervantia approbata, & mandata typis Panormi 1668 (76). ——— Something like this is ſaid to have happened in Sicily at Regalbuto, in the dioceſe of Catanea, where a paper image of St Ignatius, in the year 1666, bled prodigiouſly at the finger; and that the affair was carefully enquired into, and approved by the moſt illuſtrious Michael Angelo Bonadies, biſhop of the place, and formerly general of the Franciſcans, and publiſhed at Panermo.’ See the remark, where I ſhall ſpeak of three Sermons.

[Q] They may well ſay, that a great many condemn them out of meer prejudice.] It is certain, that whatſoever is publiſhed againſt them, is almoſt equally believed by their enemies, both Catholics and Proteſtants. It is alſo true, that the accuſations are renewed againſt them, as often as occaſion offers in any new book. In the mean time, they, who examine with any ſort of equity, the innumerable apologies, publiſhed by the Jeſuits, find, as to ſome facts, ſufficient juſtifications, to make a reaſonable enemy drop the charge. I will give an inſtance of this.

In 1610, there came out a very ſevere book againſt the Jeſuits (77), in which it was affirmed (78), that the abbot du Bois had maintained, and would prove it to Father Coton's face, that ſentence had been given againſt him at Avignon, for getting a nun with child. Father Coton, anſwering this libel, produced (79) the following letter. I, whoſe name is underwritten, do certify, that I was in Avignon all the time the R. Father Coton, of the ſociety of Jeſus, lived there, and that I never heard any one ſay, that he had committed any thing contrary to the dignity and quality of his profeſſion; and in particular as to what the Anti-Coton charges upon him. In which Anti-Coton, ſince I am made the author of a manifeſt calumny, wherewith the R. Father Coton is charged: I frankly aver, that I know nothing of it, and that I have always looked upon the ſaid R. Father Coton as a venerable and worthy man. In teſtimony whereof, I have written and ſigned this preſent depoſition. From Paris, in my ſtudy, the eve of St Denys the martyr, 1610. OLIVIER ABBOT DU BOIS. And I have ſealed it with my ſeal. Beſides this he produced four certificates (80), ſeen and acknowledged for authentic, true, and legal, by the royal notaries of the city of Paris. The firſt was ſigned Lewis Beau, prothonotary of the holy apoſtolic ſee, and ſealed with his ſeal, and with thoſe of two ſubſequent archbiſhops in the metropolitan city of Avignon, whoſe vicar-general he had been all the time of Father Coton's ſojourning in Avignon. The ſecond was ſigned by fifteen perſons, who compoſed and repreſented all the clergy of Avignon. The third was ſigned by the two conſuls of Avignon, and their acceſſor, and ſealed with the ſeal of the conſular houſe. The fourth was given by the biſhop of Orange. Theſe four atteſtations concur, not only in contradicting the author of the Anti-Coton, as an infamous calumniator; but alſo in extolling Father Coton's good and pious conduct. Beſides theſe certificates, the magiſtrates of Avignon writ to this Jeſuit in theſe terms (81). ‘ If theſe teſtimonies of prelates and conſuls are not ſufficient, we can produce the certificates of the greateſt part of the gentlemen, doctors, citizens, merchants, and others of the town.’ I know not what could be produced of greater force, to juſty the accuſed. And yet there are a great many, who ſtill believed, the nun was got with child, and that ſentence had been paſſed upon Father Coton. They gave more credit to the Anti-Coton, who brought no proof, nor any authentic evidence, than to Father Coton, who produced all that the moſt exact judicial procedings could require. This could be nothing but the effect of an extravagant prejudice.

The fate of the Jeſuits, and that of Catiline, is much the ſame. Several accuſations were given in againſt Catiline, without any proof; but they met with credit upon this general argument; ſince he has done ſuch a thing, he is very capable of having done this, or that, and it is very probable he has done the reſt. The hiſtorian Salluſt has judiciouſly obſerved this illuſion, which is not a ſophiſm of the ſchools, but of the town. ‘ Scio fuiſſe nonnullos qui ita exiſtimarent, juventutem quæ domum Catilinæ frequentabat parum honeſte pudicitiam habuiſſe: ſed ex aliis rebus magis quam quod cuiquam id compertum foret, hæc fama valebat (82). I know there were ſome, who looked upon the young perſons, who frequented Catiline's houſe, as men of ill fame; but it was not a knowledge of them, but ſome thing elſe, that gave riſe to this opinion.’ There was publiſhed at the Hague, about eleven years ago, a book intituled, the Religion of the Jeſuits. The author confeſſes, that the prejudice againſt theſe gentlemen is ſo general, that whatever atteſtations of innocence they fortify themſelves with, it is impoſſible to undeceive the world. ‘ We muſt know, ſays he (83), that nothing ſo horrible can be ſaid againſt the Jeſuits, though ever ſo doubtful, but what becomes probable from their character, and the conſideration of what they are capable of.’ He gives two examples of this: One is, ‘ the report ſpread, not only at Heidelburg, but through all Europe, that they had ſuborned a falſe ſpirit from the other world, who cried every night in the ears of the old the moſt of this plea, that without being at the pains of anſwering particularly to all the charges of their enemies, they may be furniſhed with one general common-place, to invalidate the accuſations [R]. But it is certain, there are thoſe, who, without appearing prejudiced, maintain, that ſeveral things have juſtly rendered this ſociety odious. They have not acquired ſo great a power, ſay they, nor preſerved it ſo long, without the

'duke, that there was no ſalvation for him, unleſs he would exterminate Hereſy and Heretics out of his new dominions, according to the counſel of the Fathers Jeſuits: the duke, tired with theſe viſions, reſolved to enquire into the matter. He declared himſelf to one of his officers, who engaged to conjure the ſpirit moſt effectually, without either prayers or holy water. The officer hid himſelf under the prince's bed, and when the ſpirit came, he ſo hacked and hewed him with his hanger, that it is ſaid he died of his wounds. The officer who had done the exploit, had the indiſcretion to tell his wife of it, againſt the duke's expreſs commands. The wife was no more retentive than the husband. And thus the thing was divulged. The Jeſuits have tried all manner of ways to clear themſelves. The duke has iſſued rigorous injunctions in his eſtates, againſt ſpeaking of it. The Jeſuits have procured certificates under the hands of the Proteſtants themſelves, concerning the falſity of the ſtory. But all to no purpoſe. They will never deſtroy the ſuſpicions, which theſe ſtories, whether true or falſe, have imprinted in the people's minds, becauſe they are known to be capable of this juggle, by others of the ſame ſtamp.' He mentions ſome of them in general, I mean without circumſtances of time, and and place, and perſons: and after having adviſed us to reject their certificates from the Palatinate, he concludes thus (84): 'However, be this little ſtory true, or be it falſe, we know what they can do, and that is enough to make the thing probable.' The other example is, that the Jeſuits had 'plotted to poiſon the emperor in the ſacrament (85).' This prince was cautioned of it, 'and would not communicate the next day, but forced the Jeſuit to take the poiſoned Hoſt, of which he died. The emperor and court of Vienna, according to it's devotion, ordered, under terrible penalties, the few perſons, that were privy to it, to keep the thing a ſecret. It was not however well kept; or at leaſt it ſpread a little, and a gentleman of honour (86) ſwore, that the thing happened for certain in Vienna . . . (87), We do not give this for a truth, purſues the author, and, indeed to ſay all, we are not much inclined to believe it: but be it ever ſo falſe, the Jeſuits will never be able to deſtroy the ſuſpicion of it, becauſe of the character of the ſociety, which is known all the world over' He adds ſeveral reflexions tending to perſuade his readers, that this ſtory of Vienna is certain; and then proceeds (88): 'The thing, after all may be falſe; but it will ever be thought probable, conſidering the ordinary conduct of theſe good fathers . . . . (89). They, who believe the ſtory of Vienna falſe, will however believe it probable. If it be falſe, it will at leaſt ſerve to juſtify what I have juſt now ſaid, that the hatred againſt the ſociety is extream even in the church of Rome.' See the margin (90).

Without ſo many repetitions, we might eaſily have taken his thought. He means, that a man need only confidently publiſh whatever he pleaſes againſt the Jeſuits, to be aſſured, that abundence of people will believe it. I believe him in the right; at leaſt, that in this he will prove a good prophet. It was doubtleſs on this preſumption, that he publiſhed the ſtory of Vienna, though he believed it falſe. But if other authors have taken the ſame method, what will become of all the facts, which the enemies of the Jeſuits have publiſhed? Should we not have reaſon to believe, that they have divulged ſeveral, which they knew to be falſe, or doubtful, and which nevertheleſs would in their reckoning appear as certain, and be received by the public as undoubted truths? I cannot think the rules of morality will allow the making ſo ill a uſe of public prejudice: They command us to be equitable towards all, and never to repreſent people worſe than they are. I own to this author, that the readineſs, wherewith the public ſwallows all that is ſaid againſt the Jeſuits, is a ſign of an exceſſive averſion to the ſociety (91), and I deny not but this averſion affords moſt reaſonable conſequences, which blaſt their reputation (92). He has reaſon to add (93), 'that the good fathers would not do amiſs to explain to us this riddle; how it comes to paſs, that, being ſo good, ſo officious, and ſo amiable, they are notwithſtanding ſo terribly hated, whilſt the Janſeniſts and Jacobins are not ſo cried down in the world, as the Jeſuits are (94).' But he might perhaps be embarraſſed, ſhould we require of him the explication of another riddle: how it comes to paſs, that there are miniſters, accompliſhed in all kinds of virtues, as they pretend, who are hated as a peſt in all the communions different from their own, and who have innumerable enemies in their own, and of whom nothing could be publiſhed, but what would appear probable, whilſt Mr Daillé, and Mr Claude, are every where in good reputation? Be it how it will, I queſtion whether this writer had all the prudence of a nice diſputant, when he inſiſted ſo much upon this great diſpoſition of the public to believe whatever is printed againſt the Jeſuits. This is more proper, than he imagines, to keep their own friends faſt to them, who will eaſily believe, that this prejudice has been made too much uſe of, in publiſhing the moſt ill grounded ſtories. And as, at the bottom, it is a great fault, to be ready to believe whatever is ſaid to the diſadvantage of our enemies, true or falſe, doubtful or certain, ſo there is more indiſcretion, than ſincerity, in revealing this prepoſſeſſion. Would a cunning enemy diſcover this weak place? But, in point of indiſcretion, this author has not his fellow. Does not he ſay in the ſame book (95), that the Eſprit de Mr Arnaud was ſuppreſſed in Holland, only becauſe of the FEAR, 'the country was in at that time, of quarelling with the Engliſh?' Does he not tell the public (96), 'that this prohibition hindred not the book's being ſold quietly, and without any other precaution, than that of not expoſing it in a bookſeller's ſhop? The fine, adds he (97), impoſed on the Printer was neither demanded, nor paid; it was only a formality to ſtop the mouth of the court of England; and they themſelves, who had forbidden it, would have been very ſorry, if it had not been ſold. Nor did this prohibition hinder it's being re-printed in this country. He, who was reckoned the author of the book, was not a jot the worſe received for it at court, and every where elſe.' Is it not to ſpeak with the utmoſt contempt of his ſovereign, to repreſent Holland ſo very much afraid of England. Tho' this pretended fear were true, would not a good ſubject have concealed it? Would he have revealed it to the public? Would he confeſs, that the edicts of the State, againſt a book, were only a vain formality, which the Bookſellers laughed at? I omit what may be ſaid more: it is an abyſs, which prudence adviſes to ſtop at the brink of; my indiſcretion would be a hundred times more blameable, than that of this author, if I did not draw a veil over what he has had the raſhneſs to boaſt of, and if I did not cry out, Procul hinc, procul eſſe profani. He has ſacrificed to a paternal affection, the things he ought to have had the moſt reſpect for; for no body doubts that the author of the Eſprit de Mr Arnaud, and the author of the Religion of the Jeſuits, is one and the ſame perſon. Nothing is more eaſily diſcovered; for the elogies, he beſtows on the firſt of theſe books, in the latter, can proceed only from the affection of a father, who idolizes his own offspring, and is ſtruck with a ſingular fondneſs for the Eſprit de Mr Arnaud, the child of his own brain, on a double account, firſt, as it is made according to his own image and ſimilitude; next, as it contains his own true character (98).

[R] . . . . They fail not to make the moſt of this plea . . . . that they may be furniſhed with one general common-place to invalidate the accuſations.] Heretofore they uſed to anſwer all the books that were written againſt them; at laſt they are weary of it. The reaſon they alledge for their ſilence is, that they are no more obliged to confute the ſatires of their enemies, than the king of France is to anſwer the Gazettes of Amſterdam. the aſſiſtance of the moſt refined human policy. Now does not this take in the whole compaſs of ill morals, as to ſpiritual ſins? Beſides, the Jeſuits are the men, who have carried fartheſt, and with the greateſt eagerneſs, the conſequences of ſeveral doctrines, which were hatched before their time, and which expoſe kings to continual revolutions [S], Proteſtants to butchery, and Chriſtian morality to the moſt deplorable relaxation

‘ it is Father Tellier who ſpeaks (99), the Jeſuits to neglect anſwering libels, which in their opinion are no leſs fabulous and contemptible, than the Gazettes of Amſterdam, and the hiſtorical or prophetical Syſtems of Mr Jurieu? Ought they to be more tender in point of reputation, that the powers whom God has placed over us? Ought they not, or, at leaſt may they not, be permitted, after theſe great examples, to deſpiſe what only touches their particular honour.’ Here are more reaſons of theirs, taken from the inſignificancy of their anſwers, and the diſpoſition of one part of the public to take for truth, whatever is ſaid againſt them (100). ‘ We no ſooner anſwer one of their ſatires, but they have half a dozen more ready to be publiſhed. They keep magazines full of them, they have them remitted from all parts of the world. Thoſe that were refuted a hundred years ago, or which the world laughed at, though they were not refuted, they revive again at preſent, with the ſame confidence, as if they were new pieces, or had remained unanſwered. And the generation, that ſhall come after them forty or fifty years hence, will do the ſame with thoſe ſatires invented in our days, as deſpicable, and as deſpiſed as they are. What uſe will it be, for inſtance, to the Jeſuits of China, to have been the firſt, and almoſt the only men, who ſubmitted, without the leaſt reſiſtance, to the apoſtolical vicars, in 1684, when this has not hindered their enemies from publiſhing, the laſt ſummer, by the pen of their ſecretary, the Holland Gazetteer, that the holy father was extreamly provoked againſt the Jeſuits, becauſe they would not acknowledge the biſhops he had ſent to China. Can it be doubted, that, ſome years hence, this lye will come again upon the ſtage? In like manner, what advantage will it be to the Jeſuits of Germany, to have had an atteſtation, ſigned by four of the principal counſellors of the Elector Palatine, all Proteſtants, in which they declare, that the ſtory of a Jeſuit, counterfeiting a voice from heaven to deceive this prince, and to excite him to the deſtruction of hereſy, is a pure fable? Will this act hereafter hinder any good Proteſtant, who ſhall continue the Hiſtory of the Jeſuits, from making a chapter of this chimerical adventure, upon the credit of the Holland Gazetteer? Why ſhould we not expect this, when we ſee the graveſt authors of the party ſeriouſly tell us the ſtory of the packers of Amiens, with all the circumſtances that are capable of making a ſtory ridiculous . . . . After this, let not the Holland Gazetteer repent his publiſhing, for example, that it was the Jeſuits, who by their avarice and wicked councils, engaged the emperor in the laſt Hungarian war; that the people of Vienna, enraged againſt them on this account, maſſacred ſeveral of them, when they would have eſcaped upon the approach of the Ottoman army: that it was they, who burnt Stockholm the laſt year, (a little before, it was four diſguiſed Turks that did it) &c. Let him not repent his publiſhing theſe follies, and an hundred more of the ſame nature, nor let him change his ſtile for the future. If they are at preſent deſpiſed, at leaſt he may aſſure himſelf, that the time will come, when they ſhall be very good memoirs for him who ſhall write the twentieth, or the thirtieth Tome of the Practical Morality (101). You ſee with how much artifice they take advantage of the prejudice of their enemies; and how they verify the maxim, misfortune is good for ſomething. They turn the hatred of the world againſt them to their advantage, Fruuntur Diis iratis. It is certain, their enemies would hurt them more, if they obſerved ſome meaſure in the blows they give them; for whilſt they promiſcuouſly heap on well-grounded accuſations with thoſe that are otherwiſe, they favour the accuſed; they give him a handle for rendring thoſe ſuſpected, which are really true. A man muſt be very blind, not to foreſee, that ſeveral libels, which daily appear againſt the ſociety (102), will put weapons into their hands. Did they pay the authors for publiſhing ſuch ſtories, they might be ſaid to employ their money well. See the remark I have made upon the art of ſlandering (103). Note, that the Janſeniſts (104) politickly boaſt, they are not ſo credulous, with regard to the Jeſuits, as the Proteſtants are.

[S] The Jeſuits . . . . have carried far . . . . the conſequences of ſeveral doctrines, which were hatched before their time, and which expoſe kings to continual revolutions.] The opinion, that the authority of kings is inferior to that of the people, and that they may by puniſhed by the people, in certain caſes, has been taught and practiſed in all countries, in all ages, and in all Chriſtian communions, that have made any figure in the world. Hiſtory affords us inſtances every where of kings depoſed at the inſtigation, or with the approbation of the clergy. The opinion, that ſovereigns have received the ſword from God, to puniſh Heretics, is yet more univerſal, than the former, and has been reduced to practice among Chriſtians, from the days of Conſtantine to ours, in all the Chriſtian communions, that have had the power in their hands; and a man dares ſcarce write in Holland againſt ſuch an opinion. Theſe two doctrines therefore were not invented by the Jeſuits; but they have drawn the moſt odious conſequences from them, and ſuch as are moſt prejudicial to public peace: for, from the conjunction of theſe two principles, they have concluded, and that, as they think, by conſequential reaſoning, that an heretical prince ought to be depoſed, and Hereſy extirpated by fire and ſword, if it cannot be done any other way. If ſovereigns have received the ſword to puniſh Heretics, it is evident, that the people, the true ſovereign of their monarchs, according to the firſt principle, ought to puniſh them, when they perſiſt in Hereſy. But the gentleſt puniſhment, that can be inflicted on a Heretic, is, doubtleſs impriſonment, baniſhment, confiſcation of goods; and conſeqently an heretical king ought at leaſt to be dethroned by the people, his ſovereign, and ſuperiour; ſince, according to the firſt principle, monarchs are only delegates to whom the people, not being able to exerciſe it's ſovereignty in perſon, recommend the functions and exerciſe of it, with reſtrictions, and an inalienable right of reſuming them, when they acquit themſelves ill. Now there is no caſe, in which they ought more reaſonably to be diveſted of them, than when they deſerve the puniſhment, which the ſovereign, according to the ſecond principle, is ordered by God to inflict on Heretics. But as it is not ordinarily poſſible by judicial proceſſes to take from them the goods, which they have fairly forfeited by virtue of the laws, which God will have eſtabliſhed againſt Hereſy: as, I ſay, they have moſt commonly power enough in their hands to maintain themſelves in the exerciſe of royalty; an exerciſe, which is nothing but uſurpation, as long as they are Heretics; it follows, that recourſe muſt be had to artifice, in order to bring them to the puniſhments, which they have rightfully incurred; that is to ſay, conſpiracies may be formed againſt their perſons; ſince, otherwiſe, God would have given the ſword to the people, as a true ſovereign, for the puniſhment of Heretics, in vain. On the other hand, if ſovereigns have received the ſword, to puniſh the breakers of the two tables of the Decalogue, it follows, that they ought to proceed with greater ſeverity againſt Heretics, who violate the firſt table, than againſt murderers and thieves, who only violate the ſecond; for the infractions of the firſt are immediate treaſon againſt the divine majeſty, and affront God directly: whereas the infractions of the ſecond offend him only in an indirect manner. It is therefore the duty of eccleſiaſtics to excite ſovereigns to the puniſhment of Heretics, violators of the firſt table of the commandments; and if princes are negligent in this part, that negligence deſerves more to be exclaimed againſt, than a neglect in puniſhing murderers and robbers. It ought alſo to be repreſented, that if the inevitable danger of ruining the ſtate, obliges them to grant Heretics a toleration, they are bound to keep their word no longer than the tion that can be imagined [T]. To return to Loyola, I ought to mention that the houſe, in which he was born, is at preſent called Santa Caſa, and that the queen dowager of Spain has made a grant of it to the Jeſuits [U]; that three ſermons were preached upon danger laſts; and this danger ceaſing, they ought to reſume the ſword for the extirpation of Hereſy, juſt as they would reſume it againſt robbers and murderers, when the danger which forced them to make a truce with theſe, is once over. In a word, if God has given the ſword into the ſovereign's hand for the puniſhment of Hereſy, the granting it impunity will render them as criminal before God, as the granting impunity to theft, adultery, and murder; and the only thing that can excuſe them, would be, that for the avoiding a greater evil, the infallible ruin of the ſtate and church, they were forced to promiſe the ſuſpenſion of the penal laws; whence it follows, that they are obliged to their firſt engagement as ſoon as that danger is paſſed; for every oath that engages to the diſobedience of the laws of God, is eſſentially null. Thus you ſee upon what foundations the Jeſuits have built a ſyſtem, which hath rendered them ſo odious, and which has given ſo juſt a horror for the maxims that ſeveral among them have vented. They have built upon a foundation, which they found ready to their hands; they have raiſed conſequence upon conſequence, quite out of ſight, without being aſtoniſhed at the hideouſneſs of the objects; they have believed on one hand, that this would turn to the advantage of the church; and on the other, that they did nothing againſt the art of right reaſoning. I ſhall not examine, whether Logic in effect did not lead them through all theſe conſequences; the matter would be too odious. I content my ſelf with ſaying, that France, having ſeen two of her kings ſucceſſively murdered, under the pernicious pretence, that they were favourers of Heretics, thought ſhe could no better ruin this wretched gradation of conſequences, than by overturning the firſt principle it depends upon. For this reaſon the third eſtate of the kingdom (105) reſolved to condemn as pernicious all doctrines, which make the authority of monarchs depend on any thing beſides God. I add to this an obſervation of Mr Jurieu: he cannot be ſuſpected of partiality to the Jeſuits, and yet it is certain, he praiſed this reaſoning, viz. princes may put Heretics to death, therefore they ought to put them to death; and laughed at a man, who neither blamed thoſe, who do put them to death, nor thoſe, who do not put them to death. Let us ſee Mr Jurieu's words (106).

‘I explain my ſelf (107), and ſay, that I am for thoſe, who do not put Heretics to death; and it is my opinion, that their example ought to be followed. But as I believe on the other hand, that it is lawful to puniſh Heretics capitally, I condemn not thoſe, who do it: both do well in my judgment. Mr Ferrand adds this laſt period to explain his thought, as he ſays. It had not been amiſs, if he had added two, or three, or more, to explain it farther. For they, who have any penetration, will be hard put to it, to unfold this author's notion. They will think, he has hit on a very odd medium. He is of opinion, that it is lawful, and conſequently very juſt, to burn the Calviniſts; but yet the beſt way is not to do it: ſome troubleſome diſputant will urge thus: It is never permitted to put any to death, but thoſe who deſerve it. If it be permitted to put the Calviniſts to death, they certainly deſerve it. Now how can reaſon, juſtice, and equity permit us to ſuffer thoſe to live in public ſociety who deſerve death? I know very well, that a ſovereign may, without any crime, give a murderer his life, or a robber, or a rebel, who deſerved death: but it is ſuppoſed, that they repent; and that, having once fallen into a crime, they now forſake it, and reſolve never to return to it more; there is mercy for every ſin. But there is nothing like this, in the caſe of letting Heretics live, who deſerve death on account of their Hereſy, and who perſevere however, and declare their reſolution to perſevere in it. I ſhould chuſe in the ſame manner to ſay, that it is juſt to put robbers, murderers, and ſorcerers to death, who proteſt they will rob, kill, and poiſon all they can, as long as they are ſuffered to live.’

Mr Jurieu reaſons as well in this paſſage, as he reaſons ill in an other book (108), where he maintains, that magiſtrates are obliged to puniſh Idolaters, but yet does not blame the impunity, which the States of Holland ſuffer them to enjoy, for whole ages together. Note, that, in ſaying he reaſons well, I have ſupplied, by my imagination, a clauſe that is moſt eſſential to his diſcourſe, and which he has omitted. The laſt period is abſurd, unleſs this be added to it, or ſomething equivalent; and nevertheleſs, I am for thoſe, who do not put them to death, and it is my opinion their example ought to be followed.

[T] . . . . and Chriſtian morality to the moſt deplorable relaxation.] It was not the Jeſuits, who invented the mental reſervations, nor the other opinions, that Mr Paſcal has charged upon them (109), nor even the philoſophical ſin (110). They found all this in other authors, either expreſsly, or in ſuch a manner, as a doctrine is in the principle, that produces it by conſequences. But as we have ſeen in their ſociety a greater number of patrons of theſe opinions, than in other communities, and that in their hands, the looſe maxims grew daily more fruitful, by the earneſtneſs with which they diſputed on theſe points, they have been formally and expreſsly impleaded. Wretched fruits of diſputation! their method of ſtudying has had at leaſt as great a ſhare in it, as the corruption of the heart. Before they come to read moral Divinity, they have dictated one or more courſes of Philoſophy; they have accuſtomed themſelves to cavil upon every thing; they have wrangled a thouſand times upon the ens rationis; they have heard as often the queſtions maintained pro and con about univerſals, and many other things of the ſame nature; their heads are ſo turned to objection and diſtinction, that, when they come to handle matters of morality, they find themſelves wholly diſpoſed to perplex them. Diſtinctions offer to them in ſhoals; arguments ad hominem, oblige you to fortify your ſelf on every hand, and to abate one thing to day, another thing to morrow. All this is very dangerous. Diſpute as long as you pleaſe upon logical queſtions; but in morality be content with good ſenſe, and with that light, which the reading of the Goſpel ſheds on your mind. If you go about to diſpute after a ſcholaſtic manner, you will not readily find a clew to the labyrinth. It was a very good ſaying of a certain perſon, that the books of the Caſuiſts are nothing but the art of cavilling with God (111). Theſe advocates in the court of conſcience find out more diſtinctions and ſubtilties, than the Lawyers in the civil courts. They make the tribunal of conſcience a ſort of moral laboratory, in which the moſt ſolid truths evaporate into ſmoak, volatile ſalts, and vapour. What Cicero ſaid of the ſubtilties of Logic, admirably agrees with thoſe of the Caſuiſts. ‘Dialectici ad extremum ipſi ſe compungunt ſuis acuminibus, & multa quærendo reperiunt non modo ea quæ jam non poſſint ipſi diſſolvere, ſed etiam quibus ante exorſa & potius detexta prope retexantur (112). —— The Logicians at laſt wound themſelves with their own edge, and, by enquiring after many things, find not only what they cannot themſelves give a ſolution of, but what overthrows all they have before been raiſing.’ A man is caught in webs of his own ſpinning; he is loſt, and knows not how to turn himſelf; nor has he any way to diſengage, but by relaxing in almoſt every article. They, who have read Father Pirot's book (113) will own, that it is eaſier to cenſure it, and perceive, that it contains dangerous doctrines, than anſwer his objections.

On the whole, tho' the Jeſuits are not the authors of the relaxed opinions, and tho' they are daily maintained by others, yet they ought not to think it hard, that they are charged with them; whilſt we go upon a principle, which they themſelves approve, with regard to the verſion of Mons (114).

the country, in which Ignatius was born. He ſays, that, at preſent, this province takes in Guipuſcoa, Biſcay, and the country of Alava. Theſe two laſt countries produced Ignatius's anceſtors. The firſt gave him birth in the territory of Azpeytia; for the caſtle of Loyola is ſituated in this territory. The fonts of the church of St Sebaſtian d'Azpeytia, in which Ignatius was baptized, are a continual object of devotion. Women with child flock thither, and paſſionately deſire their children may be chriſtened at them, and take the name of Ignatius, or Ignatia as an omen of good fortune. The caſtle of Loyola, where this ſaint was born, is ſtanding to this day, and is called la Santa Caſa. Lewis Henry de Cabrera, and Tereſa Henrietta Velaſca de Loyola, marquis and marchioneſs of Alcanizas and Oropeſa, laſt proprietors of this caſtle, made a ſolemn grant of it, in the year 1681, to Marianna of Auſtria, mother to the preſent king of Spain (116). This princeſs gave it the year following to the Jeſuits, for the founding a college for their ſociety, and only reſerved the right of patronage to herſelf, during her life, and, after her death, to her ſon the king, and the ſucceeding kings of Spain. But ſhe impoſed upon the donataries the ſame condition, that was annexed to the ceſſion made to herſelf of it; which was that they ſhould not be permitted to demoliſh any part of the caſtle wall, but content themſelves with building by it (117).

RASH conjectures on the happineſs of Paradice.

Should I only mention a curious book of Gabriel Henao, without giving any account of it, I might be complained of for having impertinently provoked the reader's curioſity. I ſhall ſay then, that this Jeſuit publiſhed a volume in folio, in the year 1652, intituled, Empyreologia, ſeu Philoſophia Chriſtiana de Empyreo cælo, in which he ſo particularly deſcribes the bleſſedneſs of Paradice, as to ſay (118) there will be muſic in heaven, with material inſtruments, as on earth. But his account, if I miſtake not, is not comparable to that of Lewis Henricus, his brother Jeſuit, who affirms (119); that there will be a ſovereign pleaſure in kiſſing and embracing the bodies of the bleſſed; that they ſhall bathe in the ſight of one another, for which there ſhall be moſt delicious baths; that they ſhall ſwim in them like fiſhes; and ſing as harmonious as larks and nightingales. That the angels ſhall be dreſſed like women, and ſhall appear to the ſaints in the habits of ladies, their hair curled, their petty-coats fardingaled, and in the richeſt linnen. That men and women ſhall divert themſelves with maſquerades, feaſts, and balls. That the women ſhall ſing more agreeably than the men, to make the pleaſure greater; that they ſhall riſe again with longer hair, and ſhall be decked with ribands and head-dreſſes, as they are in this world. That married people ſhall kiſs one other, as in this life, and their pretty ſweet children, which will be no ſmall pleaſure.

[X] Three ſermons, preached upon his beatification, were cenſured by the Sorbonne.] Paul V having beatified Ignatius in the year 1609, the Jeſuits ‘ kept a ſolemn feſtival in all their houſes, colleges, and noviciates, where they made choice of, and deſired ſome of the greateſt divines who were not of their order, to make his panegyric (120).’ Valderrama, prior of the Auguſtines of Seville, preached the ſermon, the thirty firſt of July 1610. Peter Deza, dominican of Valentia, preached another, the twenty ſixth of January 1610. James Rebulloſa, dominican of Barcelona, preached a third the fourth ſunday of Advent 1609. A Jeſuit of Limoſin, called Francis Solier, tranſlated theſe three ſermons out of Spaniſh into French, and publiſhed them at Poitiers in 1611. In theſe ſermons were found four articles, which the Faculty of Divinity at Paris, aſſembled in the Sorbonne, the firſt of October 1611, thundered againſt in a terrible manner,

‘ The firſt is in the firſt ſermon of brother P. de Valderama, pag. 54, and 55. We know indeed, that Moſes, carrying his rod in his hand, did very great miracles in the air, in the earth, in the water, in the ſtones, and in every thing he pleaſed, ſo far as to drown Pharoah and his army in the Red-Sea; but it was the ineffable name of God, which, as the learned Toſtat, biſhop of Avilla, ſays, was engraven on this wand or rod, which worked theſe wonders. It was not ſo great a matter, that the creatures, ſeeing the commands of God, their ſovereign king and lord, ſubſcribed with his own name, ſhould pay him their homage and obedience. Nor was it any great wonder, that the apoſtles ſhould work miracles, ſince it was in the name of God, by the virtue and power which he had given them; ſigning it with his ſignet, In nomine meo dæmonia ejicient, linguis loquentur novis, &c. —— In my name they ſhall caſt out devils, they ſhall ſpeak with new tongues. But that Ignatius, with his own name written in paper, ſhould work more miracles than Moſes, and as many as the apoſtles; that his ſignet ſhould have ſo much authority over the creatures, as that they ſhould immediately obey him; this is what renders him exceedingly admirable. The ſecond is in page 91. of the ſame ſermon. As long as Ignatius lived, his life and morals were ſo grave, ſo holy, and ſo exalted, even in the opinion of heaven, that there were only ſome Popes, as St Peter; ſome empereſſes as the mother of God; ſome ſovereign monarch, as God the Father and his holy Son, who had the happineſs to ſee it (121). The third is in brother Peter Deza's ſermon, pag. 111, 112. Doubtleſs the other founders of religious orders were ſent in favour of the church, &c. Noviſſime autem diebus iſtis loquutus eſt nobis in filio ſuo Ignatio, quem conſtituit hæredem univerſorum. —— But in theſe laſt days he hath ſpoken unto us, by his ſon Ignatius, whom he hath appointed heir of all things: to which there is no other article of praiſe wanting than per quem fecit Sæcula. —— By whom he made the worlds. The fourth is in brother James Rebulloſa's ſermon, pag. 207. The martyr Ignatius bore a moſt particular affection to the holy father and Pope of Rome, as to the lawful ſucceſſor of Jeſus Chriſt, and his vicar on earth (122).’

The Faculty ‘ voted and reſolved on the firſt article, that that form of ſpeech, by which the name of the creature is equalled with the name of Almighty God; the miracles done in the name of God are depreciated; and finally, the miracles, which were not as yet certain, are preferred before thoſe, which we are obliged to believe with a Catholic, indubitable faith, is ſcandalous, erroneous, blaſphemous, and impious. As to the ſecond, that aſſertion, which pretends, that God received any good from the viſion of the creature is of it ſelf deteſtable, falſe, and a notorious Hereſy. As to the third, which appropriates the text of St Paul, Noviſſime autem, &c. to any other than Jeſus Chriſt, it is execrable, and blaſphemous, and impious. As to the laſt article, it has two contrary parts, one of which deſtroys the other: the laſt indeed is Catholic, and approved; namely, that the Pope is the vicar of Jeſus Chriſt on earth; but the firſt, viz. that the Pope is the lawful ſucceſſor of Jeſus Chriſt, is a propoſition manifeſtly falſe, and altogether heretical. Signed C. Petit Jan curate of St Peter (123).’

Father Solier publiſhed a very bold and threatning apology for them (124). in which he ſays, amongſt other things, that it ought to be remembered, that one ſpeaks after a popular manner in ſermons and declamations, and chiefly in that ſtile, which they call demonſtrative and encomiaſtic, which more eaſily admits amplifications than the deliberative and judicial kind (125), and that it is eaſy to diſcover when the preacher advances a conception rather to delight the ear, than ſeriouſly to inſtruct the auditors (126). He ſhewed that Lewis de Grenade, St Antoninus, and St Bernard, have made as bold applications of ſcripture, and even bolder than thoſe complained of. He cites many ſcripture-paſſages (127), to juſtify this thought of Valderrama; ‘ as long as Ignatius lived, his life and his manners were not univerſally known: none but God the Father, and his Son, having the happineſs to ſee it; but as ſoon as he was dead, all the courtiers of the king eternal ran to ſee him (128).’ He asks (129), if, ‘ when the Holy Ghoſt ſays, in the canticles, to a choſen ſoul, oſtende mihi faciem tuam, ſonet vox tua in auribus meis, vox enim tua dulcis & facies tua decora; it would be ill tranſlating, or blaſpheming, or paraphraſing, this paſſage, to ſay, my dove, let me ſee thy face, and hear thy voice; foraſmuch as thy voice is ſweet, and thy countenance beautiful.’ He anſwers nothing concerning the fourth propoſition, which was cenſured, and ſeems to be ignorant that it was condemned.

doubtleſs were a freſh acceſſion to Stephen Paſquier's diſcontent [Y]. Some differences aroſe condemned. Not but he undertook to juſtify the four articles; but he ſuppoſes, that the fourth was this: that only the order of St Francis, works miracles in matter of voluntary poverty (130). ‘For a lay-brother of his order, ſays he, with the cord, which ſerves him for a girdle, in his hand, works more miracles, than ever the rod of Moſes did; becauſe the latter only drew water from a rock; but this extracts bread, wine, fleſh, and whatever he has need off, from hearts harder than flint.’ He excuſes this two ways; firſt, by ſaying it is one of thoſe notions a preacher advances, not as a ſerious doctrine, but to tickle the ears of his auditors: Secondly, by maintaining that, even literally, the propoſition is true. But, ſays he, though we ſhould take it in ſtrict ſpeaking, and with all the rigours of the ſchool, is it not true, that it is a greater work to mollify an heart ſteeled by ſinful habits, and hardened in iniquity, than to make living water ſpring out of a rock? Has not St Bernard ſaid in this ſenſe, that Jeſus Chriſt worked a greater miracle in the converſion of Mary Magdalen, than in raiſing her brother Lazarus from the dead? He had better have confined himſelf to the firſt reaſon, which was only to repreſent, that there is an indulgence due to the ſallies of an orator, and the eloquence of the pulpit, eſpecially amongſt Monks; and that the day of the panegyric is in poſſeſſion of almoſt an unlimited licence. But this hinders not, that ſometimes the enthuſiaſms of this licence ought to be cenſured; as the archbiſhop of Rheims has lately done (131). I forget not, that Scioppius (132) has been very merry upon a place of this Peter Deza's ſermon. It is that, where the preacher exhibits, as a great miracle, the happineſs the Jeſuits have had in obtaining whatever they deſired in an age ſo covetous, ſo hard-hearted, and void of charity.

Hoſpinian, ſpeaking of this matter, has ſaid a thing which, no doubt, he has perſuaded a great many of, and which notwithſtanding ſeems to be very falſe. He ſays, that the Jeſuits themſelves compoſed theſe three ſermons; but that, for the greater honour of their St Jgnatius, they gave out that the Spaniſh dominicans had preached them. He adds, that this fraud was diſcovered (133). Common ſenſe revolts againſt this accuſation; for ſuppoſe the Jeſuits as wicked as you pleaſe, it will not do; you muſt farther ſuppoſe them ſtupid, and as fooliſh as children; ſince none but blockheads could poſſibly imagine, but that, in two months at fartheſt, they ſhould be expoſed in the face of the world, if they ventured to print, that ſuch and ſuch Monks, diſtinguiſhed by their place of reſidence, their dignities and names, had preached ſuch and ſuch things, ſuch a day, in ſuch a town. Such falſehoods cannot fail of being preſently confuted by a public and judicial contradiction, which renders the lyar the eternal ſubject of his enemies deriſion. If none but fools could foreſee this imminent mortification, nothing but a brutal ſtupidity would, upon ſuch a foreſight, have expoſed itſelf to the hazard; ſo that there is all kind of probability to make us believe, that the Jeſuits, who are very jealous of the honour of their order, and very tender of their intereſts, and narrowly obſerved by vigilant enemies, have not falſly fathered the three ſermons, which Francis Solier printed at Poictiers; and ſince the Janſeniſts (134) attribute only the French tranſlation to the Jeſuits, it is an evident proof, that Hoſpinian is miſtaken. This brings to my mind a charge of forgery, which proved unfortunate to the Capuchins of Paris. They pretended, that the approbation of one of their fathers, prefixed to a book of Amadæus Guimenius, was fictitious. We declare, ſaid they, that not any one of us approved that book, and farther, that there neither has been, nor is in our congregation any provincial monk, who is called Luiſius of Valentia, who has been twice provincial miniſter of the Frier minors of St Francis, Capuchins of the province of the Blood of Jeſus Chriſt, in the kingdoms of Valencia and Murcia, Maſter of Arts, firſt profeſſor, and Jubilate reader of ſacred Divinity, and counſellor qualificator of the Inquiſition of both kingdoms; and that we have not in Spain any province ſo called. We proteſt alſo that theſe pompous titles, wherewith the author of this forged approbation is adorned, are very remote from the ſimplicity we profeſs. We declare theſe things upon the teſtimony of our moſt reverend father general, who having underſtood, that this book was publiſhed with this approbation, has teſtified what we have ſaid. This declaration of forgery was confuted in all it's parts by authentic acts, attended with all the formalities, that the moſt judicial procedure could require (135). What did the good Capuchins of Paris think of? Could they imagine, that practiſed forgers would ſpecify ſo many characters, proper names, titles of dignity, places of reſidence, if they had a falſe approbation to produce? Would not this be pointing out the track to their enemies, to take the hare in it's form? Would not this be leading by the hand to the diſcovery of the impoſture? The Janſeniſts have publickly acknowledged, that the certificate of the Capuchins of Paris contains a falſe allegation (136).

Note, by the way, that the proper names are wretchedly diſguiſed in this relation of Hoſpinian; probably by the negligence of the correctors. You find Valderanna, and Vualderanna, inſtead of Valderrama; Doza inſtead of Deza; Teſtatus inſtead of Toſtatus; Tileſac inſtead of Fileſac (137); Ducal inead of Du Val (138).

[Y] . . . which doubtleſs were a freſh acceſſion to Stephen Paſquier's diſcontent.] The news of Ignatius's beatification could not but be diſagreable to this writer, a great enemy to the Jeſuits, and who had but lately ridiculed their founder in a public work (139) ſo as to preſage, in ſome meaſure, that the artifices made uſe of at Rome, to get him canonized, would come to nothing (140). We may therefore believe, that his diſpleaſure increaſed in proportion to the noiſe the pomp of this beatification made all over Europe: I cannot conceive a ſeverer mortification, than his ſeeing a perſon beatified, of whom he had ſpoken very ill. If he had been a Proteſtant, he would have laughed at the judgment of the court of Rome; but he profeſſed himſelf a Roman Catholic: he could not therefore deny but that his ſlanders had been confuted in the moſt authentic manner poſſible, and himſelf condemned by the whole church of Rome, which acquieſced in the Pope's decree. It was a wretched come-off, to ſay, as his children did in their anſwer to Garaſſe, that he did not believe the founder of the Jeſuits would one day be beatified. It is an unlucky inconvenience in the Roman communion, that a man runs the risk of ſeeing himſelf forced to keep the feaſts of thoſe perſons devoutly, and to invoke them, whom he formerly ſatirized. This ſhould make critical authors more circumſpect. I attack a man, they ought to ſay to themſelves, who perhaps may get into the litanies before I die: let us be cautious of every thing, and conſider what may come to paſs. It is true, Lewis XII did not think a king of France obliged to revenge the injuries offered to a duke of Orleans; but how do we know whether the beatified are of this humour? Do not the country curates ſay, a thouſand and a thouſand times over, that the ſaints ſend plagues and famines, &c. to puniſh the neglect of their chapels and images? If the fault of theſe indevout people is chaſtiſed by a public diſaſter, which falls even on the innocent, has not this particular cenſor, author of the Jeſuits Catechiſm, reaſon to fear St Ignatius's reſentment.

aroſe in France about the day of his feſtival [Z], after Pope Urban VIII had publiſhed the bull of his canonization.

His Life has been written by near twenty authors: one of them calls himſelf John Euſebius of Nieremberg: his work was ſeverely cenſured, if we believe Father Baron [AA]. I need not add, that the Jeſuit Bouhours is one of his patriarch's Hiſtorians; it being a thing notorious enough. What Grotius has ſaid of Loyola, and the Jeſuits, is not the leaſt beautiful part of his hiſtory (i). His expreſſions are well choſen, grave and noble. There is nothing in it that ſavours of invective; but all beſpeaks a ſoul ſedately poſſeſſing it ſelf, and able to hold the ballance in equilibrio. But the more he ſhews himſelf exempt from paſſion and partiality, the more capable he is of perſuading a thing, which, to ſay no worſe of it, has no certainty. He maintains, that the profeſſion of a Jeſuit does not exclude marriage [BB]; that a man, when he is of the ſociety, may has ſecured him from the danger of inconſtancy. Have you praiſed a man, who dextrouſly hid his faults? He loſes his art, is univerſally cried down, and you are cenſured for your incenſe. Perhaps too he becomes your enemy, and your furious perſecutor; this has opened your eyes; you have ſeen him to the bottom, and have turned your encomiums into ſatire; for which you are expoſed, as at variance with your ſelf. Theſe inconveniencies would not have happened, if you had not been overhaſty in dealing out your praiſes. Beſides, men of merit have not always the gift of perſeverance; they loſe themſelves in proſperity, or in other conjunctures, which the general courſe of affairs produces. You are aſhamed to have been the herald of their praiſes; your ears being ſtunned with ungrateful reproaches on that account. We might avoid all this, would we wait as long, before we pronounced a man praiſe-worthy, as Solon did to pronounce him happy.

Ante obitum nemo, ſupremaque funera debet (143).

None happy call in this uncertain ſtate;
Death only ſets us ſafe beyond the reach of fate.

But as to cenſure, and criticiſm, you are not ſecure, though you wait till the perſon is dead: there ſhall ariſe, it may be, a Pope, who will enroll among the ſaints the man whom you have treated ill, and bid you, adora quod incendiſti, recommend yourſelf to the interceſſion of him, whom you have offended. I do not know but the French, who have abuſed Innocent XI, both in his life-time, and ſince his death (144), may experience this unlucky fate. It reſembles thoſe decrees of parliament, which force a man to marry the woman he has diſhonoured.

[Z] Some differences aroſe in France about the day of his feſtival.] Mr Heidegger relates, that the Pope, having aſſigned for St Ignatius's feſtival the ſame day which by antient preſcription had belonged to St Germain (145), the Jeſuits raized the name of St Germain out of the Calendar, to put their Founder's name in it's place (146). The French took offence at this by reaſon of their great veneration for St Germain. The prince of Condé, a patron of the Jeſuits, affirmed that St Ignatius appeared to him, the day they were celebrating his feaſt at Rome. The cauſe being brought to Rome was determined in the following manner. The Pope decreed, that the feaſt of St Germain, and St Ignatius ſhould be kept the ſame day; but if they could not agree together, Ignatius as being the junior, ſhould be obliged to ſtay till leap-year, when he ſhould have the intercalated day wholly to himſelf. ‘ Lis ad Pontificem delata ridicule ita ‘ deciſa eſt, ut eodem die ſimul Germanus & Ignatius celebretur: quòd ſi ſimul ſtare nolle videren‘tur, expectaret Ignatius, ceu recentior, annum biſ‘ſextilem, & diem, qui tum intercalatur, ſibi eximium ‘ haberet (147).’ I wiſh Mr Heidegger had cited ſome good author; for I do not find all this in the letter to a counſellor of parliament on a writing of Father Annat. We find this letter in the firſt Tome of the collection of pieces concerning the New-Teſtament of Mons, and this is what we read at the 593d page: ‘ Who knows not, that, as ſoon St Igna‘tius was canonized, the Jeſuits ſubſtituted him in ‘ the place of St Germain biſhop of Auxerre, whom ‘ they inſolently razed out of the Calendar; where ‘ we ſhould have no more ſeen this great name ſo ve‘nerable to all France, had it not been reſtored by ‘ a decree of the parliament of Paris, paſſed upon an ‘ excellent diſcourſe of the advocate-general.’ Mr Heidegger might have cited John Lætus (148), or rather James Rævius (149), cited by John Lætus, but what good would this have done?

[AA] The Life of St Ignatius by John Euſebius of Nieremberg was ſeverely cenſured, if we believe Father Baron.] This dominican aſſures us, that the cenſor, who was commiſſioned to examine this Life, reported to the judges that he found it ſo full of faults that it deſerved to be expunged from beginning to end. Adeo mendoſum librum ut eſſet inemendabilis, & à capite ad calcem ſpongia delendus; nonnulla etiam notavit quæ ſtomachum & indignationem audientibus moverunt (150). Father Papebroch, (151) anſwering a Carmelite, who alledged this paſſage, has obſerved, that Vincent Baron is not to be credited upon this ſubject, and that the condemnation of the book of Nieremberg concerns only the ſecond edition (152), and is moderated by a donec corrigatur. He adds, that the third edition, enlarged with the Life of Francis Xavier, went off without any oppoſition.

[BB] Grotius maintains, that a Jeſuit's vow does not exclude marriage.] His words are theſe: ‘ Tranſ‘greſſi in morem non una habitant omnes. Angu‘ſtum videbatur Societatis incrementa parietibus in‘cludere: DANT NOMINA ET CONJUGES (153). —— ‘ They do not all dwell together. It ſeemed narrow, ‘ to confine the increaſe of the ſociety within walls: ‘ THEY GIVE NAMES AND WIVES.’ Paſquier, pleading againſt the Jeſuits in the year 1564, affirmed (154), that their ſociety ‘ was compoſed of two ſorts ‘ of men, the firſt whereof, ſay they are of the great ‘ obſervance, and the others of the leſs. Thoſe of ‘ the great obſervance are obliged to four vows; for, ‘ beſides the three ordinary ones of obedience, poverty, ‘ and chaſtity, they make one particularly in favour of ‘ the Pope. . . . Thoſe, who are of the leſſer obſervance, ‘ are obliged to no more than two vows, one reſpect‘ing the fidelity they promiſe to the Pope, and the ‘ other obedience towards their ſuperiors and miniſters. ‘ Theſe latter do not vow poverty; but it is lawful ‘ for them to hold benefices without diſpenſation, to ‘ ſucceed their fathers and mothers, to acquire lands ‘ and poſſeſſions, as if they were not obliged to any ‘ religious vow. . . . . . . (155) This ſame ordinance ‘ makes it poſſible for all people to be of this order. ‘ For as, in this leſſer obſervance, there are no vows ‘ made, either of virginity, or poverty, ſo it indiffe‘rently takes in prieſts and laymen, married or un‘married, ſince they are not obliged to reſide, with ‘ the great obſervancers. But they may inhabit with ‘ the reſt of the people, provided that, on certain and ‘ prefixed days, they appear at the houſe common to ‘ them all, to participate in their grimaces.’ But let us ſee what was anſwered him by the Jeſuit Richeome (156). The fifth lie ‘ is in the ſame plead‘ing, where, having diſcourſed like a dotard upon ‘ the rule of the Jeſuits, and told a great many pi‘tiful and ſilly lies, at laſt he adds one of a larger ‘ ſize, big with many others, ſaying, this ſame ordi‘nance makes it poſſible for all people, &c. . . . . . ‘ And after having fooled ſufficiently, he faſtens the ‘ tail to his chimera, and concludes. So that follow‘ing this law and rule, it is no abſurdity to ſee a whole ‘ town of Jeſuits. This lie ought not to be reckoned ‘ a ſingle one; for it contains as many as there are ‘ words. I have been a member of this ſociety above ‘ twenty years, and have carefully read it's conſtitutions, may live where he pleaſes, and cohabit with his wife. Paſquier had ſaid the ſame thing, and was publickly charged with a falſehood. I have not found, that he anſwered the adverſary, who treated him as a downright ſlanderer. Grotius was to be pitied, if he had no other warrant, than Paſquier.

‘ tions, but never heard of the leſſer or greater obſer‘ vance among the Jeſuits; nor have I ever read one ‘ word of it, either in their books, or in their bulls ‘ expedited by the Popes for their eſtabliſhment. And ‘ to one and all, the vows of chaſtity, poverty, and ‘ obedience, are ſo expreſs, that no body can doubt of ‘ them: beſides, who ever ſaw a married Jeſuit among ‘ them? or rather, who ever heard any one ſpeak of ‘ it, beſides Paſquier?’

Perhaps Grotius might found himſelf upon the bare teſtimony of Paſquier, looking on it as inconteſtable, ſince it was not probable, that a man would venture to utter a falſity of this nature, in full parliament, and in ſo ſolemn a cauſe; but the ſureſt way is to miſtruſt appearances, and never to judge upon the report of one of the parties. Audi & alteram partem; keep one ear for the accuſed; inform yourſelf of the anſwer of each party; is a rule that ought never to be forgotten. The lie, that was given to this advocate, is found in a work printed in 1599. Paſquier, two or three years after, publiſhed his Catechiſm of the Jeſuits, in which he repeated many of the things he had advanced before, and maintained them againſt the apologiſts for the ſociety. He inſiſts (157) chiefly on an examination of the ſimple vows, which the Jeſuits are obliged to make: but does not reply one word about the two kinds of Jeſuits, which he had informed the world of, one married, the other unmarried. This makes me believe, that he diſcovered his error. The Janſeniſt, who, in 1688, publiſhed an apology for the cenſures of Louvain and Douay, ſuppoſes (158), that there are concealed Jeſuits, who without wearing the habit, are yet of the ſociety, and are left in the world for it's intereſts; but he does not ſay, that they are permitted to marry. In vain ſhall we endeavour to excuſe Grotius by the teſtimony of an anonymous writer, who printed a little book in 1682, intituled, The Emperor and Empire betrayed, how, and by whom. This author advances the ſame thing as Paſquier, and ſuſpects even the emperor to be a Jeſuit of the ſecond claſs. ‘ My ‘ jealouſy, ſays he (159), of his Imperial majeſty, en‘ creaſes the more, becauſe it is notorious, that there ‘ are ſeveral ſorts of religious among the Jeſuits; ſome ‘ who are diſpenſed with, not only as to the habit, but ‘ who are even allowed to marry, and to be inveſted ‘ with all ſorts of offices and dignities; that if his Im‘ perial majeſty, through too great a zeal for his re‘ ligion, was, in his younger years, unfortunately en‘ gaged in this order, under the aforeſaid diſpenſations, ‘ we need no longer wonder at any part of his be‘ haviour to the Proteſtants; for though he were only ‘ of the leſſer order, in which it is permitted to ‘ marry, and to poſſeſs all ſorts of offices and digni‘ ties, it is however true, that in every thing elſe, ‘ and particularly in matters of religion, he would be ‘ under the obedience of the general of the Jeſuits, and ‘ conſequently obliged to make peace and war, juſt as ‘ the general of the ſociety ſhould think fit for the inte‘ reſts of the Papal court, and the ſociety. The war ‘ he perpetually makes againſt the Proteſtants of the ‘ Upper Hungary, ... his immenſe preſents to ‘ the ſociety . . . . . with the ſcandalous and diſ‘ graceful ſigning of the laſt peace (160) . . . . . . ‘ All this ſmells ſtrong of an obedience, which knows ‘ no other duty, nor rule of juſtice and piety, than ‘ the abſolute command of his ſuperior: and I ſee ‘ nothing in the conduct of this prince, whether in ‘ his way of living, and his perpetual applications to ‘ Jeſuitical comedies, muſic, or pilgrimages, ſome‘ times to one relic, ſometimes to another, together ‘ with whatever may diſcover his natural or habitual ‘ inclinations, that contradicts this opinion.’ Yet once more, it would be impertinent, in favour of Grotius, to alledge ſuch a libeller, who dares ſo inſolently and diſreſpectfully ſpeak of his Imperial majeſty. Theſe writers would be too obligingly treated, ſhould we ſay to them; I expected proof, and you bring me vulgar ſtories (161). For they moſt commonly vent, not only what they have heard themſelves, but what they have forged in the mint of their own brain. He, whom I have cited, and Mr Jerieu, would afford matter of laughter to all the world; the one maintains, that the Jeſuits betrayed the houſe of Auſtria in favour of France, and the other, that they would be always diſpoſed to betray France, in favour of the houſe of Auſtria (162). That which is certain is, that the Imperial court has obſerved ſuch a conduct for above theſe twelve years paſt (163), as is an invincible proof, either that the Jeſuits have no credit there; or that their councils are adapted to the temporal intereſts of the emperor, preferable to the advantages of the Catholic religion in general; and if the author of the libel had underſtood politics, he might eaſily have ſeen, that the ſigning of the peace of Nimeguen was the beſt and nobleſt reſolution the houſe of Auſtria could take, conſidering the poſture of affairs, after the particular peace of France with the United-Provinces. But this author did not conſider it ſo cloſely; and, if he had been alive in 1697, I doubt not but he had been the promoter of news, not unlike what we have ſeen above (164). The Hiſtorical Letters of October, that year, have this in them. ‘ It ‘ has been for ſome time reported, that the Jeſuits ‘ had formed a conſpiracy againſt the emperor and the ‘ king of the Romans, and that one of them had already ‘ been executed. They write from Vienna, that this ‘ is a meer calumny; ſo that the emperor, to unde‘ ceive the public, has ordered his council of regency ‘ to publiſh an act in High-Dutch upon this ſub‘ ject (165).’ The author of the Hiſtorical Letters gives a French tranſlation of this Imperial act.

LUBBERT, (SIBRAND) profeſſor of Divinity at Franeker, was born at Longoworde in Friſeland, about the year 1556. He went through his claſſical learning in the college of Bremen, and ſtudied afterwards in the univerſity of Wittemberg, where he learned Hebrew to a great perfection, under the profeſſor Valentine Scindlerus, after which he went to Geneva, and diligently attended the lectures of Beza, Caſaubon, and Francis Portus (a). He went afterwards to Neuſtadt, whither prince Caſimir had removed the Calviniſtical profeſſors. He chiefly frequented the lecture of Zachary Urſinus, and inſinuated himſelf into his intimacy and favour. He was one day praiſed by him, in ſuch a manner as was at the ſame time a good proof of this profeſſor's modeſty [A]. Our Lubbert had an offer of being ſubſtitute to Urſinus in the Logic profeſſorſhip, (a) He was then explaining Apollonius Rhodius.

[A] He was one day praiſed by him in ſuch a manner, as was a good proof of this profeſſor's modeſty.] He had miſ-quoted David Kimchi in a public lecture, and being told of it by our Sibrand, he acknowledged his fault in the next lecture, and pointed out the perſon who had ſet him right. You will find a larger account of this in the following Latin: ‘ Accidit aliquando, ut ‘ D. Urſinus in lectione publica Kimchium citaret, ‘ quem noſter quoque antea ad eundem locum conſu‘ luerat. Deprehendebat adoleſcens, D. Urſinum, ‘ Kimchii authoritatem, ſive errore μνημονικῷ, ſive ‘ quod locum obiter inſpexiſſet, malè allegaſſe. Mo‘ nuit hac de re præceptorem modeſtè & verecunde. ‘ Is miratus juvenis in Ebraïſmo peritiam, introduxit ‘ eum in Muſæum, inſpectoque Kimchii Commentario, ‘ rem ſeſe ad eum modum habere deprehendit. Tan‘ tum abeſt ut offenderit clariſſimum Theologorum ‘ hæc diſcipuli libertas, ut poſtridie in lectione publica ‘ errorem illum ſuum retractaverit, monſtrato D. Sibrando, quem ſibi ejus indicium feciſſe profiteba‘ tur.

feſſorſhip, with the promiſe of a better imployment, in due time; but he modeſtly anſwered, that he did not think himſelf qualified to fill a place, in which this illuſtrious profeſſor had acquired ſo much glory. Nevertheleſs, Urſinus had found none amongſt his diſciples beſides him, fit to be recommended to this place. It was given to Fortunatus Crellius. As ſoon as Lubbert found himſelf qualified to be promoted to the miniſtry; he had a call from the Reformed church of Bruſſels, and from that of Embden; he preferred the latter, by the advice of Zachary Urſinus. He was called into Frieſland in 1584 to be preacher to the governor and deputies of the States of the province, and to read Divinity lectures in the univerſity of Franeker, the foundation whereof was reſolved on at that time. He had for his colleagues in the Divinity profeſſorſhip, Martin Lydius, and Henry Antonides Nerdenus; and though they were older than he, he far excelled them. He took his doctor of Divinity's degree at Heidelberg, when he ſaw himſelf honoured with a profeſſorſhip in that faculty at Franeker. He exerciſed this imployment about forty years, and in this long interval, was ſeveral times imployed in important affairs [B]. He was one of the deputies at the ſynod of Dort; and one of the beſt heads in the aſſembly. His great induſtry and ſtrong conſtitution, gave him opportunities of compoſing ſeveral books [C], which were much eſteemed. He preached with great zeal, and was very fervent in cenſuring vice [D], and

It was more glorious to Urſinus thus to acknowledge his fault, than to Lubbert to be praiſed for diſcovering it.

[B] He was ſeveral times employed in important affairs.] Count William of Naſſau, governor of Frieſland, and the deputies of the States of the Province frequently admitted him into their council; and when in the year 1594, the town of Groningen and the Ommelandes were added to the body of the United-Provinces, he was one of the three miniſters (2) who founded a church at Groningen, and drew up the ſtatutes of it. Some time after, a quarrel aroſe between the miniſters of Leuwarden, which was carried on with ſo much paſſion and obſtinacy, that the only means of reſtoring peace, was to diſmiſs them all; whereupon Sibrand Lubbert, Lydius, Nerdenus, and John Arcerius, were ſent to ſerve that church, and continued in it till theſe diſſentions were ended. He was deputed to the Hague, in the year 1606, to aſſiſt in a preliminary aſſembly, ad conventum præparatorium; and in the year 1618, the States of Frieſland deputed him to the ſynod of Dort (3). One of the Engliſh divines, wno aſſiſted at that ſynod obſerves, that this Frieſland deputy grew hot, and flew into a paſſion, and contributed much more to perplex things, and to foment diviſions, than to compoſe them (4). I have ſpoken elſewhere (5) of his quarrel with Maccovius; and I add here, that he had ſome differences with his colleague, the learned Druſius (6).

[C] His great induſtry and ſtrong conſtitution, gave him opportunities of compoſing many books.] He generally roſe a three at clock in the morning or ſooner, neither winter nor old age interrupted this cuſtom; and nothing afflicted him more in his maladies, than to be deprived of the ſatisfaction of ſtudying. He was ſcarce ever ſick till the laſt years of his life, his good conſtitution having all along held out againſt the ill effects of violent ſtudy. Robuſtâ & qualis paucis obtingit, valetudine ſemper uſus fuerat, magno Dei beneficio, in tantis adeoque aſſiduis laboribus. Poſtremis annis dolores nephritici ex aſſiduis ſtudiis contracti & catarrhi frequentiores per intervalla eum exercuere (7). He publiſhed books againſt Bellarmin, upon the controverſies concerning the ſcripture, the Pope, the church, and councils, and replied to Gretſerus, who had anſwered for Bellarmin. He had the laſt in this diſpute, for Gretſerus did not reply. Theſe works of Lubbert, procured him ſeveral letters filled with praiſes; and he was forced to publiſh them, as a buckler to the blows of one of his adverſaries. Quanti autem hos μακαρίτȣ labores fecerit Eccleſia, liquere poteſt ex præclaris & honorificis Elogiis Præſtantiſſimorum ejus luminum, * quorum aliquot evulgationem effrænis adverſarii maledicentia modeſtiſſimæ animæ expreſſit (8). Having obſerved, that the Socinian hereſy began to appear in the Low-Countries, he publiſhed a book againſt Socinus de Chriſto Salvatore (9). He wrote alſo againſt Arminius's letter ad H. à Collibus, and againſt Peter Bertius, who had ingaged in the defence of this letter. Afterwards he wrote againſt Vorſtius, and againſt a book which Grotius intituled Pietas Ordinum Hollandiæ. Having thus declared himſelf an ardent champion of the Contra-Remonſtrants cauſe, he was often obliged to take pen in hand; but the author of his funeral oration, did not think it proper to inſiſt on this. He declared on the contrary, that he wiſhed all theſe things might be buried for ever, in the grave of oblivion. De iis quæ poſtea ſubſecuta ſunt, malo tacere, quàm τὸ δάκρυον ἔνδον ἐγείρειν. Optem enim ex animo, quod ipſa quoque Synodus vovet, infauſta illa factionum nomina, quæ mihi hic cum cordolio & horrore uſurpanda eſſent, æternâ oblivione ſepulta eſſe. Si volumus coire Eccleſiæ vulnera & cicatricem ducere, cavendum ſedulo eſt, ne invectivarum unguibus imprudenti zelo refodiantur (10). The laſt book that Lubbert publiſhed, is his commentary upon the Catechiſm of the Palatinate. He left an Anti-Bellarminus compleat, which had coſt him infinite labour, and it was thought he had ſome reaſons to deſire, that this important compoſition ſhould not be printed in his life-time (11).

[D] He preached with great zeal, and was very fervent in cenſuring vice.] He had the courage to deſpiſe the unjuſt reſentment of thoſe, who were ſenſible that he aimed at them in his cenſures, and he always went on his own way. The word of God was ſo powerful in his mouth, that when he pleaſed, he drew tears from thoſe, who were moſt hardened in their crimes. He did not ſtand in his ſermons ſo much to confute Popery, as to reform the depravation of manners, drunkenneſs, luxury, &c. Let us hear the author of his Funeral Oration. ' Nec enim id ſolum agebat, ut Pontificias ſuperſtitiones in animis hominum veritatis flammâ exureret, ſed illud vel maximè, ut qui ſe Evangelicos profitebantur, ab ebrietate, luxu, aliiſque flagitiis avulſi, diſcerent piè, ſobriè & juſtè vivere ‡. Explevit autem omnes ſanctiſſimi muneris partes in utraque Friſia, ea libertate, ut multorum malorum odia hoc ſolum nomine ſibi conciliaverit. Quæ tamen animoſus ille Chriſti pugil, ſanctiſſimi propoſiti mutatione neutiquam placanda cenſuit. Quin contra audientior ibat, publicè peccantes, Tros Rutuluſve eſſet, nullò diſcrimine publicitus arguens. Adſuit huic libertati (Deo laboribus ejus inſigniter benedicente) admirabilis efficacia. Qui eum concionantem audivêre, ſuperſunt autem adhuc plurimi, ajunt eum vel pertinaciſſimis & deploratiſſimis hominibus lacrimas, quoties volebat, expreſſiſſe. Devotæ autem & contritæ animæ vix unquam ſiccis oculis eum audivêre (12). ——— Nor was it his only care to purge out of the minds of men Popiſh ſuperſtitions by the force of truth, but he was alſo particularly ſtudious in endeavouring to make thoſe, who profeſſed themſelves of the evangelic faith, to abſtain from drunkenneſs, luxury, and other vices, that they might learn to live, piouſly, ſoberly, and juſtly. He exerciſed the duties of the miniſtry in both the Frieſlands with ſuch boldneſs, that he drew upon himſelf the ill will of many evil doers; yet ſuch was the heroic conſtancy of this champion of Chriſt, that nothing could affright or move him from his holy reſolution. On the contrary, he behaved with greater ſeverity, reproving publickly and a ſevere obſerver of the ſtatutes; he ſometimes refuſed the dignity of rector, becauſe he feared he could not effectually reform the debauched ſcholars [E]. He refuſed a chair of Divinity, which was offered him in the Palatinate, and was become vacant by the death of Kimedontius profeſſor at Heidelberg (b). The governors of the univerſity of Franeker oppoſed that invitation; and his wife being unwilling to leave her own country, he thanked his electoral highneſs Frederic IV. He died at Franeker the twenty firſt of January 1625 (c). Scaliger himſelf owned him to be a learned man. He was grave, and uſed no complaiſance to get the love of the ſcholars. He ſeverely reprimanded thoſe who took wrong courſes. They were angry with him; but the time came, when ſeveral of them acknowledged, that they were infinitely obliged to him. ‘ In omnibus actionibus erat ſerius ‘ & gravis. Gratiam favoremque juventutis non alia ‘ ratione, quam privata publicaque induſtriâ, nec non ‘ ſalutaribus ad pietatem & diligentiam adhortationibus, ‘ captare didicerat. He began the exerciſe of his office, with the invocation of the name of God, and with an excellent oration, in which he declaimed againſt the drunkards and diſſolute ſcholars, and againſt the debaucheries of the univerſities, the ſource of the ill ſtate of the churches; and he menaced thoſe with the ſevereſt treatment, who ſhould deſerve it: ‘ In Ebrietatem, ‘ juventutis irreverentiam, & qui diſſolutis Academia- ‘ rum moribus natales ſuos debet, miſerum Eccleſiarum ‘ ſtatum graviter dicebat. LUBIENIETZKI (STANISLAUS) in Latin Lubieniecius, a Poliſh gentleman, was one of the moſt famous miniſters the Socinians had in the XVIIth century. He was born at Racow the twenty third of Auguſt 1623. He was educated with a particular care by his father, who was miniſter of Racow, and who not only ſent him to the ſchools, but alſo took care that he ſhould ſee the diets of Poland, in order to introduce him to the grandees, and inſtruct him in all things agreeable to his birth [A]. He afterwards ſent him to Thorn, where the young man ſettled for two years, and joined himſelf to two Socinian deputies (a) during the conference that was held in this city in the year 1644, for the re-union of religions. He drew up an account of this conference. Being made governor to the young count of Niemirycz, he travelled with him into Holland, and afterwards into France, where he acquired the eſteem of ſeveral learned men, with whom he conferred upon points of religion, without ever diſſembling his own, or neglecting any opportunities of maintaining it. He loſt his father in the year 1648, and returned into Poland. He married in 1652, the daughter of a zealous Socinian, and was made coadjutor to John Ciachovius, miniſter of Siedliſki; and as he quickly gave great proofs of his prudence and learning, the ſynod of Czarcow received him miniſter, and made him paſtor of a church of this name. The irruption of the Swedes made him quit it in 1655, and obliged him to retire to Cracow with his family, the 6th of April 1656. He there employed his time in faſting, and prayer, and preaching (b). The town falling again into the hands of the Poles in the year 1657, he followed the Swediſh garriſon, together with two other Socinians, to ſupplicate the king of Sweden that the Unitarians, who had put themſelves under his protection, might be comprehended in the amneſty, by the peace that ſhould be concluded with Poland. He arrived at Volgaſt the ſeventh of October, 1657, and was very well received by the king of Sweden. He eat at his majeſty's table; an honour this prince had done him before at Cracow. He obtained the acquaintance of ſome Swediſh lords, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the Divines [B], and explained his religion on ſeveral occaſions. It is even ſaid, that he was favoured with a ſignal revelation, during the ſiege of Stetin [C]. He happened to be at Oliva while the treaty of peace was carrying on there, and had the mortification to ſee the Unitarians excluded out of the amneſty granted to others who were not Catholics. Seeing himſelf thus deprived of the hopes of returning into Poland, he bent his courſe towards Copenhagen; he arrived there the twenty eighth of November, 1660, and endeavoured to obtain of the king a place of retreat for his brethren, who had been baniſhed out of Poland. This prince expreſſed a great reſpect for him [D], but as this could not produce an eſtabliſhment for that ſect, he returned into Pomerania (c), and there uſed all the endeavours he could in favour of his party. in 1633, having lived about ſeventy five years (4); the other died at Racow, in 1624, and left a ſon called Chriſtopher, who was a Socinian miniſter at Racow and at Lublin (5), and died in the year 1648 (6). He was the father of him who is the ſubject of this article.

[B] He obtained the acquaintance of ſome Swediſh lords, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the Divines.] It is no wonder that the Swediſh lords had more complaiſance for our Socinian miniſter, than the miniſters of the Confeſſion of Augsburg; for it is their buſineſs, and not that of courtiers, to take care that Hereſy does not ſpread it's poiſon, ne quid Religio detrimenti capiat. It was therefore a natural conſequence that Lubienietzki ſhould be oppoſed by the miniſters of the Confeſſion of Augsburg, whilſt perſons of quality paid him civilities. 'Cum in Pomeraniâ commoraretur Tractatus pacis expectans, in Magnatum Sueciæ familiaritatem facile venit, aliorum antea contractam amicitiam renovavit, confirmavit, commercium cum iis literarum habuit, ubique teſtimonium veritati, Rege Principibuſque ultro laceſſentibus, perhibuit. Non defuerunt præſertim Stetini Lubieniecio adverſarii, quorum odia Theologica expertus eſt, illaque Concionatores, etiam ad rudem plebeculam, propagare conabantur, inter quos primarius fuit Johannes Micrælius Vir Stetini celebris. Similia quoque Stralſundi expertus eſt noſter, ſimilia tamen ubique veritati dare teſtimonia non neglexit (7). —— While he waited in Pomerania for the treaty of peace, he eaſily contracted a friendſhip with the Swediſh nobility, his former acquaintance with ſome of them he renewed, and confirmed by correſponding with them by letters, every where giving his teſtimony to the truth, being encouraged ſo to do, by the king and the chiefs of the nobility. At Stetin Lubienietzski met with new enemies, whoſe theological malice he experienced, moſt of theſe were preachers who endeavoured to irritate the people againſt him, among theſe was John Micrælius, a man at that time in high reputation in Stetin. At Stralſund this good man met with the like uſage, yet he never omitted giving his teſtimony to the truth wherever he came.'

[C] It is ſaid . . . he was favoured with a ſignal revelation during the ſiege of Stetin.] There is no ſect but, in ſome meaſure, aſcribes to itſelf extraordinary and miraculous graces. Here is an example of it: our Lubienietzki was at Elbing, while the troops of the emperor and Brandenburg beſieged Stetin. Two weighty reaſons induced him to pray earneſtly to God, that the ſiege might be raiſed; for his wife and children were in Stetin; and a Swediſh count had promiſed to turn Socinian, if Lubienietzki could by his prayers obtain, that this town ſhould not be taken. This miniſter, moved by the intereſt of his family, and by the hopes of gaining an illuſtrious proſelyte, ſpent three weeks in faſting and prayer, after which he went to wait upon the count, and aſſured him, that the town ſhould not be taken. The count, and they who were with him, looked on it as the effects of a delirium, ſince Lubienietzki had no ſooner left them, but he fell ſick; but when at ſix days end it was known that the ſiege was really raiſed, the count was much ſurprized; for no body could tell Lubienietzki the good news he had foretold. The count was challenged upon his promiſe, but he anſwered, that having enquired of God, whether he ſhould do well to embrace this miniſter's religion; God had confirmed him in the Confeſſion of Augsburg. That the reader may ſee whether I have been a faithful tranſlator, or have heightened the ſtory, I will ſet down the words of the original: 'Accidit . . . . ut Comes Slippenbachius polliceretur Staniſlai noſtri Religionem amplecti, modò id à Deo precibus obtineret, ut Stetinum urbs non ſatis munita nec rebus ad obſidionem tolerandam neceſſariis inſtructa, de cujus liberatione propterea deſperabant, liberaretur ab hoſtibus. Lubieniecius imprimis ſuorum miſeriâ motus, tribus hebdomadibus & precibus ad Deum ardentibus & jejunio frequenti conſumptis, veniens ad Comitem, urbem extra periculum eſſe affirmavit, bonoque eos eſſe animo juſſit. Comes adſtanteſque inſanire eum putabant, præſertim quod ab iis reverſus, in morbum inciderit. Ejus vero aſſertio poſt ſex dies litteris Stetino liberato datis confirmata, graviter perterrefecit Comitem. Id enim temporis Lubieniecius à nemine certus hac de re fieri potuit. Promiſſum cum Lubieniecius, pro ſua cum Comite familiaritate, aliquando repoſceret, dixit ille, ſeſe in genua procubuiſſe, Deumque oraſſe patefaceret ſibi num Religio Lubieniecii ſuſcipienda eſſet, nec ne, ſed à Deo in confeſſione Anguſtanâ confirmatum eſſe (8).'

[D] The king of Denmark expreſſed a great reſpect for him.] Lubienietzki kept a great correſpondence by letters, which was a ſingular advantage to him, to introduce him into the favour of great men, who were glad to know by his means private news relating to other countries. The king of Denmark, to whom ſome of his accounts had been read, was ſo pleaſed with them, that he beſtowed a place upon Lubienietzki (9), which was to copy for his majeſty the letters he received, for which he was to have an annual penſion (10). This prince declared to him in private, that he could do no leſs than grant the Unitarians a ſettlement at Altena by connivance. He never ſaw him at court, but he called to him, to hear him diſcourſe of matters of religion; which expoſed the Poliſh miniſter to envy, it being feared that the king of Denmark would embrace Arianiſm. 'Solebat Rex, quotieſcunque Lubieniecium in Aulâ conſpexit, relictis cæteris, eum propius ut accederet compellare, & de religionis capitibus imprimis colloqui. Quæ res invidiam etiam creavit Lubieniecio, timentibus Theologis, ne Rex fieret Arianus (11).' This prince ordered his confeſſor and our Lubienietzki to diſpute, and was preſent. 'Cum M. Eryco Gravio Aulico concionatore & confeſſionario ſuo Rex eum commiſit, ipſeque diſputationi adfuit (12).' He endeavoured to prevail with the magiſtrates of Hamburgh, to let him be quiet; but his interceſſion was not potent enough. 'Cum iterum iterumque inſtaret, ut antea fecerat, Magiſtratus, urbeque per nuntios Lubieniecio interdiceret, fuſtra Secretariatum Regis Poloniæ obtendenti, nihilque proficientibus ejuſdem Regis interceſſoriis, in lethalem incidit morbum (13).' His friends had obtained for him the title of ſecretary to the king of Poland, becauſe they hoped that that would oblige the magiſtrates of Hamburgh, not to diſturb him; but their hopes were fruſtrated.

diſturbing him, he was obliged to quit Stetin, and betake himſelf to Hamburg, whither he ordered his family the year following (d). He there frequently diſcourſed with queen Chriſtina, on matters of religion, in the preſence of ſome princes. The ſecond voyage he made to the court of Denmark was favourable enough to him: the magiſtrates of Fridericksburg conſented that the Unitarians ſhould reſide in their town, and have the domeſtic exerciſe of their religion. But by the endeavours of a Lutheran ſuperintendant, the duke of Holſtein gave them orders, ſome time after, to depart. Lubienietzki ſtruggled a long time with the Hamburg miniſters [E]: at laſt the magiſtrates gave him punctual orders to depart. He was then ſick, and promiſed to obey them; but he died ſome days after [E] He ſtruggled a long time with the Hamburgh miniſters.] They ſo frequently and inſtantly ſollicited the magiſtrates to make Lubienietzkidepart, that he received frequent orders to retire; and it was in vain to ſay, that his Daniſh majeſty honoured him with his protection, or that he was innocent; for he was forced to yield to the ſtorm (14). However ſome years after, he returned to Hamburgh, thinking they would no more take notice of him; but he was miſtaken: a licentiate in Divinity was ſo vigilant and vehement, as to cauſe new inſtances to be made to the magiſtrates againſt Lubienietzki; and the clergy had ſo exaſperated the people, by repreſenting Lubienietzki as a public peſt, that he durſt hardly ſtir out of his lodgings. ‘Poſt annos aliquot conſilio amicorum, credentium jam de furore remiſiſſe adverſarios, ob commoditatem dirigendarum litterarum Hamburgum ſe contulit cum familia, ſed nimis vigilantem expertus eſt Dominum Edſardii Licentiatum Theologiæ, qui indefeſſo ſtudio id egit, ut cum collegis ſuis magiſtratum incitaret ut Lubieniecius urbe ejiceretur. Lubieniecio ante migrationem, domo exire non ſemper tutum fuit (15). —— Some years after, by the advice of his friends, who imagined that the rage of his enemies was by this time ſomewhat abated, he removed with his family to Hamburgh, for the conveniency of his epiſtolary correſpondence; but Mr Edſard, a licentiate in Theology, was ſo vigilant, that by his own intereſt, and that of his colleagues, he wearied the magiſtrates till they baniſhed Lubienietzki the city. It is fit this man's name ſhould here be recorded, becauſe he made it his boaſt, that it was by his means, that Lubienietzki, with his family, were expelled the city. Yea ſuch was the zeal of the clergy, that they diſputed in the church againſt the abſent Lubienietzki, declaring him a Heretic, and a very plague to the city; as may be collected from a manuſcript of Lubienietzki's, and they did this even the firſt time that he paſſed thro' that city in his way to Copenhagen in 1667. Before he left the place, it was not ſafe for him to ſtir out of doors.’ What the Sieur Edſardius did in this town, was practiſed at Fridericksburg by John Reinboht, who excited the duke of Holſtein to baniſh the Socinian refugees. ‘His pactis diſceſſit Hafniâ, venitque Fridericopolim, ibique à Magiſtratu urbis obtinuit ut exules in communionem & ſacram & civilem reciperentur, privatumque in ædibus more Polono exercitium Religionis peragéretur; quod etiam per literas Fratribus ſignificavit. Lubieniecius in id laboravit, nec ſumptibus pepercit & damnum rei familiaris ſubiit, quo poſſet eò fratres deducere, deductis ſuccurrere, donec ex urbe ſecedere juſſi ſunt à Principe Holſatiæ, quod debent partim Domino Superintendenti Lutherano Joanni Rembotto (16). —— Theſe things being ſettled, he quitted Copenhagen, and went to Friderickſtadt, where he obtained the conſent of the magiſtrates, that the exiles ſhould be received into all the rights of the city, ſacred and civil, and that they ſhould be permitted to celebrate divine ſervice in private houſes after the Poliſh manner; which by letters he ſignified to the brethren. Lubienietzki laboured in this matter without ſparing coſt, and even to the detriment of his own affairs, that he might draw the brethren together, and relieve them when they came to him, till they were obliged to leave the city by the command of the duke of Holſtein, in ſome meaſure partly procured by the Lutheran ſuperintendant John Reinboht.’ Mr Mollerus affirms the ſame thing. ‘Socinianis, ſays he (17), ab oppidi Fridrichſtadienſis Magiſtratu, & incolendi iſtud poteſtatem, & ſacrorum exercitii libertatem, a. 1662. obtinuit Staniſl. Reinbohtii, Theologi aulici, promulgato, & civitate iſta, & ditionibus ſuis univerſis, non multo poſt iiſdem interdixit *. Lubienitzius ipſe, quem ſingulari Rex Daniæ, Frid. III. favore dignabatur, urbe, quam per aliquot luſtra, connivente Magiſtratu, incoluerat, Humburgenſi a. 1675. Edzardi & Paſtorum ordinariorum inſtinctu, juſſus excedere, antequam obſequi Senatui poſſet, veneno, cibis ipſius immixto, cum biga filiarum d. 18. Maji periit. —— Staniſlaus Lubienietzki, the famous champion of that ſect, procured from the magiſtrates of Friderickſtadt, in the year 1662, that the Socinians ſhould not only be allowed to inhabit this place, but alſo to have divine ſervice, after their manner, celebrated therein, but in vain. For his moſt ſerene highneſs, the duke of Holſtein-Gottorp, without whoſe knowledge this had been tranſacted, did, by the perſuaſion of John Reinboht, a Divine of his court, publiſh an edict, whereby he commanded him to quit that city, and every other part of his dominions. As for Lubienietzki being favoured in a particular manner by Friderick III, king of Denmark, after living ſome time, by connivance of the magiſtrates, at Hamburgh in 1675, through the interpoſition of Edſard, and other miniſters, he was ordered to withdraw; but before he could obey the injunction of the ſenate, he, with two of his daughters, were deſtroyed with poiſon given them in their food on the eighteenth of May.’ There is hardly any perſon among the Catholics, or Proteſtants, but will praiſe this conduct of the Lutheran miniſters. If you alledge to them, that it is expreſſing too much diffidence of their cauſe, they have good anſwers ready. They will tell you, that diffidence is the mother of ſecurity, and when Jeſus Chriſt promiſed his church, that the gates of hell ſhould not prevail againſt it, he meant not to exclude humane means, which are moſt proper to preſerve orthodoxy: I mean the edicts of princes, which ſtop the mouth of the heterodox, and ſtifle the knowledge of objections, which might be made againſt the ſound doctrine: if you reply, that, after all, they behave themſelves as if they had not read the book of Eſdras (18), in which the force of truth is repreſented ſuperior to all others, whether that of wine, or a king, or of women; and that, on the contrary, they believe it unable to ſubſiſt in the places where it ſways, if it be left expoſed to the attacks of three or four fugitives (19); they will anſwer you, that the heart of man is more inclined to evil than good, and that therefore error is more capable of ſeducing him, than truth of undeceiving him; ſo that Chriſtian prudence does not ſuffer us to allow Heretics the propoſing their arguments. I queſtion whether there ever was any ſubject more fruitful in anſwers and replies; it may be turned ſeveral ways in every ſenſe; and hence an author will maintain to you to day, that truth need only ſhew itſelf to confound hereſy; and to-morrow, that if hereſy be ſuffered to expoſe it's ſubtilties, it will quickly corrupt all the inhabitants. One day you ſhall have truth repreſented as an immoveable rock, another you ſhall be told, that it ought not to be put to the hazard of a diſpute, as being a rencounter in which it would daſh itſelf in pieces with reſpect to the hearers. What are we to do in this volubility of reaſonings (20)? There are ſome who preſerve truth as they do a piece of China-ware, and ſeem to be convinced, that as it has the tranſparency, ſo it has the brittleneſs of cryſtal (21).

after very devoutly [F]. He was poiſoned. His two daughters died of the ſame poiſon the ſixteenth of May, 1675. He had time to lament them in verſe; for he died not till the eighteenth of the ſame month. He was buried at Altena, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the Lutheran miniſters (e) [G]. I ſhall ſay ſomething of his writings [H]. He had a great correſpondence by letters all over Europe (f). I forgot to ſay that he obtained a retreat for his brethren at Manheim, a town of the elector Palatine (g), the moſt Latitudinarian prince in the world.

[F] He died very devoutly.] Theſe are the words of his Hiſtorian: ‘ Commendato ſpiritu in manus ‘ Jeſu ſalvatoris ſui, cui fideliter ſervierat, exceſſit è ‘ vita: toto tempore ægrotationis ad extremum ferè ‘ halitum, ſermones habuit plenos in Deum fiduciæ ‘ & interni gaudii, domeſticorum benedictionis, admoni‘ tionis, nominis Divini invocationis (22). —— ‘ He departed this life recommending his ſpirit to ‘ Jeſus, his Saviour, whom he had faithfully ſerved: ‘ during his ſickneſs, even almoſt to his laſt gaſp, his ‘ diſcourſes were full of confidence in God, and of in‘ ward joy; he bleſſed his domeſtics, admoniſhed ‘ them, and invoked God's holy name.’ It is not ſaid how he was poiſoned, but it is denied that his domeſtics were guilty of that action; and a Divine is complained of for blackening them, and imputing this accident to Lubienietzki's hereſies. ‘ Cau‘ ſa morbi fuit venenum, ignotum ubi infuſum (23), ‘ non ut confidenter affirmat ad denigrandos Lubienie‘ cii domeſticos adverſarius ejus Edſardius, (qui hujus ‘ infortunii ſeriem occaſione datâ enarrare voluit,) ‘ quod vitio religionis Lubieniecii adſcribit, non co‘ gitans multos tam ex Lutheranis Reformatiſque ‘ quam Pontificiis pejori, non tantum ſimili, fato ani‘ mam exhalaſſe, quaſi hujus cladis ipſa conjux fi‘ liæque occaſionem per imprudentiam dediſſent. Sed ‘ nimis injurius eſt veritati. Venenum enim ambas ‘ filias confecit. Uxor etiam quod tantillum de cibo ‘ ſumſiſſet vix à limine mortis revocata (24). —— ‘ The cauſe of his ſickneſs was poiſon, but how it was ‘ given is unknown, not by any of his domeſtics, as ‘ his adverſary Edſard has confidently affirmed, in ‘ order to blacken them, who thought fit to give an ac‘ count of the whole ſeries of this unfortunate buſi‘ neſs; nor, as he ſuggeſts, as a judgment on him for ‘ his religion, ſince ſeveral of the Lutherans, Reformed, ‘ and Papiſts have died in a worſe, or in a like way; ‘ neither did the imprudence of his wife, and daugh‘ ters, (as he intimates) contribute any way thereto. ‘ This being a flagrant injury to truth: two of his ‘ daughters dying of the ſame poiſon, and his wife, ‘ who taſted but little of the victuals, being with dif‘ ficulty reprieved from death.’ Note, that a Socinian author confeſſes that Lubienietzki was poiſoned by his ſervant-maid (25).

[G] He was buried at Altena, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the Lutheran miniſters.] We have been juſt conſidering the practice of the eſtabliſhed religions, for they have their ſtate-politics, as well as temporal princes. One of the aphoriſms of eccleſiaſtical policy, is always to find ſome mark of God's wrath in the death of Heretics (26). Tho' it be never ſo true, that the ſame kind of death has been common to them, and ſome orthodox; yet that ſignifies nothing, it muſt nevertheleſs be ſaid, that God has maniſeſted a moſt particular judgment in the cataſtrophe of their lives (27). The reflexions that are built on this foundation, fortify the perſuaſion of the orthodox, and give them a greater averſion to the hereſy. This is well worth the trouble that is taken in it. Another aphoriſm, or ſtate-policy, is to brand a Heretic's corpſe with ſome infamy. The Hamburgh Divines did not forget this; tho' they could not prevent this Unitarian miniſter's being buried in Altena church, they at leaſt hindered the ſchoolmaſters, attended with their ſcholars, from aſſiſting, according to cuſtom, at the funeral. ‘ Funus Altenaviam Ham‘ burgo deductum legitimo prohibuiſſent Concionatores ‘ ſepulchro, niſi jam in templo Altenavienſi emptum ‘ fuiſſet; nihil tamen omiſerunt quo impedire poſſent, ‘ quod potuerunt effecerunt, ne, ut ibi moris eſt, ‘ in exſequiis Scholarum Rectores cum diſcipulis fu‘ nus comitarentur. Sit ipſis benignior Deus quam ‘ illi fuerint proximo ſuo, ob Religionem duntaxat ‘ & Conſcientiam graviſſimè vexato (28). The two aphoriſms before mentioned, and ſome others which might be added to them, are of ſo great uſe, that we cannot but praiſe the prudence of thoſe who employ them. They are means ſo proper to cheriſh the faith of the people, and prevent them from falling off from the body, that the beſt managed arguments, and ſubtileſt books of controverſy have not ſo much virtue. They muſt ſuit the taſte and capacity of the vulgar; that is to ſay, have recourſe to thoſe mechanical impreſſions, which excite the paſſions. If all men were Philoſophers, they would only uſe good arguments; but in the ſtate ſocieties are in, ſomething elſe beſides reaſon is neceſſary to maintain them, and to preſerve the preheminence they have already acquired.

[H] I ſhall ſay ſomething of his writings.] He wrote ſeveral books, but moſt of them were never printed. You will find the titles of them in the Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum (29), the moſt conſiderable of thoſe that have been publiſhed is his Theatrum Cometicum (30), divided into three parts, quarum prima continet communicationes de cometis anno 1664 & 1665 cum viris per Europam clariſſimis habitas, eorumque Obſervationes tabulis æneis expreſſas. Secunda eſt hiſtoria Cometarum à diluvio ad annum Chriſti 1665, Hiſtoriæ Univerſalis ſynopſim quandam continens. Tertia agit de ſignificationibus Cometarum ſcitis quorundam amicorum objectionibus, reſponſionibus autoris, & judiciis virorum clariſſimorum. Theatrum Cometicum, divided into three parts, of which the firſt contained deſcriptions of the Comets, ſeen in 1664 and 1665, communicated to the moſt learned men in Europe, together with their obſervations engraved on copper-plates. The ſecond a hiſtory of Comets from the deluge to the year 1665, containing a kind of ſynopſis, of univerſal hiſtory. The third treated of the ſignification of Comets, the objections of the author's friends, his anſwers, and the ſentiments of moſt learned men on that ſubject. The editors of it played ſome knaviſh tricks, which obliged the author to take a journey into Holland (31). He was writing the Hiſtory of the Reformation of Poland; but died before the book was finiſhed. What was found of it among his papers, was printed in Holland, in 1685, in 8vo. The Printers have committed ſeveral faults in that work, and few things are found in it, which beſpeak the laſt hand of the author.

at Frankfort 1605, 8vo. His Latin verſes are in the third tome of the Delitiæ Poëtarum Germanorum. We ſhall find in the following remark the title of ſome other of his works.

[B] ...... and one among the reſt, in which he pretended to explain the origin of ſin by a new hypotheſis.] He eſtabliſhed two co-eternal principles, not body and vacuum, as Epicurus, but God and nothing; God as a good principle, and nothing as an evil principle. He added, that ſin was only a tendency towards this nothing, and that ſin had been neceſſary, that the nature of good might be known. He applied to this nothing, all that Ariſtotle had ſaid of the firſt matter (3). One may eaſily ſee that all this is chimerical, and wholly unable to leſſen the difficulties about the origin of evil; for who is ſo ſtupid as not to ſee, that nothing is not capable of producing any thing, either as an efficient cauſe or as a paſſive ſubject, and it is as impoſſible for ſin to proceed from nothing, as it is for the ſinner: conſequently it is as neceſſary to aſſign a poſitive cauſe to ſin as the ſinner. It is no wonder then, that this hypotheſis of Lubin ſhould not paſs. The profeſſor Grawerus, who confuted it, had no hard taſk of it. He had the ſuffrages of Mylius, Hutterus, Piſcator (4), Schluſſelburgius, Major, and Petræus, and many others (5).

[C] . . . He was attacked upon it by ſome Divines.] I will give Mr Baillet's account of it (6). ‘Eilhard Lubin . . . . had compoſed a book, more than metaphyſical, upon the origin and nature of ſin, in which he ſufficiently diſcovered himſelf to be of the number of the Lutherans of the old ſtamp, concerning election, reprobation, juſtification, human liberty &c. His book was printed at Roſtoc, in the duchy of Mecklenburg, in 1596, and re-printed in the ſame town four years after, in 8vo and in 12mo, with the title of Phoſphorus, de prima cauſa, & natura mali Tractatus Hypermetaphyſicus, in quo multorum graviſſimæ dubitationes tolluntur & errores deteguntur. Grawer . . . exclaimed at Lubin's Phoſphorus, as if it had been a comet. He accuſed him of running into the moſt exorbitant paradoxes, and wrote againſt him a little after. Lubin anſwered him, to let him ſee that his accuſations were pure calumnies, and printed a new book at Roſtoc, in the year 1600, with the title of Apologeticus quo Alb. Graw. Calumniis reſpond. &c. which was re-printed in 1605, in 4to, in the ſame town. Grawer hereupon was obliged to defend himſelf in his turn, which he did in the Anti-Lubin, printed at Magdeburg in 1606, in 4to, with the title of Anti-Lubinus, ſive Elenchus Paradoxorum Lubini, & Emblematum Calviniſticorum, &c. De prima cauſa, & natura mali. This was only an anſwer to Lubin's Phoſphorus, but Grawer made another to it for his Apologetic, which was printed by way of appendix, with the Anti-Lubin, under the title of Reſponſio ad elumbem Lubini Apologeticum. I do not know whether Lubin appealed to the Divines of the confeſſion of Augsburg, againſt Grawer's ill uſage, and whether with that intention he writ the book intituled Tractatio Theologica de cauſa peccati, ad Theologos Auguſtanæ Confeſſionis in Germania, which he publiſhed the year following at Roſtoc, in 4to; but I can affirm that all theſe works have not hindered poſterity from believing him a better Humaniſt than Divine.’

[D] He married twice.] His firſt wife, widow to James Backmeiſter, profeſſor of the Hebrew tongue at Roſtoc, lived ſeven years with him, and bore him no children. The ſecond bore him nine. She was daughter to William Lauremberg, a famous Phyſician (7).

LUCIDUS (JOHN) ſirnamed Samotheus, or Samoſatheus, lived in the XVIth century. A book of Chronology, which he publiſhed at Venice in 1537 in 4to, gave him reputation [A]. It is ſaid that the name which he took was not his true name [B]. David Blondel did not know the time in which this author flouriſhed, for he places him in the year 1510, among ſuch as have ſpoken of Pope Joan (a).

[A] A book of Chronology . . . . gave him reputation.] Voſſius witneſſes this in the following words: ‘Anno CIↃ IↃ XXXVII facilè locum ſuum tuebatur Joannes Lucidus Samoſatheus: qui anno eo Venetiis * labores ſuos Chronologicos, non ſine eruditæ caveæ applauſu, diffundebat. In iis ſunt iſta: Emendationes temporum ab orbe condito; canones in perpetuam temporum tabulam; de vero die Paſſionis Chriſti; Epitome emendationis Calendarii Romani (1). ——— In the year 1537, John Lucidus Samoſatheus eaſily held his place, who this year publiſhed at Venice, not without great applauſe, his Chronological labours. In theſe are contained the emendation of times from the beginning of the world; Chronological Canons; of the true day of Chriſt's ſuffering; Epitome of the emendation of the Roman Calendar.’ The account here given us of the pieces contained in the work of Lucidus, is taken, word for word, from the Bibliotheque of Geſner. Voſſius might have ſaid, that Lucidus publiſhed a new edition of this book, in the year 1546, wherein he gives us to underſtand, that he was writing in the year 1545, and that he looked upon that year as extreamly proper for the reformation of the Calendar. ‘Hoc igitur anno Domini 1545, ſays he (2), maxime convenit, ut emendetur Calendarium Romanum in hoc generali Concilio, poſtquam reformata fuerit Eccleſia, in eis quæ pertinent ad fidem, atque ad bonos mores, quæ magis neceſſaria ſunt. Hæc enim oportet facere, & illa non omittere, ſicut Dominus nos in Evangelio admonet. ——— In this year 1545, it would be very proper to amend the Roman Calendar, by the authority of the preſent general council, after the church had been reformed in things relating to faith and good manners, which are more neceſſary. Theſe ought to be done, and thoſe ought not to be omitted, as our Lord admoniſhes us in the Goſpel.’ He had given the reaſon why the year 1545 ought to have been choſen. It was 1590 years after the reformation made in the Calendar by Julius Cæſar, and conſequently the equinoxes were advanced fifteen days preciſely; for he ſuppoſed, with Albategni, that every 106 years occaſions the difference of a day, between the ſolar and the Julian year.

Lucidus's performance was continued to the year 1575, by Jerom Bardi, a Monk of the order of Camaldoli.

[B] The name which he took was not his true name.] This particular is to be found in Florimond de Remond. He had been reproached that he had objected nothing to John Lucidus, who had maintained the truth of this fact (3), but that he was too late a writer to prove any thing; to this he anſwers; ‘This Proteſtant is to be pardoned for what he ſays, for he has thought this Lucidus was ſome honeſt man of the old times, but he is miſtaken, for he wrote in the year 1537, neither did he write in defence of the truth of the ſtory, but only uſed theſe words: Joan, an Engliſh woman, two years one month. During theſe two years we may ſay the ſee of Rome was vacant, becauſe a woman is not qualified for the pontificate. This is all that he ſays. John Lucidus is an aſſumed name, as I was informed by a very learned perſon, who aſſured me that he heard Poſtel ſay, that he was acquainted with that author, who concealed his true name under that of Lucidus, thereby to intimate, that he had brought new light to Chronology (4).’ The firſt part of this paſſage does not appear to be neceſſary, but yet it is not altogether uſeleſs, in as much as we learn therefrom, what Lucidus ſaid concerning Pope Joan.

LUCILIUS.

LUCILIUS (Caïus) a Roman knight, and Latin poet, was born at Sueſſa in the country of the Arunci in Italy, towards the beginning of the VIIth century of Rome [A]. He bore arms under Scipio Africanus in the Numantine war [B], and had a great ſhare in the friendſhip of this famous general, and in that of Lælius [C]. He compoſed thirty books of Satires, in which he ſeverely cenſured, even by name, ſeveral perſons of quality [D]. Some learned men ſay that he was the firſt author of this ſort of Peotry [E]; but others are of a different opinion. He uſed to ſay, that he wiſhed to meet with readers who were neither ignorant, nor very learned [F]. It is not probable

[A] He was born at Sueſſa, in the country of the Arunci, towards the beginning of the VIIth century of Rome.] Euſebius's Chronicle places the birth of Lucilius in the firſt year of the CLVIIIth Olympiad, which is the DCVth of Rome (1). Auſonius points out this poet, when he ſays, Rudes Camœnas qui Sueſſæ prævenis (2).

For thou com'ſt up to the rude Sueſſian verſe.

Juvenal alſo hints at him in this verſe:

Per quem magnus equos Auruncæ flexit alumnus (3).

The road in which the great Aruntian drove.

And therefore that is Lucilius's country which I give him, and not Sueſſa Pometia, as Father Briet will have it. 'C. Lucilius, ſays he, Romanus Eques ex Sueſſa 'Pometia urbe Aruncorum non procul à Pomptina 'palude ortus fuit (4). —— Caïus Lucilius, a Roman 'knight, was of Sueſſa Pometia, a city of the Arunci, 'ſituated not far from the Pomptin lake.' If he had conſulted Cluverius, he would have found Sueſſa Pometia was in the country of the Volſci, and not in the country of the Aurunci. Cluverius diſtinguiſhes two towns called Sueſſa; one, with the epithet Pometia, was in the country of the Volſci, the other, with the epithet Aurunca, was in Campania, beyond the Liris (5). Some commentators on Juvenal (6), by a notable blunder, ſay, that Lucilius was born at Arunca, or Aurunca, a town of the Rutuli. The time has been worſe miſtaken than the place of his birth, by Father Briet. 'Natus, 'ſays he, Olymp. CXXXVIII. obiit Olymp. CXLIX. 'ætatis 46 Neapoli publico elatus funere, ut ſcribit 'Hieronymus. —— He was born in the CXXXVIIIth, 'and died in the CXLIX Olympiad, being forty ſix 'years old. He was honoured at Naples with a public 'funeral, as Jerome writes.' St Jerome does not ſay this; and if he had, this Jeſuit ſhould either have confuted, or rejected him, ſince, according to him, the Poet Lucilius bore arms in the Numantine war (7), fifty years later than the CXLIXth Olympiad.

[B] He bore arms . . . . . in the Numantine war.] Valleius Paterculus tells us this. 'Celebre, ſays 'he (8), & Lucilii nomen fuit, qui ſub P. Africano 'Nûmantino bello eques militaverat. Quo quidem 'tempore juvenis adhuc Jugurtha ac Marius ſub eodem Africano militantes in iiſdem caſtris didicere 'quæ poſtea in contrariis facerent. —— The name of 'Lucilius was famous, who ſerved under Publius Africanus in the Numantine war, at which time Jugurtha and Marius, both young men, ſerved likewiſe 'under Africanus, and learned in the ſame camp, 'thoſe arts which they afterwards practiſed againſt 'each other.' It muſt be confeſſed, that this does not well agree with Euſebius's Chronicle; for when Scipio made war with the Numantines. Lucilius, by this Chronicle, was but fifteen years old. Did any one liſt in the cavalry before he took on the Toga Virilis? Scaliger obſerves (9), that the fathers ſometimes brought their ſons to the army, before the taking this garment; but this was not what they called militare equitem. Yet this is what Paterculus affirms of our Lucilius.

[C] He had a great ſhare in the friendſhip of Scipio and Lælius.] They honoured him with ſuch a familiarity, as to droll and toy with him. See Horace's ſcholiaſt upon theſe words of the firſt ſatire of the ſecond book.

Quin, ubi ſe à vulgo, & ſcena, in ſecreta remorant
Virtus Scipiadæ, & mitis ſapientia Læli:
Nugari cum illo, & diſcincti ludere, donec
Decoqueretur olus, ſoliti . . . . (10).

Did Lælius, or did Scipio hate his muſe?
Or ſtorm when he Mettellus did abuſe?
The great ones and the crowd did diſcommend,
And valu'd virtue only and her friend?
No, no, they treated him, and thought him good,
And when remov'd from bus'neſs and the crowd,
Would keep him company, would laugh and jeſt,
And ſport until their little meat was dreſt.

[D] He compoſed thirty books of ſatires, in which he cenſured by name . . . . . . ſeveral perſons of quality.] Let us hear what Horace had juſt ſaid of him.

Quid cum eſt Lucilius auſus
Primus in hunc operis componere carmina morem,
Detrahere & pellem, nitidus qua quiſque per ora
Cederet, introrſum turpis? num Lælius, aut, qui Duxit ab oppreſſa meritum Carthagine nomen, Ingenio offenſi? aut læſo doluere Metello?
Famoſiſque Lupo cooperto verſibus? atqui
Primores populi arripuit, populumque tributim,
Scilicet uni æquus virtuti, atque ejus amicis (11).

How, Sir, Lucilius that did firſt engage
In writing ſatires, and that laſh'd the age,
And ſtripp'd our fopplings of their lion's skin,
In which they look'd ſo gay, all foul within. &c.

Creech.

Perſius ſays the ſame thing in fewer words (12). See Juvenal, who relates how Lucilius made the guilty tremble with his pen, as much as if he had purſued them with ſword in hand.

Enſe velut ſtricto, quoties Lucilius ardens
Infremuit, rubet auditor cui frigida mens eſt
Criminibus, tacita ſudant præcordia culpa (13).

Sharp as a ſword, Lucilius drew his pen,
And ſtruck, with pannic terror, guilty men;
At his juſt ſtrokes, the hard'ned wretch would ſtart,
Feel the cold ſweat, and tremble at the heart.

[E] Some learned men ſay that he was the firſt author of ſatire; others are of a different opinion.] They who make him him the inventer of it, ground themſelves on theſe words of Horace:

Quid cum eſt Lucilius auſus
PRIMUS in hunc operis, componere carmina morem (14)?

Was it not Lucilius who firſt attempted to write in this way.

They alledge alſo a paſſage of Quintilian, and theſe words of Pliny: 'Si hoc Lucilius qui PRIMUS 'condidit ſtyli naſum, dicendum ſibi putavit (15). '—— If Lucilius, who firſt introduced the ſatiric 'ſtile, thought proper to ſay this.' Quintilian's teſtimony is this: 'Satira quidem tota noſtra eſt, in qua 'PRIMUS inſignem laudem adeptus eſt Lucili'us (16). —— Satire is indeed entirely our own, and 'Lucilius is the firſt that gained praiſe therein.' But notwithſtanding theſe authorities, Mr Dacier has maintained, with greater probability, that Lucilius had only given this kind of poetry a juſter turn, and ſeaſoned it with more wit and delicacy than his predeceſſors Ennius and Pacuvius (17).

[F] He wiſhed neither ignorant nor very learned readers.] There is ſomething in this wiſh, that diſcovers probable he died at forty ſix years of age [G], as ſome affirm. Of all his works we have only ſome fragments of his Satires remaining [H]. It is a misfortune; for if we had all his works, we ſhould learn a great many things by them. Cicero has contradicted himſelf a deal of good ſenſe. Theſe two kind of readers, are ſometimes equally formidable; the former ſee not enough, and the latter ſee too much; the one have not ſenſe enough to underſtand what is good, there is no juſtice to be expected from them; and there is no concealing from the others what is imperfect. One of Cicero's interlocutors, in the ſecond book of the Orator, mentions this thought of Lucilius, and approves it, and applies it to himſelf; I mean, he wiſhes the ſame thing. Here is what he ſays. 'Quod addidiſti tertium vos 'eos eſſe qui vitam inſuavem ſine his ſtudiis putaretis; 'id me non modo non hortatur ad diſputandum, ſed 'etiam deterret. Nam ut Cajus Lucilius homo doctus, '& perurbanus dicere ſolebat, ea quæ ſcriberet, neque ab indoctiſſimis, neque ab doctiſſimis legi velle, 'quod alteri nihil intelligerent, alteri plus fortaſſe quàm 'ipſe de ſe, quo etiam ſcripſit: Perſium non curo legere. Hic enim fuit, ut noramus, omnium fere noſtrorum hominum doctiſſimus. Lælium Decimum 'volo, quem cognovimus virum bonum & non illiterarum, ſed nihil ad Perſium. Sic ego, ſi jam mihi 'diſputandum ſit de his noſtris ſtudiis, nolim equidem 'apud ruſticos, ſed multo minus apud vos. Malo 'enim non intelligi orationem meam, quàm reprehendi (18). —— What you add in the third place, that 'you are of the number of thoſe, who, without theſe 'ſtudies, think life unpleaſant, not only hinders me from 'diſputing at preſent, but alſo utterly deters me from 'it; for as Caius Lucilius, a learned and very polite 'man, uſed to ſay, that he did not deſire that his 'writings ſhould be read by the moſt ignorant, nor by 'the moſt learned, becauſe the former knew nothing of 'the matter, and the later perhaps more than he who 'wrote it; ſo I do not care to read Perſius. For he 'was, as we all know, one of the moſt learned of our 'writers. I like Lucius Decimus very well, whom we 'knew to be a good man, and not illiterate, but nothing 'when compared to Perſius. So were I to diſpute on 'the ſubject of our ſtudies, I ſhould not care to do it 'among clowns, but much leſs among you. For I had 'rather my diſcourſe ſhould not be underſtood, than be 'cenſured.' Cicero, in another book, where he ſpeaks in his own name, declares himſelf to be far from this wiſh of Lucilius; he requires the moſt penetrating readers, and fears no colours. 'Nec enim, ſays he (19), 'ut noſter Lucilius, recuſabo quo minus omnes mea 'legant. Utinam eſſet ille Perſius. Scipio vero, & 'Rutilius multo etiam magis, quorum ille judicium 'reformidans, Tarentinis ait ſe, & Conſentinis, & Siculis ſcribere: facete is quidem ſicut alias, ſed neque 'tam docti tunc erant ad quorum judicium elaboraret, & ſunt illius ſcripta leviora, ut urbanitas ſumma appareat, doctrina mediocris. Ego autem quem 'timeam lectorem, quum ad te (20) ne Græcis quidem 'cedentem, in philoſophia audeam ſcribere?' He had in another book mentioned this thought of Lucilius, and approved and adopted it, as appears from Pliny's preface, who, after ſo great an example, doth himſelf an honour to eſpouſe it. 'Præterea eſt quædam pu-'blica etiam eruditorum rejectio. Utitur illa & M. 'Tullius, extra omnem ingenii aleam poſitus, & (quod 'miremur) per advocatum defenditur. Nec doctiſſimis: Manium Perſium hæc legere nolo, Junium Congum volo. Quod ſi hoc Lucilius, qui primus condi-'dit ſtyli naſum, dicendum ſibi putavit: ſi Cicero mutuandum, præſertim cum de Republica ſcriberet; 'quanto nos cauſatius ab aliquo Judice defendimus?' Father Hardouin has expunged Lælium Decimum out of this paſſage of Pliny, to inſert Junium Congum, agreeably to the manuſcripts. He obſerves, that Lucilius more than once made uſe of this thought, and named one while ſome perſons, and another while others; and therefore it is a miſtake to pretend, that it was Lælius Decimus in Pliny, becauſe this name is found in Cicero's ſecond book, de Oratore. Pliny had not this paſſage of Cicero in view, but another in his book de Republica. See the margin (21).

[G] It is not probable that he died at forty ſix years of age.] Euſebius's Chronicle does not make him older; it places his birth in the firſt year of the CLVIIIth Olympiad, and his death in the ſecond year of the CLXIXth Olympiad (22), which is the DCLIſt of Rome. Glandorpius ought not to be accuſed of making him ſixty four years old; it is an error of the preſs, which tranſpoſing the figures, gives 64 for 46. Such errors are common. To prove that Euſebius is miſtaken, we need only conſider, that Lucilius has mentioned the Licinian law, made againſt the expences of feaſts in the 656th year of Rome, or thereabouts. Lex deinde Licinia rogata eſt . . . . . Hujus legis Lævius Poëta meminit. . . . . . . Lucilius quoque legis iſtius meminit in his verbis, Legem citemus Licini (23). He therefore lived five or ſix years after the year it is pretended he died at Naples; and if, on the other hand, we conſider that he muſt be born before the 605th year of Rome, ſince he bore arms before Numantia, in the year 620, we ſhall find, that Horace might well call him an old man, literally, and without a figure. It is in the place where he ſays Lucilius committed all his ſecrets to his books, ſo that we find in them his life, as in a votive table.

Theſe words of Horace are in the firſt ſatire, verſe 28, of the ſecond book.

[H] Of all his works we have only ſome fragments of his ſatires remaining.] For five or ſix words, which remain of his other pieces (24), deſerve not our notice, beſides, it is not agreed theſe pieces were his. See Douza the ſon's notes upon Lucilius's fragments, at the 99th page. Some ſay, that he wrote the Life of the ſame Scipio Africanus, whoſe victories were celebrated by Ennius. Douza denies it, for a reaſon which I think very weak; he takes it from Scipio and Lucilius's living at different times, a very bad proof; for may not a Poet, who ſhall live an hundred years hence, write the private life of the prince of Condé, or the mareſchal de Turrenne. However, I believe, with Douza, that Lucilius wrote the Life of that Scipio Africanus, with whom he intimately converſed. 'Ejuſdem 'Scipionis (it is Douza the ſon who ſpeaks in his notes 'upon the fragments of our Poet, at the 98th page) vi-'tam privatam poſtea deſcripſit, in quo Pſeudoporphyrionem manifeſti erroris convincit Parens meus, qui 'Lucilium vitam privatam Scipionis, Ennium verò bella 'deſcripſiſſe annotat: ubi male nomina Scipionum inter 'ſe confuſa. himſelf concerning Lucilius's learning [I]. I do not think Horace was reaſonably blamed for the judgment he made of this Satiriſt [K]. Pompey, by the mother's ſide, was grandſon,

' of the great Scipio, and that it is he whom Horace men-' tions here, confound Chronology. The great Scipio ' was dead above thirty five years before Lucilius was ' born (25).' If Lucilius had died before Scipio was born, this had been an invincible confutation of thoſe who attributed to him the hiſtory of this Roman general: but to go and confute them by this reaſon, that he was born thirty five years after the death of this hero, muſt proceed from want of attention. It is not only poſſible, that this Poet might write the hiſtory of Scipio Africanus the elder, but very probable that he has done it; and that at the requeſt of Scipio Africanus, the younger, his good friend, who might furniſh him with many good materials. I do not, however, retract what I have advanced; how many things are not true, which are yet moſt probable (26)? for the reſt, Lucilius's fragments were collected with great care by Francis Douza, and publiſhed (27) at Leyden with notes, in the year 1597. They ſtand greatly in need of being better illuſtrated by ſome learned critic.

[I] Cicero has contradicted himſelf concerning Lucilius's learning.] In his firſt book De Oratore, he acknowledges that Lucilius was a learned man; his words are worth reciting. ' Sed ut ſolebat C. Lucilius ſæpe ' dicere homo tibi ſubiratus (28), mihi propter eam ' ipſam cauſam minus quam volebat familiaris, ſed tamen & doctus & perurbanus, ſic ſentio neminem eſſe ' in oratorum numero habendum, qui non ſit omnibus ' iis artibus quæ ſunt libero homine dignæ perpolitus (29). —— But as Caius Lucilius, a man who did ' not like you, and who therefore was leſs intimate with ' me than otherwiſe he would have been, but yet a ' very learned and polite man, was wont to ſay, ſo think ' I, that no one ought to be taken into the liſt of orators, who is deficient in any thing it becomes a free man ' to know.' He gives him the ſame praiſe of a learned man, in the ſecond book of the ſame work (30), but takes that praiſe from him in the firſt book De Finibus (31). Quintilian gives it him, without ever retracting. I will cite him in the following remark.

[K] I do not think Horace could reaſonably be blamed for the judgment he gave of Lucilius.] The critics murmured, and he juſtified himſelf. Let us ſee his words; we will begin with the criticiſm, and end with the apology.

Eupolis, atque Cratinus, Ariſtophaneſque poëtæ,
Atque alii, quorum comœdia priſca virorum eſt:
Si quis erat dignus deſcribi, quòd malus, aut fur;
Quòd mœchus foret, aut ſicarius, aut alioqui
Famoſus: multa cum libertate notabant.
Hinc omnis pendet Lucilius, hoſce ſecutus:
Mutatis tantùm pedibus, numeriſque facetus:
Emunctæ naris, durus componere verſus.
Nam fuit hoc vitioſus: in hora ſæpe ducentos,
Ut magnum, verſus dictabat ſtans pede in uno:
Cùm flueret lutulentus, erat quod tollere velles:
Garrulus, atque piger ſcribendi ferre laborem:
Scribendi recte: nam ut multum, nil moror (32).

Cratin, and Eupolis, that laſh'd the age,
Thoſe old comedian furies of the ſtage;
If they were to deſcribe a vile, unjuſt,
And cheating knave, or ſcourge a lawleſs luſt;
Or other crimes; regardleſs of his fame
They ſhow'd the man, and boldly told his name.
This is Lucilius's way, he follows thoſe:
His wit the ſame, but other numbers choſe;
I grant he was a ſharp and ready wit,
But rude and uncorrect in all he writ:
This was his fault, he haſtily wou'd rhyme,
(As if 'twere ſuch a wond'rous thing in him)
Two hundred tedious lines in one hour's time:
Yet when with force his muddy fancy flow'd,
Some few pure ſtreams appear'd amongſt the mud:
In writing much 'tis true his parts excel,
Too lazy for the task of writing well.

CREECH.

Now we ſhall ſee how Horace juſtifies himſelf.

Nempe incompoſito dixi pede currere verſus
Lucili: quis tam Lucili fautor ineptè eſt, Ut non hoc fateatur? at idem, quòd ſale multo nam ſic

Et Laberi mimos, ut pulchra poëmata, mirer (33).

Well Sir, I grant, I ſaid, Lucilius' muſe
Is uncorrect, his way of writing looſe,
And who admires him ſo, what friend of his
So blindly dotes as to deny me this?
And yet in the ſame page I freely own
His wit as ſharp as ever laſh'd the town;
But this one ſort of excellence allow'd,
Doth not infer that all the reſt is good:
For on the ſame account I might admit
Laberius farce, for poems and for wit.

CREECH.

He afterwards anſwers Lucilius's admirers concerning the mixing Greek with Latin words, and profeſſes he does not deſign to rob him of the crown ſo juſtly due to him.

Hoc erat, experto fruſtrà Varrone Atacino,
Atque quibuſdam aliis, melius quod ſcribere poſſem,
Inventore minor: neque ego illi detrahere auſim
Hærentem capiti multa cum laude coronam (34).

In ſatires I, with Varro try'd in vain,
And others too may have a happy ſtrain.
Yet thou, Lucilius, leſs, I freely own,
I would not ſtrive to blaſt his juſt renown,
He wears, and beſt deſerves to wear, the crown.

CREECH.

He demands the ſame liberty with reſpect to Lucilius, which every one takes with reſpect to the greateſt Poets, and which Lucilius himſelf took with reſpect to Ennius; and maintains, that if the author he cenſured were alive, he would correct his own works, and write with greater exactneſs.

At dixi fluere hunc lutulentum, ſæpe ferentem
Plura quidem tollenda relinquendis, age, quæſo,
Tu nihil in magno doctus reprehendis Homero?
Nil comis Tragici mutat Lucilius Atti?
Non ridet verſus Enni gravitate minores,
Cùm de ſe loquitur, non ut majore reprenſis?
Quid vetat, & noſmet Lucili ſcripta legenteis
Quærere, num illius, num rerum dura negarit
Verſiculos natura magis factos, & eunteis Mollius (35)? - - - - - - - -
- - - - - - - - - - - - - -
  - - - - - fuerit Lucilius, inquam,
Comis & urbanus: fuerit limatior idem,
Quàm rudis, & Græci intacti carminis auctor,
Quamque Poëtarum ſeniorum turba: ſed ille,
Si foret hoc noſtrum fato dilatus in ævum:
Detereret ſibi multa: recideret omne, quod ultra
Perfectum traheretur & in verſu faciendo
Sæpe caput ſcaberet: vivos & roderet ungueis (36).

Ay, but I ſaid his fancy muddy flow'd,
And faulty lines did oft exceed the good.
Well Sir, and is e'en Homer all correct?
Is he, Sir Critic, free from all defect?
Doth not Lucilius Accius rhymes accuſe?
And blame our Ennius's correcter muſe?
For too much lightneſs oft his rhymes deride,
And when he talks of his own verſe, for pride?

I thought my ſelf obliged to ſet down all theſe long paſſages, becauſe they acquaint my reader with Lucilius's character, and it is diſagreeable to be diverted by references, in reading the life of a famous man. Mr Dacier never gave a better proof of his judgment, than when he declared himſelf (37) for Horace againſt Quintilian; it is ſtrange, that learned Rhetorician ſhould not applaud this Poet's judgment. His words will let us ſee the prodigious prejudice of many in Lucilius's favour. ' Satira quidem tota noſtra eſt, in qua ' primus inſignem laudem adeptus eſt Lucilius, qui ' quoſdam ita deditos ſibi adhuc habet amatores, ut ' eum non ejuſdem modò operis autoribus, ſed omnibus poëtis præferre non dubitent. Ego quantum ab ' illis, tantum ab Horatio diſſentio, qui Lucilium fluere ' lutulentum, & eſſe aliquid quod tollere poſſis, putat. ' Nam & eruditio in eo mira, & libertas, atque inde ' acerbitas, & abundè ſalis (38). —— Satire indeed is ' wholly ours, and Lucilius was the firſt who acquired ' any reputation therein, to whoſe work ſome are ſo biggotted, that they ſtick not to prefer him not only to ' all Satiriſts, but to all Poets. For my part, I differ ' as much from them as from Horace, who thought Lucilius raked too much in mud, and ſaid many things ' which might have been as well let alone. For his ' learning is certainly wonderful. He writes with a ' great freedom, ſmartneſs, and ſparkling ſtrokes of ' wit.'

[L] Pompey . . . . was grandſon, or rather great nephew, to Lucilius.] Porphyrion, upon theſe words of Horace,

- - - - quidquid ſum ego, quamvis
Infra Lucili cenſum ingeniumque (39).

Whate'er I am, altho' I muſt ſubmit,
To wiſe Lucilius, in eſtate and wit.

obſerves, that Lucilius was brother to Pompey's grandmother, and conſequently his great uncle by the mother's ſide. Acron (40), another old interpreter of Horace, ſays that Lucilius was Pompey's grandfather. This opinion is leſs probable than the former, for if Lucilia, Pompey's mother, had been Lucilius's daughter (41), I do not think that Velleius Paterculus would have forgotten to mention it. We muſt therefore believe ſhe was daughter to a brother of Lucilius, and conſequently, that Porphyrion miſtakes the true ground of the relation. Thus the learned Antonius Auguſtinus (42), and Francis Douza reaſon and conjecture.

[M] I ſhall obſerve the faults of Mr Moreri.] I. Lucilius was not a native of Sueſſa Pometia. II. This town was not in the country of the Aurunci. III. It is not certain, that he was the firſt who wrote ſatires in Latin verſe. Mr Dacier ſhews the contrary: ſee, above, the remark [E]. IV. However it be, he ſhould not have pretended, that beſides this, he was the author of a kind of verſe unknown to the Greeks; from Græcis intacti carminis auctor; for if theſe words of Horace (43) did concern Lucilius, they would only aſcribe to him the invention of ſatire. V. But the beſt critics (44) have long ſince obſerved, that theſe words relate to Ennius, and not to Lucilius. VI. It is not true, that the CLXIXth Olympiad falls in the 651ſt year of Rome: an Olympiad includes four years.

[N] . . . . and the faults of ſome other authors.] See above (45) thoſe of Father Briet. Geſner's abridger is groſsly miſtaken about the age of Lucilius, or Lucillius, as he calls him; Floruit, ſays he (46), ſecundi belli Punici temporibus. Glandorp (47) was of opinion, that he whom Cicero ſpeaks of, as an author, who deſired neither ignorant nor very learned readers, is not the ſame Lucilius, who compoſed the ſatires. It is an error. Charles Stephens has committed the ſame fault: Lloyd and Hoſman have adopted it, and moreover pretended, that our Lucilius was born in the LIIId Olympiad, and that he died in the LXIXth, being forty ſix years of age: an abſurdity which is manifeſt. They cite Quintilian 17. 21. which is a chimerical citation.

[O] . . . . and an anachroniſm of Stephen Paſquier.] His words are theſe. ' With this it was (48) that the ' advocates of Rome ſported moſt, when they had a ' mind to awake their judges. See this piece of Cicero in his oration for Milo: Eſt enim hæc, Judices, ' non ſcripta, ſed nata lex, &c. You will find it equals ' the fineſt verſes of all antiquity; which afterwards ' grew into ſuch an affectation and abuſe, that Lucilius, a ſatirical Poet ridiculed it very handſomely ' in one of his ſatires whoſe verſes Aulus Gellius relates ' in the thirteenth book of his Noctes Atticæ (49).' Garaſſe has not pardoned him this miſtake; let us hear him. ' Wherein, I ſay, Mr Paſquier has very handſomely expoſed himſelf to the laughter of all men, ' moderately verſed in Chronology; for how could Lucilius, who lived about an hundred years before Cicero, ridicule what was done an hundred years after ' his death? It is juſt as if I ſhould ſay, ſpeaking of ' that nice, poliſhed, and accurate poetry, which was ' introduced by Berthaud and Malherbe, that Marot ' and St Gelais were diſguſted ſo much with it, as to ' ridicule and ſatirize it in their writings. Such was ' the ſufficiency of that old dotard mentioned by Severinus Boëtius in his book de Diſciplina Scholarium, ' who asked whether Æneas was not Julius Cæſar's ' wife. Such was the impertinence of that miniſter ' noted by Horace Dolabella, in the ſixth chapter of ' his Apology, who being asked, Uter fuerit prior ſecundum Annales Eccleſiæ Conſtantinus an Nero? ' —— Who, according to the annals of the church, lived ' firſt, Conſtantine or Nero? came off very ingeniouſly ' by theſe words of our Saviour, Non eſt veſtrum noſſe ' tempora vel momenta. —— It is not for you to know ' the times, or the ſeaſons. Acts i. 7. And yet I ' believe theſe men, tho' very ignorant, if they had ' ſeen the difference of ſtile, between Lucilius and Cicero, would never have called in queſtion, whether ' Lucilius had been before Cicero; as a man need not ' be very much verſed in Chronology, to be able to ' ſay a hundred years hence whether Alain Charretier, ' Froiſſard, and Monſtrelet, were before Monſieur ' du Vair; and it would be a horrid ignorance ' to ſay, that Alain Charretier, or Monſtrelet, improved the ſtile, the diction, and figures of Amiot, or du Vair (50).' It was difficult to make a good anſwer to this cenſure; and therefore we find, that the learned Paſquier's ſons defended him but ill upon this point: here is what they anſwer, ' Garaſſe ſays that Lucilius was an hundred years before Cicero, which is falſe, for Cicero and Pompey ' lived at the ſame time; but Lucilius was Pompey's ' uncle: ſo that it is eaſy to judge, that our calumniator is much miſtaken in his computation. In the ' ſecond place he ſays, this might be known by the dif- ' ference of ſtile. This ignorance is more inſupportable ' than the former; for Pliny expreſsly obſerves, that ' primus fuit Lucilius qui ſtylum acuiſſe dicitur. Horace calls him emunctæ naris, and ſays he made two ' hundred verſes in an hour, and Quintilian calls him ' principem Satyricorum, inſomuch, that Adrian the emperor preferred him before Virgil. Obſerve, I pray, ' into how many abſurdities a man ſometimes runs by ' the itch of criticizing (51).' There is nothing good in this reply, but the remark on the hundred years Garaſſe puts betwixt Cicero and Lucilius. This Jeſuit pretending to criticize one fault in Chronology, falls into another; for it is not true, that Lucilius was an hundred years before Cicero, he died ſome years after Cicero great danger, who ventured to ſpeak ill of Lucilius's poems [P].

Cicero was born. It was eaſy for Paſquier's apologiſts to juſtify this; but inſtead of good proofs, they only alledged, that Lucilius was Pompey's uncle, Cicero's cotemporary. They were miſtaken; Lucilius is accounted the grandfather, or great uncle, to Pompey (52). They are very much in the wrong, to pretend that there is no diſtinction to be obſerved betwixt Lucilius and Cicero's ſtile; there is a greater difference between the ſtile of Cicero and that of Lucilius, than between the ſtile of Mr Flechier, and that of Clement Marot. To be ſoon convinced of it, we need only caſt an eye with ſome judgment on the fragments of the Latin ſatiriſt, and on the works of Cicero at the bare opening his book. To oppoſe to Father Garaſſe the words of Pliny ill cited (53), and thoſe of Quintilian ill cited (54), is to pretend that becauſe Regnier is the firſt who writ good French ſatires, his ſtile differs not from that of Mr Patru, or Mr Boileau. The emunctæ naris of Horace proves nothing; this might be ſaid of Clement Marot, and Regnier, with a great deal of juſtice, and yet what difference is there between their ſtile, and that of Patru and Boileau? Conſider Horace's whole verſe,

Have they not been forced miſerably to mutilate his teſtimony, that they might be able to make uſe of it? If they had given it intire, would they not have furniſhed arms to their adverſary? But that proof from Horace is much leſs ridiculous than that which follows, and is taken from the ſame author, Lucilius, as Horace ſays, made two hundred verſes in an hour, therefore he writ as well as Cicero. What a monſtrous conſequence is here, and more amazing ſtill, when we conſider that Horace mentions this as a fault of Lucilius, and immediately compares this author's poems to muddy ſtreams:

Nam fuit hoc vitioſus in hora ſæpe ducentos,
Ut magnum verſus dictabat, ſtans pede in uno.
Quum flueret LUTULENTUS .... (55).

(55) Horat. Sat. IV, lib. i, ver. 9.

The laſt proof which Stephen Paſquier's apologiſts bring, is no better than the others. It is founded on a falſe fact, the conſequence whereof would make againſt them, if it were true. It is not to Lucilius, but to Ennius, that Adrian gave the preference before Virgil; and all that this proves, is, that Ennius's ſtile was more ruſty and mouldy; for this was Hadrian's taſte, as his Hiſtorian obſerves. 'Amavit Præterea 'genus dicendi vetuſtum ... Ciceroni Catonem, Vir'gilio Ennium, Salluſtio Cœlium prætulit (56). —— 'Beſides he loved the old manner of ſpeaking ... He 'preferred Cato to Cicero, Ennius to Virgil, Cælius to 'Salluſt.'

I believed when I read this, that ſince Coſtar cited no body, he did not know who firſt ſaid it, and I put myſelf upon the enquiry. I found it in ſome verſes which have paſſed for Horace's, and have been prefixed to one of his ſatires (59) in ſome editions. Mr Dacier has inſerted them in his notes upon this Poet; I will tranſcribe all he has ſaid upon it; by which we ſhall ſee, that Coſtar magnifies objects, and that his embroidery is too high.

LUCRETIA, a Roman lady, famous for her beauty and noble extraction [A], but much more for her virtue, was married to Collatinus, a relation to Tarquin king of Rome. Every one knows the reaſon that induced her to kill herſelf. I ſhall however relate the circumſtances of that tragical hiſtory. Tarquin not being able to make himſelf maſter of the town of Ardea, as ſoon as he expected, reſolved on a formal ſiege. The ſiege continued a long time, and did not hinder the young princes from entertaining one another pretty often. Sextus having invited to ſupper his two brothers and Collatinus, the diſcourſe turned upon the fair ſex; and a diſpute aroſe, not about the beauty of their miſtreſſes, as it would in our age, but upon the beauty of their wives. Each maintained

[A] For her ... noble extraction.] Lucretia's family was doubtleſs Patrician, ſince we find conſuls in it, at a time when the Plebeians were not admitted unto the conſulſhip. It made a noble figure in the reign of Tarquinius Superbus; for this prince gave the government of Rome to SPURIUS LUCRETIUS Tricipitinus, father to our Lucretia, married to a prince of the blood (1). Some authors ſay (2), that Numa Pompilius, being choſen king of Rome, married a lady called Lucretia. If ſhe was of the family I here ſpeak of, as it is probable ſhe was, what proofs ſhould we deſire greater of the famous antiquity of this houſe? Spurius Lucretius, after his daughter's death, was created Interrex, and he named Brutus, and his ſon-in-law Collatinus, to the conſulſhip (3). The later was ſoon after forced to reſign his office, and retire to Lanuvium (4), where he ſpent the reſt of his life, which was very long. Valerius being choſen in his room, took Spurius Lucretius for his colleague (5), after Brutus had been killed; but this colleague died in a few days (6). I find a TITUS LUCRETIUS, who was conſul the following year, and a few years after (7); and a PUBLIUS LUCRETIUS, colleague to Valerius, when he was conſul the third time (8). This Titus Lucretius is thought to be the father of LUCIUS LUCRETIUS Tricipitinus, conſul in the year of Rome 291 (9). I paſs over ſeveral Lucretii, who enjoyed afterwards the principal poſts in the government, before it was determined, that the Plebeians ſhould be admitted to them maintained that his was handſomeſt; the controverſy growing hot, Collatinus propoſed a means of deciding it. Why ſo many words, ſaid he, we may in a little time have viſible proofs of my Lucretia's pre-eminence; let us take horſe, and go and ſurprize our wives; the determination of the queſtion will by this means be eaſier, than if they were prepared to receive us. Wine having heated them, they readily embraced the propoſition, and rode to Rome full ſpeed. They found Tarquin's daughters-in-law at table, regaling themſelves with ſome perſons of their own age. They afterwards went to Collatia; and, though it was very late, they found Lucretia, in the midſt of her maids, working with her hands upon wool (a). They agreed, that ſhe excelled all the others and returned to the camp. Sextus, tranſported with a violent paſſion for her, returned a few days after to Collatia, without ſaying a word to any perſon. He was received with all the civility, that was due to a near relation, who was the king's eldeſt ſon, and who was not ſuſpected of the leaſt diſhoneſt thought. After he had ſupped, he was conducted to the chamber deſigned for him. He did not ſleep, but when he thought the family were quiet, he ſtole, with his ſword in his hand, into Lucretia's chamber, and threatning to kill her if ſhe made the leaſt noiſe, he declared his paſſion to her; he uſed all the tendereſt entreaties, and the moſt terrible threats, and all imaginable artifices that can touch a woman's heart. It was all to no purpoſe, Lucretia continued firm; the fear of death did not ſhake her, but ſhe could not reſiſt the menace that Sextus made of expoſing her to the laſt degree of infamy. He declared, that after having killed her, he would kill one of her ſlaves, and lay him in her bed, and make it be believed, that both the murders were the puniſhment of the adultery, in which he had ſurprized her. Having thus accompliſhed his infamous deſign, he retired as content and proud of his conqueſt, as if it had been fairly obtained, and according to the niceſt laws of galantry. The lady, ſeized with the deepeſt melancholy, ſent to entreat her father, who was at Rome, and her huſband, who was at the ſiege of Ardea, to come immediately to her. They did ſo: ſhe acquainted them with her misfortune, and conjured them to revenge her. They promiſed they would, and ſaid all they could think of to comfort her; ſhe would by no means be comforted, but drawing out a dagger, ſhe had hid in her cloaths, ſtruck it into her heart. Brutus, who was preſent at this ſpectacle, found the occaſion he had long ſought for of delivering Rome from Tarquin's tyranny, and ſo far improved this occaſion, that the kingly power was aboliſhed (b): thus Lucretia's death was the cauſe of the liberty of the Roman people, which has given a great luſtre to the immortal memory of this lady. Hiſtorians relate her adventure differently [B]. The epitaph them. But there is no need of all theſe particulars to prove, that the Lucretii Tricipitini were of a Patrician family. What I have ſaid is ſufficient. It is not certain that this can be ſaid of the Lucretii ſirnamed Veſpillo, or Ofella, or of thoſe of any other ſirname: There are even ſome Lucretii, whoſe ſirname we are ignorant of, who were of a Plebeian family; for we ſee a MARCUS LUCRETIUS, tribune of the people in the ſecond Punic war (10). Note, that QUINTUS LUCRETIUS, the firſt who was ſirnamed Veſpillo, had this ſirname for caſting Tiberius Gracchus's body into the Tiber: Cujus Corpus Lucretii Ædilis manu in Tiberim miſſum; unde ille Veſpillo dictus (11). Cicero (12) ſpeaks honourably of one QUINTUS LUCRETIUS Veſpillo, a good Lawyer and good Advocate. There was one QUINTUS LUCRETIUS Veſpillo, a ſenator, who followed Pompey's party (13), and whom the fidelity of his wife preſerved from the fury of the Triumviri, who had proſcribed him (14). This is probably the ſame who obtained the conſulſhip in the 734th year of Rome (15). Cicero ſpeaks of LUCRETIUS Ofella, as an orator, who was better at making harangues to the people, than at pleading cauſes: Aptior concionibus quam judiciis (16). Moreri has wretchedly tranſlated this. He was fitter, ſays he, to make ſpeeches than pronounce judgments. Another (17) affirms, that Cicero repreſents him fitter to be a judge than a great orator. It is believed (18), that this Lucretius Ofella, is the ſame who quitted Marius's party, and joined Sylla, and retook Præneſte, where he forced Marius the younger to kill himſelf. This piece of ſervice hindered not Sylla's putting him to death in the midſt of the Forum, becauſe he had demanded the conſulſhip againſt Sylla's intention (19).

[B] Hiſtorians relate Lucretia's adventure differently] Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, and Livy, have given the largeſt deſcriptions of it. They lived at the ſame time, and exactly conſulted the preceeding authors. Neverthele ſs, they agree but in three or four general facts: I. That Sextus entered by night into Lucretia's chamber. II. That this lady, after having reſiſted the menaces of death, intreaties, and promiſes, yielded at laſt, when ſhe was threatened with infamy. III. That ſhe killed herſelf the next day. IV. That Brutus laid hold of this occaſion to change the government. The firſt of theſe two Hiſtorians gives a more particular and large account than the other: as for inſtance, he particularizes that Sextus promiſed Lucretia to marry her; by which means ſhe would immediately be queen of the Gabii, and afterwards of Rome, upon Tarquin's death, whoſe ſucceſſor he would infallibly be, as being his eldeſt ſon (20). Livy contents himſelf with theſe general expreſſions. ‘ Stricto gladio ad dormientem Lucretiam venit, ſiniſtraque manu mulieris pectore oppreſſo, Tace Lucretia, inquit, Sex. Tarquinius ſum, ferrum in manu eſt: moriêre, ſi emiſeris vocem. Cùm pavida è ſomno mulier nullam opem, propè mortem imminentem videret; Tum Tarquinius fateri amorem, orare: miſcere precibus minas: verſare in omnes partes muliebrem animum (21). ——— With his drawn ſword in his hand, he approached the ſleeping Lucretia, he put his left hand upon her breaſt, be ſilent, ſaid he, Lucretia, I am Sextus Tarquinius, my ſword is in my hand, and if you ſpeak a word you die. The woman, awaking in a fright, perceived no help nigh, and that ſhe was in danger of immediate death; then Tarquin declared his paſſion, beſought her, mingled threatenings with prayers, and uſed all the arts capable of prevailing on a woman.’ But to know the difference between theſe two Hiſtorians, we need only remember, that Livy relates the ſtory, as we find it in the text of this article; and at the ſame time take notice of the following particulars: I take them from Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus. Sextus being ſent to Collatia by king Tarquin, upon affairs relating to the ſiege of Ardea, lodged at the houſe of Collatinus, his relation, who was then at the camp, and found a proper opportunity to ſatisfy the paſſion he had conceived for Lucretia in a former viſit. The Hiſtorian does not ſpeak of the diſpute of the young princes, concerning the beauty of their wives, which obliged them to go to Rome and to Collatia, to end the difference. This circumſtance, however, was ſingular enough to deſerve a place in Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus's account; and was an incident very capable of embelliſhing the narration. Lucretia, over-whelmed with melancholy, took coach at break of day, as ſoon as Sextus was withdrawn: ſhe took epitaph which is ſeen in Italy, and is pretended to have been compoſed by Collatinus her huſband [C], is doubtleſs, a ſuppoſititious piece. Her raviſher was not long expoſed to the remorſes of his conſcience, or the ſevere reproaches of his family, whoſe total ruin he had occaſioned. He retired to a town of the Gabii, where he had formerly commanded, and there periſhed a little after (c). The reflexions which have been made by ſome writers, are not only falſe wit, but vain cavelling ſophiſtry [D]. It has been ſaid in another took a mourning habit, and a dagger under her robe, and went to Rome with a dejected countenance, and all in tears, without ſaying any thing to thoſe who asked her the cauſe of her affliction. When ſhe came to her father's houſe, ſhe threw herſelf upon her knees; ſhe cryed without ſaying a word, and at laſt deſired him to ſend for her relations and friends: as ſoon as they were come together, ſhe told them her adventure; prayed the gods to take her quickly out of this world (22), and ſtabbed herſelf. Valerius was immediately diſpatched to the camp, to carry this news to Collatinus, and to join with him in raiſing an inſurrection among the ſoldiers. He met Collatinus and Brutus not far from Rome, who had heard nothing of what had happened. Thus you ſee variations ſomewhat ſurprizing; and which prove, that the firſt Hiſtorians, the ſources of Livy and Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, did not take the neceſſary care to have an exact information.

Here are more variations. Servius calls him Aruns who violated Lucretia; other Hiſtorians call him Sextus, and give the name of Aruns to another ſon of Tarquin (23). The ſame Servius ſuppoſes, that, in order to determine the diſpute, they went firſt to Lucretia at Collatia, and then to Rome, and ſays, that the ſlave he took with him into Lucretia's chamber, was an Ethiopian (24). I ſay nothing of Ovid, who has related (25) Lucretia's misfortune with ſeveral circumſtances of which no Hiſtorian makes mention. He uſed a Poetical licence, and has invented what he thought moſt proper to adorn his ſtory. Nay, he has inſerted what the Greeks ſaid of Polyxena (26), that ſhe took care ſo to ſettle her cloaths, that, as ſhe fell, nothing might be ſeen that modeſty would have concealed.

  Et cadit in Patrios ſanguinolenta pedes.
Tunc quoque, jam moriens, ne non procumbat honeſtè,
  Reſpicit: hæc etiam cura cadentis erat (27).

This ſaid, her fatal dagger pierc'd her ſide,
And at her father's feet ſhe fell and dy'd.
Yet as ſhe fell, her dying thoughts contriv'd,
To fall as modeſtly as ſhe had liv'd.

But as it would be no embelliſhment to his account, to ſay that the raviſher of this lady was Tarquin's youngeſt ſon, we muſt believe that in this he followed ſome tradition; and conſequently that the Hiſtorians were divided on this particular point: moſt ſaid that the raviſher was eldeſt ſon to that prince, and ſome took him for the youngeſt.

[C] The epitaph that is . . . . . pretended to have been compoſed by Collatinus her huſband.] Theſe are the words of it: ‘Collatinus Tarquinius dulciſſimæ conjugi & incomparabili, pudicitiæ decori, mulierum gloriæ, vixit annis XXII. menſ. III. d. VI. proh dolor, quæ fuit cariſſima (28). —— Collatinus Tarquinius to his moſt dear and incomparable wife, honour of chaſtity, glory of women. She lived twenty two years, three months, ſix days, who was moſt dear to me!’ It is ſaid, that this inſcription is ſeen at Rome, and in the dioceſe of Viterbo (29).

[D] The reflexions . . . . . of ſome writers are not only falſe wit, but vain cavilling ſophiſtry.] A modern author, fancied himſelf, no doubt, very witty in obſerving that Lucretia killed herſelf too late; and that, if ſhe reſolved upon parting with her life, it was not till ſhe had taſted the forbidden fruit (30). This is the falſeſt raillery in the world; and there is no reaſonable man, but will agree, that, on ſuch a ſubject as this, to quit gravity, and in any wiſe to aim at jeſting, is not only a raſh audaciouſneſs, but alſo ſtupidity and brutiſhneſs. Lucretia's action ſhould only excite the ſenſe of compaſſion and admiration. Her conduct was exempt from any mixture of impurity; ſhe was a bright ſacrifice to the love of virtue and glory: and it would be as ridiculous to ſay, that he is guilty of prodigality, who throws away his cloaths to ſave his life by ſwimming, as to ſay there was any thing of leudneſs in Lucretia's patience; for this illuſtrious lady was patient only to ſave her reputation. But if you would ſee the efforts of cavilling, read this long paſſage of Henry Stephens (31). ‘And yet the poor Lucretia did not paſs a right judgment on herſelf, when, being thus violated, ſhe ſaid ſhe had loſt her chaſtity; ſince it is certain, virtue cannot be raviſhed by any human force: and therefore what ſhe adds, that her body was violated, but that her thought (or her mind) was not culpable, contradicts what ſhe had been ſaying, namely, that ſhe had loſt her chaſtity, it being certain, that the ſeat of it is the mind, and not the body; which yet the Heathens ſeem not well to have conſidered, who have not only excuſed this woman's act, in being her own murderer, but have taken occaſion from it to extol her to the ſkies, as being a woman of courage, and of a great ſoul, in that ſhe revenged, by her death, the outrage done to her chaſtity. However, before I anſwer them, as to the outrage they pretend was done her chaſtity, I would deſire them to tell me, what they mean by the word revenge; becauſe to me it ſeems a thing againſt all reaſon, that the injury ſhould be revenged, by the death of the perſon who received it, and not by the death of him that gave it. Whereupon I ſhould alledge to them, that ſhe herſelf did not ſay, Mors ultrix erit, or vindex, my death ſhall revenge it; but Mors teſtis erit, that is, my death ſhall witneſs it: as if ſhe had ſaid, my death ſhall witneſs to the eyes of the world, what I cannot diſcover, it being a ſecret in my own conſcience; to wit, that pleaſure was ſo far from making me conſent to ſuch an act, that my life is hateful to me for having committed it. But, to come to the anſwer of the other point, I ſay, that ſuppoſing this death to import revenge, it muſt be the revenge of an outrage done to the body, and not to the mind, the ſeat of chaſtity. Which a certain author (whoſe name St Auguſtin has thought fit to conceal) conſidering in a declamation, has this fine ſentence, concerning Lucretia's misfortune: a wonderful thing! here are two perſons, and only one commits adultery. But St Auguſtin afterwards argues thus; if it is not impudicity to have to do with a man againſt her will, ſhe is unjuſtly puniſhed, ſince ſhe is chaſte. For it is certain, that the more the adultery is excuſed, the more the murder is heightened; and the more the adultery is cenſured, the more the murder is excuſed: (It being once ſuppoſed lawful for a perſon to kill himſelf.) And the ſame St Auguſtin, who praiſes this Rhetorician's ſaying, ſeems alſo to have ſucceeded well in that other argument (if it be his) Si adultera, cur laudata? Si pudica, cur occiſa? That is, if ſhe be an adultereſs, why is ſhe praiſed? if chaſte, why was ſhe killed? Upon which words, a friend of mine (32), a learned man, whom God has bleſſed with many graces, the fruits whereof are ſcattered in many parts of Chriſtendom, has lately made an epigram, with which I am willing to gratify the reader. It is this:

Si tibi fortè fuit Lucretia gratus adulter,
  Immerito ex merita præmia cæde petis:
Sin potius caſto vis eſt allata pudori,
  Quis furor eſt hoſtis crimine velle mori?
Fruſtra igitur laudem captas Lucretia: namque
  Vel furioſa ruis, vel ſcelerata cadis.

If thou wert pleas'd with the adulterous deed,
With juſtice then did thy foul boſom bleed.
If guiltleſs you did with the monſter lye,
Why for an enemy would you thus die?

ther place, that religion had no ſhare in this action of Lucretia. A learned man has oppoſed

Lewis Guyon (33) ſtole all theſe things from Henry Stephens, without the leaſt alteration; and without citing him; which plagiariſm is cuſtomary with him (34). A Spaniſh Jeſuit has amuſed himſelf with the ſame cavilling: but, as we ſhall ſee in the following remark, he has mixed ſome good things with it. He approves the Latin verſes we have ſeen above; and maintains, that Lucretia ſhewed neither chaſtity nor courage, and, from a cowardly ſpirit, feared her huſband's knife more thanher own. ‘ Ni deſcubrio lo uno ni lo otro: no lo primero, pues conſintio: y como dize Sant Ambroſio a otra de ſu manera †: Facilius oportuit ſanguinem cum ſpiritu fundere, quam perdere caſtitatem. Ni tampoco moſtro lo ſegundo, pues por flaqueza de animo temio mas el cuchillo de Colatino, que el ſuyo propio: y por eſto ſe mato con deſeſperacion, la qual ‡ pone Santo Thomas por hija dela luxuria (35). —— She ſhewed neither the one nor the other: not the firſt, ſince ſhe conſented, when as St Ambroſe ſays, ſhe ought rather to have loſt her life than her chaſtity. Nor the ſecond, ſince, thro' a cowardly ſpirit, ſhe was more afraid of Collatinus's knife, than of her own: and for that reaſon ſhe killed herſelf out of deſpair, which according to St Thomas, is the daughter of Luxury.’ All this is falſe and unjuſt: ſhe manifeſted both a great love for chaſtity, and a great courage. When a man has the courage to take away his own liſe, to ſecure his reputation, does not he chuſe to die, rather than loſe his good name? And is there in this the leaſt ſign of cowardice? If this is acting againſt the rules of true religion, it is at leaſt conforming to the ideas of Heathen heroiſm. But let us conſider a little Henry Stephens's words. He accuſes Lucretia of contradiction and ignorance: She did not know the true name of things, ſince ſhe believed ſhe had loſt her chaſtity, notwithſtanding the reſiſtance of her will. She contradicted herſelf, becauſe ſhe immediately added, that her body only had been violated. ‘ Quid ſalvi eſt mulieri amiſſa pudicitia? Theſe are her words; Veſtigia viri alieni Collatine in lecto ſunt tuo. Cæterùm corpus eſt tantum violatum, animus inſons: mors teſtis erit: ſed date dextras fidemque, haud impunè adultero fore (36). —— What is left to a woman who has left her honour? The print of another man, O! Collatine, is viſible in thy bed. But it was my body only was violated, my ſoul is pure, death ſhall witneſs this, but give me your right hand, and pledge me your faith, that the adulterer ſhall not eſcape unpuniſhed.’ I am ſurprized, that Henry Stephens, who was ſo good a Grammarian, had ſo little conſidered, that, in the uſage of all languages, the ſame words, without any impropriety, are taken in different ſenſes, more or leſs comprehenſive. Did he think he could inſtruct Livy on the ſignification of the word pudicitia? I ſay Livy: for it is he to whom our Lucretia's expreſſions belong. The Latin that was ſpoke at Rome, when this lady was alive was not like the Latin of this eloquent hiſtorian: and there is no probability, that he any where had found the very words which Lucretia uſed; each hiſtorian turned them to his own way of ſpeaking; the moſt exact were content to retain the ſenſe and force of them. It is probable ſhe complained, ſhe had loſt her honour; that ſhe had been diſhonoured, or that Sextus had violated her honour, &c. There is no impropriety in thoſe expreſſions. Thus an Engliſh woman would expreſs herſelf in the ſame caſe, though ſhe perfectly underſtood the language; and though, notwithſtanding her affliction, ſhe took care not to break thro' through the rules of grammar. They who ſteal away a maid, and enjoy her by force, are reckoned raviſhers of her honour: and if the parents confined their proſecutions to the forcing him to marry her, the proceſs is moſt properly called a proceſs in reparation of honour. The ſame phraſes would be uſed, though the violence had not been ſo extreme; I mean, in caſe the raviſher had obtained ſome ſort of conſent (37); becauſe having propoſed to her choice, either the yielding to his paſſion, or death, or the rack, or famine, or ſome other pain, able to intimidate the moſt reſolute, ſhe had choſen the firſt part of the alternative, without any kind of inward approbation. Now, if Lucretia could properly ſay, her honour was loſt, ſhe might very well uſe words equivalent to pudicitia amiſſa. Note, That Ovid uſes the words pudor raptus to ſignify the forced enjoyment of a maid (38), and Plautus expreſſes deflowering, by the words pudicitia pulſa (39). Thus the pretended contradiction, imputed to Lucretia, falls to the ground; for thoſe maids or wives, who ſhould at this day complain of having been violated, diſhonoured, or robbed of their honour, in the ſacking of a town, or otherwiſe, might add, without contradicting themſelves, that their ſoul had no ſhare in that ſtain.

Henry Stephens underſtands not what he ſays, when he affirms, that the Heathens praiſed Lucretia, for having revenged, by her death, the outrage done to her chaſtity. It is falſe, that they gave this turn to their praiſes: all therefore that he advances to confute them is a deception, a fallacy, which is called ignoratio elenchi. The Heathens, who praiſe Lucretia, grounded their panegyrics upon her extream ſenſe of glory, and the reputation of a chaſt wiſe, and her great delicacy as to this point of honour; which was ſo very great, as not to permit her to ſurvive the affront that had been offered her. What our critic borrows from St Auguſtin, whoſe meaning he has not rightly taken, is ſubject to the ſame cenſure: it is ſtill the falſe ſuppoſition, that Lucretia killed herſelf to puniſh herſelf for the crime. It is an ignorance of the ſtate of the queſtion. This lady knew herſelf innocent, and yet would die, that no leud woman ſhould have the face to live, under pretence, that Lucretia had the cowardice to ſurvive her rape (40).

THE EXAMINATION of an objection of St Auguſtin.

One of the moſt reaſonable objections of St Auguſtin, is, that ſelf-murther is a crime; and he ſtrengthens his argument by the encomiums that are given to Lucretia. He reaſons ad hominem, againſt the Heathens, and alledges to them the laws of their own tribunals. Theſe laws would have obliged them to puniſh a man, who had killed Lucretia. You would therefore be obliged, continues he, to puniſh her, if ſhe was accuſed before you, of having killed herſelf. But if ye anſwer, that it is impoſſible to puniſh her, ſince ſhe is not in being, why do you accumulate ſo many praiſes upon the murtherer of a virtuous perſon? ‘ Sed quid eſt hoc, quòd in eam graviùs vindicatur, quæ adulteriùm non admiſit? Nam ille patriâ cum patre pulſus eſt: hæc ſummo eſt mactata ſupplicio. Si non eſt illa impudicitia, qua invita opprimitur; non eſt hæc juſtitia, qua caſta punitur. Vos appello, Leges judiceſque Romani. Nempe poſt perpetrata facinora, nec quemquam ſceleſtum indemnatum impunè voluiſtis occidi. Si ergo ad veſtrum judicium quiſquam deferret hoc crimen, vobiſque probaretur, non ſolùm indemnatam, verùm etiam caſtam & innocentem interfectam eſſe mulierem; nonne eum qui id feciſſet, ſeveritate congrua plecteretis? Hoc fecit illa Lucretia, illa, illa ſic prædicata Lucretia innocentem, caſtam, vim perpeſſam Lucretiam inſuper interemit. Proferte ſententiam. Quòd ſi propterea non poteſtis, quia non adſtat quam punire poſſitis, cur interfectricem innocentis & caſtæ tanta prædicatione laudatis (41)? I do not pretend to juſtify thoſe who would ſay, in favour of this lady, that St Auguſtin has condemned her by principles ſhe did not know; for ſhe was ignorant of the axioms of the Chriſtian religion, which forbid the attempting upon our own lives: She might therefore have compained of being brought before ſuch a tribunal: ſhe might have declined the juriſdiction, and appealed to her natural judges, to thoſe ideas of grandeur and heroical glory, which have perſuaded ſo many people, that it is better to die, than to live in diſgrace. But, as I have already ſaid, this is an anſwer which I ſhall not concern myſelf with; I chuſe rather this other reflexion. The Roman magiſtrates, whom St Auguſtin ſpeaks to, and demands for judges of the queſtion, might have quickly undeceived him, by ſhewing that, the laws, which gave no authority to private perſons over one anothers lives, debar not any one the privilege of diſpoſing of his own. Do not you know, they might have ſaid, in what admiration the Cato's, the Brutus's, the Caſſius's, and ſo many other illuſtrious Romans, have ever been, who preferred death to a life, that would have made them witneſſes of the oppreſſion of liberty, or expoſed them to

In a word, are you ignorant how the reſolution of private perſons has been admired, or even of whole towns, of periſhing by precipice or fire, rather than to fall into their enemies hands? the nation, whom you look upon as the favourite people of the true God, blamed not Saul, it's firſt king, and one of the valianteſt princes of his age, for having prevented, by killing himſelf, the diſgrace of falling into the hands of the conqueror (45). His ſucceſſor, one of your greateſt prophets, did nevertheleſs give him the greateſt praiſes (46). Do not the books of the ſame nation give the ſame praiſes to a heroe, who imitated the action of king Saul (47)? And after this, will you tell us, whoever ſhould have killed Lucretia, would have been puniſhable; and therefore ſhe is puniſhable for having killed herſelf? Learn to reaſon better, and remember, that the maxims of the nobleſt and moſt auguſt ſect that ever was among the Greeks (48), favour this lady's proceeding.

It is certain St Auguſtin took a wrong method in recurring to the maxims of the Heathens, as a rule for the condemnation of Lucretia. I know well enough, that they were not all of the opinion of the Stoics, and there were ſome great Philoſophers, who condemned ſelf murder. I know alſo, that it has been ſaid, that it was rather cowardice, than a proof of courage, to forego life, to be rid of trouble and pain; and that a man, who reſolves to ſtruggle long with his ill fortune, diſcovers as much firmneſs as he who kills himſelf, ſhews weakneſs. I know, I ſay, there have been many among the Heathens, who have been of this opinion; but they wanted on their ſide glory and luſtre: they were only conſidered as the populace: the other faction was the nobility, the diſtinguiſhed party, the ſchool of heroiſm; and it might be repreſented to them, that, like counterfeit bravoes, they aſſumed honourable names, and gave the names of conſtancy and intrepidity to an exceſſive love of life, and an exceſſive fear of death. They were ſo fond of life, that nothing was able to give them a diſguſt of it: diſhonour, poverty, the moſt ſtinking dungeons, the moſt inveterate diſeaſes, did not disfigure it in their eyes (49); It appeared to them amiable even in this equipage. Death was not able to put on any diſguiſe that could conceal the leaſt feature of it's ugly face. This, might they ſay, was the principle of that great courage of which they gloried, and which made them conſider the action of Lucretia, as the effect of cowardice: Flaqueza de animo, ſaid the Jeſuit, John de Torres in the paſſage above cited.

A CONFUTATION of St Auguſtin's dilemma.

Let us now examine St Auſtin's dilemma. 'Ita hæc cauſſa ex utroque latere coarctatur, ut ſi extenuatur homicidium, adulterium confirmetur; ſi purgatur adulterium, homicidium cumuletur: nec omnino invenitur exitus, ubi dicitur, Si adulterata, cur laudata? ſi pudica, cur occiſa (50)?—— This caſe has it's difficulties on each ſide, ſo that if the murder be extenuated the adultery is confirmed; if we acquit her of adultery, ſhe muſt be charged with murder: nor can we any way anſwer this charge, viz. If ſhe was an adultereſs, why is ſhe praiſed? if chaſt, why did ſhe kill herſelf.' He pretends, that this lady's murder cannot be extenuated, without aggravating the adultery, nor her adultery extenuated, without aggravating her murder. But to ſhew that he had not diligently examined this matter, it ſuffices to ſay, that his argument proves too much; for by a like reaſoning, we ought to blame a perſon, who deſerves great praiſes. It ſometimes happened, that in the firſt ages, very pious young women, who were conſecrated to celibacy, for the ſervice of God, were violated. This is but too common a caſe at preſent; and we daily hear the ſtory of an abbeſs, who, with her Nuns, had paſſed thro' the hands of an Iriſh company in Piedmont, and who made her complaints to Monſieur de Catinat. Let us ſuppoſe, that a Nun ſhould, in this caſe, contract ſuch a melancholy, as might bring upon her a mortal diſtemper. Let us ſuppoſe that the teſtimony of her conſcience, fortified with the ſtrongeſt conſolations that a Divine could give, were unable to relieve her. Let us ſuppoſe ſhe had conceived ſuch a value for the purity of body and mind, that the bare idea of the moſt involuntary defilement, ſhould caſt her into an inſupportable affliction of which ſhe ſhould die: would not this be a convincing proof of an exquiſite chaſtity? Would not her innocence and virtue ſtand in a clear light? Whereas, if we follow St Auguſtin's dilemma, as much as you give to her affliction, you take from her chaſtity, ſi pudica, cur mortua? You ſee then, that there is more ſubtilty, than ſolidity, in this Father's argument: and thus you ſee Lucretia perfectly ſcreened from St Auguſtin's attacks, except in reſpect of the murder; for if ſhe had died of grief only, both he, and the other fathers of the church, had, by this kind of death, confirmed the praiſes of her incomparable chaſtity.

One of the odd conceits, which Balzac attributes to his Barbon, is this. 'Another word, miſunderſtood in the hiſtory of Dion, made him calumniate Lucretia's chaſtity, that is, throw dirt on the fineſt flower of antiquity, and ſully the chief ornament of riſing Rome. And although the reputation of ſo honeſt a lady had come down pure to our times, this accuſer of virtue had the impudence to oppoſe his ſingle judgment to the teſtimony of all ages: and to diſpute that heroin the poſſeſſion of her glory, by an impertinent accuſation. He pretends, that Tarquin began indeed by force, but ended by perſuaſion; that Lucretia would not give her conſent to the crime, but ſhewed ſome reſpect to his quality; and that, after ſhe was vanquiſhed ſhe was won, and the remorſe of conſcience, for the ſin ſhe had committed, as much as a reſentment of the affront, made her reſolve not to ſurvive her diſhonour (51).'

The pretence, which the hiſtorian Dion might furniſh theſe ill-natured people with, conſiſts in his ſaying Lucretia, was worked upon to ſuffer voluntarily Tarquin's enjoying her. Ἠνάγκασεν αὐτὴν ἑκοῦσαν ὑβρισθῆναι: Coegit eam NON INVITAM ſtuprum pati . . . . (52). Διὰ μὲν οὖν ταῦτ' οὐκ ἄκουσα δὴ ἐμοιχεύθη. Eam igitur ob Cauſam NON INVITA adultero ceſſit (53). The learned critic, who has publiſhed ſeveral fine fragments of Dion, blames him for offering ſo cruel an injury to Lucretia, as ſaying, that ſhe was not diſhonoured againſt her will (54); he pretends that this is ruining all that was ſerious and grave in the narration of this adventure: and that ſuch a fact, having brought on a famous re-oppoſed this opinion by ſome remarks, which will deſerve to be diſcuſſed [E]. Father le volution in Rome; and being, as it were, the hinge on which the hiſtory of the Roman people turns, it ought to have been treated in a very ſerious way, that it might appear, that the Romans, who had lived under a kingly government ever ſince the foundation of their city, did not aboliſh that form of government without a very juſt provocation. So that he ſhould not have ſaid, that Lucretia voluntarily ſuffered Sextus to ſatisfy himſelf, for this was next door to the crime (55); but that ſhe was forced, by a dagger at her breaſt. This critic adviſes us to compare the narrative of Dion with that of Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, which he thinks much inferior to that of Diodorus Siculus (56); but, he adds, the beſt of all is that of Livy.

Whatever admiration I may have for the profound learning and judgment that appears in the writings of Henry Valeſius, I cannot here be of his opinion. It ſeems to me that nothing is wanting in Dion's relation, as to the point of gravity; and I think Lucretia's chaſtity is as well ſet forth there as in any other hiſtorian, and in all the circumſtances that can raiſe our idea of it. The words, ἑκοῦσα, οὐκ ἄκουσα, ſignify nothing but what Livy and Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus and others give us clearly to underſtand. They only ſerve to ſhow a circumſtance which no hiſtorian has omitted, viz. that Sextus did not make uſe of direct force, as when a woman defends herſelf as much as ſhe can with her hands, and feet, and teeth, &c. But Dion gives us nevertheleſs to underſtand, that there was ſomething voluntary in Lucretia's patience, juſt as the moſt covetous man throws his merchandizes into the ſea voluntarily, when there is no other way of ſaving his life, which is ſtill more precious to him than his riches. All the world judges, that he who enjoys a woman after he has threatned to kill her, or to put her to the rack, or to ſome other terrible puniſhment, has effectually forced her; and that he ought to be puniſhed as a raviſher; and no body can ſay, that this woman ſuffered this willingly: Her conſent is like that of a man who walks, but only does it, becauſe they hold a ſword to his breaſt, and are ready to kill him, or to drag him along with a rope about his neck, if he does not walk. I am perſuaded that Dion would have uſed the ſame words ἑκοῦσα οὐκ ἄκουσα, non invita. If he had deſigned to expreſs what difference there is between a woman who chuſes to walk rather than to ſuffer herſelf to be dragged along, and a woman who rather chuſes to be dragged along than to walk. Let them no more therefore ſay this Hiſtorian has injured Lucretia.

[E] It has been ſaid ..... that religion had no ſhare in this action of Lucretia. A learned man has oppoſed this opinion by ſome remarks, which deſerve to be diſcuſſed.] Three obſervations have been made in the Miſcellaneous Thoughts upon Comets. I. That for the three firſt ages of antient Rome, the modeſty, frugality, and chaſtity of women were very remarkable; and there were ſome who manifeſted a very lively ſenſe of honour (57). II. That this ſenſe of honour could not be inſpired into the Roman women by the religion they profeſſed; ſince it was neceſſary, to that end, that their religion ſhould teach them, that immodeſty was diſpleaſing to the gods: but far from that it taught them the contrary, that the gods themſelves were exceſſively leud (58). III. That, if Lucretia had loved chaſtity from a principle of religion; or, which is the ſame thing, if ſhe had loved it in obedience to God, ſhe would never have conſented to Sextus's deſires; but have rather choſen to abandon her reputation to calumny, than her body to adultery. However this ſhe did not do. She couragiouſly reſiſted this prince's purſuit, though he threatned to kill her. But when he threatned to expoſe her reputation to eternal infamy, ſhe granted his deſires, and afterwards killed herſelf. This is an evident proof, that ſhe loved nothing in virtue, but the glory that attended it; and that ſhe had not in view the pleaſing of her gods; for they who would pleaſe God, would chuſe rather to be reckoned infamous by men, than commit a crime. It muſt therefore neceſſarily be confeſſed, that Lucretia's religion contributed nothing to her chaſtity; and that, in that reſpect, ſhe had been the very ſame as ſhe was, tho' ſhe had never heard there was any gods at all (59).

Mr du Rondel publiſhed in 1685, ſome reflexions upon a chapter of Theophraſtus (60), which I have read over and over again with great pleaſure. The place, where he makes the elogy and apology for Lucretia, chiefly charmed me, as having always been an admirer of this illuſtrious lady: and if the ſubject could have ſuffered it, I would have pleaded her cauſe no leſs in the Miſcellaneous Thoughts on Comets, than in the preceding remark. I therefore heartily applaud all that Mr du Rondel alledges in her juſtification, except what relates to the motives of religion. He makes two learned reflexions upon this point; one (61), ‘that the leud gods were not thoſe who were worſhipped (62) in antient Rome;’ the other, that ‘if Lucretia (63) was willing for ſome moments, to ſurvive her honour, it was, becauſe ſhe was forced to it by her religion, and was accountable for her reputation, before the Eumenides (64). She could not diſcharge her duty without calling her huſband, her father, and the reſt of her relations, and expoſing her miſfortune to them to the leaſt circumſtances; and then killing herſelf before them, in confirmation of the truth of what ſhe had ſaid. A Poet, whoſe name is not known, has hit upon this thought:

Quum foderet ferro caſtum Lucretia pectus,
  Sanguinis & torrens egrederetur, ait:
Accedant teſtes, me non faviſſe tyranno
  Ante virum ſanguis, ſpiritus ante Deos.
Quàm benè, producti pro me poſt fata, loquentur;
  Alter apud Manes, alter apud Superos.

When chaſt Lucretia pierc'd her tender ſide,
Thus ſhe exclaim'd, while flow'd the purple tide;
That no conſent my ſpotleſs mind did know,
To men, my blood, to heaven, my ſoul ſhall ſhow;
Thus my ſad fate my innocence ſhall prove,
To late poſterity and powers above.

‘But I muſt here illuſtrate what I ſay, concerning the tribunal of the Eumenides. This is the account of it. According to the antient Theologiſts, man was compoſed of a ſoul, a body, and a ſhade. At death the ſoul was reſtored to heaven, where the thoughts were examined before the Diræ; the body was reſtored to the earth, where the actions were examined before the Furiæ; and the ſhade was reſtored to hell, where the reports that had been ſpread of us were to be accounted for, and that before the Eumenides. Ne Lucretia, ſays an antient author (65), Caſtitatis famam deperderet, quippe quam ſine Purgatione futuram eſſe cernebat, invita turpibus imperiis paruit. Lucretia, fearing ſhe ſhould loſe the reputation of her chaſtity, which ſhe ſaw would happen unleſs ſhe juſtified herſelf, ſubmitted therefore, tho' againſt her will, to his baſe deſires.’ It was neceſſary there ſhould be witneſſes, and blood, to be cleared from calumny, and to appear with impunity before the Eumenides; or reſolve to be damned to all the ſerpents of infamy, which was one of theſe goddeſſes, tertia Pœnarum Infamia. Thus, Sir, Lucretia has ſatisfied her religion, and is more commendable than has hitherto been imagined; ſince, with the ſtab of the dagger, ſhe made an expiatory ſacrifice, which ſtopped the mouth of ſlander, and cleared her a glorious way to the Elyſian fields.’

Nothing can be more properly alledged, to confirm the firſt of theſe obſervations, than what is found in Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, concerning the laws of Romulus. This prince, the founder of Rome, borrowed from the Greeks the beſt inſtitutions they had for divine ſervice, but rejected the fables, the Antients had divulged concerning the crimes of their gods, and ſuffered not any thing to be aſcribed to thoſe divine natures unbecoming the ſupreme felicity. le Moyne will furniſh me with ſome thing. He is one of thoſe who have made an apology for Ceterum fabulas de ipſis a majoribus traditas, probra eorum continentes ac crimina, improbas cenſuit, inutileſque ac indecentes, & ne probis quidem viris dignas, nedum diis ſuperis : repudiatiſque his ominibus, ad bene ac præclare de diis ſentiendum & loquendum cives ſuos induxit, nihil eis affingi paſſus quod beatæ illi naturæ parum eſſet conſentaneum (66). He expreſsly obſerves, that the Romans did not teach, that Cœlus was caſtrated by his children, or that Saturn devoured his; or that Jupiter, having dethroned Saturn, threw him into Tartarus, or that the gods had been at wars, or had been wounded in them, or that they had been ſlaves among men. This whole paſſage of the Hiſtorian is very remarkable: we ſee in it, that Romulus eſtabliſhed a religion, not as a man educated among ſhepherds, but as an excellent Philoſopher, and a thouſand times a better Theologiſt, than the magiſtrates of Greece. Nevertheleſs, the other Hiſtorians, even they, who, like Livy, were more intereſted than Dionyſius, in Romulus's glory, have been ſilent upon this article; which ſilence is ſurpriſing and unaccountable. But let us obſerve, that this author, who particularizes ſo many things, rejected by the firſt king of the Romans, does not take notice that he had baniſhed what concerned the adulteries of the gods. Let us alſo ſay, that he falſly advances, that they did not ſpeak of the caſtration of Cœlus, or the dethroning of Saturn, &c. How durſt he affirm things ſo falſe ? Did he not know, that the Romans had adopted all the chimeras of the Greek Mythology (67)? Why did he not content himſelf with ſaying, that, during the firſt ages of Rome, they gave no credit to them ? Be it how it will, though we grant what he ſays of Romulus, we cannot thence infer, that our Lucretia was perſuaded, that the gods were very chaſt.

The tradition, that Romulus was the ſon of Mars, and of the veſtal Sylvia, was, doubtleſs, very antient in Tarquin's time; for this veſtal had declared, when ſhe was with child, that a god was the father of it (68). It was Romulus's intereſt that this fable ſhould be believed, in order to ſcreen the honour of his mother, and give himſelf a cœleſtial origin. This was moreover well ſuited to the temporal intereſts of the city he had built; which is probably the reaſon why he, rejecting the other fables of the Greeks, did not intimate, that the amours of the gods were to be excluded. Let us then be perſuaded, that, in Lucretia's time, one of the articles of the faith of the Roman people, was, that Mars got Sylvia with child, when ſhe went to fetch water, for the divine ſervice, to the wood conſecrated to this god (69). So that Lucretia far from fearing to offend the gods, ſuppoſing ſhe ſhould commit adultery, ought to fear the being alone in ſome conſecrated wood, and imagine that her honour would run a great risk there, the god of the place being very likely to fall in love with her, and to force her, with ſo much the leſs ſcruple, as ſhe had never been a veſtal (70), as the mother of Romulus had. Note, that during the wars that Tarquin made with the Romans they built a temple to Caſtor and Pollux (71); that is, to two baſtards of the ſame Jupiter, whom they worſhipped in the Capitol; which is a juſtification, even in reſpect of antient Rome, of what is ſaid in the Miſcellaneous Thoughts on Comets, that religion did not teach, that leudneſs was diſpleaſing to the gods. Note alſo, that the firſt king of Rome, by forbidding to aſcribe to the gods what Greece imputed to them, intimated, that there were evil reports concerning their conduct. This, doubtleſs, would occaſion at leaſt the curioſity of informing themſelves what theſe ſlanders were: and we know, that in Tarquin's time, the oracle of Delphi was very well known at Rome (72). They had therefore an account of the religion of the Greeks; they knew the ſtories concerning the love-intrigues of the gods; and, as people eaſily believe what gratifies their paſſions, they eaſily gave credit to theſe diſcourſes, authorized by a learned and ingenious nation; and which furniſhed diſſolute men with ſo many apologies. We only imitate the gods, ſaid they privately, in the beginning; they were bolder afterwards, as the law of Romulus grew obſolete. We know, from the experience of the later ages, that the forbidding a book, wherein the amours and corruptions of a court are expoſed, prevents indeed the inhabitants of the country from diſperſing theſe ſcandalous ſtories, but not from thinking of them and believing them any more than before. Apply this to the ſubjects of Romulus, with reſpect to the proſcribing the Grecian fables: add too, that the building of the temple of Caſtor and Pollux, was, as it were, an authentic declaration of Jupiter's adulteries, and derogatory to Romulus's law (73). The husband to the mother (74) of theſe two deities, was, by this edifice, as ſolemnly declared a cuckold, as by a decree of the Amphictyones, or of the ſenate. Whence we muſt conclude, that the virtue and good morals, ſo conſpicuous among the Romans for the three or four firſt centuries, did not depend on the religion of the Heathens, but only on natural religion, &c.

But here is a dilemma. The religion, eſtabliſhed by Romulus, and which repreſented God as a moſt perfect being, either ſubſiſted intire in Lucretia's time, or was already corrupted by the fables of Greece. In the firſt caſe, Lucretia did not govern herſelf by the principles of her religion, ſince ſhe ſtood more in fear of what the world would ſay (75), than of God himſelf. In the ſecond caſe, ſhe governed herſelf by the ideas of virtue, and the love of chaſtity, which the notion of her gods did not give her. Let us now ſee what relates to the ſecond obſervation of our learned friend.

He muſt give me leave to ſay, that the learning he has ſhewn upon the diſtinction of the Diræ, the Furiæ, and the Eumenides, and ſo on, was above the comprehenſion of Lucretia, and all the other women of Rome or Athens. It was a piece of the moſt myſtical Theology then in being: the women had nothing to do with it; the Initiates did not come near it: only the old Adepti were to be inſtructed in this article. I queſtion whether Varro, the moſt learned of the Romans, and the Pontifex Caius Cotta (76), penetrated ſo far. But moſt certainly Lucretia did not know, that her acquitting herſelf in heaven and earth, before the Diræ and the Furiæ, was to no purpoſe, unleſs ſhe was furniſhed with the certificates, which the Eumenides demanded in hell. She did not therefore die, to provide herſelf with an anſwer to an examination, which ſhe had no idea of. The bare intereſt of her reputation, without the leaſt regard to religion, induced her to kill herſelf, as has been ſaid in the Thoughts upon Comets.

St Auguſtin underſtood very well this truth, and hath juſtly concluded, that Lucretia's conduct does not equal that of Chriſtian women, who, having ſubmitted to a like violence, comfort themſelves in God, the witneſs of their inward purity; and are far from refuting the ſuſpicions of men, by tranſgreſſing the laws of God. ‘ Quòd ſeipſam, quoniam adulterum pertulit, etiam non adulterata occidit, non eſt pudicitiæ caritas, ſed pudoris infirmitas. Puduit enim eam turpitudinis alienæ in ſe commiſſæ, etiam ſi non ſecum: & Romana mulier laudis avida nimiùm verita eſt, ne putaretur, quod violenter eſt paſſa cùm viveret, libenter paſſa ſi viveret. Unde ad oculos hominum mentis ſuæ teſtem illam pœnam adhibendam putavit, quibus conſcientiam demonſtrare non potuit. Sociam quippe facti ſe credi erubuit, ſi quod alius in ea fecerat turpiter, ferret ipſa patienter. Non hoc fecerunt Feminæ Chriſtianæ, quæ paſſæ ſimilia vivunt. Tamen nec in ſe ultæ ſunt crimen alienum, ne aliorum ſceleribus adderent ſua; ſi, quoniam hoſtes in eis concupiſcendo ſtupra commiſerant, illæ in ſe ipſis homicidia erubeſcendo committerent. Habent quippe intus gloriam caſtitatis, teſtimonium conſcientiæ: habent autem coram oculis Dei ſui; nec requirunt amplius, ubi quid rectè faciant, non amplius habent, ne devient ab auctoritate legis divinæ, cùm malè devitant offenſionem ſuſpicionis humanæ (77). —— That tho' ſhe ſubmitted to the adulterer, yet without being an adultereſs, afterwards ſlew herſelf, was not the effect of her regard to chaſtity, but through a fear of ſhame. She could not endure the thoughts of a man's baſeneſs towards her, tho' ſhe was not baſe with him, and this Roman lady, too covetous of praiſe, was afraid, leaſt that violence which ſhe had ſuffered when alive, would be thought to be voluntary if ſhe ſtill lived; therefore ſhe reſolved to render that evident to the eyes of men by her death, which otherwiſe ſhe could never have made manifeſt to their minds, dreading to be thought an accomplice in the fact, if having been baſely uſed ſhe had for this lady, and he ſays, ſhe ſurpaſſed her own deities [F]. Let us not forget to obſerve, that as ſoon as Sextus was ſenſible of his paſſion for Lucretia, he reſolved to make uſe of force (d). This ſhews, either that, in thoſe times, married women were not uſed to be cajoled, or that the virtue of Lucretia ſhone ſo in her face and conduct that no body durſt hope for any favour (e). This ſhews alſo how the times change: for at preſent, princes, great lords, and all galants in general, think firſt of declaring their paſſion, and begin by cajoling. They think on nothing leſs than offering violence, as imagining they ſhall have no need of it. And if the worſt come to the worſt, this is their ‘ patiently ſuſtained it. But Chriſtian women have not acted like her, for having ſuffered what ſhe did they are yet alive, deſiring not to revenge on their own bodies the crimes of others, nor to add new crimes to theirs, which they muſt have done, if, becauſe the enemies in the heat of their luſt had abuſed them, they had for ſhame murdered themſelves. For they enjoy within the glory of chaſtity from the teſtimony of their conſciences. They have this alſo in the ſight of God; neither do they require any more; but chooſe to act ſo as not to offend againſt the divine law, rather than to do evil to avoid the ſuſpicions of men.’ If inſtead of following the Roman genius, which thirſted after the praiſe of men (78), ſhe had conformed to the precepts of ſound religion, ſhe had choſen to die by the hand of Sextus, rather than ſuffered him to do what he did. She cannot therefore be juſtified at the bar of religion? but if ſhe is judged at the tribunal of human glory, there ſhe will come off with flying colours. For if, on one hand, life was leſs dear to her than chaſtity; ſhe ſacrificed, on the other, to a fair reputation, what ſhe preferred before life itſelf. All this centered in ſelf-love; but had ſhe been a Chriſtian, I ſay, a thorough Chriſtian, ſhe would have acted otherwiſe, and from a principle of divine love. The Spaniſh Jeſuit, above-cited, ſtates her duty aright, and oppoſes to her the anſwer of Lucia, a Chriſtian woman. ‘ Mal ſe eganno Lucrecia, y ſi tuviera tanto valor de animo como hermoſura, con el primero reparara el danno que la hizo la ſegunda. No ſon violadas, dize Sant Baſilio *, hablando de las virgines: Quæ vim paſſæ ſunt non conſentiente ad voluptatem anima, imo integram atque incorruptam ſponſo ſuo & fide & virginitate inclytam, majori cum gloria & laude obtulerunt. Eſto no ſabia Lucrecia, y ſi lo entendia, cegoſe con el puntillo de la honra, y todo lo perdio. De manera, que por medio de la muerte, quedo muerta: y por temor de la honra quedo deſhonrada . . . . . . Quanto mas, que reſpondio muy bien otra no Lucrecia Romana, ſino Lucia Chriſtiana, al Preſidente Paſchaſio, que ſobre el meſmo punto dixo, la pondria en el lugar de las mugeres rameras, para quæ qualquiera la infamaſſe, y el Eſpiritu divino de que ſe preciava la deſamparaſſe: Si invitam juſſeris violari, caſtitas mihi duplicabitur ad coronam (79). ——— Lucretia was much miſtaken, and if ſhe valued herſelf as much for her courage as for her beauty, with the firſt ſhe repaired the miſchief which was cauſed by the ſecond. They are not defiled (ſays St Baſil, ſpeaking of the virgins) who have ſuffered violence when their ſoul did not conſent to the luſt; on the contrary, they have offered themſelves with greater glory and praiſe, like pure and faithful virgins to their ſpouſe. Lucretia was ignorant of this, and if ſhe knew it, ſhe was blinded by the point of honour, and loſt both her life and honour. How much more to the purpoſe was the anſwer not of the Roman Lucretia, but of the Chriſtian Lucia to the preſident Paſchaſius, who, in the ſame caſe, ſaid, he would ſend her among the moſt abandoned women that any one might defile her, and the holy ſpirit on which ſhe valued herſelf ſhould forſake her: If you order violence to be offered me againſt my own conſent, my chaſtity will merit a double crown.’ There is one thing more, in which the Chriſtian women St Auguſtin ſpeaks of, excelled her. She had her choice of death or conſenting: they were not allowed this option (80). Tyrants, perſecutors, and ſoldiers, made uſe of violence, without propoſing the alternative. Being reduced to this condition, all the defence they had was a denial of conſent, and repugnance of will; for what would the reſiſtance of arms and hands have ſignified? As for the reſt, we muſt preſume as much in favour of Lucretia, as in favour of them, that is, reject the ſurmiſes St Auguſtin has ſuggeſted concerning this Heathen lady. Who knows, ſays he, but ſhe was conſcious of ſome kind of conſent, which might be the reaſon of her killing herſelf? ‘ Quid ſi enim, (quod ipſa tantummodo noſſe poterat), quamvis juveni violenter irruenti, etiam ſua libidine illecta conſenſit, idque in ſe puniens ita doluit, ut morte putaret expiandum? Quamquam nec ſic quidem occidere ſe debuit, ſi fructuoſam poſſet apud deos falſos agere pœnitentiam. Verumtamen ſi fortè ita eſt, falſumque eſt illud, quod duo fuerunt, & adulterium unus admiſit, ſed potius ambo adulterium commiſerunt, unus manifeſta invaſione, altera latente conſenſione, non ſe occidit inſontem (81). —— But ſuppoſing (which ſhe herſelf only could know) that tho' the youth committed violence on her, yet through her own luſt ſhe conſented, for which afterwards grieving ſhe thought it could be expiated only by death? Yet in this caſe ſhe ought not to have put herſelf to death, if by any penitence her falſe gods might in her opinion have been appeaſed. But if this be true, then the other notion is falſe, that though two were concerned in the crime, one only committed adultery, rather both committed adultery, one by open force, the other by ſecret conſent, in this caſe ſhe did not kill herſelf without guilt.’ Theſe are unreaſonable ſuſpicions. We ought to believe, that her ſoul loſt nothing of it's purity; and that ſhe was violently robbed of an immaculate chaſtity (82), according to the litteral meaning of Brutus's words in Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus. Note, that we may reaſonably ſuppoſe, no body had ever known young Tarquin's exploit, if Lucretia had not revealed it.

[F] Father le Moyne . . . . has made an apology for this lady, in which he ſays ſhe ſurpaſſed her own deities.] I have ſeen, ſays he (83), the action brought againſt her memory, ‘ and the ſentence which is annexed to it in St Auguſtin's books de Civitate Dei. I have ſometimes heard, in declamations, that one of the moſt heroic and ſtrict ladies of her ſex (84) had pleaded againſt her; and I confeſs, that if ſhe were to be judged by the Chriſtian law, and the rules of the goſpel, ſhe would find it very difficult to juſtify her innocence . . But if ſhe be removed from this ſevere tribunal, where Pagan virtue finds no footing, ſhe is out of danger of being condemned: if ſhe is judged by the laws of her own country, and the religion of her time ſhe will be found to be the chaſteſt of thoſe who then lived, and the moſt reſolute of all the Heathens. The noble and virtuous Philoſopher, who accuſes her ſo often, would pardon her misfortune, and reconcile himſelf to her, and every body muſt confeſs, that her crime was leſs her fault, than the imperfection of the Roman law, which had not regulated it rightly, and the ſcandals of her religion, which had only given her ill examples: and truly the law of that country, in thoſe times, was only ſuperficial and out-ſide . . . As for the Roman religion which exalted ladies of pleaſure to the rank of goddeſſes, and offered ſacrifices to adulterers, it could not be expected that it ſhould keep women virtuous or chaſt. In this, Lucretia, nay, the raviſhed Lucretia, was better than the gods of Rome. It was not the love of pleaſure, or the fear of death, that made her tranſgreſs: It was the love of honour, and her extreme apprehenſion, that ſhe ſhould loſe it. And if ſhe had not the reſolution of Suſannah, who neither yielded under the fear of death, or infamy; it is ſufficient to ſay in her excuſe, that ſhe did not believe in Suſannah's God: and the miracle had been too great, if a Pagan had equalled one of the ſublimeſt virtues of the faithful. Were it not for the law and grace, what could the faithful do? We need not therefore ſcruple to praiſe Lucretia . . . . . Not being able with her hands to reſiſt an armed force, ſhe repulſed it in thought, and her ſoul raiſed itſelf as much as poſſible to avoid the ſtain of impurity, with which her body was defiled (85).’

their laſt ſhift; whereas it was the only one of the eldeſt ſon of Tarquin, a potent king at that time. He made his firſt declaration of love, with a ſword in his hand, and with the threats of death in his mouth.

LUCRETIUS, commonly called, Titus Lucretius Carus [A], was one of the beſt poets of his age. He was born, according to Euſebius's Chronicle, in the ſecond year of the CLXXIſt olympiad [B], and killed himſelf in the forty fourth year of his age; that is, he killed himſelf in the 702d year of Rome. He had a philtre given him, which threw him into a phrenzy. During this madneſs he had ſome lucid intervals, in which

[A] Titus Lucretius Carus.] Lambinus conjectures, that our Poet was either of the family of the Lucretii ſirnamed Veſpillo, or of the family of the Lucretii ſirnamed Ofella; and that the ſirname Carus was a fourth title, denoting either his admirable genius, or the ſweetneſs of his temper, or ſomething of this kind (1). He produces ſome inſtances of other perſons, who had two ſirnames. The baron des Coutures goes farther (2), and affirms, as an undoubted fact, that Lucretius was ſirnamed Veſpillo, or Ofella; becauſe, in all appearance, he derived his pedigree from one of theſe two families. The ſame Lambinus conjectures, that Lucretius was either brother, or couſin-german, to the two orators, Cicero ſpeaks of, one ſirnamed Veſpillo, and the other Ofella; or elſe to Lucretius Veſpillo, mentioned by Julius Cæſar. This laſt Lucretius was a ſenator, but that hinders not but he might be a near relation to our Poet; for there were families, in which ſome raiſed themſelves to the ſenatorial dignity, whilſt others remained in the rank of knights. To prove this, Lambinus makes uſe of a falſe ſuppoſition: he ſays, that if Cicero's brother had not aſpired to great employments, there would have been an inſtance of two brothers, one of which was a ſenator, the other only a knight; but he owns, that this was not the caſe of Cicero's brother. 'Finge ex his duobus fratribus alterum ſe ad honorespetendos, & Remp. gerendam contuliſſe: alterum luce populari carere, ſuum negotium agere, intra pelliculam ſe continere voluiſſe (quod tamen ſecus factum eſt) ſed finge ita eveniſſe, procul dubio is qui ædilitatem majorem, præturam, conſulatum adeptus eſſet, ut Marcus, Senatorii ordinis factus eſſet: ille alter qui nullum Magiſtratum geſſiſſet, in equeſtri ordine manſiſſet (3).' The baron des Coutures goes ſtill further, and affirms, that our Lucretius always continued in the Equeſtrian order; and that Cicero, who enjoyed the moſt conſiderable dignities of the republic, had a brother, Quintus Tullius, who never roſe higher than the degree of a knight.

[B] He was born in the ſecond year of the CLXXIſt Olympiad.] It is a pretty current opinion (4), that Lucretius was born twelve years after Cicero, in the conſulſhip of Lucius Licinius Craſſus, and Quintus Mutius Scævola, in the 658th year of Rome. The baron des Coutures (5) is the firſt I know of, who places the birth of Cicero twelve years later than that of Lucretius: and yet he places the birth of each under the conſulſhips fixed upon by other writers. Here Lambinus falls into three errors. He ſays that Euſebius has placed Lucretius's birth in the CLXXIſt Olympiad; that is, in the conſulſhip of Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus, and Caius Caſſius Longinus, in the 657th year of Rome; and that others place it in the CLXXIId Olympiad; that is, in the conſulſhip of L. Licinius Craſſus, and Q. Mutius Scævola, in the year 658: from whence it follows, ſays he, that this Poet was twelve or eleven years younger than Cicero, who was born in the conſulſhip of Q. Servilius Cepio, and C. Attilius Seranus. I. Euſebius places Lucretius's birth in the ſecond year of the CLXXIſt Olympiad. Now Domitius Ænobarbus, and Caſſius Longinus, were conſuls the year before. II. Their conſulſhip, and that of Licinius Craſſus, and Mutius Scævola, do not belong to the CLXXIId, but to the CLXXIſt Olympiad. It is ſomewhat ſtrange, that Lambinus ſhould ſo careleſsly determine the Olympiads CLXXI and CLXXII, by the years 657 and 658 of Rome. III. Since the conſulſhip, in which Cicero was born, falls in with the 647th year of Rome, he ought to have ſaid, that Lucretius was ten or twelve years younger than Cicero, and not twelve or eleven. Gifanius, and his copyer, Daniel Pareus (6), placing Lucretius birth in the 658th year, are in the wrong to make him precede Cicero by twelve years.

I have reckoned up eight faults in eight lines of Father Briet (7). He will have Lucretius born in the ſecond year of the CLXXVth Olympiad, and that year to be the 543d of Rome. He will have Lucretius die in the 584th year of Rome, at thirty ſix years of age, or rather forty, in the conſulſhip of Pompey and Craſſus; and that this was the year, in which Virgil aſſumed the Toga Virilis: laſtly, he pretends that St Jerome ſays, that Lucretius killed himſelf at forty years of age. Let us ſum up his faults. I. He ſhould have placed the birth of Lucretius in the CLXXIſt Olympiad, and not in the CLXXVth. II. The Olympic year he mentions, anſwers to the 674th year of Rome, and not to the 543d. III. It is abſurd to ſay, that a man who was born in the year 543, and died in 584, died at thirty ſix years of age; this, I ſay, is abſurd, though he corrects it by theſe words, or rather at the age of forty; for beſides that, he ſhould have ſaid forty one, and not forty, ſuch a disjunctive ought never to be uſed, as at thirty ſix or forty, when it is certain that the firſt part of the propoſition is falſe. This is Father Briet's caſe. He poſitively fixes Lucretius's birth to the 543d year of Rome, and his death to the 584th: he ought not therefore to have advanced two different opinions concerning his term of life. IV. As Craſſus and Pompey were twice conſuls together, it is a fault, ſimply, to obſerve, that ſuch a thing happened in the conſulſhip of theſe two men: he ſhould have ſpecified under which conſulſhip. V. Craſſus and Pompey were conſuls the firſt time in the 683d year of Rome, and not in 584. VI. He ſhould either not have mentioned Virgil at all, or have ſaid, as Donatus does, that this Poet took the Toga Virilis the ſame day that Lucretius died. The point of ſingularity conſiſts in the ſameneſs of the day: and this Father Briet enervates, by barely obſerving, that Virgil took the Toga Virilis the ſame year Lucretius died. VII. It was in the ſecond conſulſhip of Craſſus and Pompey, that Virgil took this robe, and in the 698th year of Rome (8); he ought not therefore to have placed Lucretius's death in the 584th year. VIII. St Jerome has plainly ſaid, that Lucretius killed himſelf in the forty fourth year of his age. Propria ſe manu interfecit anno ætatis quadrageſimo quarto (9). Add to theſe eight faults, that which Father Briet has committed a little after, in ſaying, that Ovid gave Lucretius the epithet divine.

> Exitio terras cum dabit una dies.

> Sublime Lucretius wrote with ſo much fire,
> That his bright work ſhall with the world expire.

It is ſublimis, and not divini, in Ovid (10). Gaſſendus was ſtrangely miſtaken about the paſſage of St Jerome: he thought the year of the death of Lucretius had been ſpecified in it, and not that, of his birth; which made him conclude, that Lucretius was older than Zeno the Epicurean, whoſe auditors Cicero and Atticus had been (11). Mr Creech has placed Lucretius's birth in the 659th year, and his death in the 702d; and pretends, that Virgil was born the ſame day Lucretius died; which would make a Pythagorean believe, that Lucretius's ſoul tranſmigrated into Virgil's body. Vix abſoluto opere moritur, eo ipſo die quo natus eſt Virgilius; & aliquis Pythagoreus credat Lucretii animam in Maronis corpus tranſiiſſe, ibique longo uſu & multo ſtudio exercitatam Poëtam evaſiſſe (12). This is a conſiderable fault; for we muſt hence conclude, that Virgil wrote his Ecloges at eight or nine years of age. Thus you ſee how the moſt learned men confound their ideas. They change the day that Virgil took his Toga

And

Virilis, into that of his birth. Lambinus made the ſame blunder (13).

If we judged by the ſtyle, we might eaſily conclude, that Lucretius was older than Cicero; but that rule would be fallacious. How many authors have we younger than Balzac, who wrote in old French, whilſt Balzac wrote eloquently and politely? however, I have read in ſome Moderns, that Lucretius preceded Cicero. ' Paulo antiquior fuit, Terentio Varrone, & ' M. Tullio, ut quidam ſcripſerunt. —— He lived ſome ' time before Terentius Varro, and Cicero, as ſome have ' wrote.' Theſe are the words of Crinitus (14). Charles Stephens, Lloyd, and Hofman, have exactly copied him; but Decimator, copying him without well-placing the commas, has uttered a groſs falſhood. ' Lucretius, ſays he (15), Poëta latinus paulo antiquior ' Terentio, Varrone & M. Tullio. —— Lucretius, the ' Latin Poet, was a little older than Terence, Varro, ' and Cicero.' In another book (16) he had barely ſaid, that Lucretius was more antient than Terence and Cicero. A famous Engliſhman (17), whom I frequently cite, will have Lucretius to be cotemporary with Cicero and Varro, but ſomewhat older. He puts in the margin, that Lucretius flouriſhed 105 years before Jeſus Chriſt. Now, according to him, the birth of Jeſus Chriſt falls in the 751ſt year of Rome (18), he believes therefore, that our Lucretius flouriſhed in the 646th year of Rome. He muſt therefore fix his birth about the year 620. In which he deviates far from the common opinion, and from that of St Jerom. Lambinus's Life of Lucretius, in the edition I make uſe of (19), imports, that he died in the forty third year of his age, in the third conſulſhip of Pompey, in the 751ſt year of Rome, the day that Virgil was born. Of the two faults, which are notorious in this account, one is, doubtleſs, a fault of the preſs (20), and the other of the author. Lambinus, inſtead of the day that Virgil took the Toga Virilis, has put his birth-day; and, though we ſhould rectify him thus far, yet we could not clear him of an error, for it was in Pompey's ſecond conſulſhip that Virgil took the Toga Virilis, in the year 698 (21).

[C] During this madneſs, he had ſome lucid intervals, in which he compoſed his ſix books de Rerum Natura.] They who ſhall read in Thuanus (22), that Taſſo was ſubject to great fits of madneſs, which hindered not his writing excellent verſes, will not think incredible what we here ſay of Lucretius. ' Amatorio po- ' culo in furorem verſus, quum aliquot libros per in- ' tervalla inſaniæ conſcripſiſſet (23). —— Falling mad ' by taking a love potion, he compoſed ſome books in ' his lucid intervals.' Some believe, that Statius alluded to this madneſs, when he ſaid & docti furor arduus Lucreti (24); but others think, that he only meant his Poetic Enthuſiaſm, and that he alluded to theſe words of Lucretius's firſt book: ſed acri Percuſſit thyrſo laudis ſpes magna meum cor. See Barthius upon theſe words of Statius.

[D] Euſebius informs us, that this work was corrected by Cicero, after the death of the author.] Father Briet ſeems to believe it, ſince he uſes theſe words: ' In ſuis verſibus, duris quidem, ſed valde Latinis, & ' Tullii lima digniſſimis. —— His verſes are difficult ' indeed, but his Latin is pure, and worthy the re- ' viſal of Cicero.' Some think (25), he only meant, that Lucretius's poems had need of Cicero's file; but others believe his meaning is, that they do honour to Cicero, by whom they were corrected; or that it plainly appears, they received the finiſhing ſtroke from this great man.

[E] Never any man denied the divine providence with more boldneſs.] He ſets out with this impious exordium.

Omnis enim per ſe Divûm natura neceſſe eſt
Immortali ævo ſumma cum pace fruatur,
Semota à noſtris rebus, ſejunctaque longè.
Nam privata dolore omni, privata periclis,
Ipſa ſuis pollens opibus; nihil indiga noſtri,
Nec bene promeritis capitur, nec tangitur ira (26).

For whatſoe'er's divine muſt live in peace,
In undiſturb'd and everlaſting eaſe:
Not care for us, from fears and dangers free,
Sufficient to it's own felicity:
Nought here below, nought in our pow'r it needs;
Ne'er ſmiles at good, ne'er frowns at wicked deeds.

CREECH.

He goes on, with giving infinite praiſes to Epicurus, who courageouſly attacked religion, and triumphed over it.

Humana ante oculos fœdè cum vita jaceret
In terris oppreſſa gravi ſub relligione:
Quæ caput à cœli regionibus oſtendebat,
Horribili ſuper adſpectu mortalibus inſtans:
Primum Grajus homo mortaleis tollere contrà
Eſt oculos auſus, primuſque obſiſtere contra:
Quem nec fama Deum, nec fulmina, nec minitanti
Murmure compreſſit cœlum: ſed eo magis acrem
Virtutem inritat animi, confringere ut arcta
Naturæ primus portarum clauſtra cupiret.
. . . .
Quare relligio pedibus ſubjecta viciſſim
Obteritur; nos exæquat victoria cœlo (27).

Long time men lay oppreſs'd with ſlaviſh fear,
Religious tyranny did domineer,
Which, being plac'd in heav'n, look'd proudly down,
And frighted abject ſpirits with her frown.
At laſt a mighty one of Greece began
T' aſſert the nat'ral liberty of man,
By ſenſeleſs terrors, and vain fancies, led
To ſlavery; ſtrait the conquer'd fantom fled.
Not the fam'd ſtories of the Deity,
Not all the thunder of the threat'ning sky,
Could ſtop his riſing ſoul, thro' all he paſt,
The ſtrongeſt bounds that pow'rful nature caſt:
His vigorous and active mind was hurl'd
Beyond the flaming limits of this world,
Into the mighty ſpace, and there did ſee
How things begin, what can, what cannot be:
. . . .
Thus by his conqueſt we our right regain;
Religion he ſubdu'd, and we now reign.

CREECH.

He ſays, in the ſame book, that one of the things that moſt encouraged him, was the praiſe he hoped to deſerve, in treating of a ſubject quite new, and in breaking the fetters of religion.

Primum quod magnis doceo de rebus & arctis,
Relligionum animos nodis exſolvere pergo (28).

[F] He has acknowledged ſome, I do not know what cauſe, which delights in the overthrow of human greatneſs.] Having deſcribed the fear which ſeizes admirals at the approach of a tempeſt, he adds, that their vows are all in vain. So true it is, that a hidden force ſeems to ſport with the dignities of the earth.

Summa etiam cùm vis violenti per mare venti
Induperatorem claſſis ſuper æquora verrit,
Cum validis pariter Legionibus, atque Elephantis:
Non Divûm pacem votis adit? ac prece quæſit
Ventorum pavidas paces, animaſque ſecundas?
Nequicquam: quoniam violento turbine ſæpe
Correptus nihilo fertur minùs ad vada lethi:

CREECH.

See here a Philoſopher, who, though he obſtinately denies a providence, and the power of fortune (30), and attributes all things to the neceſſary motions of atoms; a cauſe which knows not whither it tends, nor what it does: yet is forced, by experience, to acknowledge, in the courſe of events, a particular affectation of over-turning thoſe exalted dignities which appear among men. It is hardly poſſible not to diſcover this affectation, when we attentively ſtudy Hiſtory, or only the tranſactions of the countries within our own knowledge. A life, of any moderate length, ſuffices to ſhew us, how perſons, raiſed to the higheſt ſtations, by a ſwift courſe of good ſucceſſes, fell back again into their primitive nothing, by a like courſe of unproſperous events. All proſpered with them formerly, but nothing at preſent: they are daſhed by a thouſand ſtorms, which ſpare moderate conditions, though ſtanding, as we may ſay, in the ſame road with them. It is againſt them that fortune ſeems exaſperated; it is their ruin ſhe ſeems to have conſpired, whilſt ſhe ſuffers others to eſcape. I do not wonder then, that Lucretius perceived ſuch an affectation as this, inexplicable by his principles, and very hard to be explained by any other ſyſtem. For it muſt be confeſſed, that the phænomena, in the hiſtory of man, caſt the Philoſophers into no leſs perplexity, than thoſe in the hiſtory of nature. That which is moſt conſpicuous in the hiſtory of man, is that viciſſitude of exaltation and abaſement (31), I elſewhere ſpoke of (32), and which, as Æſop ſays, is the ordinary exerciſe of providence. How ſhall we reconcile this with the ideas of a God, infinitely good, infinitely wiſe, and director of all things? can the infinitely perfect being delight in raiſing a creature to the higheſt pitch of glory, on purpoſe to hurl it, ſome time after, to the loweſt degree of infamy? would not this conduct reſemble that of children, who no ſooner have built a caſtle of cards, but they undo and over-throw it again? this, you will ſay, is neceſſary, becauſe men abuſing their proſperity, grow ſo inſolent, that their fall muſt be a puniſhment for the ill uſe they have made of the favours of Heaven, a conſolation to the miſerable, and a leſſon to thoſe whom God ſhall favour hereafter. But were not it better, will another ſay, to mix with ſo many favours, the grace of not abuſing them? inſtead of ſix great ſucceſſes, only give four; and add, as a compenſation for the two others, the ability to uſe them well. It will no longer be neceſſary either to puniſh the inſolent, or comfort the miſerable, or inſtruct the man deſigned for exaltation. The firſt thing a father would do, if it were in his power, would be to ſupply his children with the gift of rightly uſing all the goods he ſhould beſtow on them; for without this, the other gifts are rather a ſnare than a favour, when it is conſidered, that they ſhall produce a conduct, the puniſhment whereof muſt be exemplary to others: beſides that, the uſefulneſs of theſe examples is not ſeen: all generations hitherto have had need of this leſſon; and there is no probability that future ages ſhould be more exempt from this viciſſitude, which Æſop ſpoke of, than the preceding ones. Thus this viciſſitude of good and evil, bears not the character of a being, infinitely good, wiſe, and immutable. I know a thouſand reaſons may be thought on to ſolve theſe difficulties, but as many replies may be invented: the mind of man is more fruitful in objections, than anſwers: ſo that it muſt be acknowledged, that, without the lights of revelation, Philoſophy cannot unravel the doubts that are drawn from the hiſtory of man. It is the province of Divines, and not of Philoſophers, to explain this. The Heathen Poets had recourſe to an hypotheſis, which paſſed very well with the people: They pretended, that among that multitude of deities who had a ſhare in the government of the world, there were ſome envied the happineſs of men; and who, to aſſuage the gnawing of this envy, left no ſtone unturned to ruin thoſe men. Hence Paganiſm was particularly careful to appeaſe theſe envious gods; and the goddeſs Nemeſis, who was repreſented at the head of them, had as great a ſhare as any other deity, in the worſhip and honours of religion: and even when a man was thought to be humbled, as much as theſe envious powers could wiſh, he ſtill moſt humbly beſought them to ceaſe their perſecution.

Vos quoque Pergameæ jam fas eſt parcere genti,
Gloria Dardaniæ (33).

Let it ſuffice that deſtiny thus far
Has perſecuted Troy: and all ye gods,
And goddeſſes, to whom the Dardan ſtate
And glory ſhone obnoxious . . . .

TRAPP.

If this hypotheſis were once admitted, it might eaſily be explained, how human grandeur is more expoſed to the inſults of fortune, than moderate conditions; and every one might underſtand the cauſe of that affectation, which Lucretius himſelf could not deny. Now, of all the ſyſtems of Philoſophy, there is none ſo irrecoverably over-whelmed with the difficulties I ſpeak of, as that of Epicurus. Lucretius did not know what to fix upon; he could neither employ the hypotheſis of the Poets, nor any kind of morality; for he allowed not the gods any ſhare in the government of the univerſe, nor acknowledged in our world any inviſible being, which knew or willed any thing; conſequently his vis abdita quædam is a convincing argument againſt himſelf. By it he overthrew his own principles.

I ſhall obſerve, by the way, that it had been very eaſy for him to reconcile the exiſtence of what people called, Fortune, Nemeſis, good and evil genii with his own ſyſtem. He might have left the gods in the ſtate, in which he conceived them, content with their own condition, and enjoying a ſupreme felicity, without concerning themſelves with our affairs, without puniſhing evil, or rewarding good, &c. but he might ſuppoſe, that certain collections of atoms, to which he had given what names he pleaſed, were capable of jealouſy, with reſpect to man; as alſo of labouring inviſibly in ruining exalted fortunes. I have often wondered, that neither Epicurus, nor any of his followers, ſhould conſider, that the atoms which form a noſe, two eyes, ſeveral nerves, a brain, have nothing more excellent in them, than thoſe which go to the making a ſtone (34): and therefore it is very abſurd to ſuppoſe, that every collection of atoms, which makes not a man or a beaſt, ſhould be diſtitute of knowledge. He who denies the ſoul of man to be a ſubſtance diſtinct from matter, reaſons childiſhly, unleſs he ſuppoſes, that all the univerſe is animated; and that there are every where ſome particular thinking beings; and that, as there are ſome, which do not equal men, ſo there are others which exceed them. On this ſuppoſition, plants and ſtones, would be thinking ſubſtances. It is not neceſſary, they ſhould have a ſenſation of colours, ſounds, ſmells, &c. but it is neceſſary, they ſhould have another ſort of knowledge: and, as theſe would be ridiculous to deny there were any ſuch beings as men, who do them a deal of miſchief, who pluck them up by the roots, who cut and break them in pieces; as, I ſay, they would be ridiculous to deny this, under pretence that they do not ſee the arm or ax which ſmote them; ſo the Epicureans are moſt ridiculous, in denying, that there are beings in the air, or elſewhere, who know us, who do morals [G]. Had he as attentively conſidered the accidents which befel private perſons, as he did thoſe which happen to the great, he might perhaps have diſcovered ſome I do not know us ſometimes evil, ſometimes good; or who are inclined, ſome to deſtroy, others to protect us: I ſay, the Epicureans would be very ridiculous to deny this, under pretence, that we ſee no ſuch beings. They have no good reaſon to deny Witchcraft, Magic, the Larvæ, the Spectres, the Lemures, Hobgoblins, familiars, and other things of this nature. It is more allowable in thoſe who believe the ſoul to be diſtinct from matter, to deny them; and yet I know not by what prepoſterous turn of mind, they who believe the ſoul of man to be corporeal, are the readieſt to deny the exiſtence of demons.

[G] His work is intermixed with ſeveral fine maxims againſt ill morals.] A learned critic, who has laboured to explain this poem, as much as any man whatever, gives it this teſtimony: ‘ Ambitionem etiam ſuæ ætatis graviſſimis verſibus libro tertio & quincto reprehendit (Lucretius). Quam ſanctis denique fuerit moribus Poëta teſtis eſt locupletiſſimus opus graviſſimum, multiſque præclaris ad bonos mores conformandos adhortationibus illuminatum (35). —— The pride and ambition reigning in his age, he (Lucretius) reproves in the moſt ſevere verſes in his third and fifth books. In fine, to what a ſanctity of manners our Poet attained, his excellent work is a ſufficient teſtimony, every where abounding with the moſt elegant exhortations to a moral life.’ So that we know not what to think of that Jeſuit, who durſt affirm, that all the world is agreed, concerning Lucretius's ill morals, which, adds he, are but too manifeſtly expoſed in his book (36). Upon the teſtimony of this Jeſuit, Mr Baillet had reaſon to ſay (37), ‘ that ſome have found fault with Lucretius for not diſſembling, more than he did, his own corrupt morals, and ſo much the more, as he had leſs need to expoſe them.’ But it is certain this Jeſuit is in an error; and that there is nothing in the poem de Rerum Natura, whence it may be reaſonably inferred, that the author was a man of a diſſolute life; ſo far is he from glorying in the corruption of his own morals. I confeſs, he explains ſome things, concerning generation, in very obſcene terms: but do not our moſt eſteemed and moſt virtuous Phyſicians do the ſame, in the books where they treat of theſe matters, and ſeveral others? Read Mr Menjot's diſſertations, who was a Proteſtant, and a perfectly honeſt man: read, I ſay, his diſſertation de Sterilitate, where you will find Lucretius's verſes, preceded by an explication, which, to ſay no worſe, comes not behind the verſes themſelves. ‘ Cauſis etiam ſterilitatis annumeratur incompoſitus inter coeundum motus, dùm ſcilicet clunibus & coxendicibus ſublevatis lumborum criſpitudine fluctuat, ſivè, ut dixit Martialis †, vibrat ſine fine pruriens laſcivos docili tremore lumbos fœmina οἰφόλις (Latini criſſare, Græci πτερυγίζειν appellant) unde belluæ à naturâ edoctæ in congreſſu citrà σόβησιν quietæ perſtant. Lucretius ‡, quem neſcias utrumne inter Poetas an inter Philoſophos numeres, hanc rationem reddit,

Nec molles opu' ſunt motus uxeribus hilum,
Nam mulier prohibet ſe concipere atquè repugnat,
Clunibus ipſa viri Venerem ſi lata retractet
Atquè exoſſatô ciet omni pectore fluctus.
Ejicit enim ſulci rectâ regione viâque
Vomerem, atque locis avertit ſeminis ictum.
Idque ſuâ causâ conſuerunt ſcorta moveri
Nè complerentur crebrò, gravidæque jacerent (38).

There is a great difference betwixt the Poets, who publiſh obſcenities in the way of Catullus and Ovid, and thoſe who are forced to uſe obſcene words, in explaining the effects of nature. Lucretius muſt be reckoned in this laſt claſs; and conſequently his expreſſions cannot be brought as a proof againſt his morals. The caſe is quite different as to Catullus, and ſuch as he, who publiſh obſcenities only to give the hiſtory of their amours, or excite people to the moſt filthy debaucheries. In a word, Lucretius is a Poet who was a Natural Philoſopher, and the others are the authors of verſes on galantry: it is lawful for him to make uſe of the Phyſicians ſtile. But obſcenity is intolerable in love-verſes. I mention not the poem, in which the abbot Quillet gives rules for getting handſome children (39). I am not ignorant how Mr Baillet blames him (40); therefore I forbear ſaying, that, if a Chriſtian Poet, a Poet who is an eccleſiaſtic (41), is not excluded from the number of men of probity, on account of the deſcriptions he has given upon the ſubject of generation (42), Lucretius ought not to be excluded.

I will not take advantage of Dionyſius Lambinus's teſtimony. He is an author, who, deſigning to prove by examples, the modeſty wherewith the antient Poets deſcribed what concerns the venereal exerciſe (43), alledges, amongſt other paſſages, that of Lucretius above-cited (44). ‘ Ad genera verecundiora redeo. Pindarus Apollinis cum Cyrena concubitum narrans, ita tectis verbis utitur, ut ne virginales quidem aures eis offendi poſſe videantur hoc modo, ἦρα καὶ ἐκ λεχέων κεῖρεν μελινδέα ποίαν, &c. id eſt, licet ne ex ejus cubili ſuavem herbam tondêre? & ibid. de Antei filia, quam pater optimè currenti præmium propoſuerat. Χρυσοςεφάνυ δὲ οἱ ἥβας καρπὸν ἀνθήσαντ' ἀποδρέψαι ἤθελον; id eſt, curſores autem florentem ei pubertatis aureæ fructum decerpere volebant. Lucret. lib. 4. in extr. de muliere motum adhibente in concubitu, Ejicit enim ſulci recta regione, viaque Vomerem, atque locis avertit ſeminis ictum (45). — I return to the chaſter Poets. Pindar, deſcribing the commerce between Apollo and Cyrena, uſes ſuch words as might inoffenſively touch even a virgin's ear, thus: Is it not lawful to gather a fragrant herb out of it's bed. The ſame Poet, telling us, that Anteus, offering his daughter as a prize to the man who overcame in the race, ſpeaks thus of the deſires of thoſe who contended on this occaſion, the young men who run deſired to pluck the fruit of her golden youth. Lucretius, in his fourth book, deſcribing the motion of a woman in the act of love, ſays, that by diverting the plow ſhe ſometimes cauſes the grain to fall in an improper place.’ The reaſon which hinders me from taking advantage of this teſtimony, is, that Lambinus had no very nice taſte upon this ſubject: for at preſent we ſhould think ſuch expreſſions, as he cites to be very groſs. One of Pindar's examples; contained in the words I have copied, anſwers to this Engliſh expreſſion; they would rob her of the flower of her virginity. The inſtances he cites from Homer (46) are for the moſt part as ſtrong as the expreſſions of carnal copulation, and cohabitation; which the country notaries do now make a ſcruple of inſerting, in the contracts for marriage, as was done heretofore. He moreover alledges theſe words of Horace, Inachiam ter nocte potes; where, ſays he, verbum, in quo turpitudo & obſcænitas ineſt, tacetur. — (The verb in which the obſcenity lies is ſuppreſſed. But tho' two Poets, natives of Vire in Normandy (47), have uſed the like ſuppreſſion, as Horace, in tranſlating theſe words, yet is the tranſlation obſcene. I omit to ſay, that the ode, whence Lambinus has taken this example of a modeſt conduct, furniſhes us with a quite contrary inſtance preſently after.

Inachiâ langues minûs, ac me.
Inachiam ter nocte potes: mihi ſemper ad unum
Mollis opus: pereat malè, quæ te Lesbia, quærenti taurum, monſtravit inertem!
Cùm mihi Cous adeſſet Amyntas,
Cujus in indomito conſtantior inguine nervus,
Quàm nova collibus arbor inhæret (48).

We ſhall not therefore truſt to Lambinus, as not being a competent judge. What he calls chaſt and modeſt expreſſions, are intolerable, at preſent, in love-verſes, in a book of wit, in a ſermon, or a ſpeech. None but Phyſicians, or Advocates, or Hiſtorians, or Dictionary writers, &c. can juſtifiably employ them.

Let us conclude with a fine encomium, which an excellent commentator on Lucretius has lately given him. Nothing can better prove what I have affirmed in the text of this remark. ‘ Huic calumniæ ita profligatæ ſuccedit alia elatior aſpectu, & voce truculentior; clamitans veſanum eſſe, immodeſtum, impium, voluptatis magiſtrum, omni denique ſpurcitie, quæ decet porcum ex Epicuri grege, inquinatum: Ego verò nunquam animum meum inducere potui ut know what, which delight in moleſting meaner conditions; but perhaps he would alſo have rejected this hypotheſis [H], and have undertaken to explain this matter phyſically. They

'credam, Pomponii Attici, caſtiſſimi viri familiarem, utriuſque Ciceronis delicias, & eximium ſuæ ætatis ornamentum tot vitiis (de impietate aptior erit dicendi locus) fœdatum: Teſtes igitur quæro, ſed nullibi inveniam; ſcripta evolvo, at in illis omnia longe diſſimilia; multa adverſus metum fortiter, intemperantiam ſeverè, libidinem caſtè diſputantur, quæ hortari ad virtutes, ab avaritia, ambitione, luxuria poſſint deterrere plurima: & qui ad illius præcepta vitam moreſque componit, illum privati habebunt integerrimum amicum, civem Reſpublica (49). —— To this profligate calumny, ſucceeds another higher in it's nature, and couched in ſeverer terms, he is clamorouſly ſaid to have been mad, immodeſt, impious, immerſed in pleaſure: in fine, to have been polluted with all the filth which might be expected on a ſwine out of Epirus's herd: for my part, I could never bring myſelf to believe, that the intimate friend of ſo chaſt a man as Pomponius Atticus, one who was the delight of both the Cicero's, and the ornament of the age in which he lived, could be covered with ſuch a multitude of vices, for as to his impiety, we ſhall find a properer place to ſpeak of it. I therefore enquired for witneſſes, but I could find none; I turned over his writings, in which every thing is of a contrary caſt; many fine things are ſaid to remove fear, many ſevere things againſt intemperance, he chaſtly diſputes againſt luſt, and as to what may exhort men to virtues, and deter them from avarice, ambition, and luxury, with ſuch paſſages his book abounds; and if any perſon conform himſelf to the precepts he gives for the regulation of life, private perſons will find in ſuch a one a valuable friend, and the public a good citizen.'

The Jeſuit Poſſevin, full, as he is, of ſcruples, and as earneſt as he has been, in adviſing not to ſuffer ſtudents to read ſome places of Lucretius (50), is yet of opinion, that they ought to be ſhewn the fine precepts of morality, which are in this Poet, upon the contempt of death; the avoiding of love, and upon the means of bridling the paſſions, and of procuring the tranquillity of the ſoul. 'Non negaverim perlegi poſſe in Lucretio quæ de morte contemnenda, de amore fugiendo, de coercendis cupiditatibus, de ſedandis animorum motibus, de mentis tranquillitate comparanda .... diſputat (51).'

[H] He might perhaps have diſcovered ſome, I do not know what, which took a pleaſure in moleſting meaner conditions; but perhaps he would alſo have rejected this hypotheſis.] There are very few who have not taken notice that the world generally complains, that infirmity and death, ſeize the perſons that are deareſt to them, more commonly than indifferent or hated people. See ſuch a one, ſay they, he loved his wife and had good reaſon for it; he loſt her the ſecond year of their marriage, and is not to be comforted: and, while he laments this diſmal ſeparation, many huſbands have panted after a ſtate of widowhood for twenty years together, and are ſtill threatened with the long life of their wives. Obſerve this widow, how ſhe mourns night and day her good huſband, which was carried off by death in the flower of his age: a hundred other huſbands enjoy a perfect health for a great many years together, and ſhall live on ſeveral years longer, and perſiſt in abuſing their wives without cauſe. Should they happen to die, patience would be no longer neceſſary in their houſes: comfort, repoſe, and good houſewifery would there agreeably reign together; and therefore we ought to believe they will live long. A child is lately buried, an only ſon, the delight of his father and mother's heart: he was a youth of promiſing hopes, and worthy to ſucceed to the great eſtate he was born to; death has ſingled him out, amidſt a hundred others, whom ſhe has ſpared, and who are a burthen to their families. That worthy man, who made ſo good uſe of his parts, and riches, is lately dead. His life was very ſhort; he never enjoyed a day of health; and, if his conſtitution had been ſtronger, he would have done more ſervice to the world than he has done. He is dead, and twenty others in the neighbourhood are perfectly well, and never knew what ſickneſs is, who ſeek only to diſturb all the world beſides, and who abuſe their health, their wit, and their riches, to the oppreſſing of innocence, and ſcandalizing the public by a wicked life. Obſerve yon rogue, a vagabond, and profligate; he fell from the third ſtory, and never hurt himſelf. A gentleman's ſon, an only ſon, an honeſt man, would have broken his bones with a much leſs fall. My readers will all own, that ſuch complaints are daily heard: and it is even a common ſaying, that the wiſhes of the public, for a wicked man's death, have a particular virtue to prolong his life. It would be eaſy to explain this, by the hypotheſis of theſe jealous, envious, and malignant deities, which the Heathens admitted. Sound Divinity may reaſon ſolidly hereupon; but what could Lucretius have ſaid.

If there were really deities, who repined at the proſperities of men, and delighted to mortify them, they would doubtleſs affect to deſtroy an only ſon in the flower of his age, a huſband tenderly beloved, a wife, who was the happineſs of her huſband; and, preſerve the life of a villain, who was a heart-breaking to his father and mother, and preſerve a huſband and wife, who were plagues to one another. Were they to put a family in mourning, they would chuſe out a child of the greateſt hopes, and moſt beloved; and were they to perſecute a pariſh, they would afflict ſuch as were the ſupport of it, by their charity and prudence; they would conſign them to the bed of ſickneſs, and afterwards to the grave; and protect the life of the wicked from all harm and danger. They would delight in mortifying the public, by preſerving the objects of their curſes, and ſpeedily deſtroying the objects of their hopes, the delights of mankind, the Marcellus's and Germanicus's. Conſider what Tacitus ſays, in deſcribing Germanicus's triumph, and the diſturbance that glorious day bred in the minds of thoſe, who remembered, that the favour of the Roman people brought ill luck. 'Augebat intuentium viſus eximia ipſius (Germanici) ſpecies, curruſque quinque liberis onuſtus: ſed ſuberat occulta formido reputantibus, haud proſperum in Druſo patre ejus favorem vulgi, avunculum ejuſdem Marcellum flagrantibus plebis ſtudiis intra juventam ereptum, breves & infauſtos populi Romani amores (52). —— The ſight was enobled by the beauty of his (Germanicus's) perſon, and the appearance of his chariot with five children; but they were ſtruck with a ſecret fear, remembring that the favour of the people had been fatal to his father Druſus, that his uncle Marcellus was cut off immaturely on the ſame account, whence they inferred, that the love of the Romans was ſhort and ominous.' Every one knows Virgil's reflexion, that Marcellus died young, that fate did but juſt ſhew him to the world, becauſe the gods thought, that Rome would be too potent, if it enjoyed him a long time.

Oſtendent terris hunc tantum fata; neque ultra
Eſſe ſinent: nimium vobis Romana propago
Viſa potens Superi, propria hæc ſi dona fuiſſent (53).

This wonder to the world muſt be but ſhown,
The Roman race had too much greatneſs known;
Had not the powers divine reſum'd their own.

It is very probable, that Virgil had in view the jealouſy attributed to the gods; but our divines reaſon in a manner infinitely more ſolid. They do not deny in general the diſtinctions, which a prophane and impious Heathen would have called an affectation to vex men, a reſpect of perſons, or even pure malice, and envy of fate: they find in theſe diſtinctions, a providence full of goodneſs, wiſdom, and juſtice. God ſeparates us from thoſe whom we love moſt tenderly: he does it with a deſign to diſ-unite us from the earth, and to teach us, that the true happineſs ought to be ſought in heaven. He ſuffers us to be long expoſed to domeſtic miſeries, in order to prove our patience, and to purify us in this crucible. He lengthens out the days of the wicked, in order to puniſh the ſins of men. They are the ſcourges of his juſtice; and no body ſuffers more than he has deſerved. Thus ſound Divinity finds nothing difficult in all this; but neither Lucretius nor Epicurus could have eaſily ſolved the difficulty. They might perhaps have denied the fact, and maintained, that the authors of the murmurs, complaints, and obſervations, we have ſeen above, compute wrong. It is cuſtomary for men not to reckon enough on one hand, and to reckon too much on

They who have written his life affirm, that he was a very honeſt man (a). Some pretend that the invocation at the beginning of his poem [I] may afford us a proof of his contradicting on the other. Let a wicked man, or a wicked husband die ſoon; this is preſently obſerved, but a man quickly forgets his reflexion upon it. But if an honeſt man, or a good husband, be nipped in the bud; this is attentively conſidered, and never forgotten, the memory being then a faithful regiſter. Perhaps as many children die, according to the wiſhes of their parents, as only idolized ſons. The death of the former makes no noiſe, it is but lightly reflected on; but the death of the other raiſes a thouſand out-cries and reflexions. Beſides this, we muſt know, that men are naturally more inclined to complain of their deſtiny, than commend it; and falſly imagine, on a thouſand occaſions, that their neighbours proſperity exceeds their own (54). There are ſome ſo ungrateful, and impertinent, as to ſay, My ſon is dead of his wound; if he had been another man's ſon, he would have recovered. Add, that Lucretius would have recourſe to his Natural Philoſophy. Wonder not, he would have ſaid, that a ſon, tenderly beloved, ſhould die ſooner than another, who had lived unregarded; the later grows robuſt, he hardens himſelf in all weathers; the other is ſoftened by his effeminate education, and the leaſt indiſpoſition carries him off. A young man of extraordinary parts is ſickly, and dies before he is thirty years old: a fool, a booby is never ſick, or at leaſt recovers from the violenteſt diſtemper, and lives to be very old. Have you kept a regiſter, would Lucretius anſwer, of all the learned of the firſt rank, who have lived to eighty; and of all the blockheads who have not attained to the age of man? reſume your counters, and calculate better, you will find your accounts are wrong. But after all, what wonder is it, that a great wit ſhould not be of a ſtrong conſtitution. His contexture is of a finer web of atoms, and therefore his reſiſtance to extraneous bodies muſt be very feeble. A clumſy peaſant is compounded of more maſſy and ſtrong wrought parts; and therefore muſt laſt the longer. If the atoms of the imagination are in a very rapid motion, they diſorder and ſhake the parts of the brain, opening breaches, by which there evaporates abundance of atoms, which are neceſſary to the maintaining of the organs. The machine muſt therefore neceſſarily wear itſelf out, and the principles of life quickly corrupt. Here is the explication of the axiom, Immodicis brevis eſt ætas, & rara ſenectus (55).

Great wits, have ſeldom ſcap'd a ſudden fate,
And rarely age doth on their honours wait.

Telle eſt la loi du Ciel, nul excés n'eſt durable;
S'il paſſe le commun il paſſe promptement (56).

Such is the law of heaven, no exceſs
Endures, when once the common bounds it breaks.

Theſe anſwers, which I ſuppoſe Lucretius would have given, are far from accounting for all that is contained in the beginning of this remark.

[I] The invocation at the beginning of his poem.] The baron des Coutures obſerves (57), that ‘this invocation has ſurprized a great many of the learned, as being contrary to Epicurus's doctrine. Lambinus, adds he, cites a Florentine, who pretends to have found the reaſon of it, becauſe this Philoſopher, having maintained, that our crimes provoked not the anger of the gods, nor our good actions procured to us their favours. admitted however of prayers, and owned, that they heard thoſe of men.’ I do not examine, whether, from Epicurus's profeſſing to honour the gods, we may be allowed to conclude, that he profeſſed alſo to invoke them, and to expect they would hear his prayers. There is no conſequence between theſe two things. We may eſteem, reſpect, and venerate a being on the account of the perfection of it's nature, without addreſſing our prayers to it; for we might be perſuaded, that it concerned itſelf with nothing, and diſpenſed neither good nor evil. Nor yet do I trouble myſelf to enquire, whether Epicurus might not pretend to honour the Deity, only to ſecure himſelf from the puniſhments eſtabliſhed againſt Atheiſm. I refer my reader to a treatiſe of the learned Mr du Rondel (58). But I venture to affirm, that Lucretius did not invoke the goddeſs Venus, to conform himſelf to the principles this Florentine aſcribes to Epicurus, that the gods are worthy of our prayers, though they do not govern the world. ‘I am not of Lambinus's opinion, (it is the baron des Coutures that ſpeaks) (59) who applauds this Florentine; nor does he himſelf explain the thing better, by adding, that Lucretius, perhaps only addreſſed himſelf to Venus, according to the cuſtom of the Poets: and that it was not as a Philoſopher that he pretended her charms could obtain of Mars the peace which the Romans deſired; or perhaps that Epicurus, placing the ſupreme good in the abſence of pain, addreſſed himſelf to the miſtreſs of pleaſures; or, laſtly, becauſe ſhe was the mother of Æneas, from whom deſcended the founder of Rome: for my part, I maintain, that Lucretius did not depart from the notion of Epicurus, in the invocation of Venus, it being neither a Poetical flight, nor a Roman gratitude, but a Philoſophical reflexion. He did not look upon the miſtreſs of Mars to be a goddeſs, ſince he himſelf in the ſecond book ſays, that Bacchus and wine, Ceres and corn, are the ſame thing: nor did he any more imagine, that Mars was a god; but, as he had written a poem concerning the nature of things, could he better addreſs himſelf, than to generation, which he means by the mother of love; and whom all the Naturaliſts have acknowledged for that ſecret appetite, which is given to every ſpecies for it's propagation.’ This removes not the difficulty; for it is certain Lucretius conſidered Venus according to the ideas of thoſe, who took her for a goddeſs. He does not conſider her as the natural paſſion, which induces ſexes to unite: for in that notion, Venus is no more the mother of Æneas, than of Epicurus, and yet he firſt characterizes her by the epithet of Æneadum genitrix. That which, in my opinion, is moſt reaſonable to believe, is, that all this is only a piece of wit. Lucretius ſeeing all the Poets invoke the Muſes at the beginning of any great work, was not willing his Poem ſhould be deſtitute of an ornament of this kind: he therefore ſets out with an invocation of Venus, as the propereſt Deity for a Naturaliſt. But he no ways pretended, that this was an act of religion; or that Venus, whom he celebrates with ſo many praiſes, was an intelligent being: thus he has in another place invoked the Muſe Calliope (60), without pretending that he addreſſed himſelf to an intelligent being: he has not therefore acted againſt his own principles. I ſhould ſooner accuſe Lipſius, of committing an act of Heathen idolatry in the verſes he addreſſes to the planet Venus, in behalf of his garden (61), than aſcribe to our Lucretius an act of religion, from the prayer he addreſſes to the mother of Æneas. Note, that abundance of Chriſtian Poets, infinitely greater enemies to the Heathen gods, than Lucretius was, ſolemnly invoke the Muſes, or Bacchus, in their poems. This is imitating the Antients, and not performing an act of religion; for they have not a thought of invoking the deity. Note alſo, that this invocation of Lipſius ad ſtellam Venerem, and Lucretius's invocation have been compared, with a deſign to convict Lipſius of an impiety (62); but this it cannot be, unleſs we ſuppoſe his prayer was not a piece of wit (63). But it was no more.

For the reſt, the Florentine, mentioned by the baron des Coutures, is the learned Peter Victorius. Mr Minutoli acquainted me with it in 1693. Here are his words ſomewhat more at large than I gave them in the article EPICURUS (64). ‘There is in the ſame collection (65) at the 19th page, a letter of Petrus Victorius, to John della Caſa, archbiſhop of Benevento, which turns upon the queſtion, whether the Poet Lucretius, who, in the beginning of his poem, invokes Venus, does not in that contradict the doctrine of his patron Epicurus; and whether this is conſiſtent with the inactivity aſcribed to the gods, by this Philoſopher. Doth Mr du Rondel, whoſe work I have not read, and who endeavours to make an apology for Epicurus in this reſpect, mention this difficulty, or cite that letter?’ Tycho Brahe was conſulted upon this queſtion by Iſaac Pontanus, in contradicting himſelf, and forſaking his ſyſtem in the very firſt line of his book. They would be in the right, if this invocation were any thing more than a poetical flight [K], by which he was willing to accommodate himſelf, in ſome ſort, to cuſtom. It may eaſily be ſhowed that he has, on ſeveral occaſions, adapted his ſtyle to the common way of in the year 1596, and gave this judicious anſwer. ‘ Ad queſtionem illam jocoſam, ſays he (66), & nonnihil Criticam antiqui Lucretii, cum is ſectam Philoſophorum Deos eorumque providentiam inficiantium profiteretur, Venerem nihilominus, Æneadum genitricem, primordio ſui operis, ejuſque opem imploret, non habeo ſerio dicere, quomodo hæc reſolvenda ſit, ſi quidem non ad Veneris ſidus cœleſte, quod nos una cum ceteris ſubinde ſcrutamur, ſed ad terreſtrem illam Venerem, Æneadum, uti fingebant Poëtæ, matrem, & aliorum quoque hominum genitricem pertineat . . . . . . (67) Si quid tamen in his noſtri valent luſus, crediderim Lucretium ad imitationem aliorum Poëtarum ſic exorſum eſſe, non quod revera aliquam Deam, quæ Venus appellaretur, aut ulla alia numina ſtatueret. Ideoque ſub hoc nomine voluptatem corpoream, quam etiam Deum ſubinde nuncupare non veretur, intellexiſſe arbitror. ——— As to that jocoſe, and in ſome meaſure critical, queſtion, concerning Lucretius, why he, who followed that ſect of Philoſophers, that deny the providence of the gods, invoked, notwithſtanding, the aid of Venus, the mother of Æneas in the beginning of his work. I know not what to ſay, ſeriouſly, in as much as it cannot be applied to the celeſtial planet Venus, which we, as well as others, obſerve, but to that earthly Venus, who, as the Poets feign, was the mother of Æneas, and of other men. . . . . However, if one may be allowed to offer ſomewhat in a ludicrous way, I ſhould think that Lucretius did this rather to imitate other Poets in his exordium, than that he believed Venus in reality to be a goddeſs, or that he allowed any other deities, I am therefore of opinion, that hereby he intended cenſual pleaſure, which elſewhere he does not heſitate to ſtyle a God.’

[K] They would be in the right, if . . . . . this invocation were any thing more than a poetical flight.] Before we quit this ſubject, we muſt ſay, that had Lucretius invoked either Venus or Calliope, being perſuaded, that his prayer would procure him any aſſiſtance, he would have contradicted himſelf in a manner not only unworthy of a Philoſopher, but even of a man any way capable of reaſoning. For he ſcarce has finiſhed this pretended invocation to Mars's miſtreſs,

Nam tu ſola potes tranquilla pace juvare
Mortaleis : quoniam belli fera mœnera Mavors
Armipotens regit : in gremium qui ſæpe tuum ſe
Reficit, æterno devinctus vulnere amoris (68).

Peace is thy gift alone, for furious Mars,
The only governor and god of wars,
When tir'd with heat and toil, doth oft reſort
To taſte the pleaſures of the Paphian court ;
Where on thy boſom he ſupinely lies,
And greedily drinks love at both his eyes.
CREECH.

WHETHER Epicurus could poſſibly have reconciled his ſyſtem to the public worſhip, and deceived the Athenians.

When he lays down as a principle, that the gods concern not themſelves, nor intermeddle with any kind of affair (69) ; and throughout his whole book, he makes it his chief buſineſs to explain the phœnomena of nature, by the motion of atoms, and to confute thoſe who aſcribe them to the operation of the gods. It cannot be hence inferred, either that he did not believe their exiſtence, or had no reſpect and veneration for them : for, according to his principles, it is not abſurd, that beings ſhould have been formed much more perfect than man, content with their own conditions, and no way curious either of knowing or reforming the actions and affairs of others : and as it is moſt certain, that we admire, with great veneration, the merit of ſome great men, though we never received any benefit from them, nor expect any favour, nor fear any evil office, nothing hinders, but that Epicurus's followers might have had an actual veneration for the gods. But it may very well be inferred from Lucretius's ſyſtem, that he could not invoke them ; and that he muſt have looked upon all the religious worſhip, practiſed at Rome, the vows, ſacrifices, feaſts, &c. as wholly inſignificant. A reflexion offers here upon the conduct of the Athenian prieſts, with reſpect to Epicurus. They had ſeveral times brought to puniſhment the Philoſophers, whom they accuſed of Atheiſm, and they vigorouſly proſecuted Anaxagoras for one ſimple act of profanation. ‘ Miror cur Anaxagoras reus factus ſit quia ſolem eſſe dixit lapidem ardentem, negans utique Deum, cum in eadem civitate gloria floruerit Epicurus, vixeritque ſecurus, non ſolum ſolem vel ullum ſyderum Deum eſſe non credens, ſed nec Jovem nec ullum deorum omnino in mundo habitare contendens, ad quem preces hominum ſupplicationeſque perveniant (70). ——— I wonder that Anaxagoras ſhould be declared guilty of a capital offence, for aſſerting the ſun to be only a burning ſtone, and ſo denying it to be a god, when Epicurus flouriſhed in the ſame city with glory, and lived in quiet, who not only denied the ſun, or any other ſtar to be a divinity, but alſo aſſerted, that neither Jupiter, nor any other of the gods, dwelt within the ſphere of this world, or were capable of hearing the prayers and petitions of men.’ How comes it then that they did not ſeize Epicurus ? was it becauſe he had no quarrel with them, either on account of ſome perſonal intereſt or perſonal offence, as perhaps thoſe they proſecuted had, and whom perhaps they would not have accuſed of irreligion, if it had not been to gratify their private paſſions, under the cloak of piety ? or was it becauſe Epicurus politickly conformed to the public worſhip, and openly approved it ? I believe indeed they were capable of being ſatisfied with the exterior, as they do at preſent, without ſearching into the thoughts : but was it not neceſſary, as at preſent, that this exterior ſhould be obſerved, even in books and lectures ? would they ſuffer a man to dogmatize in this ſchool, contrary to what he profeſſed in the ſtreets and temples ? it is hard to imagine this. And yet Epicurus's ſyſtem was contrary to the worſhip of the gods, as practiſed by the Athenians : it could only allow the eſteem, and reſpect, the praiſes of the gods ; but not the prayers, ſacrifices, and acts of repentance. Thus all the inconveniencies, that were to be feared from Atheiſm, the deſtruction of our confidence in the protection of heaven, the ruin of our hopes of happineſs by living well, and of our fears of miſery by living ill : all theſe inconveniencies, I ſay, without one exception, flowed as naturally, and as neceſſarily from Epicurus's doctrine, as from that of the Atheiſts. The leaſt diſcerning may very eaſily comprehend, that all the practices of religion are founded not upon the doctrine of the exiſtence of God, but upon that of his providence : ſince therefore Epicurus was tolerated in a city, which puniſhed Atheiſts, it follows, that there was with them, reſpect of perſons, and that they had double weights and double meaſures : or elſe, that the Athenians, ſo ſubtle and ingenious in other reſpects, were very ſtupid in point of religion. They ſuffered themſelves to be plaid upon like children ; not perceiving, that in dogmatizing, like Epicurus, a man mocked them, if he proteſted, that he approved the uſe of ſacrifices, and prayers, and all the other parts of public worſhip. This reaſon would appear to me very ſtrong to prove, that this Philoſopher taught the providence of God, as Mr du Rondel pretends ; it would appear to me, I ſay, very ſtrong, did I not ſee Lucretius manifeſtly combating providence, without any ſubterfuge or equivocation, or leaving any room for ſuch apologies, as are made for Epicurus, and yet living in an entire tranquillity at Rome, a city no leſs jealous of religion, nor leſs ſevere againſt impious men, than the people of Athens. Note, by the way, that the good morals of a man, who owns, with Lucretius, the exiſtence, holineſs, goodneſs, immortality, of God, without acknowledging his providence, are as good proof of this poſition, Atheiſm is not neceſſarily joined with bad morals, as the proof drawn from the good life of thoſe, who ſhould deny the providence of God, and his exiſtence all at once : for it is plain, that the belief of the exiſtence, without the belief of a providence, can be no motive to virtue, nor reſtraint to vice.

It is plain, that the vow or wiſh, or prayer, he puts up here, proceeded only from a habit he had got of ſpeaking like other men. He daily converſed with people, whoſe language was filled with parentheſes, which might have been called religious, if they had not been an effect of cuſtom rather than an act of reflexion. His wife, his maid, his friends, and all the Romans in general, were accuſtomed to bring in a ſolemn wiſh or prayer, in the mentioning an ill preſage, or ſad accident. Deus avertat, God forbid, ſaid they; if any misfortune ſhould happen, quod abominor, which God avert. Authors likewiſe made uſe of theſe ways of ſpeech,

May heaven prohibit, gods avert ſuch ill.

I make no doubt, that Lucretius, being uſed from his childhood to theſe forms of diſcourſe, uſed them in familiar converſation, either without any ſalvo, or only ſubſtituting the term natura, or fortuna, in the room of Deus. Thus the Proteſtants have ſubſtituted the parentheſis, God receive his ſoul, inſtead of that, God abſolve him. The Roman Catholics uſe the later, when they mention their deceaſed relations; but as this could not agree with thoſe who denied a purgatory, the Proteſtants have not admitted it; but however have accommodated themſelves to cuſtom by a phraſe placed like the other, and turned according to the maxims of their own religion. Lucretius being accuſtomed by his reading and converſation to this kind of parentheſis, inſerted the prayer or wiſh we have ſeen above. Nothing was more vain than this in the hypotheſis he maintained; and it cannot be pretended, that he was ignorant of the inconſiſtency of ſuch a wiſh, with the doctrine of atoms: he very well knew, that that nature, or fortune, which ſhoved them on, was unable to change or ſuſpend their courſe, or even to hear the deſires of men. If the train of their motion were ſuch as muſt ſpeedily bring on the diſſolution of the world; this diſſolution was inevitable; the devouteſt prayers of mankind, their ſacrifices and proceſſions, could not give it the leaſt delay. How then comes Lucretius in ſome ſort, to invoke nature or fortune, to put off to another time the deſtruction of the earth? it was becauſe he ſometimes ſpoke according to the language of the vulgar. Note, that the doctrine of fatality did not exclude all wiſhes; for, without departing from his principles, Epicurus might very well wiſh, that the diſpoſition of atoms might be favourable to his health. He could not have deſired that it ſhould alter, but only have wiſhed, that their nature might incline them to ſuch or ſuch purpoſes. Lucretius goes farther, as appears by his expreſſions. This is the firſt inſtance that I will give.

The ſecond is not very far different from it, ſince immediately after the ſix verſes, I have recited, we find theſe:

Qua priùs aggrediar quàm de re fundere fata
Sanctiùs, & multo certa ratione magis, quàm
Pythia, quæ tripode è Phœbi lauroque profatur;
Multa tibi expediam doctis ſolatia dictis (74).

But now before I teach theſe truths, more pure
And certain oracles, and far more ſure
Than what from trembling Pythia reach'd our ears,
I'll firſt propoſe ſome cure againſt thy fears.
CREECH.

Here he promiſes oracles, much more certain than thoſe of Delphi, and he made uſe of the ſame compariſon in another place, to heighten the importance of the doctrine of the antient Grecian Philoſophers.

Quamquam multa bene ac divinitus invenientes
Ex adyto tamquam cordis reſponſa dedêre
Sanctiùs, & multo certa ratione magis, quàm
Pythia, quæ tripode ex Phœbi, lauroque profatur (75).

Which they have left as oracles, more ſure
Than from the Tripod ſpoke, and leſs obſcure
Than thoſe the Antients from the Pythia heard. . . .
CREECH.

Who ſees not that, in both theſe paſſages, he expreſſes himſelf, according to the ideas of the people, and not according to the principles of his ſect? for, according to him, the anſwers of Apollo's prieſteſs could only be the dreams of a diſtempered brain; or of an ignorant impoſtor. He acknowledged no Divinity in the oracles: It was not therefore giving the higheſt idea of a philoſophical Doctrine, to affirm it excelled the Delphic oracles. It is as much as if we ſhould now ſay, that Des Cartes's notions deſerve more attention, than the prophecies of your ſtrolling gypſies, and fortune-tellers. It is plain then, that Lucretius adapted his language to popular opinions: and it would be ridiculous cavilling to maintain, that the force of truth ſometimes drew expreſſions from him, which overturned his ſyſtem, and convicted him of groſs contradiction; for example, where he owns in two places of his Poems, that there was ſomething divine, inſpired, ſupernatural, and prophetical, in the oracles of Apollo.

[M] It is pretended he was a diſciple of Zeno. They who have criticiſed this, have not ſucceeded very well.] If we once admit their opinion, who ſay, that Lucretius was ſent to Athens to ſtudy, it can hardly be queſtioned, but he was one of Zeno's diſciples, the chief of Epicurus's ſchool at that time. Accordingly we ſee, that Lambinus and Giſanius joined theſe two opinions together. 'Credibile eſt Lucretium . . . . ſeſe Athenas contuliſſe ibique Zenonem illum Epicuræorum Coryphæum audiviſſe (76). It is probable that Lucretius . . . . went to Athens, and there heard Zeno, the great leader of the Epicureans.' This is what Lambinus ſays: the following words are Giſanius's (77). 'Præerant hortis eo tempore Zeno acriculus ille ſenex, & Phædrus, homo, ut Cicero ait, humaniſſimus, itaque his videtur uſus præceptoribus Titus, quos etiam Atticus paulo licet hoc poeta grandior audivit. —— The gardens were at that time under the direction of Zeno, a ſhrewd old man; and Phædrus, whom Cicero mentions as a perſon of the greateſt humanity, theſe therefore were, in all probability, the maſters of Titus, as, a little before, they had been to Atticus, who was ſomething older than that Poet.' The Baron des Coutures has trod in the ſame ſteps. It is probable, ſays he (78) that Lucretius went to Athens, where Zeno, who was the honour of the Epicurean ſect, had acquired a general eſteem. A letter has been inſerted in the Bibliotheque Univerſelle (79), containing ſome critical obſervations on the baron's opinion. writers [O], we ſhall ſay ſeveral things concerning Lucretius. They who deſire to know the elogies that have been given him, need only conſult the authors, whom Barthius points out to us (b). Mr Creech who, in 1695, put out an edition of this poet (c), with an excellent paraphraſe, and fine notes, had before publiſhed an Engliſh tranſlation of it. It is pity ſo good an author had not a longer life (d), and that his end was, in ſome meaſure, like that of the Roman author, whom he had tranſlated and paraphraſed. I am certain, that the abbot de Marolles's French tranſlation would not have met with the fate it did [P], had it been as good as this Engliſh verſion.

laſt is this: laſtly, the fifth blunder is, that Zeno is ſaid to have been the honour of the Epicurean ſect, whereas he is acknowledged to be the head of the Stoics. The critic did not obſerve, that there were more Zeno's than one: He thought the founder of the Stoics was meant, and upon this foot he ſhould have found in the words he cenſured a notable fault in chronology, which he does not mention. Zeno, the chief of the Stoics, died the firſt year of the CXXIXth Olympiad: ſo that his death muſt have preceded the birth of Lucretius above 160 years. He ought therefore to have ſuſpected, that the author he cenſured, had a Zeno in view, different from the founder of the Stoics: and if this ſuſpicion had put him upon making ſome inquiries he would probably have found, that there was a famous Epicurean, named Zeno (80), who taught at Athens in Lucretius's time.

[N] We confute Mr Moreri.] I. He ought not to have ſaid, that our Poet was called T. Carus Lucretius. Carus was not his name, but his fir-name, Cognomen. II. By theſe words, Roman by nation, Moreri doubtleſs meant, that Lucretius was born at Rome. This is expreſſing his thought ill; for where is the author ſo exact as to ſcruple to ſay, that Cicero and Livy were Romans by nation, as Demoſthenes and Thucydides were Greeks by nation? III. We have no proof that Lucretius was born at Rome: Mr Moreri therefore ought not peremptorily to have given him this birth-place. IV. Much leſs ought he to have ſaid that Lucretius himſelf declares, he was a native of Rome: I have found in Lucretius but one paſſage, which may give ground to ſay, that he makes it his native city; but that paſſage is of no force. It is this,

Nam neque nos agere hoc patriaï tempore iniquo
Poſſumus æquo animo (81).

Careſs with all the ſubtil arts, become
A flatterer, and beg a peace for Rome.
For midſt rough wars, how can verſe ſmoothly flow;
Or midſt ſuch ſtorms, the learned laurel grow?
CREECH.

Cicero, Livy, Florus, Seneca, who were all born out of Rome, would not have ſpoken otherwiſe. All the inhabitants of a country might ſay, in the time of a Civil-war, that their country is afflicted, though the particular place of their birth were exempt from that public calamity. Learned men, more learned than Moreri (82) have affirmed what he affirms. Mr Morhof, ſomewhat wiſer, you will ſay, than the reſt, has uſed the particle, perhaps: but it is certain, that his forte relates to another doubt: therefore we may reckon him among thoſe who poſitively ſay, Lucretius was born in Rome (83). V. He ſhould not have affirmed, that Lucretius's relations ſent him to ſtudy at Athens. This is, I confeſs, very probable, but yet, ſince there is no proof of it, he ſhould have mentioned this by way of conjecture; or at moſt only ſay, as Giſanius has done, that no one doubted it. ‘Adoleſcentulus autem, ſays he, quin à parentibus, ſeu propinquis, conſiderata ejus ad bonas artes nata pænè divina indole, Athenas more patrio ſit miſſus, Athenas non ita pridem à P. Sulla crudeliter vaſtatas, non dubito, poſtulat hoc Romanorum conſuetudo, ac doctrinæ ratio (84). —— That a lad, either by his parents or by his relations, led by the conſideration of his pregnant, and almoſt Divine, parts, was ſent according to the cuſtom of thoſe times to Athens, a little before cruelly treated by Publius Sulla, I make no queſtion, the cuſtom of the Romans, and the mode of education in thoſe days, obliged me to own it.’ VI. It is not true, that Velleius Paterculus and Cicero have ſaid, that Lucretius's eloquence rendered him the ſublimeſt of all the Poets of his time. Cicero ſpeaks of him but once; nor is it certainly known whether the praiſes he gives him, are great or moderate; for the learned are divided about the reading of his paſſage (85): ſome (86) underſtand it, that there was not much wit in Lucretius's poem, though there was a great deal of art: others (87) underſtand it, that this work ſparkled with a great many bright thoughts, and that, nevertheleſs, a great deal of art appeared in it. Take the moſt favourable reading you pleaſe, Cicero will not be found to ſay, what Moreri aſcribes to him. As for Velleius Paterculus, he is content to place Lucretius in the liſt of great wits; eminentium ingeniorum notare tempora (88). He has ſaid nothing particular of him. VII. It is no ſmall fault to ſay, that a woman, named Lucilia, gave Lucretius a love-philtre, which threw him into a ſtrange phrenzy. This is omitting one capital circumſtance, to wit, that Lucilia is ſaid to be Lucretius's wife (89). VIII. It is not true that Cicero ſays, that Lucretius Offella was fitter to make orations than to pronounce judgments (90). IX. Cicero, Velleius Paterculus, and Cæſar, do not ſpeak of another, who was probably brother or uncle to the poet. It is very true, that he whom Cicero and Cæſar ſpeaks of, the former in his letter to Atticus (91), the latter in the civil-war, is the ſame man; but he whom Velleius Paterculus ſpeaks of, is another, and probably the ſame who harangued better than he pleaded.

[O] . . . . . and ſome other writers.] See above, the remark [B]. The baron des Coutures makes Lambinus ſay, that Lucretius's elocution is preferable to that of Cæſar or Cicero. He muſt have uſed a different edition from that I have conſulted, where I have found theſe words. ‘Hoc non dubitanter affirmabo nullum in tota lingua latina ſcriptorem Lucretio latine melius eſſe locutum: non M. Tullii, non C. Cæſaris orationem eſſe puriorem (92). —— I will not heſitate to affirm, that none of the Roman writers, deſerve to take place of Lucretius in point of Latinity; the ſtyle of Cicero, or of Cæſar, is not more pure.’ Something like this might be imputed to Peter Victorius; for he boldly preferred Lucretius before Virgil (93). It is ſurpriſing, after the foregoing paſſage, to find Lambinus accuſed of ſaying that Lucretius's Latin was bad. ‘Quo reſpexit forte Dionyſius Lambinus cum Lucretium malum latinitatis autorem vocat, qua tamen cum ſententia ille minime audiendus eſt (94). —— To this perhaps Dionyſius Lambinus had regard, when he ſaid that Lucretius wrote bad Latin, in which however he deſerves no credit.’ Borrichius ſuppoſes, that Cicero, Aulus Gellius, and Scaliger, have praiſed Lucretius for writing the pureſt Latin. ‘Certe puriſſimæ latinitatis eſſe omnia in confeſſo eſt . . . . laudaturque hoc nomine Ciceroni, Gellio, Scaligero, aliis (95). —— Certainly in purity of Latin ſtile his merit is generally confeſſed . . . . having on this account, been praiſed by Cicero, Gellius, Scaliger, and others.’ We have ſeen above that Cicero's elogy, had no relation to the purity of ſtile. Glandorpius is miſtaken (96) in ſuppoſing, that Lucretius followed Empedocles's opinions: if he had conſidered the firſt book de rerum Natura, where Empedocles is confuted he would not have ſaid this.

[P] The abbot de Marolles's tranſlation would not have met with the fate it did.] Queen Chriſtina would have thanked him for the dedication of ſo fine a book. Her ſilence, doubtleſs, mortified the abbot, who nevertheleſs continued well ſatisfied with his performance. Let us hear what he himſelf ſays (97): ‘When my verſion of Lucretius was printed, the worthy Mr du Morhier, for whom I have always had a great eſteem, adviſed me to make a preſent of it to Chriſtina queen of Sweden (98): But this produced nothing; nor do I ſo much as know

(98) That is to ſay, that I ſhould dedicate it to her.

It will not be improper to examine a falſe reaſoning and a contradiction, that Lucretius is reproached with. The falſe reaſoning relates to one of the arguments he has uſed to ſhew, that death was to be deſpiſed. Epicurus had employed it before, but in ſuch a manner that Plutarch ſeverely cenſured him for it [Q]. The contradiction relates to Lucretius's whether ever ſhe received the book, which Mr Herauld, who managed her affairs here with ſo much care and fidelity, aſſured me he had ſent her. At leaſt I received no anſwer, contrary to the cuſtom of this princeſs, who was then liberal of her compliments to men of letters. However it be, the book has not failed of a good reception from the public: and ſome learned men, the count de Pagan, the late Mr le Pailleur, the learned Mr d' Aviſſon, Mr de la Courvée, Phyſician to the queen of Poland, and ſome others, have given me thanks, in the name of the public, for having, in ſome meaſure, ſolved the difficulties that might be raiſed from the doctrine of this Poet, in his third volume, where he treats of the nature of the ſoul. I have ſince very much corrected it, and put it in a better ſtate for a ſecond edition.' The abbot de Marolles did not underſtand the Latin tongue, or Epicurus's phyſics enough to ſucceed in ſuch a verſion. Yet it has bore two editions, the firſt in the year 1650, dedicated to the queen of Sweden; the ſecond in the year 1663, to which was added the tranſlation of the tenth book of Diogenes Laërtius, and dedicated to the firſt preſident.

[Q] Plutarch ſeverely cenſured Epicurus.] To comment theſe words regularly, we muſt firſt ſet forth the deſign of Epicurus and Lucretius. They propoſed to prove, that death is not to be feared, that death is nothing, that we are not intereſted nor concerned in it.

Nil igitur mors eſt, ad nos neque pertinet hilum (99).

Their proof was taken from hence, that things diſſolved, or ſeparated, have no ſenſe; and that things which have no ſenſe are nothing with regard to us. Epicurus's words are theſe. Ὁ θάνατος οὐδὲν ϖρὸς ἡμᾶς, τὸ γὰρ διαλυθὲν ἀναισθητεῖ, τὸ δὲ ἀναισθητοῦν οὐδὲν ϖρὸς ἡμᾶς (100). Plutarch (101) pretended, that this Philoſopher argued wrong here, and that there was a neceſſary propoſition wanting in his ſyllogiſm; namely this, death is the ſeparation of the body and ſoul: Ὁ θάνατος ψυχῆς καὶ σώματος διάλυσις. Aulus Gellius, taking Epicurus's part, agrees, that the ſyllogiſm, to be in form, ought to contain this propoſition: but he maintains, that Epicurus, having not undertaken to reduce his reaſoning to ſyllogiſtical rules, ſuppreſſed it on purpoſe, as being ſufficiently ſelf-evident. And it ſhould not be thought ſtrange, that the concluſion was placed not at the end, but at the beginning of the argument; the Philoſopher Plato, frequently arguing after the ſame manner; that is, inverting the order of the propoſitions of a ſyllogiſm. This is what Aulus Gellius anſwers to Plutarch's cenſure: he miſtook the point, and has been ſeverely criticized in the XVIth century. He has been accuſed of having betrayed his own folly by endeavouring to cover that of another, and even of not underſtanding the ſtate of the queſtion. 'Nactus autem eſt patronum (Epicurus) tali prorſus cliente dignum Gellium: qui dum alienam ſtultitiam tegere vult, prodit, ſuam. Tantum enim abeſt ab eo defendendo, ut ne intellexiſſe quidem videatur, quid in eo reprehenderetur (102). It might have been added, that he did not know in general, what a ſyllogiſm was; for he ſuppoſes, that of Epicurus is really conformable to the rules, and that to be in form there is nothing wanting, but the propoſition ſub-underſtood by the author. Now let us ſee what this ſyllogiſm would be, by adding what Epicurus has ſub-underſtood.

Death is the diſſolution of body and ſoul,
That which is diſſolved is inſenſible, and what is inſenſible does not affect us:
Therefore death does not affect us.

This ſyllogiſm is fallacious, as manifeſtly conſiſting of four terms (103). We muſt therefore believe, that Plutarch's objection was not founded on the ſuppreſſion of the major, as Aulus Gellius pretends, but upon this that the major, which was ſub-underſtood, was not a principle from whence the concluſion could be deduced. This is aſſuredly the caſe of this principle; and you clearly ſee, that after having granted the major and the minor of the ſyllogiſm, juſt now produced, the conſequence may ſtill be denied. Muretus is very angry with Epicurus hereupon, and treats him as an impertinent Logician. 'Illius artis (Dialectices) ignoratione ruebat in dicendo: ſæpeque aliquid probare aggreſſus, ea ſumebat, quibus datis ac conceſſis, id tamen quod probare inſtituerat, non concluderetur. Quale eſt, quod cum docere vellet, mortem nihil ad nos pertinere, ita ratiocinabatur: Ὁ θάνατος οὐδὲν ϖρὸς ἡμᾶς. τὸ γὰρ διαλυθὲν ἀναισθητεῖ. τὸ δὲ ἀναισθητοῦν οὐδὲν ϖρὸς ἡμᾶς. Neque enim ſequitur, ſi id quod diſſolutum eſt ſenſu vacat; idcirco ipſam quoque diſſolutionem non ſentiri. Neque mors eſt το διαλυθὲν, ἀλλὰ αὐτὴ ἡ διάλυσις. Meritoque Plutarchus ſecundo librorum, quos de Homero compoſuit, imperfecte, atque præpoſtere, atque inſcite ſyllogiſmo uſum eſſe eum dixerat: non quod prætermiſiſſet illud λῆμμα, ὁ θάνατος ψυχῆς καὶ σώματος διάλυσις: quo addito, nihilo magis efficietur, quod ipſe voluit: ſed quod, ſtupiditate quadam, & craſſitudine ingenii, non pervidiſſet, quantum inter id, quod diſſolutum eſt, & ipſam diſſolutionem intereſſet (104). —— Being ignorant of the Art of Logic, he made frequent miſtakes: for when he undertook to prove ſomething, he laid down ſuch propoſitions, which tho' they were granted, would nevertheleſs have concluded nothing, in favour of what he intended to prove. For example, when he endeavoured to prove that death no way concerns us, he reaſoned thus: Death is nothing to us, for what is diſſolved, becomes inſenſible, and what is inſenſible is nothing to us. For it does not follow, that if what is diſſolved, be inſenſible, therefore diſſolution itſelf, cannot be felt; nor is death the thing diſſolved, but the diſſolution itſelf. And Plutarch ſays very rightly, in his ſecond book upon Homer, that he uſed this ſyllogiſm in a manner imperfect, prepoſterous, and which ſhewed that he had no ſkill in arguing. Not meerly for leaving out this lemma, Death is the diſſolution of ſoul and body: Which being added makes nothing in favour of what he intended to prove, but that thro' a certain ſtupidity and groſſneſs of underſtanding he could not ſee the difference between the thing diſſolved, and the diſſolution itſelf.' And to convince us that the fault Plutarch has taxed Epicurus with, conſiſts not in barely ſuppreſſing the major; he produces a paſſage of Alexander Aphrodiſeus (105); in which Epicurus's argument is cenſured juſt as he ſuppoſes Plutarch had criticiſed it. I cannot think Plutarch would have troubled himſelf to cenſure that which the beſt Logicians might have done. Nothing hinders their employing an enthymema, which is a ſyllogiſm wanting either the major or minor. It is ſtill uſed in the ſchools, while the greateſt ſlaves to the formalities of diſputation have nothing to ſay againſt it, provided the propoſition underſtood be right: but what hiſſing would they make, if it was found to be as defective as this before us? Let us diſcover the fallacy.

Epicurus and Lucretius ſuppoſe, that death is a thing that does not concern us, and in which we are not at all intereſted. They conclude this from the ſuppoſition that the ſoul is mortal, and conſequently that the man is inſenſible, after the ſeparation of the ſoul and body.

Nil igitur Mors eſt, ad nos neque pertinet hilum,
Quandoquidem natura Animi mortalis habetur:
Et velut anteacto nil tempore ſenſimus ægri,
Ad confligendum venientibus undique Pœnis;
Omnia cum belli trepido concuſſa tumultu
Horrida contemuere ſub altis ætheris auris:
In dubioque fuit ſub utrorum regna cadendum
Omnibus humanis eſſet, terraque marique:
Sic ubi non erimus, cum Corporis, atque Animaï
Diſcidium fuerit, quibus è ſumus uniter apti

Well then, what's death to us, ſince ſouls can dye?
For as we neither knew, nor felt thoſe harms,
When dreadful Carthage frighted Rome with arms,
And all the world was ſhook with fierce alarms;
Whilſt undecided yet, which part ſhould fall,
Which nation riſe the glorious lord of all:
So after death, when we ſhall be no more,
What tho' the ſeas forſake their uſual ſhore,
And riſe to heav'n? What tho' ſtars drop from thence?

CREECH.

They are in the right to ſay, that nothing concerns a man, which happens to him in a ſtate of inſenſibility: for it is the ſame thing to the ſtatue of Socrates, whether it be broken to pieces, or the ſtatue of Cæſar. Since therefore the breaking of Cæſar's ſtatue, does in no wiſe concern the ſtatue of Socrates, the latter is no way intereſted in it's own deſtruction: it neither ſees it nor feels any thing of it any more than it would the burning of a tree under the ſouth pole. But ſtill they fall into a fallacy two ways: they cannot deny, but that death happens, whilſt a man is yet endued with ſenſe; it is therefore a thing which concerns a man. And from the inſenſibility of the ſeparate parts, they are in the wrong to infer, that the accident, which ſeparates them, is imperceptible. ‘ Epicurus . . . . . negavit mortem ad nos pertinere, quod enim diſſolvitur, inquit, ſenſu caret, & quod ſenſu caret nihil ad nos. Diſſolvitur autem & caret ſenſu non ipſa mors, ſed homo qui eam patitur. At ille ei dedit paſſionem cujus eſt actio. Quod ſi hominis eſt pati mortem, diſſolutionem corporis & peremptionem ſenſus, quàm ineptum, ut tanta vis ad hominem non pertinere dicatur? (107) —— Epicurus . . . denied, that death any way concerns us, for, ſaid he, that which is diſſolved, wants ſenſe, and that which wants ſenſe, can be nothing to us. But that which is diſſolved, and wants ſenſe is not death itſelf, but the man who ſuffers it. So that he attributed paſſion to that which is the action. But if it be the part of man to ſuffer death, the diſſolution of the body, and the loſs of ſenſe, how ridiculous is it to ſay, that this great change concerns him not.’ Thus their firſt inconſequence conſiſts in their concluding from the parts ſeparated to the ſeparation itſelf; as the latter, may be painful, and attended with a thouſand ſorts of troubleſome ſenſations, it is an evil which properly and really belongs to man, and that even in virtue of their own principle, that if the dead are not at all intereſted in their condition, it is becauſe they feel nothing. The ſecond defect of theſe Philoſophers reaſoning, is their ſuppoſing, that man only fears death, becauſe he imagines it attended with a great poſitive miſery. They are miſtaken, and afford no remedy to ſuch as look on the bare loſs of life, as a great evil. The love of life is deeply rooted in the heart of man; and this is a ſign that it is conſidered as a very great good: from whence it follows, that death is feared as a very great evil, merely for robbing us of this good. What ſignifies it, againſt this fear, to ſay, You will feel nothing after you are dead? Will you not quickly be anſwered, It is enough to be deprived of a life I love ſo well; and if the union of my body and ſoul is a ſtate which belongs to me, and which I paſſionately deſire to preſerve, it cannot be pretended, that death, which breaks this union, is a thing which does not concern me. Let us conclude, that Epicurus and Lucretius's argument was not juſt, and could only be concluſive againſt the fear of pain in another world. There was another ſort of fear, which they ought to have removed; to wit, the fear of the deprivation of the pleaſures of this life. They might ſay, that, taking all together, the inſenſibility of the dead is a gain rather than a loſs, as being a deliverance from the evils of this life. Now whether theſe evils ſurpaſs the goods, as many have believed, or whether they only equal them, it is an advantage to be inſenſible; for there is no man who rightly underſtands his own intereſt, but would prefer four hours of good ſleep, before two hours of pleaſure, and two hours of pain, ſuppoſing them equal in degree (108).

(107) Turtull. de Anima.

(108) See Lucret. lib. iii, ver. 913, & ſeq. where he has recourſe to the compariſon of ſleep to confute thoſe who alledge the good which death deprives us of. He alſo very well confutes the other reaſons of thoſe who grieve, that they muſt die.

Let us ſee another paralogiſm of Lucretius. He pretends, that death would not concern us, even tho' ſenſation ſhould remain in the ſeparate parts, or tho' chance ſhould again in time produce a re-union of ſoul and body. His reaſon is, that we are compounded of a ſoul and body; and therefore nothing concerns us, but what belongs to us, as we are this compound. As therefore the ſoul, ſeparate from the body, is not the man, it's ſenſations in that ſtate would not be thoſe of the man; and it would not be true to ſay, that Scipio would be unhappy, under pretence that Scipio's ſoul was unhappy after Scipio's death. I make uſe of this example, though it is not contained in theſe words of Lucretius.

Diſtracta'ſt Animi natura, Animæque poteſtas:
Nil tamen hoc ad nos, qui cœtu, conjugioque
Corporis atque Animæ conſiſtimus uniter apti (109).

(109) Lucret. ubi ſupra, ver. 855. pag. m. 173.

But now ſuppoſe the ſoul, when ſeparate,
Could live, and think, in a divided ſtate:
Yet what is that to us, who are the whole,
A frame compoſ'd of body join'd with ſoul?

CREECH.

He thinks it poſſible, that the ſame atoms a man is compoſed of, and which are diſperſed by death, may take, in time, the ſame ſituation, and produce a man again: but he will not allow, that the events which happen to this new man, ſhould any way concern the former. The interruption of life, adds he, hinders our having any intereſt in what ſhall happen hereafter, in caſe the ages to come ſhould reſtore to us the human nature we had before. The ſtate we were formerly in, is at preſent a thing entirely indifferent to us; and we may ſay the ſame of the ſtates we may arrive to, in the time to come.

A CONFUTATION of Lucretius, as to what he ſays of the ſenſe which might remain after death.

If Lucretius expected to convince of theſe two points of Phyſics, ſuch as know how to go the bottom of a queſtion, he made little uſe of his reaſon. Here is an inſtance that will ſet this matter in a clear light, tho' I ſuppoſe it at pleaſure. Let us fancy to ourſelves a watch, and let us ſuppoſe it to be animated, to be ſenſible, and capable of underſtanding what the maker ſays to it. Let us after this ſuppoſe, that he tells it, he is going to take it to pieces; that he will not leave two wheels of it together; that all the pieces ſhall be ſeparated, and laid each a-part in a box; that the ſenſe ſhall remain, notwithſtanding this diſſolution; and that the ſoul or principle of life ſhall retain it's faculties, as to grief and joy, &c. Is it not certain, on this ſuppoſition, that the watch will intereſt itſelf in theſe ſenſations, which it is told the diſperſion of it's parts will not put an end to? It will be no longer affected as a watch: but it is ſufficient, for it's miſery, that, as a ſenſitive ſubſtance, it ſhall ſtill feel heat, cold, pain, trouble, &c. It will certainly be the ſame ſubſtance, which had been expoſed to theſe evils in the watch; and the evil it ſhall ſuffer after the deſtruction of the compound will only be a continuation of the evil it had ſuffered, whilſt the compound ſubſiſted. Apply this to our ſoul, and you ſhall ſee, that, if it remain ſenſible after our death, it would be moſt true to ſay, that the ſame nature which had ſuffered hunger, and cold, the fever, and ſtone, &c. in a human body, ſuffers other things out of the human body; and that Lucretius's conſolation is chimerical and ridiculous. What ſignifies it, ſays he, if your ſoul be miſerable after your death, you are a man; the ſoul will not be a man in a ſeparate ſtate; and conſequently the miſeries of the ſoul will not belong to you. A ſilly conſequence! It is as if Pythagoras had ſaid to a man, at the point of death, your ſoul ſhall go into the body of an ox; which ſhall be almoſt all it's life yoaked to the plough, and ſuffered to die of hunger when it is old; but that ſuffering will not concern you, ſince an ox is not a man. Would not this be a wonderful comfort? People do not ſufficiently attend to this poſition, that the ſubject of the accidents remains always numerically the ſame, in all the transformations of bodies. The ſame atoms that compoſe water, are in the ice, in the vapours, in the clouds, in the hail, and in the ſnow: thoſe which compoſe the wheat paſs into the meal, the paſte, the bread, the blood, the fleſh, the bones, &c. If they were miſerable under the form of water, and under that of ice, it is the ſame numerical ſubſtance, that is to be pitied in both theſe eſtates; conſequently all the diſaſters that are to be feared, under the form of meal, concern the atoms which compoſe the wheat: and nothing ought ſo much to intereſt itſelf about the lot and condition of the meal as the atoms of wheat, though they are not to ſuffer in the ſtate and compoſition of wheat.

A CONFUTATION of Lucretius, as to what he ſays concerning the production of the ſame man

Let us now confute another fallacy of Lucretius, and reſume the example of a watch. If the watchmaker ſhould ſay to it, I will keep your parts diſperſed for three or four years, but at that period of time I will re-join them, and make you up again. During the ſeparation, no part ſhall feel any pain; they ſhall all be in a perfect ſleep, but as ſoon as they are reſtored to their former ſituation, their labour, their conſtraint, and ſtate of ſuffering, ſhall return. Would not a watch, that ſhould give credit to theſe words, be fully perſuaded, that itſelf and no other ſhould be the watch, that he would put in order again at three or four years end? It would have the greateſt reaſon in the world to believe it, and to intereſt itſelf in this new watch's fate and deſtiny, as it's own. And yet it's firſt life would have been interrupted. Let us ſay then, that Lucretius too lightly examined this matter, when he affirmed, that death putting a long interval between the firſt and ſecond life of the ſame atoms of a human body, would cauſe this firſt and ſecond life to belong to different men. I know indeed, that, though we ſuppoſe this kind of reſurrection, yet we might ſay, that the miſeries we had ſuffered at Rome in Marius and Sylla's time, do not at all contribute to our preſent fortune. A total oblivion ſeparates us from thoſe times; nevertheleſs we ſhould have been thoſe miſerable perſons: and we ſhould be the ſame men, who had formerly undergone ſo many misfortunes: from whence it reſults, that if we ſhould return again into the world a thouſand years hence, all the miſeries we were to ſuffer in that new life would properly belong to us; and the certain knowledge of ſuch a futurity muſt neceſſarily give us a diſturbance. Lucretius therefore has not reaſoned juſtly. There are but two ways a man can take to calm, in a reaſonable manner, the fears of another life. One is to promiſe the happineſs of heaven; the other is to promiſe a privation of all kind of ſenſe. Note, that the Spinoziſts had no pretence to either of theſe two conſolations. All their refuge conſiſts in preparing themſelves for a perpetual and infinite circulation of forms, ever accompanied with thought, but without knowing whether they ſhall be more happy or more miſerable than under the human form.

[R] They who pretended that he could not ſay this without contradicting himſelf, have . . . . not well conſidered his opinion.] Lactantius charges this contradiction upon him, and imagines, that the force of truth overpowered him, and inſinuated itſelf into his ſoul without being perceived. 'Denique idem Lucretius oblitus quid aſſereret, & quod dogma defenderet, hos 'verſus poſuit;

In terram, ſed quod miſſum eſt ex ætheris oris
Id rurſus Cœli fulgentia templa receptant.

'Quod ejus non erat dicere, qui perire animas cum 'corporibus diſſerebat; ſed victus eſt veritate, & imprudenti ratio vera ſurrepſit (111). —— In fine, Lucretius forgetting what he had aſſerted, and what doctrines he hath defended, hath left us theſe verſes;

Whatever is from the earth's entrails born,
Doth ſoon, or late, unto that earth return,
But what deſcends from the etherial ſkies,
From earth releas'd, to heav'n again will riſe.

'Which ſurely was not fit for him to ſay, who had maintained that the ſouls periſhed with the bodies; but he was overcome by truth, and theſe words eſcaped him unawares.' A Dominican, who has lately written concerning the Chineſe idolatry, perfectly approves this obſervation of Lactantius, and makes uſe of it to corroborate his proofs againſt the Jeſuits (112). 'It would be no wonder that the Chineſe ſhould contradict themſelves, ſince Lucretius, one of the learnedeſt Philoſophers of the Epicurean ſect, who durſt openly attack the doctrine of the ſoul's immortality, confeſſed, notwithſtanding, that if it diſperſed itſelf after death, it was becauſe the groſſer parts were loſt in the earth, and the more ſubtil and cœleſtial parts re-aſcended into the third region of the air, or into heaven. Thus, ſays Lactantius, he fell into a manifeſt contradiction upon the ſubject of the ſoul . . . . (113). The notion of the learned of China, upon this point, perfectly reſembles that of Lucretius, and they explain themſelves much as he did. This Philoſopher maintains, that the ſoul periſhes with the body: nevertheleſs he confeſſes, that it's ſubtileſt parts aſcend and re-unite in heaven, from whence they came. He contradicts himſelf, though he was a very ingenious man: and you object to us *, as a great abſurdity, that the Chineſe who are a people of a very mean underſtanding, without ſubtilty, penetration, and almoſt without principles, as you declare in your Memoirs, ſhould contradict themſelves, if they believed, that the pictures of the dead were the ſeats of their ſouls.' If the contradiction of the Chineſe be no groſſer than that which Lucretius is accuſed of, the adverſaries of the Jeſuits will get little by it; for it is certain Lactantius had no reaſon to believe, that Lucretius contradicted himſelf. See the verſes I have cited in the remark [G] of the article JUPITER (114). They immediately precede thoſe recited by Lactantius, and ſignify no more than this, that the objection would have given him no trouble: he would have been infinitely harder put to it, to maintain the attributes of his gods [S]. For he himſelf furniſhes arms to thoſe who

the earth, impregnated with atoms which fall from heaven along with the rain, produces plants, and beaſts, and men. Lucretius would prove in this place, that two kinds of inſenſible matter may compoſe one entire ſenſible being. The earth is inſenſible, the ſeeds it receives into it's boſom, and which drop from heaven, are inſenſible; and yet the earth, impregnated by thoſe ſeeds, produces and nouriſhes bodies that have life and ſenſe. Death diſunites the parts of theſe bodies, but deſtroys nothing of their ſubſtance. Thoſe that the earth ſupplied are reſtored to the earth; and thoſe which deſcended from the region of the æther aſcend thither again. This manifeſtly means, that the ſubtil parts which compoſe the ſoul, according to Epicurus's ſyſtem, evaporate, and exhale, when the man dies, and diſperſe themſelves in the air, juſt as we ſee bodies do in the chymical analyſis of compounds, when the ſpirituous parts gain the top, and the earthy remain at the bottom of the veſſel. Lucretius does not pretend, as the Dominican ſuppoſes that the parts of the ſoul, go, and reunite in heaven from whence they came; ſo as to perſevere in a ſtate of a ſoul, and a thinking ſubſtance. He ſuppoſes them diſſipated, and inſenſible, as they were before the life of the animal (115); and therefore does not believe, that the ſoul, as a ſoul, ſurvives the man: there is therefore no contradiction in his doctrine, and he cannot be alledged for an example of the contradictions which the Chineſe would fall into, if they affirmed, on one hand, that the ſoul is nothing but the ſubtileſt parts of thi-kie or matter; and pretended on the other, that it deſcends into the pictures of the dead from the uppermoſt region of the air, where it had reaſcended (116).

[S] He would have been infinitely harder put to it, to maintain the attributes of his gods.] A perfect tranquillity, and compleat happineſs, were the principal qualities which he attributed to the gods (117). He maintained, on the other hand, that the nature of things contained nothing but vacuum and body;

Conſiſtit rebus; nam corpora ſunt, & inane (118).

This All conſiſts of body and of ſpace,
That moves, and this affords the motion place.

He aſſigns his reaſons and then concludes,

Ergo præter Inane, & Corpora, tertia per ſe
Nulla poteſt rerum in numero natura relinqui;
Nec, quæ ſub ſenſus cadat ullo tempore noſtros,
Nec, ratione animi quam quiſquam poſſit apiſci.
Nam, quæcunque cluent, aut his conjuncta duabus
Rebus ea invenies: aut horum eventa videbis (119).

Well then a different third in vain is ſought,
And not to be diſcover'd by ſenſe, or thought,
For whatſo'er may ſeem of more degrees,
Are the events, or properties of theſe.
While to explain we call thoſe properties,
Which never part except the ſubject dies;
Body and ſpace make up this mighty frame,
And all we ſee is but made up of them.

CREECH.

Without an extraordinary penetration one may eaſily perceive, that theſe two doctrines of Lucretius are inconſiſtent. I might therefore have diſcovered the difficulty, which we ſhall ſee by and by; but I had not the leiſure to conſider it; I have found it, ready to my hand, in a book of the Sieur Cotin, before I had conſidered this ſubject. And, as it is but juſt to give every one his due, I ſhall make uſe of the words of this writer. The gods ‘have bodies, or ſomething like bodies, ſince beſides vacuum and body, and what reſults from their union, we cannot ſo much as conceive any other nature. This Epicurus poſitively teaches; ſays the interpreter of this Philoſopher, who alſo believes, that, if the ſoul were incorporeal, it could neither do nor ſuffer any thing. What felicity then would the gods have, if they were incorporeal (120)? . . . . . Their bodies are compoſed of atoms . . . . and there is a vacuum betwixt the parts which compoſe theſe divine bodies . . . . . ſince vacuum and atoms are the principles of all things. Every body . . . . may be reſolved into the parts which compoſe it; and the heap of atoms . . . . cannot eternally ſubſiſt in the ſame manner; they are too volatile, and moveable to remain always at reſt (121).’ Cotin inſers from all this, ‘that Epicurus's gods, though diſcharged from human affairs, are not ſo happy and quiet as he imagines: they are not without apprehenſion and fear of the laſt ſeparation of atoms, which being once diſperſed thro' the vacuum, will never unite again. Thus, ſays this Philoſopher, the particles which compoſe the ſoul being once diſperſed, can never reunite throughout all ages: otherwiſe we might be, after we had ceaſed to be; that is to ſay, the reſurrection would be naturally poſſible. An hypotheſis, however, which may be inferred from Epicuriſm (122): for why may not the ſame chance, which had once united the little bodies, that compoſed Pythocles and Metrodorus, be able to re-unite them once again? . . . . . Beſides . . . . . the Epicurean gods having ſettled their manſions amidſt thoſe innumerable worlds, which overthrow one another, and make a dreadful craſh, how can they bear, without extream diſturbance, ſo many ponderous maſſes falling round about them, and perhaps upon their heads? For chance knows them not, and conſequently can pay them no reſpect (123).’ Note, that this writer obſerves (124), that moſt of the Epicureans have ſaid, that the gods . . . are not compoſed of atoms. What I offer hereupon may be ſeen in the remark [F] of the article EPICURUS (125). They perceived, that eternal felicity, which they attributed to the gods, was not conſiſtent with the contexture of atoms. It was neceſſary therefore to give them another nature; but hereby they ruined the fundamental article of their ſyſtem, that capital principle which is the baſis of their Phyſics, viz. that atoms and vacuum are the principles of all things. I do not think Lucretius could ever get clear of this difficulty. He muſt either have given up the bleſſed eternity of his deities, or his two principles, for it is not poſſible to retain both theſe doctrines at the ſame time. Hence we may judge, that the hypotheſis of the exiſtence of the gods; which is the richeſt jewel in the ſyſtem of Anaxagoras, and ſome other Philoſophers, and the nobleſt and moſt excellent piece of the whole machine, is the weakeſt part of the Epicurean ſyſtem. Their founder, having delivered himſelf from all fear, with reſpect to the divine juſtice, found himſelf, in other reſpects, more embaraſſed with his gods, than if he had aſcribed to them a providence. He durſt not deny their exiſtence, and yet he knew not what to do with them, or where to place them. Whatever he could ſay of them, made a breach in his ſyſtem, and expoſed him to invincible objections. See how Cicero has turned him into ridicule, as well upon the ſubtilty of the bodies of the gods (126), as their human ſhape (127), &c.

This All conſiſts of body and of ſpace.

WHETHER Epicurus owned a Providence.

The Sieur Cotin taxes him with a palpable contradiction, with reſpect to divine providence. ‘What will you ſay, if I ſhew you, by a preciſe and formal paſſage of Epicurus, that he not only believed a Deity, but alſo owned his providence? . . . . . This paſſage is in his epiſtle to Meneceus *; it is certain there are gods: but we muſt have a care of attributing to God, mark this, who is an immortal and moſt happy being, any quality repugnant to his immutable felicity. No, he is not impious, who does not believe that croud of gods, which the greateſt part of men imagine and never ſaw, but he who believes things too mean and unworthy of them. The gods ſend to theſe prophane wretches, who diſhonour them by their falſe opinions, innumerable calamities; and, on the contrary, heap their benefits upon the wiſe and good. The reaſon whereof is, becauſe they love their like, and think that what is not agreeable to virtue, is not agreeable to their nature. Seneca, Epictetus, and Plato, could not who would attack them; and in this, his ſyſtem does not appear to be the production of a man who can reaſon conſiſtently.

‘ ſpeak more divinely. Epicurus, thou, at the bottom of thy ſoul, art religious, becauſe nature cannot wholly deny itſelf: the misfortune is, that thou canſt not ſay what thou ſayeſt, without contradicting thyſelf (128).’ Here you ſee a flight and a moral reflexion, which the author would have placed better, if he had brought them into one of his ſermons. But wherever he had placed them, they would have been ill grounded; for it is not true that Epicurus ever wrote to Meneceus, what Cotin attributes to him. Let us ſee the Greek words, with the learned Gaſſendus's Latin tranſlation, which will clearly ſhew, that Epicurus's notion is as remote from Cotin's ſenſe, as heaven from earth. Ἀσεβὴς δὲ οὐχ᾽ ὁ τοὺς τῶν πολλῶν Θεοὺς ἀναιρῶν, ἀλλ᾽ ὁ τὰς τῶν πολλῶν δόξας Θεοῖς προσάπτων. Οὐ γὰρ προλήψεις εἰσὶν, ἀλλ᾽ ὑπολήψεις ψευδεῖς αἱ τῶν πολλῶν ὑπὲρ Θεῶν ἀποφάσεις. Ἔνθεν καὶ μεγίστας βλάβας οἴονται, τοῖς κακοῖς ἐκ Θεῶν ἐπάγεσθαι, καὶ ὠφελείας τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς. Ταῖς γὰρ ἰδίαις οἰκειούμενοι διὰ παντὸς τοὺς ὁμοίους ἀποδέχονται, πᾶν τὸ μὴ τοιοῦτον, ὡς ἀλλότριον νομίζοντες. Impius eſt proinde, non is, qui vulgareis multitudinis Deos tollit; ſed is, qui multitudinis opiniones Diis adhibet. Non enim germanæ prænotiones ſunt, ſed ſuſpiciones falſæ, ea, quæ de Diis ab hominibus è vulgo traduntur. Arbitrantur quippe & malis detrimenta maxima; & bonis præſidia à Diis advenire: ſiquidem propriis virtutibus, ſeu affectibus innutriti, ſimileis ſui Deos admittunt, & quicquid affectuum ſuorum non eſt, id exiſtimant ab ipſis alienum (129). —— He therefore is not impious who denies the gods of the vulgar, but he who attributes the notions of the vulgar to the gods. For the ſentiments of the vulgar concerning the gods, are not true and certain, but falſe and ſuppoſititious only; for they imagine, that great misfortunes befall the wicked; and bleſſings are beſtowed upon good men, by the direction of the gods, aſcribing to them their own paſſions and inclinations, and excluding from them, whatever they feel not in themſelves.

However, this contradiction does not concern Lucretius; and, if I have mentioned it, it is only to ſhew the beſt and the worſt ſide of his cenſure.

LUGO (FRANCIS DE) elder brother to the cardinal of that name, of whom I ſpeak below, was born at Madrid in 1580, and became a Jeſuit at Salamanca in 1600. He took ſo much pleaſure in humbling himſelf, that, after having taught Philoſophy, he begged of his ſuperiors the employ of explaining the rudiments of Grammar, and obtained it. Having afterwards taught Divinity, he deſired he might be ſent to the Indies, to teach the Infidels their Catechiſm and Grammar. But they employed him to to higher purpoſes: they gave him a profeſſorſhip of Divinity in the cities of Mexico and Santa Fe. Finding that the employment given him in this country did not agree with that humility in which he deſigned to live, he deſired to be re-called to Spain. In his return he loſt the greateſt part of his commentaries upon Thomas Aquinas's Summa Theologica [A]. He was deputed to Rome by the province of Caſtile, to aſſiſt at the eighth general aſſembly of the Jeſuits, and ſtayed there after the breaking up of this aſſembly to exerciſe two offices, viz. that of cenſor to the books publiſhed by the Jeſuits, and that of Theologiſt to the general: but finding his reputation encreaſe daily, after his brother was made a cardinal, he returned into Spain, where he was choſen rector of two colleges. He died the ſeventeenth of December 1652 (a). He is the author of ſeveral books [B]. LUGO (JOHN DE) a Spaniſh Jeſuit and cardinal, was born at Madrid the twenty fifth of November 1583; but he always wrote himſelf of Seville, becauſe his father kept his ordinary reſidence there [A]. He diſcovered his parts when he was but three years old, for he could read printed books and manuſcripts. He maintained ſome theſes at fourteen, and was ſent ſoon after to Salamanca to ſtudy the Civil-law, in imitation of his elder brother, and notwithſtanding the oppoſitions of his father, he became a Jeſuit the ſixth of July 1603. He finiſhed his courſe of Philoſophy with the Jeſuits at Pampelona, and ſtudied Divinity at Salamanca. After the death of his father, he

[A] Becauſe his father kept his ordinary reſidence at Seville.] He had a very honourable employment there: I would name it, if I knew how it is called in Spaniſh (1): but not knowing it, I ſhall uſe the Latin words of Don Nicolas Antonio (2). Joannes de Lugo, Joannis filius civis & Jurati (quomodo ſecundi ſubſellii decuriones vocant) Hiſpalenſis. The ſtates of the kingdom being called to Madrid, he aſſiſted there as deputy of his country (3): he married in the ſame city Tereſa de Quiroga, and had the ſon by her, who is the ſubject of this article (4). This ſon might have been more rightly ſirnamed Hiſpalenſis, than Madritenſis; for when a woman lyes-in, in a journey, it is not uſual to make that the child's birth-place where he is born, but where his parents live. This is the caſe of children of embaſſadors, born in the places of their embaſſy. They are reckoned natives of the places where their father would reſide, were they not embaſſadors: and becauſe they are abſent upon public affairs, Republicæ Cauſa, their children have the ſame priviledges as thoſe who are born at home. Thus it was with cardinal de Lugo's father; he only reſided at Madrid, as deputy of Seville to the aſſembly of the States of the kingdom.

(1) I believe thoſe who enjoy this employment are called Jurados, as the conſuls of Bourdeaux are called Jurats; but theſe conſuls are choſen every year.

he was ſent by his ſuperiors to Seville, to take poſſeſſion of his patrimony which was very conſiderable. He divided it with his brother's conſent betwixt the Jeſuits of Seville and thoſe of Salamanca. He taught Philoſophy for five years (a), and afterwards was made profeſſor of Divinity at Valladolid. The ſucceſs with which he diſcharged this employment, made him eſteemed worthy of a more eminent chair: accordingly in the fifth year of his profeſſorſhip he received orders to go to Rome, to teach Divinity there. He ſet out in March 1621; and, having eſcaped ſeveral dangers in croſſing the provinces of France, he arrived at Rome in the beginning of June the ſame year. He profeſſed Divinity there twenty years, with a great reputation; for he thoroughly underſtood ſchool Divinity: He made a good choice (b) of the opinions he defended, and was admirable for joining brevity with perſpicuity. He minded only his own buſineſs, without loſing time in making his court to the cardinals, or frequenting ambaſſadors houſes. He never affected to be an author, but having received a command to publiſh ſome of his works, his vow of obedience did not permit him to diſpenſe with it. He printed ſeven large volumes in folio [B]; the fourth of which he dedicated to Urban VIII. This Pope made him a cardinal the fourteenth of December 1643. Some very ſingular things are related, which ſhow how free from ambition this Jeſuit was [C]. While he was cardinal, he ſhewed himſelf very charitable to the poor: he liberally diſtributed the bark to ſuch as were afflicted with agues [D]. He died the twentieth of Auguſt 1660, leaving all his eſtate to the Jeſuits of the profeſſed college at Rome, and would be buried at the feet of Ignatius Loyola, the founder of the order (c). He invented the hypotheſis of turgid points [E], to ſolve the unſurmountable objections, both againſt the diviſibility of parts ad infinitum, and againſt Mathematical points. A fragment of one

[B] He printed ſeven large volumes in folio.] The firſt treats de Incarnatione Dominica, and was printed at Lyons, in 1633, and 1653. The ſecond, de Sacramentis in genere & de ven. Euchariſtiæ ſacramento & ſacrificio, at Lyons, 1636. The third, de Virtute & Sacramento Pœnitentiæ, at Lyons, 1638, 1644, and 1651. The fourth, and fifth, de Juſtitia & Jure, at Lyons, 1642, and 1652. The ſixth, de Virtute Divinæ fidei, at Lyons, 1646, and 1656. The ſeventh is a collection Reſponſorum Moralium, at Lyons, 1651, and 1660. Beſides this, he wrote notes, in privilegia vivæ vocis oraculo conceſſa ſocietati, printed at Rome, in 1645, in 12mo; and he tranſlated the Life of the bleſſed Lewis de Gonzaga out of Italian into Spaniſh (5). The fourth of theſe volumes was dedicated to Pope Urban VIII. The author hereupon was obliged to go and pay his reſpects to this Pope, to whom he had never ſpoke (6). He was favourably received by him; and from that time Urban employed him on ſeveral occaſions, and expreſſed a particular affection for him. De Lugo ſeeing himſelf obliged to be an author, employed no amanuenſis, or any other perſon, to fit his manuſcripts for the preſs. He himſelf underwent all this great labour (7). Father Maimbourg has made uſe of a thought of this cardinal; which the reader will perhaps be glad to find here, and may give him ſome notion of the principles of this Spaniſh doctor. 'The church, ſays Father Maimbourg (8), 'has not yet thought it neceſſary to determine any 'thing concerning the immaculate conception of the Holy Virgin. It has not uſed this method concerning her exemption from venial ſin, having decided 'that point as being an appurtenance of faith . . . . . 'She has ſearched the ſcriptures and apoſtolical tradition, and the ſenſe of the holy fathers, upon the quality of the mother of God, to diſcover the whole extent of it. And † as afterwards ſhe found the exemption from venial ſin to be comprized in this ſupreme dignity, as a neceſſary conſequence in it's 'principle, ſhe has defined it as a point of faith ⸸, 'revealed in the word of God, which contains it. 'This is the remark of the learned and ſubtle cardinal 'de Lugo ‡, in his excellent treatiſe concerning faith, 'which I had the honour to receive from him at Rome, 'when I was his diſciple.'

[C] Some very ſingular things are related, which ſhew how free from ambition this Jeſuit was.] He was created a cardinal without his knowledge, or the leaſt thought that the Pope had any ſuch deſign. Hearing the news of his creation, he was almoſt confounded; and did not give the meſſenger, who brought the news, the preſent due to him on ſuch occaſions: the reaſon he gave for it was, that this news was diſagreeable to him; and he would not ſuffer the college of Jeſuits to give any teſtimony of joy, or play-days to the ſcholars. He looked on the coach, that cardinal Francis Barberini ſent him, as if it had been his coffin; and, when he was in the Pope's palace, he declared to the officers, who were preparing to put on his cardinal's robes, that he firſt deſired to repreſent to his Holineſs, that the vows he made, as a Jeſuit, forbad him to accept the cardinal's cap. He was anſwered, that the Pope diſpenſed with thoſe vows: Diſpenſations, replied he, leave a man to his natural liberty, which if I am permitted to enjoy, I ſhall always refuſe the cardinalſhip. They were therefore obliged to introduce him to the Pope: to whom he told his reaſons, and asked him, whether his Holineſs commanded him, in virtue of holy obedience, to accept this dignity: the Pope anſwered he did; whereupon de Lugo humbly acquieſced, and ſtooped to receive the hat. The purple did not hinder his retaining a Jeſuit conſtantly near him, as a perpetual witneſs of his actions: he continued to dreſs and undreſs himſelf, without the aſſiſtance of any of his domeſtics. He would have no tapeſtries in his palace; and he ſettled ſuch regular orders in it, that it was a kind of ſeminary. This is a good part of Father Southwell's account (9): every one may believe of it what he pleaſes.

[D] He liberally diſtributed the bark to ſuch as were afflicted with agues.] This febrifuge came from Peru. It was brought to Rome in 1650, by the Jeſuits; from whence it is called in ſome places Jeſuits Powder. There was an attempt to diſcredit it, which made Father Fabri publiſh a book at Rome, in the year 1655, intituled, Pulvis Peruvinus Febrifugus vindicatus (10). This powder was then very dear, as Southwell affirms. By this he heightens the cardinal's charity. Quibuſque (pauperibus) corticem Peruanum non levis pretii contra febres benigne & liberaliter diſtribuebat (11). It is obſerved, in Furetiere's Dictionary, at the word Quinquina, that this febrifuge was called at firſt, cardinal de Lugo's powder.

[E] He invented the hypotheſis of turgid points.] To ſpeak more exactly, I think it ought to be ſaid, that finding this hypotheſis almoſt dropped, he adopted it, and brought it into credit. It does not remedy the difficulties that are propoſed againſt Mathematical points: and beſides it manifeſtly includes an incomprehenſible abſurdity; which is, that a corpuſcle, which in itſelf has neither parts nor extenſion, ſhould ſwell at ſuch a rate, as to fill ſeveral parts of ſpace. The ordinary doctrine of the ſchool-men, concerning rarefaction, gave occaſion to John de Lugo to evade the great inconveniencies of this ſtrange abſurdity. The ſchool-men teach, that a rarefied body takes up more ſpace than it did before, without acquiring any new parts of matter; the ſame body, ſay they, ſometimes fills a greater ſpace, and ſometimes a leſſer: but as this doctrine is abſolutely incomprehenſible, and contradictory, it could be but of very ſmall advantage to this Jeſuit. See how Arriaga confutes him without naming him (12).

one of his letters has diſcovered a pretty curious myſtery [F]; which is, that there is ſometimes a nice piece of policy in the devotion to the holy Virgin.

[F] A fragment of one of his letters has diſcovered a pretty curious myſtery.] The Jeſuits teach the immaculate conception not out of piety, but out of hatred to the Dominicans, and to render them odious to the people. The cardinal du Lugo, a Jeſuit, wrote this letter to one of their fathers at Madrid. 'I deſire your reverence may be pleaſed to take care, that your ſociety diligently apply themſelves in your quarters, to enforce the devotion of the conception, for which the people of Spain, have a great affection, to ſee if, by that means, we can give a diverſion to the Dominicans, who preſs us hard here in defending St Auguſtin: and, I believe, if we cannot oblige them to employ themſelves upon ſome other ſubject, they will overcome us in the principal points de auxiliis (13).

[G] He is ſaid to be the firſt author of the diſcovery of the philoſophical ſin.] See the book intituled, The Philoſophiſm of the Jeſuits of Marſeilles, there you will find the following words (14). That which embaraſſes de Lugo, 'in admitting actual ſins purely philoſophical in a ſavage, at leaſt during the ſhort time in which he ſuppoſes and maintains, that he may be inculpably ignorant of God, is, that this ſavage may poſſibly die, within this ſmall time, in his philoſophical ſins; and that he does not know what God may think fit to do with, nor what judgment he may paſs upon ſuch a ſinner, nor in what rank he may place, him for eternity. Some other Jeſuits ſend him to the limbo of ſtill born infants after a temporal puniſhment, proportioned to the philoſophical ſin, of what nature ſoever it be, whether parricide, inceſt, &c. But de Lugo chuſes rather to eſtabliſh a new order of providence.... In this new order *, God, rather than baniſh out of this world the philoſophical ſin, which is ſo neceſſary in it, and not to be embaraſſed what to do in the next, with this ſort of ſinners, will work a miracle rather than let them die in this ſtate. He will give them, before they leave this world, as much knowledge of the true God, as ſhall be neceſſary to qualify them for ſinning theologically, or at leaſt as muſt light as may be neceſſary to create a doubt in their minds that there may be a God, and wait and prolong their life till they have committed, with this knowledge or under this doubt, ſome ſin which he may proceed againſt as a mortal ſin, and puniſh it eternally in hell; for that doubt alone which he would neglect to remove would render his ſin eternally puniſhable, becauſe, that, by ſinning in this ſtate, he would expoſe himſelf to the danger of offending him, who is the author of his being. The thought is wholly new, and worthy of him, who appears to be the firſt Jeſuit, who made the diſcovery of the philoſophical ſin.' We may, eaſily perceive, that the author, who thus ſets forth the doctrine of this Jeſuit, mixes ſome touches of raillery in what he ſays: but after all, it is not ſtrange, that a doctor ſhould be embaraſſed, when he endeavours to reconcile the eternal damnation of man with the natural ideas, which clearly diſcover to us, that, in order to an action's having a character of morality, it is indiſpenſably neceſſary, that a perſon, committing this action, know whether it be good or bad, or be ignorant of it through his own fault. It is an eaſy matter to ſtumble in ſuch way, ſince we can hardly avoid making ſome falſe ſteps, even when we propoſe to acquit the judgments of God, of whatever ſeemingly makes them appear leſs equitable The ſuppoſition of our de Lugo does not tend to diminiſh the number of the damned, but to render them more notoriouſly to deſerve damnation.

LUPERCALIA, a feaſt celebrated by the Romans, on the fifteenth of February. Romulus was not the inventer of it (a), but Evander, who introduced it into Italy (b), whither he retired ſixty years before the Trojan war. As Pan was the great Divinity of Arcadia, Evander, a native of that country appointed the feaſt of the Lupercalia in honour of this god (c), to be celebrated in the place where he built houſes for the colony he brought with him; that is, upon the Palatin Mount. He there built a temple (d) to the god Pan; and ordained a ſolemn feaſt, which was celebrated by ſacrifices offered to that god; and by the races of naked people, with whips in their hands, wherewith they laſhed all they met in their way. Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus cites Ælius Tubero, whoſe exactneſs he commends. He cites him I ſay, to ſhew, that this feaſt was celebrated, according to Evander's inſtitution, before Romulus and Remus thought of building Rome. But, as it was pretended, that they were nurſed by a wolf, in the very place which Evander had conſecrated to the god Pan, no doubt this determined Romulus to continue the feaſt of the Lupercalia, and to render it more famous. The LUPERCI (which was the name of the prieſts, who officiated in this particular worſhip of Pan) were divided into two ſocieties; one of which bore the name of Quintilii, the other that of Fabii (e), to perpetuate, as is ſaid, the memory of one Quintilius and of one Fabius, who had been the heads, the one of the party of Romulus, and the other of the party of Remus. A long time after was added to them the college or ſociety of Julii, in honour of Julius Cæſar (f). Marc Antony entered himſelf into this ſociety [A]. Though the celebration of the Lupercalia ſerved only to diſgrace religion, yet Auguſtus perceiving, that it had been diſcontinued for ſome years, gave orders for the re-eſtabliſhing

[A] Marc Antony entered himſelf to this ſociety.] Cicero, in the ſecond Philippic, tells him, 'Ita eras Lupercus, ut te conſulem eſſe meminiſſe deberes. Though you were one of the Luperci, you ought alſo to remember you was a conſul.' Whence we may reaſonably conclude, that he was one of the Julii Luperci; for ſo great a flatterer of Julius Cæſar, as he, would have been far from entering into either of the two antient ſocieties, whilſt there was a new one eſtabliſhed in honour of Julius Cæſar. But, without drawing inferences, we find the fact clearly in Cicero's oration againſt Marc Antony, as Dion Caſſius relates it (1). Τὰ γὰρ λυκαῖα ἦν καὶ ἐπὶ τȣ͂ ἑταιρικȣ͂ τȣ͂ Ἰȣλίȣ ἐτέτακτο; that is, according to Xilander's tranſlation, Nimirum agenda ei erant Lupercalia uni ex Collegio Julio. Father Abram (2) has tranſlated this Greek more exactly, thus, Lupercalia enim erant, & ipſe in ſodalitate Julia erat conſtitutus. —— It was in the time of the Lupercalia, and he was one of the ſociety of the Julii. After Julius Cæſar's death, the revenues were taken away from the Luperci, which he had beſtowed upon them. Marc Anthony complains of it, in his letter to Hirtius and Octavius, which is ſo exactly confuted by Cicero in the thirteenth Philippic. Manutius reading thus the paſſage, Vectigalia Juliana Lupercis ademiſtis, is in pain (3) to know whether Cæſar's liberality extended to all the colleges of the Luperci, or only to that which was conſecrated to himſelf; but Father Abram (4) is in no doubt, ſince he follows this reading, Vectigalia Julianis Lupercis ademiſtis. — You have deprived the Julii Luperci of their income. See Nonius's (5) citation of Cicero's letter to the young Cæſar.

This is infinitely leſs ſtrange, than to ſee it continued under Chriſtian emperors, and to find, that when, at laſt, Pope Gelaſus, in the year 496, would tolerate it no longer (h), there were Chriſtians found amongſt the ſenators themſelves, who endeavoured to maintain it, as appears by the apology which the Pope writ againſt them (i). [B] Auguſtus . . . . gave orders for the re-eſtabliſhing it.] Moreri makes Suetonius ſay, that Auguſtus reſtored the three ſocieties of the Luperci. This ſuppoſes they had been all ſuppreſſed, but Suetonius has no ſuch thing: He only ſays, that Auguſtus re-eſtabliſhed the Lupercalian ceremonies, ſacrum Lupercale, which had been by degrees aboliſhed. How many eccleſiaſtical or civil cuſtoms are there, which fall inſenſibly into diſuſe, though the bodies or ſocieties, which ought to practiſe them, ſubſiſt with all their incomes? does not Cicero ſay ſomewhere (6), that the ancient cuſtom of the auſpices was hardly any longer obſerved? And yet the colleges of the augurs, pontiffs, &c. ſubſiſted as before.

[C] And even ſome of the principal magiſtrates.] This we learn from Plutarch: Διαθέουσι δὲ, ſays he (7), τῶν εὐγενῶν νέοι πολλοὶ καὶ τῶν ἀρχόντων. Diſcurrunt autem & ex nobilibus juvenes multi & ex Magiſtratibus. —— Some noble young men, ran as well as ſome magiſtrates. He ſays the ſame in another place (8), and uſes the word, ἀρχόντων, they who tranſlate it, thoſe who are the chief magiſtrates for that year, or who are then in the magiſtracy, are, in my opinion, not amiſs: for a parentheſis, which Plutarch uſes in another place (9), clearly ſhews, that he believed the conſuls were obliged to run naked with the Luperci. Ἀντώνιος δὲ τῶν θεόντων τὸν ἱερὸν δρόμον εἷς ἦν (καὶ γὰρ ὑπάτευεν). Antonius autem unus eorum erat qui ſacrum curſum peragebant (gerebat enim Conſulatum). —— Antony was one that ran the ſacred race, for he was then conſul. But it is very probable, that Plutarch impoſes upon his readers; for if 'the cuſtom was ſuch (I will ſet down 'his own words (10) as they are in our Engliſh tran'ſlation) that on this day, there were many young 'noblemen, and even thoſe who were the principal 'magiſtrates that year, who ran ſtark naked through the 'city, anointed with oil of olives, &c. If (11) An'tony was one of thoſe that ran this ſacred race '(of the Lupercalia) as being then conſul,' how is it that Cicero ventured to ſay, in a full ſenate (12), that, from the foundation of Rome, not only no conſul, but no prætor, no tribune of the people, no ædile, ever did what Mark Antony ventured to do? Now what was that action of his? It was this, that, being conſul, he went naked, and anointed, to the public place, under pretence of the Lupercalia, got into the pulpit, and harangued the people. Marc Antony endeavoured to juſtify this conduct by his being Lupercus: but he was anſwered, that the quality of conſul, which he then bore, ought to take place of that of Lupercus; and that every body knew, that the conſulſhip was a dignity of the whole people, whoſe majeſty ought ever to be preſerved, and not expoſed or rendered contemptible in any reſpect whatſoever. Let no body tell me, that Cicero does not blame this conſul, for his haranguing the people naked; for beſides, that the contrary appears from the citations before-mentioned, we muſt know that Cicero made uſe of a figure, which manifeſtly contains this maxim, The Lupercalia might be celebrated according to all the ceremonies belonging to them, without the conſul's diſhonouring the whole city, by his nakedneſs, and by his poſtures. It is certain therefore, that Plutarch is miſtaken. For Cicero, more worthy of credit than he, in what concerns the dignity of the conſulſhip, takes it for granted, that the Lupercalian races were inconſiſtent with this dignity; and that never any conſul, or any of the principal magiſtrates of Rome, were concerned in them before Marc Antony; but Plutarch pretends, that the conſul, and the other magiſtrates, were always concerned in them.

Who would not be ſurprized to find Father Abram (13) draw this conſequence from the principles and reaſoning of Cicero, that one and the ſame perſon at the ſame time was to be conſul and Lupercus; unum & eundem & conſulem & Lupercum fieri debuiſſe. It was eaſy for him to confute this conſequence by the words in which Plutarch affirms, as we have already ſeen, that the young Roman nobility and magiſtrates ran the races in the Lupercalia. He adds, in confirmation, the paſſage of the ſame hiſtorian, in which it is ſaid, that becauſe Marc Anthony was conſul, he was one of theſe runners; and thence concludes that Plutarch would inſinuate, that they who were not magiſtrates were excluded from theſe races. A man would almoſt adviſe the renouncing ſtudy when he ſees learned men entangle themſelves in ſuch abſurdities, upon things as clear as the ſun. Abram ought at leaſt to have refuted Plutarch, by the long paſſage of Dion, which he has partly cited, and partly referred to.

Britannicus (14) affirms, that it was lawful for all, whether men or women, to celebrate this feaſt: whence Plutarch writes, that Marc Antony, in celebrating it, was carried along the ſtreets ſtark naked in a coach, by women and maids ſtark naked (15). This commentator has but ill expreſſed his own meaning; for how could a man, that was carried by women, ride in a coach through the city? But this is not the worſt of it; it is hardly to be doubted, but he has erroneouſly fathered this upon Plutarch; and that at bottom, it is falſe. Were it true, Cicero's Philippics, which do not mention it, would, doubtleſs, have thundered againſt Antony.

[D] Anointed with oil of olives.] I have followed the tranſlation of Xylander. Others tranſlate Plutarch's Greek, ἀλειλημμένοι λίπα, by unguento delibuti, -- beſmeared with ointment. The difference is ſmall; Cicero (16) ſpeaking of the Lupercalia of Marc Antony, makes uſe of the words unguentis oblitus. Dion mentioning the oration of Cicero againſt Marc Antony, uſes twice on the ſame ſubject of the Lupercalia the word μεμυρισμένος, unguentis delibutus. Lloyd fancies he ſays a thing but little known, when he tells us, that he had learnt from a paſſage of Appian, that the Luperci anointed their bodies. Nudum etiam corpus tunc illis unctum neſcio an vulgo notum ſit ſed eruo ex Appian. lib. 2. Bell. Civil. He neither cites Plutarch, nor Dion, nor Cicero; but Appian, who has only copied Plutarch, except the parentheſis which may be ſeen in the margin, where it is expreſly obſerved, that this unction was a cuſtomary thing (17).

As for the ſtory which Ovid tells, and which ſeems to make againſt me, I anſwer, I. that it only relates to the particular time, in which the oracle was given; and

As to the ceremonies the Luperci were to obſerve in ſacrificing (which were, doubtleſs, very ſingular, ſince, amongſt other things, there were to be two boys preſent who laughed aloud) ſee Plutarch in the life of Romulus. And as for the reaſons why theſe prieſts were naked, during the divine ſervice, and when they ran along the ſtreets, ſee Ovid, who gives a great many of them, in his ſecond book of Faſti. One is taken from the ill ſucceſs of Pan's amours, which is pleaſant enough; and which hath been very ill related by Du Boulai [F].

and that it muſt not be believed, that any women, but thoſe who were then married, and at the age of Child-bearing, ſubmitted to the ſentence of the oracle. I ſay, II. that Ovid doe snot tell us how or by whom they were laſhed; whether naked, or in their cloaths; whether by their husbands, or the Luperci. What way ſoever it was done we do not find in it the proof of Pope Gelaſus's aſſertion; for their husbands were far from whipping them publickly, ſince the oracle did not command it; or from ſuffering the Luperci to whip them, otherwiſe than in private, and as the high-prieſt whipped the veſtals, who had ſuffered the ſacred fire to go out (18). This manner of execution fullfilled the ſenſe of the oracle; and it is to be believed, that the husbands went no farther, and, perhaps too, ſtood ready at hand to prevent the Luperci's uſing one ſort of inſtrument for another.

Ovid's ſtory is this. He ſays (19), that in Romulus's time, women became ſo barren, that this prince ſaid, it had been much better they had never ſtole them (20). They had recourſe to prayers; husbands and wives proſtrated themſelves in a wood conſecrated to Juno. The goddeſſes anſwer threw them into a a violent anxiety; for theſe words were diſtinctly heard: That an ugly old goat ſhould leap the Roman wives. Italidas matres, inquit, caper hirtus inito. By good luck an augur that was preſent, put them out of pain: he ſacrificed a goat, and ordered, that the skin ſhould be employed to whip the women (21); which they conſenting to, failed not to lie-in in ten months time. Thomas Bartholin (22), who has adapted to his ſubject the general cuſtom of their ſubmitting to be whipped by the Luperci, which Meibomius had forgotten (23), would have found his account better in the particular adventure I have related.

[F] Ovid . . . . gives . . . . a reaſon pleaſant enough, which has been very ill told by Du Boulai.] As Du Boulai (24) has told it with ſeveral interpolations, I think myſelf obliged to give a faithful account of it here, in order to inſpire my readers with a juſt miſtruſt of writers, who tranſcribe one another, without recurring to the original (25): the ſtory is thus. Hercules travelling with Omphale, was ſeen by Faunus (26), who immediately fell in love with the fair one, and ſought an opportunity to enjoy her. Hercules and Omphale lodged that night in a cave, where, whilſt ſupper was getting ready, Omphale amuſed herſelf with changing cloaths with Hercules, dreſſing him in her petticoats, and trinkets, and putting on herſelf, inſtead of them, the lion's skin, the club, and the quiver. They ſupped in this equipage, and went to ſleep in it. They were to lie a-part that night, becauſe in the morning they were to ſacrifice to Bacchus, an act of religion which required continence the preceding night. Faunus, who had purſued his beloved object, ſtole into the cave, in the dark, whilſt the domeſtics were in a deep ſleep; not without hopes that Hercules and his miſtreſs were as faſt aſleep as they; and that, by this means he might perform his exploit. He groped about ſometimes on one ſide, and ſometimes on the other, till at laſt he found Omphale's bed: but he no ſooner touched the lion's skin, but he ſtarted back in a great fright. A little after, feeling about, he found Hercules's bed, and judging, by the fineneſs and ſoftneſs of the cloaths, that it was Omphale, he laid himſelf along, and with great eagerneſs began to take up her coats; and without being diſcouraged by the briſtly legs (27), thought to accompliſh his deſign. Hereupon the hero, giving him a thruſt with his elbow, threw him out of the bed (28). This awakened Omphale; ſhe calls up the people, a candle is brought, Faunus is found ſprawling on the ground, hardly able to riſe, and is made the laughing-ſtock to the company. Ovid pretends, that this is one of the reaſons of the nakedneſs of the Luperci: Faunus, taking an averſion for the habits which had thus deceived him, would not ſuffer his prieſts to wear any at all, during the ceremonies of his worſhip.

Let us now reckon up the faults, which Mr du Boulai has committed in the ſpace of twenty one lines. I. He ſays, that Hercules was paſſing through mount Palatin, when Faunus was ſmitten with his wife: but if he had read Ovid (29), he would have found that Hercules was then in Lydia. II. He does not know whether the wife that attended Hercules, was Iole or Omphale. Ovid's text, without leaving room for a doubt, fixes us to Omphale. III. He ſays, that Hercules retired into a foreſt, to avoid the ſcorching heat of the ſun. Ovid makes him retire into a cave, and only when it was late. IV. He ſays, that Omphale going to bed, as being the more chilly and timorous, took the lion's skin, which her husband wore, to cover her, and the club to defend her from the wild beaſts. There is not one word in Ovid concerning any of theſe motives: and beſides, what incoherence! that, on one hand, the ſeaſon, ſhould be ſo vehemently hot, as to oblige them to retire into a foreſt; and, on the other, the nights ſhould be ſo cold, that a young woman muſt cover herſelf with a lion's skin to keep herſelf from being ſtarved? V. He ſays, that Faunus obſerved every thing, except the change of the cloaths: Ovid makes him take notice of nothing, nor does he ſend him into the cave till mid-night, when all the ſervants, and Hercules, were aſleep. VI. He ſays, that Hercules awaked his wife, and ordered a fire to be lighted, whilſt he held this impudent fellow. In Ovid it is Omphale who cries out, and commands not that a fire ſhould be lighted, (this not being what is ſaid on ſuch occaſions) but that a light ſhould be brought (30). Beſides, Hercules only puſhed this impudent fellow out of bed; he did not hold him. VII. He ſays, that Faunus was ſoundly thraſhed: of which Ovid ſays not one word. VIII. He ſays, that this adventure was the reaſon of Hercules's riſing quite naked: but, on the contrary, as Ovid tells the ſtory, he had lain all night in Omphale's cloaths. What likelihood is there that he ſhould be undreſſed to riſe upon ſuch an occaſion as this? IX. He ſays, that Hercules guarded his wife from violence. This is falſe; for the ſpark, taking the husband for the wife, made no attempt at all upon her. X. He ſays, that becauſe Hercules roſe quite naked, and had ſecured his wife from violence, he added the ceremony of nakedneſs to the others, which were practiſed at the feaſt of this god, to appeaſe him for the treatment he had given him. All this is falſe and abſurd: the two cauſes of adding ceremonies are chimerical, as we have ſeen; and it was not Hercules, but Faunus, or Pan, that eſtabliſhed the ceremony of nakedneſs.

Incubus begat him [A]; and have even falſified the day of his birth, in order to frame a ſcheme of his nativity tohis diſadvantage [B]. They accuſe him of having confeſſed, that after ſtruggling for ten years together with his conſcience, he at laſt became perfectly maſter of it, and fell into Atheiſm [C]. They add, that he frequently ſaid, he would renounce his portion in Heaven, provided God would allow him a pleaſant life for a hundred years

[A] They have dared to publiſh that an Incubus begat him.] Father Maimbourg has been ſo equitable as to reject this ridiculous ſtory. 'He was born, ſays he (1), at Iſleben in the county of Mansfeld, in the year 1483, not of an Incubus, as ſome, to render him more odious, have written, without any appearance of truth, but as other men are born, a thing never called in queſtion till he became an Hereſiarch, which he might eaſily be, without any need of ſubſtituting a devil in the place of his father, John Luder, or diſgracing his mother, Margaret Linderman (2), by ſo infamous a birth.' Such fables are hardly to be pardoned in thoſe who mention them only as witty conceits. This is what an Italian Theatin (3) has done in a poem, in which he ſuppoſes, that Luther, born of Megera, one of the furies, was ſent from hell into Germany. This is more monkiſh than poetical.

[B] They have falſified the day of his birth, in order to frame a ſcheme of his nativity to his diſadvantage.] Martin Luther was born the tenth of November, betwixt eleven and twelve of the clock at night, at Iſleben, whither his mother was come on account of the fair, not thinking ſhe was ſo near her time: for we muſt know, that her husband, a man of mean condition, and who worked in the mines, did not then live at Iſleben, but in the village of Meza (4). The good woman, being examined by Melancthon, concerning the year ſhe was brought to bed of Martin Luther, anſwered, that ſhe did not very well remember it; ſhe only knew the day and the hour (5). It is thereſore out of pure malice, that Florimond de Remond places his birth on the twenty ſecond of October. He thought thereby to confirm the aſtrological predictions of Junctinus, who, by the horoſcope of this day, has defamed Martin Luther, as much as he could. This Aſtrologer was ſtrongly confuted by a profeſſor of Straſburg, who ſhewed, that, by the rules of Aſtrology, Luther was to be a great man. 'Nihilominus Ræmundus diem 22. Octobris præfert, ut malitioſæ Aſtrologi cujuſdam Junctini calumniæ fidem conciliaret, qui ex horoſcopo illius diei ingenium Lutheri miris modis infamare voluit. Hunc Iſaacus Malleolus Profeſſor. Mathem. Argentoratenſis anno 1617, edita diſſertatione de genitura Lutheri refutavit (6). —— However, Florimond de Remond has fixed upon the twenty ſecond of October, that he might give credit to the malicious inſinuations of one Junctinus, an Aſtrologer, who, from the horoſcope of that day, endeavoured to throw the moſt ſcandalous reflexions on the abilities of Luther. Iſaac Malleolus, profeſſor of the Mathematics at Strasburg in the year 1617, refuted all that this man advanced in a diſſertation on the birth of Luther.'

To illuſtrate theſe words of Mr Seckendorf, I ought to ſay, that Florimond de Remond followed Cardan's hypotheſis more than Junctinus's. He mentions both the dates, that of the twenty ſecond of October, and that of the tenth of November. He prefers the firſt, which is that of Cardan, and inſinuates, that Junctinus followed the latter. 'Luther, ſays he (7), was born at Iſleben .... in the year 1483, the twenty ſecond of October, in the afternoon at eleven of the clock, thirty ſix minutes .... Several authors ſay he was born the tenth of November, on St Martin's eve, which made his parents name him Martin: this, perhaps, has occaſioned that variation; for it is not probable, that Cardan and Junctinus, who with ſo much curioſity have calculated his nativity, ſhould be both miſ-informed. But Cardan ſays, he was born the twenty ſecond of October; this is Luther's true birth day: the ſame ſays Junctinus. And, though there be ſome variation between theſe two Aſtrologers, about Luther's horoſcope, yet it is ſo ſmall that it deſerves not to be conſidered. For in both, the planets are ſituate in the ſame houſes; the moon, in both, is in the twelfth; Jupiter, Venus, and Mars, in the third; the Sun, Saturn, and Mercury, in the fourth.' The variation of theſe two famous Aſtrologers, was not ſo great as that of ſome others, who differ a whole year with reſpect to the birth-day of Martin Luther. I ſhall cite my author (8). 'There will be as many themes or figures (9) as there are ſpectators at different hours; and each Aſtrologer, by that means, will make his own different from the reſt .... They will hower agree, notwithſtanding all this; as heretofore two of theſe gentlemen did in Germany, who, in making Luther's horoſcope, who was born the tenth of November 1483, agreed as to all the events of his life, and his perſonal qualities, though they differed as to the day of his birth a whole year: ſo true it is, that this noble ſcience never fails to diſcover all events.' The difference between Gauricus and Cardan, is a compleat year, bating ſome few hours. Gauricus places Luther's birth the twenty ſecond of October 1484, one of the clock, ten minutes in the afternoon, and he finds by this horoſcope the ſame abominations as Cardan. 'Hæc mira ſatiſque horrenda. 5. Planetarum coitio ſub Scorpii aſteriſmo in nona cœli ſtatione quam Arabes religioni deputabant, effecit ipſum ſacrilegum hereticum, Chriſtianæ religionis hoſtem acerrimum, atque prophanum. Ex horoſcopi directione ad Martis coitum religioſiſſimus obiit. Ejus Anima ſceleſtiſſima ad Inferos navigavit, ab Alecto, Tiſiphone, & Megera flagellis igneis cruciata perenniter (10). —— This is ſtrange, indeed terrible, five planets being in conjunction in Scorpio, in the ninth houſe which the Arabians allotted to religion, made him a ſacrilegious Heretic, a moſt bitter and moſt prophane enemy to the Chriſtian faith. It appears from the horoſcope directed to the conjunction of Mars, that he died without any ſenſe of religion, his ſoul ſteeped in guilt ſailed to hell, there to be laſhed with the fiery whips of Alecto, Tiſiphone, and Megera thro' endleſs ages.' Can any body now ſay, that the Aſtrologers have not a great zeal for the religion they profeſs. But note, that this laſt was a prelate.

[C] They accuſe him of having confeſſed, that having ſtruggled for ten years together with his conſcience, he was .... fallen into Atheiſm.] 'Martin Luther, who had made ſuch progreſs, as to arrive at the perfection of Atheiſm, confeſſes, nevertheleſs, that he had ſtruggled for ten years together with himſelf, to ſtifle or blunt that piercing ſting of conſcience, which his Atheiſm fixed in the inmoſt receſſes of his miſerable ſoul (11).' Such an accuſation required a citation of Martin Luther's own words; and yet Garaſſe has given none, he does not ſo much as cite this author's works in an indefinite manner: but in the 968th page of his book, he has not ſo far forgot his duty; he has cited ſomething: this is what he ſays, 'Luther, who was a perfect Atheiſt, ſays, in his Table-Talk, related by Rebenſtok, that he had lain ten years before his conſcience, as the Greeks lay before the city of Troy; for that was his compariſon: But that by his diligence, he had maſtered it, and reduced his mind to ſuch a ſtate, as to entertain no farther ſcruples. He might, in my opinion, apply the whole ſtory, and the taking of Troy, to the taking of his conſcience: for, as Troy was taken by means of a wooden horſe, ſo it was by a wooden horſe that Luther took his own conſcience, and ſtifled all that vermin of ſcruples: for from that time he became a horſe, if there ever was an horſe in the world: and his diſciple, Aurifaber, depoſes, as an ear-witneſs, that he had learned it from Luther's mouth from the pulpit, that, thanks be to God, he felt no longer any diſturbance of his conſcience; and that he began to ſee the fruits of his goſpel amongſt his diſciples; Nam poſt revelatum Evangelium meum, ſaid he, Virtus eſt occiſa, juſtitia oppreſſa, temperantia ligata, veritas lacerata, fides clauda, nequitia quotidiana, devotio pulſa, hæreſis relicta. I have fought with ſuch ſucceſs that I have ſtifled the ſeeds of virtue, oppreſſed juſtice, extinguiſhed ſobriety, rent truth to pieces, broken the pillars of faith, made villany familiar, baniſhed devotion, and introduced Hereſy.' There is no need to obſerve here, that all this is perverted; the thing ſpeaks itſelf: and I am certain, there is no honeſt man, whatever religion he is of, but will deteſt or pity the extravagace of ſuch a ſlanderer.

years in this world [D]. They impudently maintain, that he denied the immortality of the ſoul [E]. They charge him with having groſs and carnal ideas of heaven [F], and with compoſing hymns in honour of drunkenneſs, a vice to which they make him much

[D] They add, that he frequently ſaid he would renounce his portion in heaven, provided God would allow him a pleaſant life for a hundred years in this world.] This accuſation comes from the ſame hand as the former (12). ‘ Quirinus Cnoglerus has obſerved, in his Lutheran Creed, that he had ſeen a little German book written in praiſe of SAINT MARTIN LUTHER, which contained at large the legend of this new ſaint, canonized by the miniſters of Germany, in which he had particularly read the following paſſage. Compoſiti ſunt duo verſus in honorem cariſſimi noſtri præceptoris SANCTI LUTHERI, debentque omnes Papiſtæ ferre, velint, nolint, ut veri verſus, & pia carmina ſint & maneant: ſunt autem hujuſmodi:

IN VITA ÆTERNA.

At loca poſt illos tertia, LUTHER habet.

‘ Two verſes have been made in honour of our dear maſter SAINT LUTHER, which, whether the Papiſts will allow it or no, ſhall always be acknowledged to contain true and pious praiſes: they are theſe:

IN LIFE ETERNAL.

Chriſt's place is firſt, Paul to the next preferr'd,
Who will deny, that LUTHER claims the third.

You will find in the margin the ſequel of this paſſage (13).

[E] They impudently maintain, that he denied the immortality of the ſoul.] ‘ Martin Luther, who was a man wholly carnal, and compoſed of fat and greaſe, teaches, in ſeveral places, that the immortality of the ſoul is a meer chimera: for behold his own words in the ſecond tome of his works of the Wittemberg edition, in the year MDLI, in the twenty ſeventh article of his aſſertions. Quos Leo Pontifex definivit articuli fidei, de immortalite animæ, portenta ſunt. —— That is a monſtrous doctrine which Pope Leo aſſerted, concerning the immortality of the ſoul. And in the ſame tome of the edition of the year MDLII, in the articles XXXI and XLI, he plainly ſays; Nihil eſt quod dicitur, Anima rationalis creando infunditur, & infundendo creatur: meliùs hac in re ratio decernit & Poeta dicens, Patrem ſequitur ſua proles. —— It is idle talk to ſay, that the rational ſoul is infuſed in it's creation, or created in it's infuſion: reaſon determining this much better, as alſo the Poet who ſays, the offspring from it's ſire derives itſelf.’ It is better to believe, ſays this groſs blockhead, what the Poet ſays, than what the church teaches: thus you ſee from what fountain this reformer drew his articles of faith; from the leud Poets, who have acknowledged no other deity than Venus, nor any other pleaſure than ſenſuality (14).’ The firſt of theſe two paſſages is ſo mutilated, that no judgment can be paſſed upon it. It is no ſtrange thing for a moſt orthodox man to call thoſe thoughts chimeras, which another entertains concerning the immortality of the ſoul. He would not call the doctrine of the immortality itſelf thus, but the abſurd reaſons they would build it upon, and the extravagant conſequences they would deduce from it. As to the ſecond paſſage, what can be more abſurd than to pretend, that a man teaches the mortality of the ſoul, upon pretence, that he ſuppoſes it produced by another ſoul? may he not be perſuaded, with ſome fathers of the church, that the ſoul is immortal, and produced by way of propagation, ex traduce? but, what do I ſtand on? a man would be as ridiculous to take pains to prove, that Luther believed the immortality of the ſoul, as he who accuſes him of believing it mortal.

But, to ſhew what ſtreſs is to be laid upon Garaſſe's citations from Martin Luther's Table-Talk, let me here obſerve how he cites Prateolus. Calvin's doctrine, ſays he (15), holds, and muſt hold, the mortality of the ſoul, if it will be at all conſiſtent, and Prateolus very well perceived this in his book of Hereſies, verbo Athei; for he there obſerves, that a general aſſembly being held at Geneva, of all the States, to deliberate concerning Purgatory, one of the moſt ingenious, and moſt conſiderable, ſaid expreſsly, when it came to his turn to give his vote, Purgatorium cum Miſſâ & Romano Pontifice melius abolere non poſſumus, quàm ſi dicamus, ſimul animam cum corpore extingui; - - - We can never find out a better way to aboliſh Purgatory, the Maſs, and the Roman Pontiff, than by ſaying, that ſoul and body died together. Such was the opinion of this gentleman. And then afterwards, to confirm this doctrine, came out public theſes, printed and diſputed in Geneva, in the year MDLXVIII, wherein were theſe words: Quicquid de animarum habetur immortalitate, ab Antichriſto ad ſtatuendam ſuam culinam excogitatum eſt. All that is ſaid concerning the immortality of the ſoul, ſaid this proponent, is nothing elſe, but an invention of Antichriſt, to make his pot boil. Prateolus (16) has only cited Lindanus, who ſaid, that the Italian Proteſtants, who fled to Geneva, deliberating one day concerning the means of aboliſhing Purgatory, the Papacy, and other doctrines of the Catholic church; one of them gave his opinion, that the beſt way was to ſay, that the ſoul died with the body. By this means, ſaid he, we ſhall deſtroy Purgatory, the Maſs, and the Pope, all at once. Lindanus (17) cites the acts of Valentine Gentilius's trial. It is a book wherein the Calviniſts complain of ſome members of the Italian church of Geneva, who were infected with Arianiſm, and were expelled for their errors. Judge if this be proper to ſtain the Calviniſts, or fix any blot upon the orthodoxy of the Geneveſe. But eſpecially admire Father Garaſſe's raſhneſs, who has converted a meeting of ten or twelve Italians, into a general aſſembly of all the States; and an opinion advanced by ſome inconſiderable perſons in a chamber, into theſes publickly defended (18). If this Jeſuit makes ſuch ill uſe of Prateolus's authority, what credit can we give him, when he cites Martin Luther's Table-talk? I ſhall only confute him in this general way; for having not the book itſelf, I cannot confront the words with Garaſſe's citations. I add, that he has related a thing quite otherwiſe than one of his fraternity has done. ‘ Articulus ille, ſays an Iriſh Jeſuit (19), quo creditur animam eſſe immortalem, Luthero judice eſt portentum in Romano ſterquilinio Decretorum quod Papa condidit ſibi & ſuis fidelibus. —— This article, by which the immortality of the ſoul is ſettled, ought, in the opinion of Luther, to be thrown on the dunghil of the Pope's decrees, whereby he eſtabliſhed his own faith, and that of his followers.’ To have juſt ſuſpicions that this is ill cited, we need only caſt an eye upon the reſt of this Jeſuit's diſcourſe. ‘ Si dubites, continues he, an fortè contagio hujus portentoſi Paradoxi alios è Reformatione afflaverit, Reſpondet Joannes Brentius *: Etſi inter nos nulla ſit publica profeſſio quod anima ſimul cum corpore intereat, & quod non ſit mortuorum reſurrectio: tamen impuriſſima & profaniſſima illa vita quam maxima pars hominum ſectatur, perſpicuè indicat quod non ſentiant eſſe vitam poſt hanc. Nonnullis etiam tales voces tam ebriis inter pocula excidunt, quàm ſobriis in familiaribus colloquiis. Quibus declarat, licet non publica, ſaltem privata perſuaſione, & licentia vitæ, hanc invaluiſſe ſententiam, eamque vel ipſos ſobrios profiteri.’ Can any thing be more aſtoniſhing? a paſtor deplores the corruption of his flock. Though there be not among us, ſays he, any formulary of public faith, by which we declare that the ſoul dies with the body, and that the dead riſe not again; yet the impure and profane life that moſt people lead, is a manifeſt ſign, that they believe not the immortality of the ſoul. Some even drop ſuch diſcourſes not only when they are drunk, but when they are ſober, in common converſation with their friends. Hereupon they accuſe a whole church of diſ-believing the immortality of the ſoul, and repreſent them as only forbearing to make it an expreſs article of their confeſſion of faith. Who can bear conſequences, in which the blindneſs of paſſion, is ſo ſcandalous? See the margin (20).

Luther, ſays he (21), being arrived to perfect Atheiſm, was ſtill more ridiculous, for having deviſed intolerable fooleries, according to the confeſſion of his diſciple Rebenſtock; for he one day preached publickly, that God, to pleaſure his elect, was reſolved to create, after the laſt judgment, little cats, and lap-dogs, Quorum cutis erit aurea, & pili de lapidibus pretioſis, i. e. *Whoſe skin ſhould be of gold, and their hair of precious ſtones, and beſtow them on the bleſſed to uſe them for play-things, as the ladies do who put them in their muffs. [G] . . . . . and with compoſing hymns in honour of drunkenneſs, a vice to which they make him much addicted.] ‘ Martin Luther, in the firſt Tome of his works, in the chapter of Drunkenneſs, after having authorized this vice, and ſhewn, as well as he could, that it was incident to all the great peſons that ever were, at laſt remembering the eccleſiaſtical hymns, he was wont to chant in the cloyſters, made one in honour of drunkenneſs, which conſiſts of two ſtanza's; the firſt whereof is this:

Eſt poſt ſomnum, ventriculum
Vino implere iterum,
Nam Alexandri regula
Præſcribit hæc remedia (23).

If you will drink but deep,
You preſently will ſleep,
And then your belly will
Be fit again to fill,
Great Alexander's rule
(And ſure he was no fool)
To keep a man at eaſe,
From care or from diſeaſe.

. . . . . we ſee in a book called Concordia Proteſtantium, that Luther is honoured with thoſe elogies, Divus Lutherus zelo plenus: and, as the Painters repreſent our ſaints with their perſonal ſigns, St Jerome with a lion, (though this be a fault of the Painters, authorized by antient cuſtom, for it is not St Jerome, but St Geraſimus, that ought to be repreſented with a Lyon) St Ambroſe with a bee-hive, St Auguſtine with a young child, St Gregory with a white pigeon; ſo it is a cuſtom, throughout all Germany, to paint this new ſaint of the pretended Reformed religion, with his ſpecific mark; namely, a great glaſs full of wine; which, as I have ſhewn before, and related from Rebenſtok, he called Poculum Catechiſticum: ſuch are Luther's arms; and John Matheſius adds, that he boaſted no body could drink off his glaſs in a breath but himſelf; as no body could manage Hercules's club (24) but himſelf (25).’ The paſſage Garaſſe refers us to, concerning the catechiſtical goblet, is in the 59th page of his book: thus: ‘ The moſt frolickſome of all was Martin Luther, as Rebenſtock, and Matheſius relate in his life; for this groſs blockhead being at table, uſed to have his great goblet brought him, which he called Poculum Catechiſticum, which held about two pints, and which he ſwallowed at a draught, boaſting that no body could do it but himſelf: as Ulyſſes, ſaid he, had a bow, which no body could bend and draw up to the arrows point but himſelf. Now when he was heated with wine, having three or four times conſulted his catechiſtical goblet, he told the pleaſanteſt ſtories in the world; for, falling upon the antient doctors, he uſed to draw them in very fine colours.’ Let us alſo recite what we find in Fitz Simon's book. I inſert his authorities in the margin: ‘ Ait de ſe Lutherus, nihil ſingulare in vita mea eminet. Poſſum jocari, potare, frontem exporrigere, ridere, ſumque commodus & facetus convivator, cumque unum biræ, ſive cerviſiæ cantharum teneo (verbi gratia vitrum illud monſtrum, horrendum, informe, ingens, ex Apoſtolorum ſymbolo, Dominica oratione, & decem præceptis conſtans, quod uno hauſtu Lutherus exhaurire conſuevit). Statim dolium ipſum totum concupiſco, ſæpiuſque bene bonum hauſtum facio in Dei gloriam. Pro ea itaque quod prius macerabam corpus meum, mox cum mortuus & in capulo repoſitus fuero, vermibus ventricoſum beneque craſſum Doctorem eſcam dabo *. Ventricoſum itaque & benè craſſum Doctorem Diſcipuli Reformati, Evangeliſtamque jocoſum, bibacem, commodum & facetum convivatorem, proprii oris confeſſione Evangelici noſtri Reformatores nacti ſunt (26). —— Thus ſpeaks Luther of himſelf; there is nothing ſingular in my life; I can joke, drink, be merry, laugh, and be a facetious companion at a feaſt, when I take my tankard of beer or ale (he means his monſtrous goblet of ſuch an enormous bigneſs, that it held the Apoſtle's Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments: and yet the whole contents of it Luther could drink off at a draught.) I then wiſh for the whole hogſhead, and drink many a good draught to the glory of God. And whereas I formerly uſed to macerate my body, now as ſoon as I am dead I ſhall afford the worms a good feaſt out of a jolly tunbellied doctor. Therefore the reformed diſciples have a jolly tunbellied doctor, and our evangelical reformed an evangeliſt, merry, ſmiling, complaiſant, and a facetious feaſter, as appears from his own words.’ In another place of his book (27) we find theſe words: ‘ Quaſi vero Lutherus in immani ſuo vitro catechiſtico, quod ſolus ille exhaurire potuit, unam aquæ guttulam inſtillari tulerit? —— As if Luther would ever have ſuffered a drop of water to be put into that monſtrous catechiſtical glaſs, on which he valued himſelf for being the only one capable of drinking it up at a draught.’ Mr Juncker, at page 193, and 220 of his Vita D. Martini Lutheri Nummis atque Iconibus illuſtrata, maintains, that all that is ſaid of this pretended catechiſtical rummer, is an impoſture and groſs fiction; and he cites two or three books, which prove, that we ought not to take any notice of what is found concerning it in the Colloquia Menſalia. This book of Mr Juncker is very curious, and ſhews, that the author applied himſelf, with great diligence and ſucceſs, to a re-ſearch into every thing that was fit to illuſtrate the matter which he was upon.

[H] And particularly againſt Moſes.] ‘ Martin Luther had hardly any thing oftener in his mouth, particularly in his cups, than that the commandments of the decalogue, were the ſource and fountain of all the villanies in the world, as Rebenſtock has related in his Colloquies, in page CCCLXIX, and in the ſecond tome of his works of the Witemberg edition, page 112, he makes a vow to God, almoſt of the ſame nature of that of the miſerable Theophilus, in the firſt ſonnet of the ſatirical Parnaſſus; for his part, he ſolemnly and devoutly promiſes never to keep any of the ten commandments: and in fine, being in the extaſy of his devotions, he ſays, Tollantur è medio omnia Dei præcepta & ceſſabunt omnes Hæreſes. To ſuppreſs Hereſies, talk not to me of diſputes, nor conferences, nor war, nor the command of princes: I know a ſhorter expedient than all this; which is, to throw the decalogue into the fire, and there will be no more Hereſies in the world (28) . . . . But if you would more clearly underſtand and diſcover Luther's opinion concerning the decalogue, and the law of Moſes, obſerve how he ſpeaks of them in the firſt tome of his works of the Witemberg edition MDL, page CCXV. Vide ut ſis prudens, & Moſem cum ſui lege, quam longiſſime amoliri, & in malam rem abire jubeas; neque quicquam illius terrore ac minis movearis, ſed ſuſpectum eum habeto, ut peſſimum hæreticum anathematizatum & damnatum hominem, mutoque deteriorem Papa & Diabolo. Be prudent, ſays that he got Amadis de Gaule tranſlated into good French [I], to put people out of conceit with the Scripture, and all books of devotion. They obſerved ſo little meaſures in the calumnies they publiſhed againſt him, as to accuſe him of having ſaid, that he believed nothing of what he preached [K]; and that he was very glad to hear that other miniſters reſembled him in this. Moſt of theſe calumnies are grounded upon ſome words in a certain book publiſhed by Luther's friends [L]; to which they give a very malicious interpretation, and very remote from this miniſter's thoughts. Not but it muſt be confeſſed, that it was a very great imprudence to publiſh ſuch a collection. It was the effect

‘he, and ſtand upon your guard; and when the queſtion ſhall be about Moſes, ſend him to the devil, with all his Old Teſtament, and not be concerned at his menaces; for as much as he is an heretical miſcreant, an excommunicated wretch, and a damned ſoul. In a word, a wicked man more curſed than the Pope, and the devil (29).’ Garaſſe had ſaid before (30), that Luther ‘having, by his great induſtry, arrived to Atheiſm, held alſo the like diſcourſe, as Rebenſtock relates, in his Table-Talk. Ego non pluris facio ſexcenta loca Scripturæ, quam putridam nucem, I value ſix hundred places of the Bible, if they ſhould be urged to me no more than a rotten nut.’ Laſtly, he pretends (31) that Luther uſed to ſay after dinner, ‘that he knew a good way to prevent ſinning mortally againſt God; which is, ſaid he, to throw the decalogue and the Bible into the fire.’

[I] They go ſo far as to maintain, that he got Amadis de Gaule tranſlated into good French.] This egregious lie is found in the book (32) of an Italian Dominican, called Brother Angelo Paciuchelli. His book, written in the Italian tongue, has been tranſlated into Latin by Charles de Marimont, a Lorraine Theatin. The Leipſic Journal mentions it, in which I have found the following paſſage. ‘A veritate maxime alienum eſt, quod Lectione ſtatim prima, qua S. Scripturæ & Aſceticorum librorum neceſſitatem & utilitatem commendat, de B. Luthero traditur: ſceleratum ſcilicet illum virum, cum Germaniam execrabili hæreſi contaminare decreviſſet, profanis eam libris corrupiſſe, curaviſſeque ut lingua Gallica liber quidam donaretur, Amadis dictus, & quidem omni elegantia exornatus per Principum aulas ſpargeretur; ſicque paulatim ſacrarum paginarum ſpiritualiumque librorum nauſea curioſorum aulicorum animis inſtillaretur. Cujus ineptiſſimæ calumniæ, quæ nobis quidem non indignationem ſed riſum movet, non poterit non cordatiores ex Romano-Catholicis pudere, quos minime fugit quanto zelo ad ſacræ Scripturæ, quæ, ipſi tunc clero tantum non ſordebat, laicorum vero manibus extorta plane erat, frequentiſſimam lectionem, omne hominum genus, ſummos, medioximos, infimos Lutherus noſter revocaverit, ſacris in eum finem Bibliis (non Amadiſo) in vernaculam linguam incredibili labore atque ſtudio traductis (33). —— It is very wide of truth, what in the firſt ſection concerning the neceſſity and uſefulneſs of reading the holy Scriptures and myſtic books is reported of Luther, viz. that this moſt abominable man, when he had determined to corrupt all Germany with his deteſtable Hereſy, took care to have a book called Amadis put into new and elegant French, and brought into the courts of the princes, that by degrees he might inſtil into the minds of people of rank, a contempt for the ſacred writings, and of all pious books in general, whichridiculous calumny cannot excite in us indignation but laughter, for the honeſt Catholics themſelves muſt be aſhamed of it. For they cannot be ignorant that by the indefatigable pains of Luther, the ſacred writings were once more put not only into the hands of the clergy, but into thoſe of the middle rank, nay, even of thoſe of the meaneſt ſort. He having for that purpoſe tranſlated into the vulgar tongue, with incredible ſtudy and toil, not Amadis but the holy Bible.’ What is not a man capable of in point of groſs calumnies, and diametrically oppoſite to all probability, when there are thoſe who dare affirm, that Luther deſired to bring the Scriptures into diſcredit: Luther, I ſay, who had no greater reproach to bear, with all the reformers, than that of too much recommending to lay-men the reading of the Bible in the vulgar tongue?

[K] They . . . . accuſe him of having ſaid that he believed nothing of what he preached.] ‘There are a great many Chriſtians, who are Chriſtians in appearance, who make an outward profeſſion of believing in God, in a perfunctory manner, and by way of compliment, that they may not be thought Atheiſts. Sturmius reproached Beza with being of this claſs, and applied to him the ſaying of Socrates, Hoc unum me ſcire ſcio, quod nihil ſcio. — I only know this, that I know nothing; he applied it to Theodore Beza by this gentle parody, Hoc unum me credere credo, quod nil credo. — I think I only believe this, that I believe nothing. Of this humour was the fat mortal, Martin Luther, who thanked God, that he was not ſingular in his fraternity: for I believe nothing, ſaid he, of what I preach; and, God be bleſſed, there are many who are infected with the ſame diſtemper amongſt our miniſters; as John Matheſius has written in his life: this is what I call, believing in God in appearance, and theſe are the Chriſtians in appearance, who believe in God by way of compliment, Ne nihil credere videantur. — Leſt they ſhould be thought to believe nothing (34).’ Compare this with Matheſius's Latin, cited by Henry Fitz-Simon, you will find how Garaſſe has amplified it. ‘Joannes Matheſius in vitam Lutheri plures conciones compoſuit, quas tandem in lucem emiſit. In earum vero duodecima ſic ait: Magiſter Joannes Muſa Prædicans Rochlizenſis narravit mihi, ſe quodam tempore admodum dolenter Luthero queſtum eſſe, quod ipſemet ea credere non poſſet quæ aliis prædicabat. Tum reſpondiſſe Lutherum: Benedictus ergo ſit Deus, cum idem aliis quod mihi uſu venit. Adhuc enim mihi ſoli id uſu venire credidi (35). —— John Matheſius compoſed ſeveral ſermons on the Life of Luther which at laſt he publiſhed. In the twelfth ſermon he has theſe words. Maſter John Muſa, miniſter at Rochlitz informed me, that having once complained to Luther with great concern, that he found it impoſſible for him to believe what he preached to others: Luther anſwered, I bleſs God that this has fallen out to another as well as to me; for hitherto I thought that I alone had this misfortune.’

[L] A certain book publiſhed by Luther's friends.] According to the preſent mode, it would have been called Lutheriana or Lutherana. But the title that was given it of Sermones Menſales, or Colloquia Menſalia, is better; for Luther's Table-Talk is the ſubject of the book. It was publiſhed in 1571, by Henry Peter Rebenſtock, miniſter of Eiſcherheim. Andrew Rivetus, if I miſtake not, ſays ſomewhere, that this book is ſuppoſititious: but Gisbert Voëtius (36), at leaſt as zealous againſt Popery as he, acknowledges the contrary. Mr Seckendorf has not attempted to prove this book ſuppoſititious, he only obſerves that theſe Table-Diſcourſes were collected with indiſcretion, and raſhly printed by a perſon . . . . who impudently idolized Luther (37). The controverſiſts of the other ſide took advantage of it, as appears by Garaſſe's paſſages above-cited, and by the notes of Feuardentius upon St Irenæus (38). They have made the ſame uſe of Luther's Letters, publiſhed with little diſcretion and prudence. See Mr Gaſtineau's Controverſial Letters, who cites ſeveral pieces from them, not very honourable to the memory of the author. See what Mr Saldenus has anſwered to Bellarmine, who would prove, from Luther's table-talk, that he diſcarded Job out of the canon of ſcripture. ‘Impegit Luthero quod Jobi etiam Libro divinam authoritatem detraxerit, argumento è convivalibus ejus Sermonibus deprompto, at ludicro plane & calumnioſo; cum neque Libri illius Autor unquam fuerit Lutherus, neque eo vivente vel approbante editus ſit (39). —— He objects to Luther, that he had detracted from the divine authority of the book of Job, citing in ſupport of what he ſays, ſomewhat taken out of Luther's Table-Talk, but this is idle and ſcandalous, ſince it is well known, that Luther was not the author of that book, nor was it publiſhed in his life-time, or ever had his approbation.’ See the margin (40).

effect of an inconſiderate zeal [M], or rather of an exceſſive prepoſſeſſion, which hindered their diſcerning the faults of this great man. It cannot be denied, but the impetuous heat of his temper forced from him ſuch ſayings, as deſerve to be condemned, as when he declared his opinion upon the Epiſtle of St James [N]. There were ſome Proteſtants, who maintained, that he had not ſpoken ſo harſhly as was pretended; and at the [M] It was the effect of an inconſiderate zeal.] Voiture's apologiſt makes uſe of a thought which may be properly applied in this place: I ſhall recite the paſſage at large, as containing ſeveral curious particulars (41). ‘ It were to be wiſhed, that the public had received from Mr Voiture's own hands the preſent that has been made it of his verſes and letters. He would, doubtleſs, have retrenched ſome things to have made it perfect. . . . . He would not have appeared before the world as he has done in ſome of his letters, in diſorder, in a diſhabille, in his morning-gown; he would have put on his court-cloaths, or even a ceremonial and feſtival habit. He would have kept up in all points to the ſtricteſt laws of Decorum; with the rules of which he thought he might lawfully diſpenſe, in a free ſecret correſpondence with his friends and confidents. They who have publiſhed his works . . . . are fallen into a fault, which is ſeldom avoided on the like occaſions, having choſen to employ their diligence in collecting the ſcattered pieces of our author, rather than the judgment in making a good choice of them. And indeed, it is no wonder, that ingenious men, of ever ſo fine and delicate a taſte, ſhould be miſtaken in this manner. That beloved freed man of Cicero, whom he ſomewhere calls the reformer and rule of his writings; and who, particularly by the beauty of his wit, had merited his tendereſt affections, did ſomething ſtill worſe than this. After the death of his maſter, he publiſhed a collection of his jeſts, wherein, through an exceſs of paſſion and zeal, not having courage to leave out any thing, he inſerted many ſo cold and inſipid, that Quintilian, a ſupreme judge of theſe matters, thinks them unworthy of ſo famous an orator. The meaning of which, Sir, is, that as piety conſecrates the vileſt things, when they have touched the bodies of ſaints, or only their bones and aſhes; ſo love and admiration idolize whatever bears the name of thoſe extraordinary men, who have been ſnatched from their admirers; and as if every one was capable of the ſame devotion and worſhip, they propoſe them to the veneration of all the earth, and of all ages. The leaſt important and moſt neglected billets or letters, are, by their paſſionate admirers, looked upon, as precious relics of theſe great wits, worthy to be engraved on braſs and marble, and to be handed down to lateſt poſterity . . . For the reſt theſe, whatever may be ſaid of them, are not vitious extreams (42); for, proceeding from the violence of a friendſhip nobly placed, this ſort of exceſs is more to be eſteemed, than the moderation of other virtues; and deſerves not only excuſe, but commendation. Your ridiculous curioſities are juſtly condemned; ſuch as that of the Greek, who bought Epictetus's earthen lamp, which he uſed in his lucubrations, at the price of three thouſand drachmas; or of that extravagant prince, who gave I know not how many talents for the Poet Æſchylus's Table-Book; or that other who corrupted the prieſts of Delphi, to get Orpheus's lyre out of their hands, though he knew not how to touch it, or even to put it in tune.’ I have ſeen in an edition of the Scaligerana (43); a preface which contains the ſame thoughts in fewer words. ‘ Ea plerumque eſt in iſtos literatorum heroas præpoſtera vulgi religio & quædam velut idolomania, ut ne verbulum quidem illis excidere patiatur quod non avide colligat, & inter pretioſiſſima κειμήλια ſedulo recondat. Pœne quomodo hodierni ἁγιολάτραι divorum cineres, ungues, pilos, oſſium fragmenta, veſtium fimbrias aut lacinias, & cætera quæ reliquiarum nomine cenſent venerabundi ſervant. Sic Virgilii ſpeculum, & quidem inter ſacra monumenta, Dionyſiani in agro Pariſienſi Monachi non ſine riſu viſendum præbent. Sic Italos Petrarchæ ſui non modo tumulum ædeſque, ſed & urceum & ſedile, imo & domeſticæ felis ſceleton cadaver aliaſque neſcio quot ejuſdem farinæ quiſquilias magna pompa peregrinantibus oſtentare refert Jo. Philippus Thomaſinus, libro quem de divini poetæ rebus compoſuit. —— Such for the moſt part, is the ridiculous veneration, and almoſt idolatrous regard, which the vulgar pay to thoſe heroes in literature, that they cannot ſuffer ſo much as a word to eſcape them without greedily ſeizing it, and laying it up among their moſt precious curioſities. As our modern ſaint-ſervers preſerve the aſhes, nails, hair, pieces of bones, hems, or bits of garments; and whatever elſe goes under the name of relics, with the higheſt reverence. So the Monks of St Dennis at Paris, ſhew, not without expoſing themſelves to juſt contempt, the loooking-glaſs of Virgil, among the reſt of their ſacred treaſures. And the Italians, as we are informed by John Philip Thomaſino, in his Life of Petrarch, not only ſhew the houſe and tomb of that divine Poet, but alſo his pitcher and his ſtool, nay, the very skeleton of his cat; and I know not what beſides.’ Theſe things fairly repreſent to you the caſe of the compilers of Martin Luther's diſcourſes.

[N] His opinion upon the epiſtle of St James.] He called it a work of ſtraw, in compariſon of the epiſtles of St Paul and St Peter. The Catholic controverſiſts have hereupon made a thouſand outcries, without being aſſured, by their own eyes, that ever Luther ſaid ſo. Edmund Campian's adventure is remarkable; he had accuſed Luther of uſing this expreſſion: he had the lie given him, and afterwards the confuſion of not being able to make good what he had ſaid, though he was furniſhed with the books he cited (44). This, which in reality was but a vain and imaginary triumph, was, however, a ſubſtantial one, on account of the ſhame it gave the Jeſuit, and the joy it occaſioned among the Proteſtants. The learned Whitaker, if we believe Mr Daillé (45), enjoyed a great ſatisfaction from it all his life long: he maintained, that Luther had not ſpoken in that manner, and that Campian ſlandered him. Let Mr Daillé ſpeak. ‘ Mr Cottiby taxes Luther with ſaying, that this epiſtle is a work of ſtraw; but he he does not ſhew the book, nor place of Luther where theſe words are found; which makes me ſuſpect, that, without having ſeen them, he truſted to Edmund Campian the Jeſuit, or ſome ſuch author, who hurried on by a furious hatred againſt our religion, makes no ſcruple to impute to us whatever comes in their head, be it ever ſo falſe or incredible. I will not undertake to read Luther's ſeven or eight great tomes, to know whether he writ theſe words, which your diſciple charges upon him. I will only tell you, that reading over again what William Whitaker †, a grave and learned man, anſwered to your Campian, who ſaid the ſame thing of Luther, I have found, that he accuſes him of a great falſity; and ſays, that having carefully ſought for the preface of Luther to this epiſtle, from whence Campian cited theſe words, he had at laſt found it, and that it began thus: “ Tho' this epiſtle of St James has been rejected by the antients, yet for my part I praiſe it, and look upon it to be uſeful and advantageous.” He adds, that the ſame perſon in the book, concerning the Babyloniſh captivity, ſpeaks of it farther in theſe words: “ I omit, ſays he, what many affirm, with great probability, that this epiſtle is not the apoſtle St James's, nor worthy of the ſpirit of an apoſtle. But for this work of ſtraw, of which your Father Campian, and your new diſciple ſpeak, he proteſts he has no where met with it in Luther (46).’ It is, nevertheleſs, true, that this is found in a preface of this Reformer. Let us hear further what Mr Daillé ſays. “ Afterwards Mr Rivet anſwering the Jeſuit Sylveſter de Petra Sancta, who alſo advanced the ſame calumny, adds,” that ſome have diſcovered to our people, that Luther had written in a German preface upon the firſt edition of the Bible, that St James's epiſtle, as to it's worth, cannot be parallelled with thoſe of St Paul, and St Peter, and that, in compariſon of theſe, it is an epiſtle of ſtraw. We do not approve (ſays Mr Rivet ‡) this judgment of Luther; and it is certain, that he himſelf afterwards condemned it. Theſe words being not to be found in any of the editions made after the

'year 1526 (47).' To ſhew how authors copy one another, without conſulting the originals, I will obſerve, that Fitz-Simon, renewing the accuſation which his brother-Jeſuit Campian could not prove, cites the ſame preface (48) which Campian had cited. Idem dico de Epiſtola Sancti Jacobi quam Lutherus non tantum ut dubiam, ſed ut contentioſam, tumidam, aridam, ſtramineam, & apoſtolico ſpiritu indignam appellavit (49). The biſhop of Meaux does not ſpeak of this epithet ſtraminea (of ſtraw), nor cite any of theſe prefaces, but another book of Luther. 'The bold reformer retrenched from the canon of the ſcripture, whatever did not agree with his notions; and it is on occaſion of this unction, that he writes in the captivity of Babylon, without any teſtimony of antiquity, that this epiſtle ‡ does not ſeem to be St James's, nor worthy of the apoſtolic ſpirit (50).' Fitz-Simon has ſaid, in another place, that Luther rejected the three firſt evangeliſts. 'Judicare quoque oportet ejus (Lutheri) animum erga vetus teſtamentum, ex odio erga præcipuam partem novi teſtamenti in his verbis expreſſam. Non immerito igitur admonui (inquit *) in prologo novi teſtamenti lectores, ut hanc falſam aboleant opinionem, quod ſcilicet quatuor ſint evangelia, & quatuor tantum Evangeliſtæ. Dixi autem Joannis evangelium eſſe unicum, pulchrum, verum ac principale evangelium, aliiſque tribus longè ac longè præferendum, ac anteponendum: adeò ut etiam Pauli ac Petri epiſtolæ longe præcedant tria illa evangelia, Matthæi, Marci, ac Lucæ. Delevit ergo  Lutherus pro virili tria ſimul integra evangelia, ut aſcititia, deformia, falſa, vilipendenda (51). —— We ought to judge of Luther's ſentiments in reſpect of the Old Teſtament, by the averſion he expreſſed againſt the greateſt part of the new, which I ſhall prove from his own words. Not without reaſon, therefore, ſays he, I have admoniſhed my readers, in my prologue to the New Teſtament, that they ſhould lay aſide that falſe opinion, viz. that there are only four Goſpels, and four Evangeliſts. I have ſaid that the Goſpel of St John, is a true and excellent Goſpel, and therefore to be eſteemed the principal, being by far ſuperior to the other three; nay, that the Epiſtles of Paul, and Peter, ought likewiſe to be in higher eſteem, than the three Goſpels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke. Thus Luther, as far as it was in his power, has aboliſhed three entire Goſpels, by repreſenting them, as counterfeit, ill wrote, falſe, and of little worth.'

Since the firſt edition of this Dictionary, I have diſcovered, that Mr Daillé and Mr Rivet have not traced Campian and Whitaker's diſpute, ſo exactly as I thought they had done. I imagined, that theſe two French miniſters, who were both men of prodigious reading, had ſaid all that could be ſaid upon the ſubject; but I was in the wrong to think ſo. This we ſhall ſee in the following remark, with a ſmall cenſure of the paſſage of the biſhop of Meaux.

[O] . . . . . . The Proteſtants denied ſomething which they ought to have granted.] Campian's accuſation was contained in theſe words: Quid Luthero (cauſæ fuit) ut Epiſtolam Jacobi contentioſam, tumidam, aridam, ſtramineam, flagitioſus Apoſtata nominaret, & indignam ſpiritu cenſeret Apoſtolico? Deſperatio (52). He pretended then, that Luther ſaid, that St James's epiſtle was contentious, bombaſtic, dry, and of ſtraw, and unworthy of the apoſtolic ſpirit. This was one of the firſt points that was diſcuſſed in the verbal diſpute, which Campian maintained in the Tower of London (53). He was furniſhed with Luther's works that he had cited; he was required to find out the words of his accuſation; he did ſeek, and found only this, 'Affirmant nonnulli epiſtolam Jacobi Apoſtolico ſpiritu indignam (54) — Some affirm, that the epiſtle of St James is not worthy of the apoſtolical ſpirit.' He had asked leave to ſend to Germany for the editions, publiſhed by Luther himſelf: he proteſted, that he had read the words in queſtion in Luther; and that before him ſeveral famous writers, ſome of whom he named had accuſed Luther of the ſame crime. But he was laughed at, as a man who would ſend to Germany for an advocate in a deſperate cauſe (55). Whitaker, ſome time after, took pen in hand againſt this Jeſuit, and treated him as a liar, as we have ſeen in the preceding remark, in the firſt paſſage of Mr Daillé. But he afterwards owned, there was ſomething of truth in the accuſation; for obſerve his reply to John Duræus, a Scotch Jeſuit, who had written in defence of Campian: 'Cum viderem accuſatum à Campiano Lutherum, ut ego putabam, injuſtè, licuit mihi falſum crimen verbo notare. Itaque Jacobi epiſtolam eſſe his contumeliis, quas Campianus commemorat, à Luthero affectam negavi, quia in Lutheri libris nihil tale potui reperire. Tu jam verba ipſa profers, quæ tamen nec vidi unquam, nec qui ſe vidiſſe diceret, conveni. Utcunque ſe res habet non magni refert. Nobis enim Lutheri quæque dicta minimè præſtanda ſunt. Quanquam mihi planè ſuſpectam eſſe fidem tuam profiteor, & te aliorum fictis auditionibus nimiùm tribuiſſe ſuſpicor. Primùm enim vidi quandam Lutheri præfationem antiquiſſimam, editam anno 1525 Wittembergæ, in qua Jacobi epiſtolam præ Petri ac Pauli epiſtolis ſtramineam vocat. Sed hoc cum tuis conferendum non eſt. Deinde cùm alii pontificii volunt oſtendere Jacobi epiſtolam à Luthero ſtramineam eſſe dictam, hanc ipſam præfationem, atque hæc verba proferunt, de tuis nullam mentionem faciunt. Denique cùm videam in quadam præfatione hanc epiſtolam præ alteris ſtramineam dici, non exiſtimo in eadem præfatione ἁπλῶς, & tumidam & aridam, & contentioſam, & ſtramineam, & ſpiritu Apoſtolico indignam nominari. Quare dum novam hanc editionem tuam video, ἐπέχειν malo, quàm aliquid temerè in alterutram partem affirmare (56). —— When I ſaw that Campian had accuſed Luther in a manner, which to me ſeemed unjuſt, I thought my ſelf at liberty to take notice of that falſe charge. I therefore denied that Luther had treated St James's Epiſtle ſo contumeliouſly, as Campian has reproached him with; becauſe in all Luther's writings, I could not find any ſuch thing. You now produce the words themſelves, with I never ſaw my ſelf nor could ever meet with any man that had ſeen them. However it be, this matter is of no great importance, ſince all Luther's opinions are not of equal weight with us. However I cannot help ſaying, that I ſuſpect what you affirm, and am afraid you have been deceived, by giving credit to the too bold aſſertions of others. For firſt, I have ſeen Luther's preface, a very antient piece, printed in the year 1525, at Wittemberg, in which he ſays, that the epiſtle of James, compared with thoſe of Peter and Paul, is an epiſtle of ſtraw; but this is nothing to what you advance; yet when other Popiſh writers have attempted to prove, that the epiſtle of James was called by Luther an epiſtle of ſtraw, they quote this very preface, and theſe words, but they ſay nothing of the words you mention. Laſtly, when in a certain preface I obſerve, that the epiſtle in queſtion is ſaid to be an epiſtle of ſtraw, in reſpect to others, I cannot think it ſhould in the ſame preface be called, without any reſtriction, angry, bombaſtic, dry, contentious, an epiſtle of ſtraw, and unworthy the apoſtolic ſpirit; therefore, till I ſee this new edition of your's, I will ſuſpend my judgment, and not affirm any thing raſhly on either ſide.' Obſerve, he confeſſes, that, ſince the publication of his book againſt Campian's reaſons, he had found a preface of Luther, printed at Wittemberg in 1525; in which it was ſaid, that St James's Epiſtle, is an Epiſtle of ſtraw, compared with the Epiſtles of St Peter and St Paul; but that not finding the Epithets contentioſa, tumida, arida, indigna Apoſtolico ſpiritu, alledged by Campian, and repeated by Duræus, he will not grant the truth of the citations, till the copy be produced, that contains them. He declares that, in the mean time, he will ſuſpend his judgment betwixt the affirmative and negative. Campian's apologiſts got ſome ground by this confeſſion of Whitaker; but, to have juſtified him perfectly, they ſhould have produced to the public, a work in which the epithets of contentioſa, tumida, &c. were contained. It does not appear, that they were able to do it; and therefore Whitaker, in anſwering a new antagoniſt, maintained, that Campian ſtill lay under the charge of a ſlanderer, ſince nothing more could be proved than the epithet ſtraminea.

Epiſtle, it was doubtleſs, before the year 1525 [P]. I ſhall give ſome reaſons for it below

Conſider well the following paſſage, in which Whitaker talks to his adverſary William Rainolds: ‘Cum copioſam & amplam hujus rei defenſionem ſuſceperis, quare in ea re maximè deficis, ad quam maximè auxilio tuo opus eſt? Nam quod affers de ſtramine, antea fatebamur totum illud, quod verum fuit: tuæ itaque partes fuiſſent copioſiùs confirmaſſe, Lutherum etiam Epiſtolam illam vocaſſe contentioſam, tumidam, aridam indignam ſpiritu Apoſtolico; quorum omnium eo in loco illum Campianus accuſavit. Sed cum nihil ad hanc rem probandam afferre poſſis, coactus es fateri Campianum graviùs Lutherum, quàm meritus eſt, de hac Epiſtola accuſaſſe: ita ut ſi uno aliquo verbo Jeſuitæ tui, cujus cauſam agis, exiſtimationem defenderis; pluribus tamen eum verbis condemnaſti; quæ tu interim veteratoriè omittis, quaſi nec ea unquam dixiſſet Campianus, nec tua res ageretur. Fateor ſanè parum referre, quid de Luthero Campianus finxerit nequiter: at qui eum defendendum ſuſcepiſti, ne putes te officio tuo ſatisfeciſſe, ſi ex multis, quæ ille protulit, in una aliqua re eum defenderis, & in pluribus defeceris. Quare vel deſine tandem de uno iſto verbo litem movere, vel reliqua teſtimoniis confirma (57). —— Since you undertook a full defence of this matter, why do you moſt fail in that wherein your aid was moſt wanted? for as to what you ſay about ſtraw, that has been admitted and acknowledged to be true, but it is your buſineſs to prove at large that Luther has called that epiſtle, contentious, bombaſtic, dry, unworthy of the apoſtolic ſpirit; of all which Campian in the ſame place accuſes him. But when you are able to bring nothing to ſupport this, you are forced to confeſs, that Campian has cenſured Luther, with reſpect to that Epiſtle, more ſeverely than he deſerved. Thus though you think you have made good one, of the words cited by the Jeſuit, whoſe cauſe you maintain, yet you have condemned him as to many more of which however you take no manner of notice, as if they had never been ſaid by Campian, or you had never undertaken his defence. I do acknowledge, that it is not of very great importance, what Campian has wickedly feigned to have been ſaid by Luther, but as you undertook his defence, you ought not to think your work done when you only ſupport him in one part of his charge, and give him up in the reſt. Therefore let us hear no more of this ſingle word, or elſe come with your proofs, as to the reſt of his charge.’ Let us cite another paſſage, in which he tells us, that he had not ſuppreſſed the diſcovery he had made ſince the publication of his anſwer to Campian's ten reaſons. He examined, with all poſſible care, as many copies as he could find, whether German or Latin, of this reformer's works, and having at laſt met with that which concerns the epithet ſtraminea; he publiſhed it in a preface to his anſwer to a tract of Sanders. ‘Si Lutherus hoc ſcripſerit, iniquè ego Campianum falſi reum peregi: ſi non ſcripſerit, turpiſſimè Lutherum Campianus inſimulavit. Ut veritatem iſtius rei cognoſcerem in omnibus exemplaribus, quæ comparare potui, tàm Germanicis quàm Latinis examinandis ſummam induſtriam collocavi: cum autem nulla verba ejuſcemodi, ſed diverſa potiùs, invenirem; credebam, optimâ impulſus ratione totum iſtud excogitatum fuiſſe; itaque falſiſſimum eſſe pronuntiavi. Evenit verò poſtea, ut in vetus Germanicum Teſtamentum à Luthero converſum inciderem præfixis ipſius præfationibus, in quibus inveni quiddam, quod aliqua ex parte referret illud quod objecerat Campianus. Cum autem illud legiſſem, non rem diſſimulavi, ſed fatebar in reſponſione mea ad Gregorium Martinum. In illa quidem præfatione ſcribit Lutherus, S. Jacobi Epiſtolam non poſſe dignitate certare cum Epiſtolis S. Petri & Pauli, ſed Epiſtolam ſtramineam eſſe, ſi cum illis comparetur. Quam ejus ſententiam non probo; atque in recentioribus editionibus cum omiſſa ſint illa verba, opinor ipſum poſtea Lutherum hanc ſuam ſententiam improbaſſe. Non profectò dubito, quin æquus lector fatebitur inter hoc, quod ſcribit Lutherus, atque illud, quod ei objicit Campianus, diſcrepantiam eſſe. Etenim aliud eſt loqui planè & ἁπλῶς, aliud uti comparatione. Lutherus, inquit Campianus, Epiſtolam S. Jacobi ſtramineam vocavit. Lutherus ait præ Pauli & Petri Epiſtolis ſtramineam eſſe (58). —— If Luther really wrote this, then it was wrong in me to charge Campian with falſely accuſing him; but if he did not write it, then Campian moſt baſely traduced Luther. In order to come at the truth of this matter, I diligently compared all the copies I could meet with, either in German or in Latin; but when I could find no ſuch words, but rather things of a contrary nature in them, I, on good ground, believed the whole to be a fiction, and pronounced it falſe. But afterwards, when, in an old German Teſtament, I found a preface written by Luther, wherein ſomething was contained of what had been objected by Campian againſt him, I did not diſſemble this matter, but confeſſed it freely in my anſwer to Gregory Martin. In this preface Luther writes thus, The epiſtle of St James is by no means of equal dignity with the epiſtles of Peter and Paul, but is an epiſtle of ſtraw, if compared with them. This opinion of his I do not approve, and as theſe words are omitted in later editions, I am of opinion, that Luther himſelf diſapproved it. However, a candid reader will, I doubt not, eaſily diſcern that there is a wide difference between what Luther wrote and what is objected to him by Campian; for it is one thing to uſe an expreſſion abſolutely and ſimply, and another to apply it by compariſon. Luther, ſays Campian, calls the epiſtle of St James, an epiſtle of ſtraw, but Luther himſelf ſays, that it is an epiſtle of ſtraw in compariſon of thoſe of Peter and Paul.’ By all this it appears, that Mr Daillé and Mr Rivet were ignorant of a great many things relating to this controverſy. They did not know, that Whitaker retracted part of what he had advanced; nor that he himſelf found out the preface which informed him of Luther's bold expreſſion. The Jeſuits have not been ignorant of this; they boaſted of it, and exaggerated the thing, pretending, that he owned that the whole accuſation brought againſt Luther was well grounded. We ſhall cite the author of Campian's life, in the place where he gives us the hiſtory of the conference held in the tower of London. ‘Is matutini certaminis ordo exituſque fuit, viſique hæretici eo lætiores è certamine abſcedere, quòd Lutherum calumnia ſuo judicio exemiſſent: quamquam id quoque gaudium ut vanum ita non diuturnum fuit: paulo poſt ad inquiſitionem tantæ rei omnium ſtudiis converſis, incorrupti Lutheri codices inſpecti, inque iis inventa ipſa, quæ carpſerat hominis Apoſtatæ Campianus verba. Et quoniam res aperta erat, ipſi hæreſis magiſtri, inter quos Whitakerus fuit, Lutheri inſanas illas voces in vetuſtis exemplaribus legi palàm faſſi; perſonam triumphanti penè jam mendacio, vel inviti ſuis ipſi manibus detraxere (59). —— This was the method and iſſue of the morning diſpute, and the heretics ſeemed to go off with joy, becauſe they thought they had vindicated Luther from theſe calumnies; but as this joy was ill founded, ſo it continued not long, for people being now turned to the ſearch of this point, Luther's uncorrupted copies were examined, and in them the very words were found with which Campian had charged that apoſtate. And as the thing was now notorious, even the arch-heretics, among whom we may reckon Whitaker, publickly acknowledged, that they had read theſe ſenſeleſs expreſſions of Luther in ſome old copies; and thus they themſelves pulled off the mask from a lie, which had like to have triumphed over truth.’ The more we examine, theſe things, the more we find it an Herculean labour, to diſcover truth in the midſt of ſo many diſguiſes and juggles.

What I have to ſay againſt the biſhop of Meaux will not detain my readers long. He affirms (60), that Luther, without any teſtimony from antiquity, has written, that this epiſtle appears not to be St James's, nor worthy of the apoſtolical ſpirit. This obſervation is falſe; you need only compare it with theſe words of Mr Daillé: ‘Origen †, many ages before Luther, writ, that ſome rejected this epiſtle, which Euſebius ⸸ alſo teſtifies, and ſays, there were but few of the antients who had mentioned it; and St Jerome ‡ after him ſays, that it was affirmed, That it was not the apoſtle himſelf, but ſome other perſons, who had writ it under his name, tho' by little and little, in tract of time, it had been received, and authorized (61).’ Whitaker, in his anſwer to Duræus, proves at large, that St James's epiſtle was ſuſpected by a great many in the antient church.

[P] . . . . it was, doubtleſs, before the year 1525.] We have ſeen (62), that the epithet, ſtraminea, is below (b). The world was long ignorant of the fault he had been guilty of in conſenting, that the landgrave of Heſſe ſhould have two wives at the ſame time [Q]. But at laſt it found in a preface printed that year. But it is certain he had been leſs circumſpect ſome years before. We may therefore preſume, that, growing moderate by degrees, he ſoftened and tempered, in 1525, what he had advanced too ſhocking, the paſſage, for inſtance, which Campian, Duræus, Fitz-Simon, &c. charge him with, and which was entirely left out in the editions after the year 1525. I have obſerved, that Cochlæus, in the year 1522, accuſes him of having publiſhed injurious prefaces, with reſpect to ſome books of the canon of the ſcripture. ‘Optimis quibuſque videbatur Lutherus, nimis malitioſè graſſari in ſacras literas novi Teſtamenti. E quorum Canone, audaci cenſura rejiciebat Epiſtolam ad Hæbreos, Epiſtolam Jacobi, Epiſtolam Judæ, & Apocalyſim Joannis. Quas ſane & atrocibus infamabat calumniis in ſuis præfationibus. In præfatione vero generali, etiam in ſacratiſſima Evangelia audaciſſime manum mittebat: volens in primis repudiandam eſſe vetuſtiſſimam hanc & omnibus Chriſtianis notam ac receptam opnionem & ſententiam, Eſſe ſcilicet Quatuor tantum Evangelia, totidemque Evangeliſtas (63). —— Luther, in the opinion of the beſt of men, is thought to have treated the ſacred writings of the New Teſtament with too malicious a boldneſs. Out of the canon of which, by his audacious cenſure, he has rejected the epiſtle to the Hebrews, the epiſtle of James, the epiſtle of Jude, and the revelation of John, defaming them in his prefaces. But in his general preface, he has audaciouſly injured even the moſt ſacred goſpels, endeavouring to deſtroy, and to reject that moſt antient, and univerſally received, notion amongſt Chriſtians, that there are only four goſpels, and as many evangeliſts.’ Be pleaſed to remember, that this Cochlæus had been one of his moſt violent adverſaries: But, after all, ſince it cannot be denied but that the ſtraminea ſubſiſts, it is probable, that Campian's whole paſſage was in ſome antient preface: For, in reality, the other epithets are not more, nor indeed ſo injurious as this. Whitaker, like a ſkilful man, took advantage of this Jeſuit's apologiſt's not being able to produce the edition they wanted. He made good uſe of this advantage, and profited by Luther's reſtriction, tho' it has not all the force that is imagined, and be only a palliative remedy: For whoever ſays, that St James's epiſtle is an epiſtle of ſtraw, in compariſon of St Paul's, really ſays, that it is not canonical, or the production of an inſpired writer. It would be abſurd to pretend, that writers, inſpired by God have not an equal authority, or that ſome are more credible than others. Would not this be to ſay, that the Holy Spirit neglected ſome of them, and left them to their particular opinions, true or falſe? This cannot be admitted; and conſequently there is a neceſſity of ſaying, they are all, as to us, of equal authority; ſo that when a man affirms, that a writing, compared with St Paul's epiſtles, is a writing of ſtraw, he can conſider it no otherwiſe than as a human writing. And upon this foot he thinks it lawful to paſs ſuch a judgment on it, as the laws of criticiſm require; and to take to task the ſtyle, the turn, the thoughts, as if he were judging of the works of Tertullian, or Arnobius. This, however, does not excuſe Campian's not mentioning Luther's reſtriction, if he found it in the edition, upon which he grounded his charge; otherwiſe he fell into the ſophiſm, a dicto ſecundum quid, ad dictum ſimpliciter. Still reſerving a liberty to ſay, that on ſuch occaſions, reſtrictions are only an appearance of reſerve; ſince St James's epiſtle ſtill remained actually and fully degarded from it's canonical character, as a work divinely inſpired.

(Q) He conſented that the landgrave of Heſſe ſhould have two wives at the ſame time.] Mr Varillas has ſpoken of this matter at large. ‘Philip, landgrave of Heſſe, was of ſo vigorous a conſtitution, that one wife was not ſufficient for him; and the Surgeons, who opened him after his death, found a natural cauſe for it, which the modeſty of our tongue will not permit me to explain * . . . . He perſuaded himſelf, that his infirmity diſpenſed with the goſpel rigour, and permitted him to have two wives at the ſame time. Nothing diſturbed him in the notion he had conceived of it, but the novelty of the thing: But he ſuppoſed, that the approbation of Luther, and others of the moſt famous divines of his ſect, would juſtify his action. He aſſembled them at Wittemberg, in form of a council, in the year 1539. The affair was there examined with all the precautions that were thought neceſſary to prevent their deciſions being turned into ridicule. They foreſaw the troubleſome conſequences of what they were going to do; But, at laſt, the fear of diſobliging the landgrave, carried it in Luther's opinion, and his chief diſciples, againſt the law of Jeſus Chriſt, conſcience, reputation, and all other human and divine conſiderations. The reſult of the aſſembly of Wittemberg, was written with Melancthon's own hand, and ſigned by Luther, and by the other moſt famous divines of their ſect. It was expreſſed in ſo ſtrong terms, that it could leave no doubt, or ambiguity, and was ſent to the landgrave in the following form (64).’ Mr Varillas gives the act intire in Latin and French. We there find an expreſs permiſſion granted to this landgrave to marry a ſecond wiſe, provided, that only a few perſons were made privy to it. We there alſo find, that in certain caſes of neceſſity, any other man might marry again in his wiſe's life-time; and two of theſe caſes of neceſſity are ſpecified by theſe doctors, viz. I. If a man being a captive, in a foreign country, cannot preſerve, or recover his health, without the uſe of a woman. II. If a man be married to a leprous woman. ‘Certis tamen caſibus locus eſt diſpenſationi, ſi quis apud exteras nationes captivus ad curam corporis & ſanitatem inibi alteram uxorem ſuperinduceret, vel ſi quis haberet leproſam; his caſibus alteram ducere cum conſilio ſui Paſtoris, non intentione novam legem inducendi, ſed ſuæ neceſſitati conſulendi, hunc neſcimus, qua ratione damnare liceret (65).’ Mr Varillas ſets down in Latin and French the landgrave's contract of marriage with Margaret de Saal; to which marriage this prince's firſt wife gave her conſent. This hiſtorian makes many reflexions thereupon, tending to ſhew, that the reaſons of theſe Caſuiſts open a very large door to polygamy, and obſerves, that the two acts, inſerted in his hiſtory (66), have been faithfully tranſcribed and collated by the Imperial Notaries with the originals, which are preſerved in the archives of Ziegenhain, belonging equally to the branch of Heſſe-Caſſel, and to that of Heſſe-Darmſtadt (67).

But after him came a more artful controverſiſt (68), who has drawn another piece out of the ſame place, and has made many ſubtle reflexions upon this matter. This other piece is the inſtruction the landgrave gave to Martin Bucer. In this we find, on one hand, the reaſons which induced this prince to a ſecond marriage; and, on the other, thoſe by which he would induce the Divines to conſent to it. He ſhews, that he never loved the princeſs, his wife; and that ſhe was ſo diſagreeable, and ſo ſubject to drunkenneſs, that he neither could, nor ever would abſtain from other women, whilſt he had no other wife but her; and that, nevertheleſs, he would not incur the penalties, which the ſcripture denounces to fornicators and adulterers. Cum videam quod ab hoc agendi modo penes modernam uxorem meam nec poſſim nec velim abſtinere (69). The Phyſicians, adds he, know the ſtrength of my conſtitution; beſides, I am often obliged to aſſiſt at the diets; they laſt a long time, and we have rich tables there; how then can I preſerve my continence? For I cannot always take my wife along with me, with her great retinue. ‘Primo quod initio, quo eam duxi, nec animo, nec deſiderio eam complexus fuerim. Quali ipſa quoque complexione, amabilitate, & odore ſit, & quomodo interdum ſe ſuperfluo potu gerat, hoc ſciunt ipſius aulæ Præfecti; & Virgines; aliique plures: cumque ad ea deſcribenda difficultatem habeam, Bucero tamen omnia declaravi. Secundò, quia valida complexione, ut Medici ſciunt, ſum, & ſæpe contingit ut in fœderum & imperii comitiis diu verſer, ubi lautè vivitur & corpus curatur; quomodo me ibi gerere queam abſque uxore, cùm non ſemper magnum Gynæceum mecum ducere poſſim, facile eſt conjicere & conſiderare (70).’ He adds to all this I know not how many threats and promiſes, which much embarraſſed his Caſuiſts; for it is highly probable, that if a private gentleman had conſulted them upon the like caſe, he would have obtained nothing from them. It may therefore reaſonably be imagined, that they were men of little faith; became public: the Roman Catholics exclaimed very much about it; and ſome miniſters, have not had all the neceſſary prudence in anſwering for Luther [R]. They have advanced they had not a due confidence in the promiſes of Jeſus Chriſt: They believed, that if the reformation of Germany was not maintained by the princes who profeſſed it, it would ſoon be extinguiſhed. The experience of the time paſt made them timorous; they ſaw, that the violence of perſecutions, and the violence, employed by Catholic princes againſt thoſe who had left the Romiſh communion, had ever deſtroyed thoſe reformations in the birth. It was natural to fear a like fate, unleſs force were repelled by force. However it be, it cannot be denied, generally ſpeaking, but Luther's book contained ſeveral things favourable to polygamy (71). Lyſerus gives ſeveral inſtances of it (72). See the Remark [U]. I will conclude this with the words of the biſhop of Meaux, 'At preſent, ſays he (73), all this myſtery of iniquity is diſcovered by the pieces, which the elector Palatine, Charles Lewis, (who died laſt) (74), has cauſed to be printed; and whereof, the prince, Erneſt of Heſſe, one of Philip's deſcendants, has revealed a part, ſince he turned Catholic. The Book, which the prince Palatine cauſed to be printed, is intituled, Conſcientious Conſiderations upon Marriage, with an Explication of Queſtions hitherto diſcuſſed, concerning Adultery, Divorce, and Polygamy. The book came out in high Dutch in 1679, under the borrowed name of Daphnæus Arcuarius, under which was concealed that of Laurentius Bæger, one of this prince's counſellors.'

It muſt here be obſerved, that Thuanus was ill informed of the circumſtances of this affair. The landgrave, according to him, was, on one hand, ſo vigorous in the conjugal exerciſe, that his wife could not admit his embraces as often as he deſired; and, on the other, ſo chaſte, that he did not love to take his pleaſure abroad: And therefore the princeſs conſented to the diverſion which a concubine might give to the vigour of her huſband. And the thing having been communicated to the miniſters, they gave the landgrave a concubine, who might tame him a little, and oblige him to be more moderate towards his wife (75). This was not the caſe; he had never loved her; he married her againſt his inclination: and beginning three weeks after his marriage to make uſe of other women, he continued the ſame courſe till his ſecond marriage. 'Initio quo eam duxi, nec animo nec deſiderio eam complexus fuerim . . . . Si porro diceretur quare meam uxorem duxerim, vere imprudens homo tunc temporis fui, & ab aliquibus meorum conſiliariorum, quorum potior pars defuncta eſt, ad id perſuaſus ſum. Matrimonium meum ultra tres ſeptimanas non ſervavi, & ſic conſtanter perrexi (76). —— When I firſt married her, I had no inclination for her . . . . If it be asked, why then did I make her my wife? I own frankly, that I was at that time, an imprudent man, and that ſome of my counſellors, moſt of whom are now dead, perſuaded me thereto. I did not keep my marriage above three weeks, and ſo I have gone on.' It is very probable, that ſhe was ignorant of his vigour, or knew it only by hear-ſay. Away with theſe fooliſh jeſters, who might be able to criticize Thuanus, on his ſuppoſing, that the princeſs, finding herſelf unable to bear ſo frequent attacks, called in a concubine to her aſſiſtance. Montagne might have rallied this Hiſtorian upon it, but his authority is ſuſpected. See here a paſſage of his Eſſays. 'We have farther read of a difference that happened in Catalonia, between a woman, complaining of the too conſtant efforts of her huſband (not that, in my opinion, ſhe was ſo much incommoded by them; for I believe no miracles, except in faith; as under this pretence, which is the fundamental action of marriage, to re-trench and bridle the authority of huſbands over their wives; and to ſhew, that their luſt and naughtineſs paſs beyond the nuptial-bed, and trample under foot the charms and pleaſures of Venus): To which complaint, a man truly brutal, and unnatural, anſwered, that even on faſting days, he could not diſpenſe with leſs than ten times. From whence proceeded that notable decree of the queen of Arragon; by which, after mature deliberation of the council, this good queen to give a rule and example to all ages of the moderation and modeſty required in a juſt marriage, determined, for the legitimate and neceſſary bounds, ſix times a day; abating and quitting much of the occaſions and deſires of her ſex, to eſtabiſh, as ſhe ſaid, an eaſy form, and by conſequence permanent and immutable. Whereupon the doctors cry out, what muſt be a woman's appetite and concupiſcence, ſince their reaſon, their reformation, and their virtue is defined at this rate (77)?'

See the remark [D] of the article GLEICHEN, and remember that abundance of authors, who relate the ſame thing as Montagne, and make their jeſts upon it, do this rather to exerciſe their wit, than to expreſs their thoughts. Some of them are at leaſt perſuaded, that they have been told ſincerely, that is enough.

Claudite jam rivos, pueri, ſat prata biberunt (78).

[R] Some miniſters, have not had all the neceſſary prudence in anſwering for Luther.] The only anſwer that ſhould have been given the biſhop of Meaux, was to ſay, as Mr Baſnage has prudently done (79): I. That Luther ought not to have granted the landgrave of Heſſe the permiſſion to marry a ſecond wife, whilſt his firſt was alive; and that the biſhop of Meaux did juſtly condemn him upon that article. II. That the Popes have run into much more criminal exceſſes; from whence it follows, that Luther's fault, cenſured by the Papiſts, has no weight; for if this fault hindered him from being an inſtrument in the hand of God to declare the truth, and reform the church, the Roman Catholics are to blame in believing that the Popes, who have been guilty of more crying ſins than this, were, however, living oracles to the church, and the vicars of Jeſus Chriſt. It is certain, the Catholics can infer nothing from this action of the reformers, nor from any other to invalidate the reformation, without deſtroying a principle abſolutely neceſſary for their own ſupport; to wit, that the greateſt crimes do not hinder the Pope pronouncing ex cathedra, from declaring a truth, the belief of which is obliging on all the faithful.

Had the author of the Paſtoral Letters been as judicious as Mr Baſnage, he would not have expoſed his cauſe to objections, which he could never get over. Firſt, he would have confeſſed the fact; for if it be permitted to doubt of the acts, which the elector Palatine, Charles Lewis, cauſed to be publiſhed, with the atteſtation of a Public Notary, declaring they were copied from the original, in the archives of the houſe of Heſſe, there will be no poſſibility of proving facts: the moſt authentic declarations of ſovereign courts, the privy-ſeal, the great-ſeal, and all the moſt valid teſtimonies imaginable, will be a feeble barrier againſt the obſtinacy of a diſputer. Therefore prudence required, that it ſhould not be called in queſtion, whether the landgrave Philip obtained of Luther, and ſome other miniſters, a diſpenſation to marry two wives. I ſay this further: the reſpect that is due to the moſt illuſtrious houſe of Heſſe, and to the memory of a reformed elector, does not ſuffer us to doubt of it: nevertheleſs, the author of the Paſtoral Letters has very plainly declared he doubts of it (80). But his great fault lies here, that, to extenuate the complaiſance of theſe miniſters, he diſplays every thing, that can ſhew the law of marriage, of one with one, to be ſubject to a thouſand exceptions; he would particularly have it ſacrificed to the imperious power of a laſcivious conſtitution. 'There is no manner of compariſon, ſays he (81), betwixt thoſe two evils; to wit, the having recourſe to the unhappy remedy of a ſecond marriage, and the launching out into a thouſand impurities; which are the neceſſary conſequences of celibacy in perſons, whoſe complexion is not turned to continency.' This created him adverſaries, both among the Catholics and Proteſtants. The author of the Hiſtory of the Variations told him, that this principle would carry us too far. 'The perpetual indiſpoſition of a huſband or a wife, is as invincible an impediment, as abſence, or captivity itſelf: the married couple therefore muſt unmercifully leave one another in theſe ſad circumſtances; but an unſuitableneſs of humour, one of the moſt incurable diſtempers, will be a no leſs neceſſary impediment (82).' This miniſter found, in his own communion, many adverſaries both lay-men and divines. The biſhop of Meaux advanced principles manifeſtly pernicious: And the moſt tolerable of what they offer is of ſuch a nature, that they had much better have ſaid nothing [S]. Mr Claude's manner of ſpeaking of this great reformer is very judicious [T]. He has juſtified him among

Meaux produces him (83) a letter from another miniſter, ‘who bluſhes for his brother, on account of theſe neceſſities, alledged againſt the goſpel, and theſe inevitable impurities . . and who perceives the inconvenience of this impure doctrine, which would introduce divorce, and even polygamy, whenever either of the parties ſhould labour under diſtempers, I ſay not, incurable, but long; or where any other impediment may be found, which ſhould oblige them to live ſeparately.’ This miniſter is not named; but another has openly impeached this doctrine, in order to have it cenſured; and, has publiſhed, that it is a principle naturally productive of this concluſion, that a man, who has a ſick wife, may marry a ſecond (84). ‘There is nothing more certain, adds he, an equal neceſſity gives an equal privilege; and if an husband is as much hindered from cohabiting with his wife, by having a dead palſy, as by his own captivity among Barbarians, he is equally at liberty to ſeek a remedy to his incontinence, in a ſecond marriage.’ Mr de Beauval, among the lay-men, has urged this ſtill more ſtrongly (85). Another lay-man has maintained, that this maxim ‘(86) opens a gate to the ſtrangeſt diſorders; it authorizes an incontinent perſon, whoſe wife is long ſick, to marry another; and then another and another, without end, if providence pleaſes to render them all unhealthy. Thus you ſee a Turkiſh polygamy breaking in by this gap, into Chriſtianity, and filling it with it's brutal luſts: beſides, you ſee in Chriſtianity, that which was never ſeen in antient Paganiſm, nor is, at this day, to be ſeen in Mahometiſm; to wit, women authorized to have ſeveral husbands at the ſame time, when not having the gift of continency, they happen to be joined to a diſtempered husband: for it were ridiculous to pretend, that it is a leſs evil in them, to give way to promiſcuous luſts, which are, according to this miniſter, the infallible conſequence of celibacy in ſome conſtitutions, than to recur to the remedy of a ſecond husband. We ſee therefore that his maxim is a ſource of the moſt ſcandalous and filthy licentiouſneſs, that ever was ſeen in the world; and that nothing will expoſe our communion to more mortifying reproaches, than this doctrine of Mr Jurieu, unleſs our ſynods condemn it. All the laws which decency and the prudence of magiſtrates have introduced to hinder widows from marrying again, before a certain time, fall to the ground, or are only a tyrannical impoſition, which makes thoſe of a certain complexion launch into a thouſand impurities.’ The author of the Paſtoral Letters finds a hundred expedients (87) to bring himſelf off, with reſpect to ſome other difficulties that were propoſed to him concerning divorce, and ſecond marriages; but it was utterly impoſſible for him to diſ engage himſelf from this. All he could do was to calumniate his accuſer; for it is a calumny for a man to complain, that he has been accuſed of a thing, of which he has not been accuſed (88). Thus you ſee how much it concerns thoſe who anſwer a book of controverſy not to be haſty; for if they give way to the impetuous raſhneſs of their own thoughts and temper, they ſpoil the beſt cauſe.

What I have ſaid of the reſpect due to the moſt illuſtrious houſe of Heſſe, and to the memory of the reformed elector, would not be underſtood by every body, if I did not explain it. The acts of this ſecond marriage were taken from the archives of Ziegenhain, common to the branch of Heſſe-Caſſel, and to that of Heſſe-Darmſtadt (89). Prince Erneſt of Heſſe Rhinfelds, having embraced the Romiſh religion, was glad at their being publiſhed, becauſe he thought this would fix a blemiſh on the church he had quitted (90); and it is manifeſt, they are a great diſgrace to Luther, Melancthon, Bucer, &c. There is therefore no likelihood, that the landgraves of Heſſe-Caſſel, and the landgraves of Heſſe-Darmſtadt, the former Calviniſts, and the later Lutherans, would have been ſilent, if there had been any ſuſpicion, that theſe acts were forged. Theſe great princes could not be ſufficiently blamed, if, having any ſuſpicion of this, they had done nothing to oppoſe the deſign of the landgrave, Erneſt, a Catholic proſelyte. It is therefore denying them their due reſpect to doubt, whether theſe acts be genuine; it is inſinuating that they ſuffer under the authority of their archives, the reformers to be publickly aſperſed, and moſt unjuſtly ſlandered, and a diſhonour brought upon the Proteſtant church. As they are not capable of a lukewarmneſs, ſo injurious, it is moſt certain their ſilence clearly proves the validity of theſe acts. And as for the elector Palatine, how ſhameful would it be, ſhould it be proved, that he ordered one of his counſellors to publiſh falſe acts of this nature? I know indeed, that it was his intereſt they ſhould be moſt genuine, becauſe he did all that was poſſible to legitimate his marriage with a lady he had kept, whilſt his electreſs was alive; which occaſioned this princeſs's leaving him, and refuſing to be called his wife any longer: but, however, he had too much honour and prudence, to go about to juſtify himſelf by a ſuppoſititious fact, the falſeneſs whereof might have eaſily been proved by the electreſs's relations (91).

[S] . . . . they had much better have ſaid nothing.] The author of the Paſtoral Letters has much enlarged upon the practice of ſome ſtates (92). This was giving a handle for three new objections: for, I. his adverſaries (93) failed not to take the advantage of it, as if the civil laws of Proteſtants left a man too great a latitude in matrimonial caſes; and, as if only a ſmall number of private perſons had diſapproved it, whilſt he had the general practice on his ſide. II. All the examples he produces, or could produce, are of a different kind from the matter in debate; they being not marriages of a man with two wives in the ſame houſe at the ſame time, as were thoſe of the landgrave. III. Laſtly, a caſuiſt ought not to regulate himſelf upon a practice tolerated by princes. Who is ignorant what extreme abuſes civil laws have authorized or tolerated in Chriſtianity for many ages together, with reſpect to marriage (94)? The church has ſtood out, and by it's oppoſition, has at laſt cauſed thoſe things to be changed, which were not reconcileable with the goſpel. What a fine caſe ſhould we be in, if the caſuiſts would approve of all that princes permit? Do they not almoſt every where ſuffer fornication to go unpuniſhed (95)? If any ſuit happens betwixt a young woman and him who has got her with child, the moſt ſhe has to fear, is, that the man will not be condemned to pay her a ſum of money (96): as for cenſures or other penalties, ſhe need not be afraid of them. The judges refer all this to her confeſſor, her relations, or her conſiſtory. And are not plays not only tolerated, but even protected by the prince? Have not the Actors of operas at Paris a guard allowed them, detached from the troops of the king's houſhold? Nevertheleſs, do the preachers ceaſe to exclaim againſt theſe diverſions? And if any eccleſiaſtical author dares to write in favour of plays, is he not immediately overwhelmed with oppoſite writings, and forced to recant (97)? So that a good moraliſt will not regulate his opinions by the practice of the civil law, in a point concerning relaxation of manners.

Whoever would ſee as good an anſwer as could be given to the biſhop of Meaux, concerning the marriage of the landgrave, will do well to read Mr Seckendorf (98).

[T] Mr Claude's manner of ſpeaking of Luther is very judicious.] Theſe are his words. ‘I confeſs it were to be wiſhed, that Luther had been more temperate in his way of writing; and that with his great and invincible courage, with his ardent zeal for the truth, with that unſhaken conſtancy he ever manifeſted, he could have ſhowed a greater reſerve and moderation. But theſe faults, which are moſt commonly complexional, prevent not our eſteem of men, when, in other reſpects, we perceive in them a good fund of piety, and virtues perfectly heroic, ſuch as were ſeen to ſhine in Luther. For we cannot refuſe to praiſe the zeal of Luciſer, biſhop of Cagliari, or to admire the great qualities of St Jerome, though we diſcover too much keenneſs and paſſion in their ſtile. And perhaps too, there was ſome particular neceſſity at the time of the reformation, to employ the ſtrongeſt expreſſions, the better to awaken men from that profound ſlumber, in which they had lain ſo long. However, I grant, that Luther ought to have been more reſerved in his writings; and that if the author of among other things upon a point, which has given occaſion to ſeveral writings; that is to ſay the diſpute with the devil concerning private maſſes [U]. Luther died the eighteenth

‘ of the Prejudices would have contented himſelf to ‘ complain of the acrimony of his ſtile, we ſhould have ‘ been content, as a full anſwer, to deſire him, for the ‘ future, not to imitate himſelf what he condemned in ‘ another (99).’ All this is good and ſolid. I ſhall only obſerve, that a general method of juſtifying people from hence, that their temper was very proper, conſidering the poſture of affairs, to produce good effects, is a great ſource of illuſion. No body doubts, that providence knows how to chuſe the moſt effectual means to arrive at it's ends: but as the ill qualities of men are, at ſome ſeaſons, more proper than their brighteſt virtues, to execute God's decrees, it would be very ill reaſoning to conclude, that violence and paſſion are commendable upon pretence, that the corruption of the world needs the harſheſt treatment. The wiſdom of God, I confeſs, is eminent in employing ſuch inſtruments; but the inſtruments may very well be extremely vitious. I have obſerved above (100), that Cardinal Palavicini has excuſed Julius II, upon the need the church then had of a war-like Pope.

[U] He has juſtified him . . . . npon the diſpute with the devil, concerning private maſſes.] There are ſome objections, which the great controverſiſts leave to the diſputants of the lower forms; but there are others which are employed by all authors, great and ſmall (101), by thoſe who preach controverſy from a bulk in the ſtreets, and thoſe who dictate from the higheſt pulpits: the objection I ſpeak of, is of this number. The meaneſt country miſſionary has not failed to urge it; Mr Nicolle has oppoſed it with a very grave air. ‘ Never any one, ſays he (102), but Luther durſt boaſt, ‘ in a printed book, that he had had a long conference ‘ with the devil; that he had been convinced, by his ‘ reaſons, that private maſſes were an abuſe; and that ‘ this was the motive which induced him to aboliſh ‘ them. But common ſenſe has ever made all others ‘ conclude . . . . that it was an exceſs of extravagance, ‘ to take the devil for the maſter of truth, and become ‘ his diſciple.’ Mr Claude anſwered this objection very well (103). This is one of the four places of his book, to which the Janſeniſt replied, in a book intituled, A Confutation of the Anſwer of a Lutheran miniſter, concerning the conference of Luther with the devil. And they failed not to inſert this part of their reply in the ſecond edition of the Prejudices (104). To ſee a compleat anſwer to this objection, we need only read a tract, an extract whereof has been given in the News from the Republic of Letters, in the month of January 1687. This tract (105) is a ſolid confutation of a little book of the abbot de Cordemoi. The biſhop of Meaux (106) forgot not this reproach againſt Luther; but ſee how Mr Baſnage anſwered him (107).

The advantages the Roman controverſiſts pretend to draw hence are, doubtleſs, imaginary; but there is no probable reaſon for taking this ſtory of Martin Luther as a kind of figure or parable, as Mr Claude pretends. For Luther owns, in ſeveral places of his works, that he knows very well the devil's way of diſputing; and that it had coſt him many a bitter night: Multas noctes mihi ſatis amarulentas & acerbas reddere ille novit (108). He diſputes, ſays he, with that force, that it is ſudden death to a man; he believes this was the fate of Oecolampadius and Emſerus. The only pleaſure, according to him, that is found in theſe diſputes, is, that the devil quickly diſpatches them, and ſuffers them not to be ſpun out to any length, when he finds a man alone in his houſe. ‘ Diabolus ſua argumenta fortiter figere & urgere novit. Voce quoque gravi & forti utiter. Nec longis & multis meditationibus diſputationes ejuſmodi tranſiguntur, ſed ‘ momento uno & queſtio & reſponſio abſolvitur. Senſi ‘ equidem & probè expertus ſum, quam ob cauſam illud nonnunquam evenire ſoleat, ut ſub auroram quidam mortui in ſtratis ſuis inveniantur. Corpus ille ‘ perimere vel jugulare poteſt: Nec id modò, verùm ‘ & animam diſputationibus ſuis ita urgere, & in anguſtum coarctare novit, ut in momento quoque illi excedendum ſit, quo ſanè me quoque non ſemel tantum ‘ non perpulit . . . . Credo equidem quod Emſerus & ‘ Oecolampadius, aliique horum ſimiles, iſtiuſmodi ignitis Satanæ telis & haſtis confoſſi ſubitaneâ morte perierint. Nemo enim mortalium citrà ſingulare Dei ‘ auxilium ac robur illas ſuſtinere & perferre poteſt. ‘ Jucundum equidem ſeſe diſputando præbet, ſcilicet. ‘ Brevibus enim tranſigit omnia, nec diu moras nectit, ‘ ſiquidem virum ſolitarium domi ſuæ invenerit (109). ‘ —— The devil knows how to urge and apply his arguments with great force. He uſes a ſtrong and grave ‘ voice: nor are ſuch diſputes tranſacted in long or many ‘ meditations; but in a moment the queſtion and it's anſwer are diſpatched. I know, and am well aſſured, ‘ that from this cauſe ſome have been found about break ‘ of day dead in their beds. For he is able to ſqueeze ‘ and ſtrangle the body, and not ſo only, but in theſe diſputes to preſs the ſoul and reduce it to ſuch ſtreights ‘ as in a moment to drive it out, to which extremity he ‘ has more than once reduced me . . . . . I verily believe ‘ that Emſerus and Oecolampadius, and other ſuch men ‘ ſtruck by theſe fiery darts and javelins of Satan, have ‘ periſhed by a ſudden death; for no mortal, without ‘ the ſingular aid and aſſiſtance of God, has ſtrength to ‘ ſuſtain and reſiſt them. It is true his way of diſputing ‘ is very agreeable; for it is ſhort and not tedious, eſpecially if he meets with a ſolitary man at home.’ Add to this theſe words of Luther's ſeventh tome at page 230 of the Wittemberg edition. ‘ Urget (Satan) in ‘ immenſum corda, nec deſinit niſi repulſus verbo Dei: ‘ & ego plane perſuaſus ſum, Empſerum & Oecolampadium & ſimiles, his ictibus horribilibus & quaſſationibus ſubito extinctos eſſe; nec enim humanum cor ‘ horrendum hunc & ineffabilem impetum, niſi Deus ‘ illi adſit, perferre poteſt, &c. —— Satan ſtrongly urges ‘ the heart, nor deſiſts unleſs repulſed by the word of ‘ God: and I am fully perſuaded that Empſerus and ‘ Oecolampadius and others have been ſuddenly deſtroyed ‘ by theſe horrible ſhocks, neither can any human heart ‘ ſuſtain theſe terrible and inexpreſſible attacks unleſs ‘ God aſſiſts it.’ See the ſecond edition of Mr Nicolle's Prejudices, page 366. It is pretended, that Luther ſaid, that if the Sacramentarians underſtand not the ſcripture, it is becauſe they do not diſpute with the devil, the beſt opponent in the world: and that, without carrying him, hung about one's neck, as he had done, a man could be nothing more than a ſpeculative Divine. ‘ Quod Sacramentarii (inquit Lutherus) ‘ ſacram Scripturam non intelligunt, hæc cauſa eſt, ‘ quia verum opponentem, nempe diabolum non habent, qui demum benè docere eos ſolet. Subdit: ‘ Quando diabolum ejuſmodi collo non habemus affixum, nihil niſi ſpeculativi Theologi ſumus (110). ‘ . . . . . Ego Diabolum intus & in cute novi, quippe ‘ quocum plus uno ſalis modio comederim (111). . . . . ‘ Diabolus multo frequentius & propius mihi in lecto ‘ accubares ſolet, ſeu condormit, quam mea Catherina. ‘ Mecum in dormitorio deambulare ſolet . . . . . . Ego ‘ Diabolum collo meo affixum habui (112). —— ‘ That the Sacramentarians, ſays Luther, do not underſtand the holy Scriptures, the true cauſe is this, becauſe they have not the true antagoniſt, that is to ſay, ‘ the devil, who in the end is wont to teach them right. ‘ He adds, when we have not the devil thus hung about ‘ our neck, we are no more than ſpeculative Divines. . . . ‘ I know the devil intimately, having eat more than one ‘ buſhel of ſalt with him . . . . . The devil much oftner ‘ ſleeps with me, and lies nearer to me in bed than my ‘ Catherine. He uſes to walk with me in my bed-chamber . . . I have had the devil hung about my neck.’ ‘ &c.’ Hence I conclude, that Mr Claude ought not to have ſuſpected that this diſpute of Luther was only a parable.

He has anſwered another objection of the author of the Prejudices, founded upon this, that Luther ſeems to have animated his ſect to ſlaughter. Mr Nicolle accuſes him of it, but Mr Claude juſtifies him. I thought he had repelled another attack; to wit, that, founded on the famous words, Si nolit uxor, veniat ancilla; but having haſtily run over his Defence of the Reformation, and the book of the Prejudices, I met with nothing relating to it. The biſhop of Meaux has not omitted this reproach of the miſſionaries. His words are theſe: ‘ (113) I have always been afraid to ſpeak of thoſe ‘ inevitable neceſſities, which he diſcovered in the union ‘ of the two ſexes, and of the ſcandalous ſermon he ‘ preached at Wittemberg upon marriage: but ſince ‘ the ſequel of this ſtory has once obliged me to break ‘ through the reſtraint that modeſty had impoſed, ‘ I can no longer diſſemble what is found printed eighteenth of February 1546. A thouſand fables have been invented concerning his death [X]. Nor did they forbear publiſhing lyes, upon this ſubject, till he had left this world

‘ in Luther's works. It is true then, that in a ſermon that he preached at Wittemberg for the reformation of marriage, he was not aſhamed to ſpeak theſe infamous and ſcandalous words †: If they are ſo obſtinate, he ſpeaks of wives, it is fit their husbands ſhould tell them, If you will not another will: If the miſtreſs will not come, let the maid be called . . . However, the husband ought firſt to bring his wife before the church, and admoniſh her two or three times; after that divorce her, and take Eſther inſtead of Vaſhti.’ The biſhop of Meaux expreſſes himſelf thus in another place: ‘ Luther explained himſelf againſt monaſtic vows, in a terrible manner, ſo far as to ſay of that of continence (ſtop your ears, chaſt ſouls) that it was as impoſſible to keep it, as to diveſt ones ſelf of his ſex ‡. It would put modeſty out of countenance, ſhould I repeat the words he uſes, in ſeveral places upon this ſubject, and ſhew how he explains the impoſſibility of continence: I cannot imagine how he can reconcile this to that liſe, which he ſaid he had led, without reproach, all the time of his celibacy, till he was forty five years old (114).’ He is accuſed of having preached, that it is lucky, if five maids, and as many men, be found in a whole city, who have preſerved their chaſtity to twenty years of age; and that this would exceed the purity of the apoſtolic ages, and the ages of the martyrs; and that a man, who lives, without a wife, as much tranſcends the powers of nature, as if he lived without eating (115). Theſe are things which we muſt not attempt to juſtify. They are exceſſes, and firſt motions, which Luther, doubtleſs, retracted before his death. What can be ſaid more ſatirical againſt the laws canonical and civil, which force no body to marry, and which prohibit marrying any more than one wife? Theſe principles of Luther are inconſiſtent with monogamy. I doubt not but theſe ſallies of his zeal, againſt monaſtic vows, gave grounds to the accuſation that was formed againſt him. George duke of Saxony, complained, that ſo many adulteries had never been known, as ſince Luther's teaching that a woman, who conceived not by her husband, might apply to another man; and that if ſhe happened to be pregnant, her husband was to take care of the child, whilſt a husband, whoſe wife was barren, might uſe the ſame privilege. This prince charged this on Luther himſelf (116), in a letter he wrote to him in the year 1526. ‘ Quando tam numeroſa perpetrata ſunt adulteria quam poſtea quam tu ſcribere non dubitaſti: ſi mulier è viro ſuo concipere nequeat, ut ad alium ſe transferat à quo poſſit fœcundari, & maritus prolem inde natam alere teneatur: Itidemque vir faciat (117). This was carrying the point higher than Lycurgus.

[X] A thouſand fables have been invented concerning his death.] Some have ſaid, that he died a ſudden death: others that he killed himſelf; others that the devil ſtrangled him; others that his corps ſtunk ſo abominably, that they were forced to leave it in the way as they were carrying it to be interred. Nor are they people of mean figure and credit, who vent theſe calumnies, but the moſt famous writers; which reflects on the whole body of Popery; for ſuch fables ought not to paſs the preſs: the cenſors of books ought to expunge them, unleſs they ſaw them judicially proved. We ſhall ſee who theſe authors are, that have publiſhed theſe impertinences. ‘ Pontificii . . . . aſſerunt mortem Lutheri fuiſſe malam & infelicem, ſed de mortis genere non unam eandemque fovent ſententiam. Some contend, that* Luther laid violent hands upon himſelf; this was the opinion of Thomas Bozius, who, in ſupport thereof, cites theſe words from Cornelius à Lapide. Luther, when he had ſupped heartily, being in the night preſſed by deſpair, and diabolical fury, diſpatched himſelf by the help of a rope, as is aſſerted by his ſervants, ſince converted to the orthodox Faith. Others, as Bellarmin, falſly ſuggeſt, that Luther died ſuddenly, for which he quotes a paſſage out of Cochlæus's Life of Luther, which runs thus: Luther was taken off by a ſudden death, for having in the evening ſupped ſplendidly, and being merry in good health, and having made all the company laugh at his facetious ſtories, he the ſame night died. Again, ſome have impudently proceeded ſo far as to give out that he was taken away by the devil. Thus William Beſſæus a French Jeſuit writes, Luther having drank heartily, and being well ſtuffed with meat, without the leaſt ſign of piety, went to his bed, but paſſed the night in hell, with the devils. Hence Coſterus, in his envenomed poem, on the death of Luther, ſays,

‘ Fabianus Juſtinian gives his approbation to all theſe ſtories in the following words: many are of opinion that Luther himſelf was taken away by a ſudden and unprovided death by the agency of his own evil ſpirit, becauſe the Phyſicians, when called to him either knew not what to make of his diſeaſe or pretended it was an apoplexy. . . . . *There is an account of Luther's death, by perſons worthy of credit, and who were eye-witneſſes thereof, ſuch as Juſtus Jonas, Michael Cælius, John Aurifaber of Wiemar, who, before God, and in the preſence of Chriſt, teſtify, that a true and faithful account of the death of Luther, is given in the eighth volume of his works, wherein the curious reader may be largely informed of that matter, as well as from Mattheſius Sleidan, and Thuanus, a Roman Cathotholic . . . world [Y]. I have ſaid nothing of his marriage, becauſe I ſpeak largely of it in another place [Z]. His greateſt enemies cannot deny, but that he had eminent qualities, and hiſtory affords nothing more ſurpriſing than what he has done : for a ſimple Monk to be able to give Popery ſo rude a ſhock [AA], that there needed but ſuch another intirely to

'thruſt down the throat of theſe calumniators. . . . . Even now that Luther is dead, the Papiſts cannot let him reſt, but ſhew their hatred to him, and invent new lies concerning him. For they pretend, that the body of this choſen inſtrument of God, was left in the high way, becauſe, of it's intolerable ſtench.' Some have publiſhed, that Luther died like Arius. Theſe are Simon Fontain's words (119). 'Some Catholic's who had opportunities to know how the the thing truly happened, have written, that, riſing to eaſe nature, he fell down dead.' Father Maimbourg has rejected all theſe fooliſh ſtories, but he has been miſtaken in a notable fact. 'The elector of Saxony, ſays he (120), cauſed his body to be conveyed with a moſt magnificent pomp to Wittemberg, where he erected for him a monument of white marble, ſurrounded with the ſtatues of the twelve apoſtles, as if he had been the thirteenth, with reſpect to Germany.' Mr Seckendorf has ſhewn, that this monument, and theſe ſtatues, are chimera's (121).

I ſhall here ſet down a paſſage of a Paris Divine, who reproached the Lutherans with acting contrary to their principles. 'They had always condemned, ſays he (122), the pomp with which the Catholics buried their dead in paying them the laſt honour of ſepulture, blaming the ſermons that were preached in honour of the deceaſed, and ſaying, that it were much better to have charitably beſtowed on the poor what was thus ſpent in theſe funeral pomps and honours. On the whole, that it was all one, and equally Chriſtian, to be buried in a dunghill and without tapers, as to be depoſited in holy ground, with all this pomp. If what they ſaid was before true, why did they employ ſuch expence and coſt to lay their Luther in his grave ? Why did they not give this money to the poor, which was ſpent in conducting him from Iſleben to Wittemberg ? Which could not be done for a ſmall ſum. Why did they not bury him in a dunghill, where he might have rotted as well as at Wittemberg ? In ſhort, if this veneration is condemned by the holy ſcriptures (as they falſly think) why have they uſed it ?' It is certain that they who reform do not always conſider, that there are ſome abuſes, which ſhould not be ſpoken againſt for fear of condemning themſelves beforehand; theſe being things into which people quickly relapſe.

[Y] Nor did they forbear publiſhing lyes, upon this ſubject, till he had left this world.] A pamphlet was publiſhed at Naples, and in other places ; the ſubſtance whereof was this. Luther, being dangerouſly ſick, deſired to communicate, and died as ſoon as he had received the viaticum. As he was dying, he deſired that his body might be laid upon the altar to be adored ; but that requeſt being neglected, he was buried. There aroſe a furious tempeſt at his interrment as if the end of the world was at hand. The terror was univerſal. They who lifted up their eyes to heaven, perceived, that the hoſt, which the deceaſed had preſumed to take, was ſuſpended in the air. It was gathered up with great veneration, and laid in a ſacred place, and the tempeſt ceaſed. It returned the night following with ſtill greater fury, and filled all the town with conſternation. The next day Luther's ſepulchre was opened, and found empty, and a ſulphureous ſtench proceeded from it, which no body could bear. The aſſiſtants fell ſick of it, and many of them repented, and returned into the pale of the Catholic church (123). This pamphlet was written in Italian, and it was ſaid in it, with an air of triumph, that it contained a miracle in honour of Jeſus Chriſt, for the terror of the wicked, and the conſolation of good people ; and that this event was known by letters from the French embaſſador (124). Luther, having read this pamphlet the twenty-firſt of March 1545, cauſed it to be printed, and added a poſtſcript to it. Some Roman Catholics, being aſhamed of this impoſture, endeavoured to ward off the infamy, by another fraud. They endeavoured to perſuade the world, that Luther, or ſome of his friends, were the authors of this romance ; but there are very authentic proofs to the contrary. 'Fuerunt ex adverſa parte, quos protervi figmenti puduit, & ideo inventorem ejus ipſum Lutherum ſubſtituere voluerunt, vel aliquem ex ſuis; impudenter utique & vene. Extant enim . . . literæ Landgravii ad electorem Saxoniæ d. 12. Mart. authenticæ, in quibus ei relationem iſtam Italicam miſit, ſignificans, ſe eam ab Auguſtano quodam, cujus literas etiam adjunxit, accepiſſe, ex quibus percipitur typis excuſam ſchedam illum Neapoli & multis aliis locis fuiſſe (125).' What a ſcandal is it to thoſe who underſtand the nature of ſcandal, to find ſuch effects of a falſe zeal for religion?

[Z] I ſpeak largely of Luther's marriage in another place.] To wit, in the article BORE. I have but one obſervation more to make, and it is deſigned for the correcting a fault of the famous Joſeph Hall, biſhop of Exeter. He ſays, that a malicious apoſtate † affirms, that 'Luther had been the day before a monk, the next day betrothed, the day after a huſband, and the next day after a father (126). My informer (127), continues he, maintains this laſt by the teſtimony of Eraſmus ‡, who, in one of his letters to his friend, Daniel Mauchius of Ulm, mentions the ſame ſtory more at large. Pray, reader, look over all this vaſt volume of Eraſmus's Epiſtles, Refut. p. 28, 29. and if there be no ſuch perſon, (as indeed there is none) nor any ſuch letter ; judge you what we are to think of the veracity of theſe people.' He is to blame to cenſure the perſon, who alledged Eraſmus's teſtimony ; and he would not have cenſured him, if he had known what is found in the 278th page of Chytræus's annals. We there find that Luther's adverſaries alledged a certain letter of Eraſmus (128), not printed ; wherein he makes mention of the too haſty lying-in of Luther's wife (129). So that Joſeph Hall ought not to have inſiſted on this Letter's not appearing in the vaſt volume of Eraſmus's letters. If he had treated it as a forgery, he had been much to blame. See above (130) the ſame fact, in another letter of this author. That which might be very juſtly ſaid, is, that Eraſmus had acknowledged the falſity of this news (131). From hence we may learn how hard a taſk it is to confute a man on matters of fact: for we muſt know almoſt an infinite number of them to oppoſe with ſafety any thing that an adverſary affirms or denies.

[A A] We cannot ſufficiently admire that a ſimple monk ſhould be able to give Popery ſo rude a ſhock.] How many ſtates and nations did he induce, in a little time, to ſeparate from the Romiſh communion ? This was repreſented very happily, though in ſomewhat a burleſque manner on a piece of tapeſtry. Read this paſſage, taken from a letter of Coſtar. 'The laſt time the king was at Chalons, a very rich piece of tapeſtry was hung in his chamber, which came from the late queen of Navarre; in which were repreſented Luther and Calvin, who gave the Pope a clyſter, which put the good man into ſuch commotion, that he was ſeen in another place taken with a great vomiting and looſeneſs, and evacuating abundance of kingdoms and ſovereignties, Denmark, Sweden, the duchy of Saxony, &c.' Wickliff, John Huſs, and ſeveral others had attempted the ſame thing, but did not ſucceed. This was, you will ſay, becauſe they were not favoured with a concurrence of circumſtances: they had no leſs merit nor abilities than Luther; but they undertook the cure of the diſeaſe before the criſis ; and, as we may ſay, in the increaſe of the moon. Luther, on the contrary, attacked it at a critical time, when it was arrived to the higheſt pitch ; when it was impoſſible it ſhould grow worſe; and therefore, according to the courſe of nature, muſt either ceaſe or diminiſh: for when things are arrived to the higheſt point of their aſcenſion, they commonly begin to decline (132). He ſowed in the full moon, when the wane was juſt drawing on: he had the ſame good fortune, as thoſe remedies have which are employed laſt, and which carry away the glory of the cure, becauſe applied, when to over-throw the Romiſh church, is what we cannot ſufficiently admire. Some attribute the revolution, brought about by his miniſtry, to certain poſitions of the ſtars [BB]. It is not true, as ſome affirm, that his enterprize has inſpired ſeveral people with a contempt for the Chriſtian religion [CC]. He, who would be throughly acquainted with the hiſtory when the diſtemper has diſcharged it's malignity. You may, if you pleaſe, add, that the concurrence of Francis I, and Charles V, was fatal in this affair. I anſwer, that all this notwithſtanding, there muſt have been eminent gifts in Luther to produce ſuch a revolution as he has done. Here is an excellent thought of Father Paul (133). ‘If there was any thing, in the ſetting up of this novelty (134), that gave ſcandal as I ſhall relate it, yet it is well known, that Leo's predeceſſors made many like conceſſions, and from leſs honeſt motives, and had carried their avarice and extortions farther. But frequently good opportunities of doing great things are loſt for want of knowing them [‡], or knowing how to make uſe of them. Beſides, that, we muſt wait the time, that God has appointed to puniſh the faults and corruptions of men. And all this concurred under Leo's pontificate, of whom we ſpeak at preſent.’ It muſt be acknowledged, that ſeveral circumſtances concurred to favour Luther: Learning flouriſhed among the laity, whilſt church-men would not renounce their barbariſm, and perſecuted the learned and ſcandalized all the world, by an unbridled luſt. See the margin (135). It was ſaid, with reaſon, that Eraſmus, by his railleries, prepared the way for Luther. He was his St John Baptiſt, his forerunner. Simon Fontaine complains, that occaſionally Eraſmus did more miſchief than Luther, becauſe Luther did only open the door wider, after Eraſmus had picked the lock, and half opened it (136).

[BB] Some attribute the revolution brought about by his miniſtry, to certain poſitions of the ſtars.] Paul Jovius goes ſo much into this profane thought, as to impute to a malignant conſtellation, not only what happened in Germany, by means of Luther, but alſo the converſion of the Indians in the eaſt and weſt: and when he conſiders, that the faith of people changed almoſt at the ſame time, in the four parts of the world, ſome embracing Mahometiſm others Chriſtianity, and others Lutheraniſm, he cannot believe but the influences of the ſtars had brought this about by their occult and pernicious qualities. ‘Nec multo poſt exarſit in Germania, ſays he (137), authore Luthero dira hæreſis, quæ populis, ut in Perſide acciderat, ad inſaniam verſis, Chriſtiani dogmatis placita, & veteris ſacrorum ritus vehementiſſimè conturbavit. Ita ut facilè crediderim ab oculta cœli poteſtate, malignoque ſyderum concurſu proveniſſe, ut religiones toto terrarum orbe enatis factionibus uno tempore ſcinderentur, quando non Mahometani modo Chriſtianique, ſed & remotiſſimæ gentes idololatræ, aut ſydera aut portenta pro Diis venerantes, cum in India quæ ad Orientem vergit, tum in Novo orbe ad Occiduam plagam reperto, novas ſacrorum opiniones induerint.’ Florimond de Remond ſeems to applaud this notion: he gives it in French, and complains of a Proteſtant tranſlator, who had omitted that paſſage. ‘Almoſt at the ſame time, ſays Jovius, that Iſmael ſeized upon the empire of the Perſians, and changed the religion, blending it with the new Mahometan ſuperſtition, there aroſe in Germany, under Luther's authority, that monſtrous Hereſy, which endeavoured to deſtroy the Catholic religion, and all that antiquity had received; as the people, enraged and bigotted with their new follies and ſuperſtitions, had done in Perſia: by which means, ſays he, I willingly admit, that, by a ſecret power of heaven, and a malignant influence of the ſtars, all the religions in the univerſe began to change; ſince not only Mahometans, but alſo Chriſtians, nay idolatrous nations, the moſt remote, who worſhipped idols, both in the Eaſt-Indies and in the new world towards the Weſt, fell into new religions and opinions at the ſame time. This is what the Latin of Jovius ſays. But in his French tranſlation, the reformed ſincerity, the ſcrupulous conſcience of his tranſlator is remarkable, who paſſes over all that Jovius ſays of this change of religions, and this monſtrous Lutheran Hereſy ſprung up in Saxony: this grieved him at the heart. With what fidelity do they handle holy and ſacred books, when they thus impudently mutilate the preſent Hiſtorians to ſuppreſs a ſentence relating to Luther (138).’ The delicacy of ſuch tranſlators cannot be approved. If there be zeal in their conduct, it is a zeal ſo blind, ſo ſuperſtitious, ſo mean and childiſh, that it deſerves to be given up to their adverſaries indignation. Note, that Lipſius attributed alſo to the ſtars the fondneſs of the XVIth century for diſputes in religion (139). Fatalis iſta eſt ingeniorum ſcabies, ut omnes diſputare malint, quam vivere .... (140). Ita loquor, quia velut à cœlo, &, ut dixerim, aſtro aliquo eſt hæc peſtis. Atque ut corporum quidam morbi certis temporibus interveniunt: ſic nunc iſte animorum. Viri, fœminæ, ſenes, pueri, quæſtiunculis ludunt & laſciviunt: eoque ventum, ut pro parum ſano ſit, qui non ſic inſanit. Myſterium Theologia erat, facta eſt populare oblectamentum. He pretends, that the ſoul is ſubject, as the body, to ſome diſtempers, which return from time to time; and he reckons, in the number of theſe diſeaſes of the ſoul, the ſpirit of diſputing, and the change of religion, which reigned at that time. He relates a paſſage of Nicephorus Gregoras, containing a deſcription of the like ſtate. All places rang with Theological diſputes; even they who knew not what was to be believed, nor what they themſelves pretended to believe, talked of nothing, but of Theology, in the markets and theatres (141). ‘Vis imaginem claram horum temporum? Nicephori Gregoræ iſta lege. [*] Apud nos etiam opificibus effuſa ſunt arcana Theologiæ, atque ita omnes inhiant ratiocinatiunculis & ſermonibus ſyllogiſticis, ut herbæ & paſcuis armenta. Et illi, qui de rectâ fide ambigui ſunt, & qui nec quomodo credendum ſit ſciunt, nec quid ſit illud quod credere ſe dicunt; illi inquam & fora & porticus & theatra omnia Theologiâ compleverunt.’ Without recurring to conſtellations, the ordinary ſanctuary of ignorance, ſecond cauſes might have been diſcovered on earth, which God made uſe of to effect the change that happened in Germany in the XVIth century.

[CC] It is not true .... that his enterprize has inſpired ſeveral people with contempt of the Chriſtian religion.] If Coëffeteau had ſaid, that Luther made abundance of people damn themſelves by the profeſſion of Hereſy, he would have ſpoken according to his prejudices, and we ſhould have pardoned him; but this is not the evil he deplores. Let us hear him. ‘Mean time, ſays he (142), inſtead of repreſenting to us here the ſallies of this furious ſpirit of Luther, whoſe inſolence has diſpleaſed the Calviniſts themſelves, the Sieur du Pleſſis, ought to have meditated on the horrour of his crime, and repreſented to himſelf the great loſs of ſouls, with which he is chargeable before God and his angels, for having been the author of all the diſputes that are ariſen in Chriſtendom. God ordained in the antient law [], that if it happened, that any having a controverſy with another, ſhould ſtrike a woman with child, ſo as to deſtroy her fruit, his life ſhould go for the life of the child. What then will the divine juſtice appoint againſt thoſe, who, by their ambition, and by the diſputes, which they have excited in the church, have occaſioned the death of ſo many millions of ſouls, who are diſguſted at the Chriſtian religion, to ſee thoſe, who profeſs themſelves miniſters of it, ſo ill agreed upon the principal points of the holy Goſpel.’ We may affirm, that the number of thoſe who were lukewarm, indifferent, or diſguſted with Chriſtianity, diminiſhed much more than it increaſed by the diſturbances Europe felt on occaſion of Luther. Every one choſe his ſide with warmth; ſome remained in the Romiſh communion, others embraced the Proteſtant: the former conceived a greater zeal for their religion than they had before; the later had an ardent zeal for their new belief. No body can ſhow thoſe who, as Coëffeteau ſays, rejected Chriſtianity, upon account of ſo many diſputes. Had he ſaid, that the diviſions of Chriſtians, and their conduct towards one another, after having formed themſelves into ſects, are moſt proper to bring the goſpel into diſcredit, and the people into unbelief, I ſhould have agreed with him; but he muſt have ſuppoſed, at the ſame time, a thing which very few practiſe. He muſt have ſuppoſed, that there are a great many without double weights; that is, who examine, without prejudice, what happens at home and abroad. But where are theſe to be met with? Where are thoſe, who, by the force of cuſtom, do not judge the ſame things to be moſt juſt, when they make others ſuffer them, and moſt unjuſt when they ſuffer them themſelves? In ſuch a diſpoſition as this there is no danger that the multiplicity of ſects ſhould create many Sceptics: let what will happen, every one will ſtick faſt by the party he has choſen. The antiperiſtaſis, which the new Philoſophers have baniſhed from nature, takes place in religion. Zeal cools, when we are not taken notice of, nor ſurrounded with another ſect, and rekindles when we are. We may here apply the verſes that were made upon Menelaus (143), and ſay, that Coëffeteau has miſtaken the matter: he has taken that for a real fact, which muſt happen only in caſe men reaſoned after a certain manner.

(143) He was weary of Helena while he had her in an undiſturbed poſſeſſion, and was all on fire when ſhe was taken away from him. See, above, citat. (42), of the article HELENA.

[DD] I was amazed to find that cardinal Perron durſt ſay, that Luther believed the mortality of the ſoul.] See in what words he affirms it (144): ‘Luther denied the immortality of the ſoul, and ſaid, that it died with the body; and that God afterwards raiſed both again: ſo that, in his opinion, no one enjoyed the viſible preſence of God; whence he drew an argument againſt praying to ſaints, ſhewing, that the ſaints hear not our prayers. The church believes that the ſouls of the ſaints, and of the bleſſed enjoy the preſence of God as ſoon as they are dead; and Luther reckons this among the impieties of the Romiſh church, that ſhe believes the immortality of the ſoul.’ You ſee he is not charged with abſolutely denying the puniſhments and rewards of another life, but only with deferring them, till after the final reſurrection of all men. This is leſſening very much the heinouſneſs of the accuſation, which others had brought againſt him; but this is not avoiding the crime of lying and ſlandering. It is a common ſaying, that all romances are founded upon ſome hiſtory: I have therefore ſuſpected, that cardinal du Perron built this fable upon ſome words of Luther, ill underſtood, and found in quotations; and I, having not the leiſure to turn over all the great volumes of this miniſter, have conſulted a Divine of the Confeſſion of Augsburg, and deſired him to inform me if there were any pretext that could occaſion this cardinal's ſpeaking thus. The ſubſtance of the anſwer, he was pleaſed to make me, is as follows: Luther never taught that the ſoul died with the body, and was to riſe again with the body. It can never be proved by his works that he was of this opinion; and he has very clearly ſhewn, that he believed quite contrary. Conſult what he has written upon the eighth verſe of the fourth chapter of Geneſis, where he ſpeaks of the death of Abel. The origin of the calumny is in a letter he writ to Amſdorf in the year 1522; in which he appears much inclined to believe, that the ſouls of the juſt ſleep to the day of judgment, without knowing where they are, &c. He does not pretend to ſay, that they are dead in this interval, but only lay in a profound reſt and ſleep; in which opinion he followed many fathers of the antient church ‡. He rectified this opinion, in proceſs of time; and though he ſeems in his later writings to attribute reſt to the ſouls of the predeſtinate, he does not mean thereby a reſt which is a profound ſleep, and deprives them of the viſion and converſation of God and the Angels. See his commentary upon the twenty fourth chapter of Geneſis, where he ſpeaks very largely of the ſtate of ſouls departed.

[EE] In Nicole Grenier's book, whereof we ſhall ſee a long paſſage.] This book is intituled, The Shield of Faith, by way of dialogue, extracted from the holy Scriptures, and holy Fathers, and moſt antient doctors of the church. The author, a regular canon of St Victor, dedicated it to Henry II. I cannot tell in what year he publiſhed it the firſt time. La Croix du Maine, and du Verdier Vau-Privas, mention only the edition of Paris 1566, and 1567. They ſay nothing of that of Avignon 1549, which I uſe, and which is not the firſt; for the title imports, that the book was reviſed and enlarged by the author. The edition mentioned by du Verdier Vau-Privas contains an apology againſt the Lutheran bound, which attempted to gnaw the Shield of Faith. I ſuppoſe he means Bartholomew Cauſſe, miniſter of Geneva, author of a book intituled, The true Shield of the Chriſtian Faith; in ſeveral dialogues, demonſtrating, from holy Scripture, the errors and falſe allegations of a book intituled, The Shield of Faith; formerly written by a monk of St Victor at Paris, calling himſelf the Bienallant (well-going). My edition is of Geneva 1563, reviſed and very much enlarged. Let this be ſaid in favour of Bibliographers. Let us now come to the point, and relate what the canon of St Victor ſays of Luther. ‘Luther's ambition, and deſire of glory and honour, was ſo great, that, tho' he was but a meer Presbyter, and an Auguſtine, an Apoſtate, and an uncowled Monk, yet he took upon him the epiſcopal office and dignity. For being once in the city of Liſbon (145), he preſumed to ordain two presbyters in St Andrew's church, impoſing hands upon them, and ſinging the anthem Veni Sancte Spiritus. Moreover he cauſed himſelf to be carried in a pompous chariot, or litter, as a great prince, ſurrounded and attended with gentlemen and guards. And, in his entry into towns, there were vollies of ſhot, and firing of cannons. This was not imitating Jeſus Chriſt, his Apoſtles, and the holy Doctors of the church, who, by their preaching and example recommended humility and ſimplicity. Very different is the life of true Chriſtians, and heretical Antichriſts. The Life of the Apoſtles, and holy Doctors of the church was humble, ſober, chaſte, modeſt, and devout: but the life of the falſe Doctor and Apoſtate, Luther, was proud, gluttonous, laſcivious, infamous, and ſenſual: for it is notorious and evident to all, that, having violated his religious vows, and eccleſiaſtical continence, he took for his wife, or whore, a nun, by whom he had three baſtards and illegitimates. His gluttony was the cauſe of his great incontinence; for, as St Jerome ſays, Venter mero æſtuans, facile deſpumat in libidinem. ——— The ſcum of luſt eaſily riſes in a ſtomach boiling with wine. And, to ſpeak the truth, Luther ought rather to be called the prince and doctor of drunkards and gluttons, than of Saxons and Germans. He was a ſecond Epicurus, or Sardanapalus, ſince it is commonly ſaid of him, that, at every dinner and ſupper, he drank two gallons of luſcious rich wine; and eat of the moſt exquiſite and delicate diſhes; which he continued to the laſt: for he died ſuddenly, full glutted, after having ſupped plentifully, and ſtuffed his paunch. But let us leave this wretch (146).’ It is for the intereſt of the Lutherans, and all Proteſtants in general, to re-publiſh the fabulous impertinences their adverſaries publiſhed againſt the reformers of the XVIth century. They ſhew, that they were wholly conducted by a blind prejudice; a prejudice which is to their reproach and diſadvantage. Here you have a canon of St Victor of ſo little judgment, as to employ an objection, which overthrows Pope, cardinals, and all the prelacy, whoſe train and pompous equipages are diametrically oppoſite to the life of the Apoſtles.

(145) The author, if I miſtake not, would ſay Iſleben, but by an inexcuſable negligence, he did not well inform himſelf of the true names of towns, and fell into a ridiculous miſtake, there being in Portugal the city of Liſbon, where Luther never was of a citation from Luther [FF]. It was impoſſible for him to verify it by the original books. This leads me to make this obſervation, that nothing would be more convenient for thoſe who are accuſed of miſ-quoting this reformer, than the liberty of the moſt curious library of prince Rodolphus Auguſtus, duke of Brunſwic [GG]. Luther's life, in medals (g), publiſhed in the year 1699, contains an infinite number of particulars (h), and points out an infinite number of authors, who have ſpoken of this illuſtrious perſon. We find, in the Preface to the reader, a liſt of all thoſe who have compoſed either his elogy or his hiſtory. We there likewiſe find a confutation of the falſhoods of an anonymous author, whoſe dialogues were printed in the year 1694, with the title of Lucien en belle humeur. I only mention this circumſtance to have an opportunity of ſaying, that there is no ground to think, that Mr Fontenelle is the author of theſe dialogues (i). They might poſitively affirm, that he is not; and that he is not capable of ſo imperfect a performance. In the Vatican library at Rome is ſhewn (k) a Bible, which is ſaid to be of Luther's tranſlating, and written with his own Hand. But this is not probable, conſidering the extravagant prayer (l) at the end of it, and which appears to be of the ſame hand with the reſt. Whilſt the troops of Charles V quartered at Wittemberg in the year 1547, a ſoldier gave Martin Luther's effigies in the church of the caſtle two ſtabs with his dagger (m). The emperor did a very generous action at that time: He would not ſuffer the tomb of this pretended hereſiarch to be demoliſhed; and he forbid the attempting any thing of that nature upon pain of death [HH]. Luther had made a great progreſs in ſcholaſtic learning, and had even followed the ſect of the Nominals; which ſpun the thread fineſt in all abſtract queſtions; yet no one inveighed ſo much as he againſt the method of philoſophizing uſed at that time; nor was any man more vehemently bent againſt the great Ariſtotle. You will ſee the proofs of this in the extracts I ſhall give of an invective of Father Gretſer [II], where the Jeſuit endeavours to make out

[FF] A ſmall ruffle was given Mr Arnauld, on occaſion of a citation from Luther.] Mr le Fevre, doctor of Divinity, of the Faculty of Paris, has publiſhed what follows, in a book printed at the Hague (147) in 1685. Does not he remember, ſays he (148), ſpeaking of Mr Arnauld, that about four years ago, a miniſter having writ to him, that he had falſly cited ſome paſſages from Luther to ſhew that he denied the neceſſity of good works, and amongſt others this; let us beware of ſin; but, above all, let us beware of the law and good works, and fix only on the promiſe of God and faith: words which he cited as from a ſermon of Luther, upon a text in the New Teſtament; he found himſelf obliged to take the trouble of ſearching for this paſſage in all the works of Luther that were to be met with at Paris, and not finding it could give no other anſwer to the miniſter, who had writ to him, than confeſſing he had taken, this paſſage from Bellarmine, and at the ſame time inſiſting on this cardinal's fidelity.

[GG] The moſt curious library of prince Rodolphus Auguſtus, duke of Brunſwic.] This prince, who has joined the love of letters, to all other qualities worthy his illuſtrious family, was not ſatisfied with the magnificent library of Wolfenbuttle; he ſet up another private one, which he ſtored with a very great number of ſcarce books. Here we find all the writings that Luther publiſhed from the year 1517 to his death: the editions, I ſay, which he publiſhed and corrected himſelf, and which are preferable to the original manuſcripts, becauſe in reviſing the proofs he corrected many things that had eſcaped him. It is a much ſafer way to have recourſe to theſe editions, than to thoſe, in which all his works have been reduced into a body; for they who collected them took the liberty to mend, and change, what they thought fit (149): and this is, doubtleſs, the reaſon why the citations from Luther, upon which any controverſy ariſes, are ſo hard to be verified. We can hardly have any recourſe now, except to the volumes in folio publiſhed ſince his death. The compleat editions of all his works have cauſed the particular editions of his tracts to be neglected; and hereby almoſt all the copies of theſe particular editions are loſt, which is a misfortune. 'Libelli à Luthero 'ipſo editi diligentius quam factum eſt, aſſervari debuiſſent, non tantum, quod commodius legi poterant, 'quam in magnis, in quos, poſtmodum redacti ſunt, 'voluminibus, ſed & quia genuini & ab interpolatione 'aut incuria, quæ compilatoribus tomorum dudum imputata eſt, ſecuri erant (150).' The prince I ſpeak of, employed a Profeſſor of Helmſtadt (151) to publiſh an account of his library. See the book intituled, Antiqua Literarum monumenta, autographa Lutheri aliorumque celebrium virorum ab an. 1517, uſque ad annum 1546 reformationis ætatem & hiſtoriam egregie illuſtrantia, &c. The firſt tome of it was printed at Brunſwic, in 1690 (152), and the ſecond in 1691 (153). The overſeers even of public libraries, which are the beſt endowed, ſometimes uſe a blamable œconomy. They part with the particular tracts, when they have once all the works of an author reduced into a body: And thus it comes to paſs, that there is no verifying from theſe great libraries, whether an author, who has cited paſſages, from the firſt editions, which differ from the latter, hath acted ſincerely.

[HH] Charles V would not ſuffer Luther's tomb to be demoliſhed, and forbad the attempting any thing of that nature upon pain of death.] The Spaniards earneſtly ſollicited him to pull it down, and even deſired his bones ſhould be dug up and burnt: But the Emperor very wiſely anſwered, I have nothing farther to do with Luther; he has henceforth another judge, whoſe juriſdiction it is not lawful for me to uſurp: Know that I make war, not with the dead, but with the living, who ſtill make war againſt me. 'Violari autem ſepulchrum vetuit Carolus V, Imperator, Wittebergam expugnatam armis miniſque ingreſſus, contra quam urgebant Hiſpani omnes, eo uſque inſenſi, 'Luthero, ut & oſſibus ejus inviderent quietem, eaque 'perinde, ut huſſo factum fuerat vivo, mallent cremari; 'quos laudatiſſimus tamen Imperator graviſſimo ſermone caſtigavit, quando dixit: Nihil mihi ultra 'cum Luthero, alium ille judicem jam habet, cujus 'Juriſdictionem invadere noſtrum non eſt, neque mihi 'cum mortuis bellum eſſe ſciatis, ſed cum ſuperſtitibus 'in nos armatis. Cumque animadvertiſſet, Hiſpanos 'duci Albano & Epiſcopo Atrebatenſi, ſuadentibus ejus 'Indignitatem facti, conſentire, ſevere tandem atque 'etiam vitæ capitiſque periculo ſanxit, inviolatum Lutheri ſepulchrum ut eſſet (154).'

[II] The extracts I ſhall give of an invective of Father Gretſer.] I do not believe I am miſtaken in aſcribing to him the harangues (155) which were pronounced in the academy of Ingolſtat, the 14th of November 1606, when he preſented two licentaties in Divinity for their degrees. One of them made a long declamation, intituled, Utrum Lutherus fuerit Scholaſticus Theologus, wherein he undertook to prove the negative, and ſomething more. 'Lutherum non modo non fuiſſe Theologum Scholaſticum, ſed omnium ſubtiliorum ſcientiarum hoſtem '& calumniatorem impudentiſſimum. —— Luther 'was not only no ſcholaſtic Divine, but alſo an outrageous enemy, and calumniator of all kinds of ſubtile 'ſcience.' The proof of the firſt part of this theſis was reduced to a ſyllogiſm, which the candidate pronounced with a very audible voice; 'Ut autem, ſaid 'he (156), rem ipſam ſtatim, cunctis ambagibus omiſſis aggrediar, elata voce proclamo; Scholaſticus non 'eſt, qui craſſiſſimos, ſtupidiſſimos, &, ut ſic appellem, 'decumanos, prorſuſque aſininos contra Theologiam & 'Philoſophiam out this propoſition, Luther does not underſtand ſcholaſtic Divinity. One of the arguments made uſe of to prove this, is his teaching that one and the ſame doctrine is falſe and true at Lutherus tales errores commiſit; non eſt igitur Lutherus Scholaſticus. —— But that without dwelling on unneceſſary circumſtances, I may come to the point itſelf, I, with a loud voice, proclaim, He is no ſcholaſtic, who commits, groſs, ſtupid, and, if I may ſo call them, aſs-like errors, againſt the principles of Divinity and Philoſophy. Luther hath committed ſuch errors; therefore Luther is no ſchoolman.' He afterwards went upon the proof of the minor, for the major was ſelf-evident. He had already obſerved, that Luther boaſts of a thorough knowledge of all the ſecrets of the niceſt ſchool-divinity; and that Melanchthon hereupon has beſtowed great encomiums on him (157). ‘ Lutherus non ſemel teſtatur, omnia Scholaſticæ Theologiæ myſteria ſibi probè eſſe cognita: omnia adyta perluſtrata: omnes excuſſos angulos. Credatis fortiter Magiſtri noſtri eximii (ſic loquitur Lutherus Doctores Lovanienſes & Colonienſes compellans) *. Luthero eſſe notam Philoſophiam & Theologiam veſtram, in qua non peſſimo ingenio, nec ultima ſocordia verſatus ſit plus duodecim annis, interque Sympalæſtritas veſtros detritus. Et ne ignoraremus in quam Scholaſticæ Theologiæ familiam nomen dederit, alibi nobis exponit cùm dicit, ſe † Occami caſtra ſecutum; cujus ſectatores, tempore Lutheri, vulgò TERMINISTÆ audiebant, longeque ac latè in ſcholis regnabant, teſte ipſo Luthero; qui palam ſcribit: ſe ⸸ Occanicæ ſeu Modernorum ſectæ placita & dogmata non tantùm a limine ſalutaſſe, aut primoribus labris ſolummodò deguſtaſſe; ſed penitus imbibita tenere; his enim verbis ſuam in Scholaſtica Theologia peritiam decantat Lutherus; de qua etiam perpetuus Lutheri encomiaſtes Melanchthon ‡: Gabrielem & Cameracenſem (duos inſignes ex Occami gymnaſio Theologos) pænè ad verbum memoriter recitare poterat Lutherus. Diu multumque legit ſcripta Occami. Hujus acumen præferebat Thomæ & Scoto. —— Luther has more than once affirmed, that all the myſteries of ſcholaſtic Divinity were well known to him, that he had ſearched it's moſt hidden parts, and had penetrated even it's obſcureſt corners. You may ſafely believe, moſt excellent maſters, (theſe are the words of Luther to the doctors of Louvain and Cologn) that your Philoſophy and Divinity is well known to Luther, in which, neither with the dulleſt wit, nor with the leaſt pains, he, for twelve years together, contended with your champions. And that we may not be ignorant of what tribe of the ſcholaſtic Divines he was, he elſewhere informs us, that he fought under the banner of Occam, whoſe followers, in the time of Luther, were commonly called Terminiſts, who then reigned in the ſchools, as Luther himſelf witneſſes, and declares, that he had not only ſome knowledge of the doctrine of Occam, but underſtood it perfectly; for theſe are Luther's own words, in which he ſets out his great skill in ſcholaſtic Divinity. To the ſame purpoſe Melanchthon, the conſtant panegyriſt of Luther, ſays, that Luther could almoſt repeat word for word the writings of Gabriel and Cameracenſis, (two famous Divines in the ſchool of Occam) and that he had ſtudied, with great aſſiduity, the works of Occam, and preferred the penetration of this doctor to that of Thomas Aquinas, and Scotus.' The firſt proof of the minor is taken from Luther's having maintained, that this propoſition, The word was made fleſh, is true in Divinity, and abſolutely impoſſible and abſurd in Philoſophy. ‘ Omne verum vero conſonat. Tamen idem non eſt verum in diverſis profeſſionibus. In Theologia verum eſt, Verbum eſſe carnem factum. In Philoſophia ſimpliciter impoſſibile & abſurdum (158). —— Truth is always conſonant to truth, but the ſame thing is not true in different ſciences. In Theology, it is true, the word was made fleſh; in Philoſophy, it is impoſſible and abſurd.' The author diſplays here the common diſtinction of Divines, to maintain, that the philoſophical arguments, which Luther alledges do not oppugn the myſtery of the Trinity and Incarnation; and adds, ‘ Simili ſtoliditate dicit (Lutherus) Syllogiſmos prædictos non eſſe malos vitio formæ ſyllogiſticæ; ſed virtute & majeſtate materiæ, quæ in anguſtias rationis ſeu ſyllogiſmorum includi non poſſit. Quaſi verò nullus ſyllogiſmus & forma & materia probus formari queat de re Cœleſti & Theologica; & divinitus nobis revelata (159). —— With like ſtupidity he (Luther) affirms, ſuch ſyllogiſms are not bad thro' any defect in the ſyllogiſtic form, but becauſe of the excellency and majeſty of the matter, which cannot be pent up within the narrow bounds of reaſon or ſyllogiſm. As if no ſyllogiſm, regular both in form and matter, could be framed with reſpect to heavenly and theological matters, or ſuch as have been communicated to us by divine revelation.' He forgets not that maxim of Luther, That Divinity claſhes with the rules of Philoſophy; but that Philoſophy, in it's turn, claſhes much more with the rules of Divinity: ‘ Impingit Theologia in Philoſophiæ regulas, inquit Lutherus, ſed ipſa viciſſim magis in Theologiæ regulas (160)!' He takes notice of Luther's indignation at the Sorbonne, which had defined, that what was true in Philoſophy, was alſo true in Divinity; and he declares, he muſt be a beaſt, who diſapproves this determination. ‘ Vehementiſſimè ſtomachatur ſcholaſticus noſter in Pariſienſem Theologorum Scholam, quam Sorbonam vocant. Qua de cauſſa? Sorbona, mater errorum, peſſimè definivit, idem eſſe verum in Philoſophia & Theologia. Non tantùm Sorbona optimè & ſanctiſſimè hoc definivit; ſed & Concilium Lateranenſe ſub Leone X. Et certe tam eſt hoc evidens, ut fungum eſſe oporteat, qui diſſentiat: Nam ut album eſt album, ubicunque ponatur; & aqua eſt aqua, ubicunque collocetur; ita & verum eſt verum ubicunque conſtituatur, ſive in Theologia, ſive in Philoſophia (161). —— Our ſchoolman moſt virulently rails againſt that college of Divines in Paris, called the Sorbon: For what reaſon? Why, this Sorbon, the mother of errors, has fooliſhly determined, that the ſame thing is true in both Philoſophy and Divinity. Not only the Sorbon has wiſely and religiouſly determined this, but alſo the Lateran council, under Leo X. Nay, it is ſo evident, that a man muſt be a a very blockhead who denies it; for as white is white, wherever it be placed; and water is water wherever it is found; ſo truth is truth wherever it is eſtabliſhed, whether in Divinity or Philoſophy.' What the cenſor affirms, concerning the doctrine itſelf, I think unqueſtionable (162); but he is to blame to look upon the contrary opinion, as ſtupidity of mind; for there have been very ſubtile and ſagacious Divines (163), who maintained Luther's notion in this matter. ‘ Conſidera & hoc ſtuporis Lutherani indicium, (adds this critic 164), Aliquid eſt verum in una parte philoſophiæ, quod tamen falſum eſt in alia parte philoſophiæ. Nimirum naturam eſſe principium motus & quietis, verum erit in Phyſica: falſum in Metaphyſica & Ethica. Humor humectat, inquit Lutherus, eſt veritas in Sphæra aëris, ſed manifeſta hæreſis in Sphæra ignis. Forte propterea, quia in Sphæra ignis concreſcit in glaciem. Nam ſi non congelaretur; quomodo non madefaceret Lutherum, ſi integro aquæ dolio perfunderetur? —— Conſider this mark of Luther's ſtupidity. Something is true in one part of Philoſophy which is falſe in another; for example, that nature is the principle of motion and reſt, will be true in Phyſics, but falſe in Metaphyſics and Ethics. That humidity moiſtens, ſays Luther, is true in the ſphere of the air, but a manifeſt hereſy in the ſphere of fire. Becauſe, perhaps, in the ſphere of fire, it hardens into ice: for if it did not congeal, why ſhould it not wet Luther if a tub of water was poured on him?' If the Jeſuit had been a good Natural Philoſopher, he would have been more equitable in this laſt cenſure; he would only have ſaid, that Luther had not clearly enough explained his thought. I believe Luther had a glimpſe of what the new Philoſophers have a clear and diſtinct notion of. They ſhew, that what the Peripatetics call humidity, one of the four elementary qualities, ought to be called liquidity (165). And, in this ſenſe, Luther ſaid rightly, that humidity wets in the air, but not in the fire; for flame is a liquid body, and does not wet; conſequently it is true, that the liquid moiſtens in the elementary air, and not in the elementary fire. I know this example, at bottom, makes nothing at all for Luther's hypotheſis; but we may, however, believe, that his thought was not well underſtood. I meddle not with the other proofs of the minor of the ſyllogiſm.

Here follows a long ſcroll of reproaches againſt Ariſtotle (166). ‘Niſi caro fuiſſet Ariſtoteles, inquit Lutherus (†), vere diabolum eum fuiſſe, non puderet aſſerere. Eidem Luthero eſt Ariſtoteles, Proteus, hiſtrio, qui Græca larva Eccleſiam luſit, vaſerrimus ingeniorum illuſor, calumnioſiſſimus calumniator, ſycophanta impiiſſimus, princeps tenebrarum, triceps Cerberus, tricorpor Geryon, vere ἀπολλύων, ⸸ id eſt, perdens, & vaſtator Eccleſiæ; merus logodædalus, & logomachus, vaſtator piæ doctrinæ, beſtia, caligo hominum, & quidem teterrima. Momus, imo Momus Momorum ‡. Beſtia gentilis ſimilis hydræ in Lerna. In quo fere nihil eſt Philoſophiæ. Impiiſſimus eſt. Publicus veritatis, & ex profeſſo hoſtis. Gentilis animarum carnifex. Hircus, vel potius hircocervus. Bis ſacerrimus Ariſtoteles. In cute perfectus Epicurus. Non mihi perſuadebitis, inquit Lutherus, Philoſophiam eſſe garrulitatem illam de materia, motu, infinito, loco, vacuo, tempore, quæ fere in Ariſtotele ſola diſcimus: talia quæ nec intellectum, nec affectum, nec communes hominum mores quidquam juvent: tantùm contentionibus ſerendis, ſeminandiſque idonea. Quod ſi maxime quid valerent, tot tamen opinionibus confuſa ſunt, ut, quo quis certius aliquod ſequi propoſuerit, hoc incertior feratur, & faces Euboïcas ſectetur; & ſerò tandem cum Proteo ſibi fuiſſe negotium, pœniteat.——If Ariſtotle had not been fleſh, ſays Luther, I ſhould make no difficulty to affirm, that he was a true devil. To the ſame Luther, Ariſtole appeared a Proteus, a Buffoon, who, in a Greek maſk, deceived the church; a crafty deluder of minds, a moſt outrageous calumniator, a moſt impious ſycophant, a prince of darkneſs, a three headed Cerberus, a three bodied Geryon, a true Apollyon, that is, deſtroyer, and ſpoiler, of the church, a very juggler in words, a prater, a ſubverter of pious doctrine, a beaſt, and a moſt terrible deceiver of men, a Momus, yea, the Momus of Momus's, a heathen brute, like the hydra in Lerna, in whom there is hardly any thing of Philoſophy, a moſt impious perſon, a public and profeſſed enemy of truth, a heathen murtherer of ſouls, a buck goat, doubly wicked Ariſtotle, a perfect Epicure. You ſhall never perſuade me, ſays Luther, that Philoſophy conſiſts in prating about matter, motion, infinite, ſpace, void, time, which are almoſt the only things we learn in Ariſtotle, which neither improve the underſtanding, nor the inclinations, or common manners of men, ſerving only to ſow and nouriſh contentions: which granting them to be neceſſary, yet the many opinions about them are ſo confuſed, that whoever propoſes to attain certainty by purſuing them, becomes but the more uncertain, following an Eubœan torch, and repenting, at laſt, that ever he had any thing to do with this Proteus.’ It cannot be ſaid, that he was ſo incenſed againſt the head of the Peripatetics, only after he had quarelled with Popery; for it may be proved, that he was of the ſame mind before he had done any thing to diſpleaſe the court of Rome. Read this paſſage of Gretſer: ‘Neque unquam bene erga Ariſtotelem affectus fuit; quod diſces ex his, quæ anno Domini 1516, ad Langum Auguſtinianum prius ſcripſit, quàm aperte inſaniret *: Mitto has literas ad eximium D. Jodocum Iſenacenſem, plenas quæſtionum adverſus Logicam, & Philoſophiam, & Theologiam, id eſt, blaſphemiarum, & maledictionum contra Ariſtotelem, Porphyrium, Sententiarios, perdita ſcilicet ſtudia noſtri ſeculi. Sic enim interpretabuntur, quibus decretum eſt, non quinquennio cum Pythagoricis, ſed perpetuò, & in æternum cum mortuis ſilentium tenere, omnia credere, ſemper auſcultare, nec unquam ſaltem levi præludio contra Ariſtotelem, & Sententias velitari, & muſſitare. Quid enim non credant, qui Ariſtoteli crediderunt, vera eſſe, quæ ipſe calumnioſiſſimus calumniator aliis affingit & imponit tam abſurda, ut aſinus (Lutherus) & lapis non poſſint tacere ad illa? Nihil ita ardet animus, quàm hiſtrionem illum (Ariſtotelem) qui tam vera Græca larva Eccleſiam luſit, multis revelare, ignominiamque ejus cunctis oſtendere, ſi ocium eſſet. Habeo in manus commentariolos in 1. Phyſicorum, quibus fabulam Ariſtei denuò agere ſtatui in meum iſtum Protea (Ariſtotelem). Pars crucis meæ vel maxima eſt, quod videre cogor fratrum optima ingenia, bonis ſtudiis nata, in iſtis cœnis vitam agere, & operam perdere (167)——Neither was he ever well affected to Ariſtotle, as you may ſee from what he wrote in the year 1516, to Langus Auguſtinianus, before he publickly ſhewed his folly. I ſend theſe letters to the illuſtrious Jodocus of Eiſenach, full of objections againſt Logic, Philoſophy, and Divinity, that is, of blaſphemies and curſes againſt Ariſtotle, Porphyry, the Sententiarians, thoſe deſtructive ſtudies of our age: for ſo they will determine, to whom not only a Pythagorean ſilence of five years, but even a perpetual and everlaſting one, like that of the dead, is enjoined, and to hear, and believe, without daring ſo much as to whiſper, or hint the leaſt doubt of what is delivered by Ariſtotle, or in the ſentences. What will they not believe, who believe Ariſtotle a moſt outrageous calumniator, who impoſes upon others ſuch abſurdities, as an aſs, (Luther) or a ſtone, would ſcarce bear without ſpeaking. There is nothing I ſo much deſire, as to expoſe this buffoon (Ariſtotle) who, in a Greek maſque, deceives the church, and to make him juſtly odious to all, if I had but time. I have a commentary by me, on the firſt book of his Phyſics, in which the ſtory of Ariſteus ſhall be re-acted upon this Proteus of mine (Ariſtotle). My greateſt vexation is, to ſee my brethren, who have excellent talents, and ſeem born for the improvement of learning, toiling at ſuch ſtuff, and loſing all their time.’ This Jeſuit produces a great many other paſſages, injurious to Ariſtotle, taken from Luther's writings.

[KK] Luther taught that one and the ſame doctrine is falſe . . . in Philoſophy, and true in Divinity.] I have ſpoken of this in the foregoing remark: but here I add, that the moſt rigid followers of Luther have deſerted him upon this article; and have with ſo much force, oppoſed their brethren, who revived this notion that they have obliged them to retract it (168). Let us ſay alſo, that ſome miſunderſtanding may mix in this diſpute, and much controverſy about words; and that Luther's doctrine would be wrongfully blamed, if he had expreſſed himſelf after this manner, the ſame doctrines which appear falſe and impoſſible, when we judge of them by natural light, are true and certain when we judge of them by the light of the word of God. But to pretend, that even after revelation has ſhewed us that a doctrine is true, it continues to be falſe in Philoſophy, is a groſs miſtake. It is much more reaſonable to own, that philoſophical light, whoſe evidence hath ſeemed to be a ſure guide to us in our judgments of things, was fallacious and illuſive; and that it muſt be rectified by the new knowledge communicated to us by revelation. Affirm, as long as you pleaſe, according to the notions which Logic teaches us, in the chapter de oppoſitis, that a man is not a ſtone; but beware of affirming, as Ariſtotle would have done, that it is impoſſible a man ſhould be a ſtone: would not Ariſtotle have affirmed, that it is impoſſible God ſhould be born of a woman; that God ſhould ſuffer cold and heat; that God ſhould die: in a word, that God is man? And would he not be miſtaken in theſe aſſertions? Now ſince we know that the oppoſition betwixt the idea of God, and the idea of man, hinders not that one of theſe beings may be truly affirmed of the other, ought we not to ſay that nothing hinders but a man and a ſtone may be one the ſubject, and the other the predicate, of an affirmative, and móſt true propoſition? Let us ſay then, that the Jeſuit, who exclaimed ſo much againſt Luther, perplexes himſelf wretchedly, and is angry without reaſon. One would think he affirms it abſolutely impoſſible for two created natures to be united hypoſtatically; and does he not ſee, that, if this be once allowed impoſſible, the ſame may be concluded againſt the myſtery of the incarnation; for which he is ſo angry with Luther? ‘Audite, ſays he (169), & obſtupeſcite, vel potius execramini; non tantùm imperitiam, ſed & intolerabilem blaſphemiam. Nec minus, inquit Lutherus, imo magis diſparata eſt prædicatio; Deus eſt homo; quam ſi dicas, homo eſt aſinus. An non hæc Lutheri impia theſis totum incarnationis myſterium ex imis fundamentis evertit? Si magis diſparata eſt illa, Deus eſt homo; quàm iſta,

If there is more diſparity in ſaying*, God is man, than in affirming, man is an aſs, then it is more falſe that God is man, than that man is an aſs, which yet is ſimply falſe, which falſehood ariſes from the disjunction of the predicate from the ſubject, becauſe there being no connection between the predicate and the ſubject, it follows that, without lying, the predicate cannot be affirmed of the ſubject. If then in that propoſition, God is man; there is as great, nay, greater disjunction of the ſubject, from the predicate, and vice verſa, then that propoſition, God is man, is falſe, as is this man is an aſs, becauſe diſparities, cannot be affirmed of one another, as long as they are not connected by a common band. But if the ſubject, and predicate of this propoſition, God is man, are connected by a true, real, ſubſtantial, and hypoſtatic bond, then it follows that Luther lied, when he affirmed that the ſubject and predicate of that propoſition, was equally, nay, more diſtant, and diſproportionate, than the ſubject and predicate in this, man is an aſs. What ſort of a Scholaſtic Divine then was Luther? who, through his own ſtupidity, and ſottiſhneſs, overturns and deſtroys the oeconomy of the holy Scripture; nay, like a very Turk he denies it; and to all who have a mind to deny it ſhews not only a hole, but opens a a large breach.’ We need only conſider this paſſage to ſee the unfairneſs and blind paſſion of that writer.

Francis Garaſſe has diverted himſelf with this facetious humour of Luther. ‘This fat fellow, ſays he (171), writing againſt the ſacred faculty of Divinity, in the ſecond Tome of his works, ſuppoſes certain concluſions againſt the faculty, and then condemns them, as in the name of the whole univerſity, impertinently playing upon a thing of conſequence. The title of the tract is this. ‘Apologia Philippi Melanchthonis adverſûs furioſum decretum Theologaſtrorum pro Luthero, &c. The three firſt concluſions are theſe: In Libro Joannis Majoris ſunt PLAUSTRA nugarum. The ſecond, Quondam fuerunt ſtrenui Mileſii. The third, Spectabilis Domine Decane vos eſtis iratus. To theſe three propoſitions he anſwers in the name of all the Divines of France. As to the firſt, which ſays, that in Major's books, there are cart-loads of fooleries. Hæc Propoſitio eſt ſtultè aſſerta, in eo quod intendit nugas plauſtris vehi: cùm nugæ ſint res ſpirituales & Plauſtra res corporales. Having formed this chimera out of his own brain, he combates it, to obtain a falſe triumph, like that of Caligula. To the the ſecond, which ſays, that the French Divines were formerly as brave, as the Mileſians; but that they have degenerated; he makes our Divines anſwer, Hæc propoſitio eſt ſuſpecta, quia ſcriptura eſt Græca: & Græci ſunt heretici: Hoc eſt noſtrum ſentimentum. To the third, which ſays, venerable dean of the faculty, you are angry: he makes all the Divines anſwer. Hæc propoſitio eſt deriſoria & ſcandaloſa in eo quod dicit, vos eſtis iratus, eſt enim incongrua ſicut ego currit, & à nobis olim damnata: & in eo quòd dicit Decane vos eſtis, intendendo quòd ſumus ex cane nati, eſt contumelioſa.’ ſured, but it was not unuſeful at that time; and we know it has been ſaid, that Eraſmus, by his railleries, ſerved for a fore-runner to Martin Luther (m). But if it be true, that Eraſmus prepared the way, it is alſo true, that this way was more and more enlarged, and laid open by the wrong meaſures, that were taken with this reformer. Eraſmus obſerved ſeven great faults in thoſe meaſures [MM]. See the book of the Sieur Richard, prior of Beaulieu St Avoye (n), a Catholic author.

It is certain, that a grave and elaborate anſwer, would not have been ſo proper, as theſe burleſque pieces, to expoſe the univerſities of that time to the laſt contempt, with a great number of people. But it might be queſtioned, whether it became Luther and Melanchthon, thus to divert and amuſe themſelves with jeſts and banters. They ought, you will ſay, to have been wholly taken up with the important affair they had undertaken; and if they had well weighed the great characters of their miſſion, they would not have had leiſure for banter. They knew what perſecutions their cauſe was expoſed to in other countries: they ought therefore ſo to have laid it to heart, as to have no deſire to make merry by humorous and burleſque compoſitions. I do not offer theſe as ſtrong and weighty objections, and am perſuaded, that they whoſe intereſt it is to find them weak, will eaſily anſwer them. For which reaſon I ſhall not ſtand to diſpute about them. I ſhall only ſay, there are a great many perſons who have not diſapproved the reflexions, which they found at the end of a book of Mr Brueys. 'In truth, ſays he (172), I cannot believe, that the Proteſtants of this kingdom, who are truly pious whatever eſteem they have for Mr Jurieu's wit and learning, can approve that a miniſter, who has forſaken them, and fled into a foreign country, affects in all his works the character of an humouriſt and droller, whilſt he daily hears at a diſtance, of the ruin and deſolation of his party. Methinks if we conſider the diſpoſition which becomes a perſon of his character, the joy he expreſſes in all his writings, at his being out of the reach of the danger his ſect is expoſed to, is not very natural nor warrantable. It ill becomes him, in my opinion, to be merry in ſecurity, whilſt thoſe he has deſerted groan under the juſt chaſtiſements, which the church, as a good mother, mixes with the kindneſſes and benefits ſhe employs to bring them back into her boſom: in my opinion it is acting contrary to the goſpel, to laugh with thoſe who weep; and I think the works of this author, how fine and delicate ſoever in other reſpects, ought at leaſt to have ſome taſte of the bitterneſs of his ſoul if he were really more affected with the affliction of his brethren, than with the tranquillity which he himſelf enjoys. We may therefore ſay, that as the calumnies and reproaches with which this author's works are filled, may induce the Catholics to believe, that a man, whoſe thoughts are ſo remote from charity, cannot be a good Chriſtian, though he ſpoke with the tongue of angels; ſo that ill-natured joy, which he manifeſts in his writings, thoſe ſtrokes of raillery and ridicule, by which all the world immediately diſcovers the productions of his pen, ought to perſuade all the pretended Reformed, who have any judgment, that it is impoſſible for him, who ſo miſ-times his raillery, whatever zeal he expreſſes in their defence, to be a good Proteſtant.'

[M M] Eraſmus obſerved ſeven great faults in the meaſures taken againſt Luther.] I have mentioned the book, in which there is a large account of this matter; and it is a book that may be eaſily had at the Bookſellers; ſo that I ſhall be very ſhort on this head, and only ſhew in groſs the capital point of each of theſe faults. The firſt conſiſted in their ſuffering a quarrel to ariſe about the gatherings among the mendicant Friars, and the Theſes of indulgencies, to be diſcuſſed before the people in ſermons (173). The ſecond, in their oppoſing to Luther only ſome mendicant Friars, who were no more than declaimers and organs of ſlander (174). The third, that they did not impoſe ſilence on the preachers of both parties, and chuſe out prudent, learned, and peaceable perſons, who might have inſtructed the people, without any contention, and inclined them to peace and the love of the goſpel (175). The fourth, that they would abate nothing on either ſide (176). The fifth, that cruelty was exerciſed againſt the Lutherans, at the inſtigation of ſome mendicant Friars (177). The ſixth; that the biſhops of Germany, who were MILITARY MEN for the MOST PART, did not do their duty (178). The ſeventh, that they did not take care to appeaſe the wrath of God by public prayers, and by a converſion, truly penitent and ſincere (179). The catalogue of faults of the Romiſh party might, perhaps, be enlarged: but that we leave to the ſpeculative, and content ourſelves with ſaying, that moſt of theſe, ſpecified by Eraſmus, could not well be avoided, conſidering the poſture of affairs the church was then in. Hence it may be concluded, that Luther's deſign was brought forth in a favourable juncture of time. The prudence of the court of Rome plaid it's part well enough; but it could not prevent the marring the affair in ſeveral inſtances, by a defect in it's inſtruments; and I am certain, numbers of Proteſtants are convinced, that their party maintained itſelf by the falſe meaſures of the oppoſite ſide, as much as by the goodneſs of it's cauſe. On the other hand, a great many fancy, that there were ſeveral faults committed on the part of the reformation, and that theſe were incidents favourable to popery. Thus great quarrels are generally fed and fomented; each party makes falſe ſteps, which reciprocally ſerves to balance and ſupport the other (180).

[A] He was puniſhed with death for an offence that can hardly be thought capital.] It is not eaſy to fix the ſpecies of this action. Some ingenious men (1) believe, that Lutorius's crime conſiſted in 'deceiving Tiberius, by preſenting him an elegy on the death of Germanicus, which had been made before for the death of Druſus, who had recovered from a diſtemper, which it was thought he would die of.' Others believe, that he had made a ſatire upon Druſus. This is the opinion of Theophilus Raynaud: 'Ex ea item lege (2), ſays he (3), Lutorius Priſcus apud Dionem, lib. 57. quod in Druſi ægrotantis mortem, famoſum carmen ſcripſiſſet, mori juſſus eſt Senatus decreto.' Theſe two opinions I think are falſe, and ſhould chuſe rather to ſay, that Lutorius was accuſed of having had the audaciouſneſs of accounting Tiberius's ſon as dead, and even compoſing verſes upon it before the time. The author of the News from the Republic of Letters, from whom I borrow theſe words, immediately adds (4): 'It is certain, a man expoſes himſelf to the rigour of the law, who dares declare, on ſome occaſions, the finiſter judgment which people paſs upon the ſickneſs of kings. The Phyſician, du Val, was ſent to the gallies, becauſe there was found in his cloſet a paper, in which he had predicted, that Lewis XIII would die before the dog-days, in the year 1631.' This particular is found in certain memoirs of the duke of Orleans, which came out in the year 1685.' The words of Manius Lepidus do not oppoſe the opinion I eſtabliſh, ſo much as is imagined: for in an age of flattery no difficulty is made of advancing, that a Poet who inſtead of making vows, and confiding in the fortune of the republic, whilſt the preſumptive heir to the crown is ſick, ſings the death of that prince, and communicates to his friends the black and diſmal ideas of ſo lamentable a ſtate, not yet arrived; that ſuch a Poet, I ſay, is poſſeſſed with an execrable thought, and poſſeſſes his hearers with accuſed of having compoſed another, on the death of Druſus, while this prince was ſick (a); and it was affirmed, that he kept this poem ready to be produced, with hopes of a greater recompence, in caſe Druſus ſhould die (b). The prince's recovery ſhould have obliged this Poet to ſuppreſs his work; but he could not deny himſelf the glory of it. He read it to ſome ladies; all of whom except one, durſt not deny the fact (c). All his judges, except two, condemned him to death. Tiberius, who was then abſent (d), practiſed his uſual artifices [B], when he underſtood that the ſentence was executed, and made ſome regulations for the time to come. Manius Lepidus, who voted only for his baniſhment, gave a very ingenious turn to his opinion [C]. We ſhall ſee how with the like. ‘ Si, patres conſcripti, unum id ſpectamus quam nefaria voce Lutorius Priſcus mentem ‘ ſuam & aures hominum polluerit, neque carcer, neque laqueus, ne ſerviles quidem cruciatus in eum ‘ ſuffecerint (5). —— Conſcript Fathers, if we conſider ‘ only with how wicked a ſpeech, Lutorius Priſcus ‘ has defiled his own ſoul, and the ears of all men; neither priſon nor halter, nor indeed the puniſhments peculiar to ſlaves are equal to his crime.’ Theſe are the words of Manius Lepidus. Let us therefore conclude that the crime this Poet was accuſed of, was anticipating, in his poem, the death of Druſus, the emperor's ſon. There was, doubtleſs, more imprudence than crime in this action.

I deny not but the laws have treated thoſe as guilty of a capital crime, who conſult the future events of the prince's life: ‘ Capitale eſt de ſalute principis ‘ vel de ſumma Reip. reſpondere aut conſulere (6). ‘ It is a capital crime to anſwer or to enquire of ‘ the health of the prince, or of the fate of the government.’ I know ſeveral perſons have ſuffered death for ſuch a curioſity ‘ Valens imperator ſub ‘ uno proloquio juſſit occidi omnes qui de ſuo ſucceſſore ſpiritus conſuluerant, nec modo qui conſuluerant, ſed omnes qui aliquid ea de re inaudierant, ‘ nec ad ſe detulerant (7). —— The emperor Valens, ‘ by a ſingle warrant, ordered all to be put to death, ‘ who had conſulted ſpirits to know who ſhould be his ‘ ſucceſſor, and not only ſuch as conſulted, but all who ‘ had ſo much as heard any thing of the matter, and ‘ had not informed him.’ The emperor Julianus Didius, cauſed all thoſe to be burnt, who conſulted the diviners upon the emperor's fortune (8). The canon laws have excommunicated thoſe who engage in intrigues about the ſucceſſion in a prince's life-time. This is what the learned John Beloi repreſented to the leaguers in Henry the third's reign. ‘ By theſe means ‘ they ſeem to conſpire his death, which, in effect, ‘ is revolting againſt nature, good manners, Chriſtian ‘ piety, and the love we owe to our king; for whom we ‘ are conſtantly obliged to pray, to wiſh, and preſage ‘ well: ſo that to act upon the preſumption of any ‘ unluckly accident or misfortune to him, would be ‘ againſt all laws, civil and natural; and therefore ‘ good people cannot approve, that, againſt their king's ‘ deſire, and in his life-time, his ſucceſſion ſhould be ‘ diſputed, and called in queſtion, which is a thing ‘ not in being as long as it pleaſes God to continue ‘ him in the world. Therefore, by a decree in the ‘ fifth council of Toledo in Spain, which was held in ‘ Honorius the firſt's time †, about the year 622, in ‘ the reigns of Heraclius the emperor, and Chintillius king of Spain, all thoſe were excommunicated, who inquired, or preſumed to be ſollicitous ‘ and inquiſitive, who ſhould be their king, after him ‘ who holds the ſcepter. “ Therefore, ſays the text “ becauſe it is contrary to piety, and dangerous for “ men to think of future things, of a forbidden nature, and to inform themſelves about the accidents of princes, or to provide for the future, “ with relation to them, foraſmuch as it is written, “ it is not for you to know the times or the ſeaſons, “ which God has reſerved in his own power: we “ ordain by this decree, that if there be any enquirer about theſe things found, who, in the king's “ life-time, looks upon another from a proſpect of “ his ſucceeding to the kingdom, or draws others “ to him on that account, he ſhall be expelled the “ ſociety of Catholics by the ſentence of excommunication ‡.” The ſame decree was repeated in the ‘ ſixth council, held in the ſame city of Toledo; to ‘ which is added a moſt pertinent reaſon, by which ‘ the authors of theſe diſcourſes are blamed, as aiming at the knowledge of futurity, which God perhaps will never ſuffer them to arrive at (9).’ I have read in the French Mercury, a ſtory I am going to relate: ‘ Noel Leon Morgard, an Almanackmaker . . . . . affirmed in his Almanack, for the ‘ year 1614, that the ſtate of France would change, ‘ and reflected on the perſon of the king, and ſhewed ‘ the time, the months, and places, in which he ſpoke ‘ of ſeveral great princes, whom he denoted, only ‘ tranſpoſing the letters of their names. This Almanack ‘ being ſold the firſt day of the year, there was an ‘ extraordinary demand for it among the curious, ‘ who ſaid, it was a prophecy: and that which gave ‘ vogue to it was, that Morgard, having ſaid in the ‘ firſt quarter of January, that a marſhal ſhould play ‘ his ſon an unlucky trick, it happened, that a man, ‘ in years, in the ſuburbs of St Germain, and who ‘ had formerly been a ſoldier, killed his ſon, deſigning to kill a woman he kept. The noiſe that ‘ theſe new predictions cauſed among the people, coming to the ears of their majeſties, and the council, ‘ Morgard was, on the eighth of January, carried to ‘ the Baſtile, by the archers of the grand provoſt. Nine ‘ days after he was removed to the common goal; the ‘ tenth of January, he was condemned by a decree of ‘ the court, for nine years to the gallies; and the ‘ ninth of February he was put in chains, to be carried to Marſeilles, where he tugs at the oar in the ‘ king's ſervice (10).’

Every one may have read ſeveral things of this nature, but I venture to ſay, that this was not Lutorius's caſe. All the enquirers into futurity have no other end but to raiſe conſpiracies, or diſturb the public tranquillity; or, in general, they are ill-affected perſons as Tertullian obſerves. ‘ Cui enim opus perſcrutari ſuper Cæſaris ſalute niſi à quo aliquid adverſus illum cogitatur, vel optatur, aut poſt illam ſperatur ‘ & ſuſtinetur? non enim ea mente de caris conſulitur ‘ qua de dominis (11).’ Now what is there like this in a Poet's impatience, who, during his prince's ſickneſs, prepares a copy of verſes to produce them in caſe the prince ſhall die? there was nothing in the conduct of Lutorius, but a great deal of indiſcretion and vanity. He ought not to have read his poem: he ſhould not have entertained the ladies with it, to be entertained in his turn by their commendations.

[B] Tiberius . . . made uſe of his uſual artifices.] He praiſed the zeal the ſenate had expreſſed in puniſhing ſeverely the leaſt offence committed againſt the emperor, but deſired they would not be ſo haſty in puniſhing them. He praiſed Lepidus, and did not blame Agrippa. The latter was conſul deſigned, and voted for death, Lepidus only for baniſhment. It was reſolved, for the future, that the decrees of death ſhould not be executed till the tenth day after ſentence. Id Tiberius ſolitis ſibi ambagibus apud ſenatum incuſavit, cum extolleret pietatem, quamvis modicas principis injurias, acriter ulciſcentium; deprecaretur tam præcipites verborum pœnas: Laudaret Lepidum, neque Aggrippam argueret. Igitur factum S. C. ne decreta patrum ante diem decimum ad ærarium deferrentur; idque vitæ ſpatium damnatis prorogaretur (12). Some (13) attribute all this to Tiberius's ambition; they pretend, that he was diſpleaſed not that they had put Lutorius to death, but that they had condemned him to death without his advice. They add, that, to make himſelf maſter of all ſentences of this nature, even in his abſence, he got a decree paſſed, that the execution ſhould be deferred.

[C] Manius Lepidus . . . . gave a very ingenious turn to his opinion.] I have already recited (14) the beginning of his diſcourſe; here is another piece of it. ‘ Vita Lutorii in integro eſt, qui neque ſervatus in periculum Reipub. neque interfectus in exemplum ibit. ‘ Studia illi ut plena vecordiæ, ita inania & fluxa ſunt: ‘ nec quidquam grave ac ſerium ex eo metuas, qui ‘ ſuorum ipſe flagitiorum proditor, non virorum ani-how the advocate Arnauld, who employed it in pleading againſt the Jeſuits, was reflected on by Father Richeome [D]. Mr Moreri has committed ſome faults [E].

‘ mis, ſed muliercularum adrepit: cedat tamen urbe, & bonis amiſſis aqua & igni arceatur (15). —— The life of Lutorius is ſtill untouched: to ſave it, will no wiſe endanger the ſtate; nor will the taking it away have any influence upon others. His ſtudies, as they are full of wildneſs, are likewiſe empty and periſhing: neither is ought important or terrible to be apprehended from one who thus betrays his own follies, and makes his court not to the minds of men, but the imaginations of women: let him however be expelled Rome, interdicted from fire and water, and his eſtate be forfeited.’ There is nothing to be feared, ſaid he, by ſuffering Lutorius to live; nor will the taking away his life be any great example. He is an idle fellow, who ſpends his time in trifles; all his ambition is to get into the womens good graces: we need not fear any ſerious enterprize, or any thing conſiderable from him.

(15) Tacit. ubi ſupra.

[D] The advocate Arnauld . . . . was reflected on by Father Richeome.] Arnauld, pleading againſt the Jeſuits in the year 1594, amongſt other things has this (16); they ſay, ‘ that they came into France for our great advantage; experience has ſhewn, that they have cauſed our ruin. What need of any longer trial? Let them go and advantage our enemies the ſame way: there is to this purpoſe an excellent paſſage in Tacitus, Si, patres conſcripti, unum id ſpectamus quàm neſaria voce aures hominum polluerint, neque carcer, neque laqueus ſufficiant: eſt locus ſententiæ, per quam neque impune illis ſit, & vos ſeveritatis ſimul ac clementiæ non pœniteat: aqua & igni arceantur. —— If, conſcript fathers, we do but conſider how wickedly they have defiled the ears of men, neither dungeon nor halter can puniſh them ſufficiently: but there is room for a ſentence by which neither they ſhall eſcape unpuniſhed, nor will you have cauſe to repent of your ſeverity or indulgence, let them be forbid fire and water. There you have the Jeſuit's ſentence.’ Some years after he employed the ſame thought in a tract called, Le franc & veritable Diſcours (17): ‘ Gentlemen, if ye conſider the horrid wickedneſs of theſe people, hanging will not be ſufficient for them; but I know a means, by which you will never repent of, having been either too gentle, or too ſevere; baniſh them all.’ Richeome anſwers (18), that theſe words are not ſo in Tacitus; and that therefore this diſcourſer is ‘ a wonderful bold forger, writing to his prince . . . . With theſe words then he condemns us, in mercy, to baniſhment . . . . more cruel and deceitful, by half, than the Heathen who firſt ſpoke them. For in this place of Tacitus, Marcus Lepidus, a Roman general, adviſed the ſenate to clemency towards Lutorius a knight, convicted of many great crimes. Whereas this man metamorphoſes his words into an exhortation to cruelty, to perſuade the ruin of many innocent perſons.’ After this he gives a tranſlation of the paſſage of Tacitus, cut off with an & cætera; and complains of Arnauld's confidence in producing it egregiouſly diſguiſed (19), and oppoſes the innocence of the Jeſuits, to Lutorius's abominable crimes. He commits two faults at leaſt; for his complaint of the pretended falſification of the paſſage of Tacitus is ill-grounded; and he ought not to have ſuppoſed, that Lutorius was actually a deſperate criminal, guilty of abominable and numberleſs crimes. He ſhould have regulated himſelf, not by the phraſes of the ſenator Lepidus, but by the real nature of the fact. He might have found the quality of the offence in the very words of this ſenator, I mean in thoſe he ſuppreſſed by his Et cætera.

[E] Mr Moreri has committed ſome faults.] He has only conſulted Dion, who has too much abridged the matter, not in the twenty ſeventh book, as Moreri affirms, but in the fifty ſeventh. Tacitus ſhould have been conſulted, whoſe narrative is larger and more exact. But Moreri's great fault lies in ſaying, that Lutorius was accuſed of having written a poem againſt Druſus. Would he have ſaid this, if he had known, that this Poet was accuſed of deſigning to publiſh this poem, in caſe Druſus ſhould die, and believing he ſhould receive a greater reward for it, than for that he had made upon Germanicus's death.

LUXEMBURG, the capital city of the province of that name (a), was only a caſtle in the time of the emperor Otho the Great (b). Gilbert, ſon to Ricuin of Ardenne, having obtained it of the abbot of St Maximin, enlarged it, and founded the county of Luxemburg, with the conſent of Bruno, duke of Lorrain, brother to the emperor Otho the Great. This county was made a duchy, by the emperor Charles IV (c), for Venceſlaus, his uncle (d). The town of Luxemburg is very ſtrong. It is not true that it was never taken by the French, before the year 1684 [A]. Hither the miraculous image of our Lady of Conſolation, patroneſs of the duchy of Luxemburg, and county of Chini, was brought as to a place of ſecurity; but it was carried back to her chapel the twentieth of May 1685. The public has ſeen the advice that was given to the Jeſuits about the proceſſion, they made that day (e). They find many Roman antiquities in this province [B], which makes all the curious earneſtly deſire the publication

It was not hard to undeceive them; for we find in hiſtory, that the French took Luxemburg in 1542, and that being recovered by the emperor's arms, they retook it in 1543. They loſt it the year following. Note, that they blocked it up in 1682; they bombarded it in 1683; and took it in 1684 (1). They reſtored it by the treaty of Ryſwick in 1697.

Several images of the falſe gods have been found there, and ſeveral medals and inſcriptions (2). Peter Erneſt, count of Mansfeld, removed them to Luxemburg, to adorn a fountain he conſecrated to the memory of his wife. He cauſed a magnificent houſe to be built near it. The inſcription of this fountain will, perhaps, not be unacceptable here. They conſiſt, for the moſt part, of images of the Heathen deities, and of epitaphs round the border of that beautiful fountain, which he carefully preſerves in memory of his beloved wife, Mary of Montmorenci, often going to Mary's fountain (ſo called by him) . . . . But let us firſt hear the inſcription with which this illuſtrious prince has adorned his fountain :*

‘ Whoever thou art that comeſt hither to avoid the heat, or to quench thy thirſt. Thou mayeſt be refreſhed here agreeably, undiſturbed. Take up the water with thy hand. Waſh thy mouth. Trouble it not with thy feet. Nor pollute it with thy naked body. For he has conſecrated theſe gentle waters to the peaceful manes of his moſt dear wiſe. And from her name Mary, called it Mary's fountain. He cauſed theſe limpid ſtreams, the latent witneſſes of his eternal love, to ruſh from yonder rock. Encloſed them in native ſtone, and bid them for ever flow.

Peace be to the aſhes of Mary.

This is taken from a relation dated at Antwerp, the ſeventh of October 1575 (4). Mr Baudelot informs us (5) that Mr de Ballonſfeaux, nephew to Father Wiltheim, ſhewed him, in manuſcript, the antiquities of Luxemburg, written by this Father.

(4) It was printed by Plantin, in 1584, in 8vo, the edition of Leyden, which is the third, was printed in 1667, in 12mo.

(5) In his Diſſertation on Ptolomæus Auletes.

LYCOPHRON, the ſon of Periander, king of Corinth, had a very odd deſtiny. He was ſeventeen years old, when Meliſa his mother was killed by Periander, and had a brother (a) a year elder than he. Procles, their grandfather by the mother's ſide, king of Epidaurus, invited them to his court, and, when he ſent them back to their father, he told them they ought not to forget who it was that killed their mother. Lycophron was ſo ſtruck at this ſaying, that being returned to Corinth, he took up a ſtubborn reſolution not to ſpeak to his father, either to aſk him, or to anſwer him a queſtion. Periander, enraged at his carriage, expelled him his houſe, and underſtanding from his eldeſt ſon, what Procles had ſaid to them, he forbad thoſe, who had received Lycophron into their houſes, to entertain him any longer. The young man, being forced to depart, found a reception elſewhere, for ſome days ; but as ſoon as his lodgings were known, orders were ſent to his landlord to turn him out of doors ; at laſt, a decree was publiſhed, impoſing a fine at diſcretion, to be paid to Apollo, on any who either lodged, or vouchſafed to ſpeak to him. This order was obeyed, and Lycophron lay four days and four nights in the ſtreets, without eating or drinking. Periander, touched with compaſſion, went then to ſpeak to him, and tenderly repreſented, how much better it were for him to ſucceed to his riches and crown, than make himſelf miſerable by a miſtaken reſentment. All the anſwer he could get from him was, that he ought to pay the fine, ſince he had ſpoken himſelf to his ſon. Periander, finding the diſeaſe incurable, ſent Lycophron away to Corfou, and there left him, without ever once thinking of him, till he found old age coming on, and rendring him incapable of diſcharging his kingly functions. The incapacity of his other ſon obliged him to ſend and offer Lycophron the government. He ſlighted the propoſition, and would not vouchſafe, ſo much as to ſpeak to the meſſenger. His ſiſter was diſpatched to him, and in vain repreſented all the ſweets of ſovereign authority. At laſt a propoſal was made, that he ſhould come and reign at Corinth, and his father would reign at Corfou. He accepted the condition ; but the inhabitants of Corfou ſlew him, to prevent a change, which they did not approve of. This, in my opinion, is ſuch an abridgment as ought to be made of Herodotus's narrative (b) [A].

[A] This is the abridgment I think ought to be made of Herodotus's narrrative.] Diogenes Laërtius (1) has mangled this narration. Mr Moreri, not content to mutilate and falſify it, has perplexed it with an obſcure jargon. What he ſays of Lycophron's conſtantly refuſing to return to Corinth, is expreſsly contradicted by Herodotus. Mr Hoffman is in the ſame error.

LYCOPHRON, a Greek Poet. You will find, in Moreri, what country he was of, and when he lived. The poem, which we have of his is a very obſcure piece [A]; but [A] The poem, which we have of his, is a very obſcure piece.] It is intituled Alexandra, and contains a long train of predictions. The author ſuppoſes, that Caſſandra, daughter of Priam, is the oracle, which foretold all theſe things ; but however, it is not ſhe that ſpeaks, but a man, who gives a faithful account to Priam of all Caſſandra's prophecies (1). Dection, Orus, and Theon, had written notes upon this poem, which are loſt (2). Tzetzes's commentary is ſtill in being. Amongſt the modern critics, William Canterus, and John Meurſius have learnedly employed themſelves on Lycophron's Alexandra. Meurſius's edition is accompanied with a Latin tranſlation, compoſed by Joſeph Scaliger, and ſuited to the character of the original, as being very difficult to be underſtood, and thick ſet with barbarous terms.

The beſt edition of this Poet, is that which was publiſhed at Oxford, in 1697, in folio. Mr Potter who procured it, has done all that was proper to recommend it. He has corrected the Greek text ; and over againſt each verſe of Lycophron, he has ſet down William Canterus's Latin tranſlation, which is in proſe ; under it the commentary of Iſaac Tzetzes, with the corrections and various readings. He has given Scaliger's verſion, which is in Iambic verſe, by itſelf, and then the notes of Canterus, the commentary of Meurſius, and his own, which is very learned. To all this are added ſeveral exact and commodious indexes. Mr de Boiſſieu aſſures us (3) that his father, who was well verſed in ſeveral languages, and as famous for learning as for arms, had written a commentary on Lycophron ; but he does not tell us, whether this work was ever printed. For the reſt, we muſt not forget, that Bernard Bertrand, native of Riez, in Provence, is the firſt, who tranſlated this poem of Lycophron into Latin. He tranſlated likewiſe the commentary of Tzetzes. Both theſe verſions were printed together at Baſil in 1558. Canterus (4) has mentioned this work with a pretty deal of contempt. No notice is taken of it in the abridgment of Geſner's Bibliotheque, printed at Zurich in the year 1583. Lycophron is there ſpoken of on the footing of an author, ſome of whoſe works, in manuſcript, are found in the library of Vienna (5) ; and when Bernard Bertrand is ſpoken of, mention is but, in my opinion, he muſt have had not only a great deal of learning, but a great deal of wit, to compoſe ſuch a book. You will find in Mr le Fevre (a), a great many learned and ingenious thoughts on the obſcurities of it. I know not why he ſhould ſay, that Suidas has preſerved the names of twelve or thirteen tragedies written by Lycophron; for we find, in Suidas, the titles of twenty. This Poet was killed by an arrow; and Ovid is the only author, who informs us of this particular [B].

only made of his tranſlation of Euſtathius on Dionyſius Afer de Situ Orbis, printed at Baſil by Oporin, and his verſion of a book of Galen de humoribus, printed at Straſburg in 1558. I would have them print the interlineary gloſs and Greek notes, which Mr Nicolle wrote with his own hand on the Greek text of Lycophron (6). It is a very excellent manuſcript, as the abbot Faydit aſſures us (7), to whom Mr de Beſſat, maſter of accounts, and nephew of the abbot de Bourzeis, lent it.

[B] He was killed by an arrow; Ovid is the only author who informs us of this particular (8).] Valerius Andreas Deſſelius (9) who pretends, that Theoderet mentions it, is miſtaken, as the learned Mr de Boiſſieu obſerves (10). He ſhews, that Theodoret does not ſpeak of Lycophron's death, nor even of the place of his ſepulture. For inſtead of Lycophrone, it ought to be read Leucophryne; as appears by this paſſage of Arnobius (11): 'Leucophrynæ monumentum in fano apud Magneſiam Dianæ eſſe, Myndius profitetur ac memorat Zeno. —— Zeno, the Myndian, records, that there is a monument of Leucophryne in the temple of Diana at Magneſia.' Theſe are Mr de Boiſſieu's words: 'De obitu Lycophronis ne verbum quidem apud illum (Theodoretum) reperitur: deinde Theodoreti locus (12) . . . . ubi ex Zenone, Lycophronem in Dianæ Magneſiæ templo conditum eſſe refert, plane depravatus eſt, & pro Lycophrone, reponendum eſt Leucophryne, cujus monumentum erat apud Magnetes in Dianæ templo, ut ex eodem Zenone tradit Arnobius —— There is not a word in Theodoret of the death of Lycophron: then the paſſage of Theodoret. . . in which he relates, out of Zeno, that Lycophron was buried in the temple of Diana of Magneſia is manifeſtly corrupted, and for Lycophrone, we muſt reſtore Leucophryne, whoſe monument was among the Magneſians, in the temple of Diana, as Arnobius relates from the ſame Zeno.' I wonder Mr le Fevre has not mentioned this paſſage of Ovid.

LYCORIS. It is the name Virgil gives a famous courtezan, whom other authors call Cytheris. He ſpeaks of her in his tenth Eclogue, in order to comfort a friend [A] of his in deſpair on her preferring Marc Antony before him. We have ſpoken at large elſewhere (a) of Marc Antony's fondneſs for Cytheris, but have not given the hiſtory of this woman fully enough. Let us ſay then, that ſhe was a famous Comedian, whom Volumnius fell in love with, and made free [B]. This was the reaſon of her taking the name

[A.] Virgil . . . . ſpeaks of her . . . . . to comfort a friend of his.] This friend, if we believe Servius, (1), was the orator Caius Aſinius Gallus, the ſon of Aſinius Pollio. But, as Servius adds, that this Gallus is the firſt, who was made governor of Ægypt, the learned ſuſpect his commentary; for it is manifeſt he has confounded the Poet Cornelius Gallus with the Orator Aſinius Gallus (2). The firſt, who obtained of Auguſtus the government of Ægypt, immediately after the conqueſt of this kingdom, was the Poet Cornelius Gallus. It is probably to him, that Virgil addreſſes his eclogue of Conſolation, on the barbarous infidelities of the courtezan Cytheris. The perſon, to whom the Poet inſcribes it, compoſed four books of poems upon his own amours (3). There are ſome fragments of them extant, if we believe the critics.

[B] She was a Comedian . . . . whom Volumnius fell in love with, and made free.] Servius ſays, that Virgil's Lycoris was the courtezan Cytheris, whom Volumnius had made free: Hic autem Gallus amavit Cytheridem meretricem libertam Volumnii (4). He does not ſay ſhe was a Comedian; but, that we learn elſewhere. We know that the courtezan Cytheris, Marc Antony's miſtreſs cauſed herſelf to be called Volumnia. 'Vehebatur in eſſedo Trib. plebis: lictores laureati antecedebant, inter quos apertâ lecticâ MIMA portabatur, quam ex oppidis municipales homines honeſti obviam neceſſario prodeuntes, non vero illo & mimico nomine, ſed VOLUMNIAM conſalutabant (5) — The tribune of the people was drawn in a chariot: laurelled Lictors went before, among whom an Actreſs was carried in an open litter, whom the honeſt burgeſſes of the ſeveral towns, being obliged to meet her, ſaluted, not by her true theatrical name, but by that of VOLUMNIA.' For what reaſon, if not becauſe Volumnius had made her free? Now Marc Antony's Cytheris was a Comedian; and therefore ſhe, that Servius ſpeaks of, muſt have been ſo too. The only thing to be proved, is, that Volumnius loved her. This proof I take from one of Cicero's epiſtles (6): 'Accubueram hora nona . . . . apud Volumnium Eutrapelum, & quidem ſupra me Atticus, infra Verrius . . . . infra Eutrapelum Cytheris accubuit. In eo igitur, inquis, convivio Cicero ille quem adſpectabant, cujus ob os Graji ora obvertebant ſua? non; me Hercule ſuſpicatus ſum illam affore: ſed tamen ne Ariſtippus quidem ille Socraticus erubuit cum eſſet objectum habere eum Laïda: habeo, inquit, non habeor à Laïde —— I ſat down to table . . . . at the houſe of Volumnius Eutrapelus, between Atticus and Verrius . . . . below Eutrapelus ſat Cytheris. You will ſay, it did not become me to be preſent at ſuch a banquet: I profeſs I had no ſuſpicion that ſhe would be preſent: yet Ariſtippus, the Socratic, did not bluſh, when it was objected to him, that he had Lais: I have her, ſays he, but ſhe has not me.' It is plain, that Cytheris is here a courtezan, whom Volumnius entertained at bed and board. This epiſtle of Cicero is ſaid to be written in the 703d year of Rome. He wrote another (7) to Volumnius the ſame year, but without ſaying a word of the courtezan. Father Abram, who imagines the contrary, had not well conſidered it: 'ad hunc amorem, l. 7. ep. 32. alludit ſcribens ad eundem Volumnium, Ut nihil ſit tam ἀκύθηρον quod non alicui venuſtum eſſe videatur (8). —— To this intrigue, book 7. ep. 32, he alludes, writing to the ſame Volumnius, nothing is ſo barren of wit, but it will pleaſe ſome body' This entirely relates to an ill reliſh for jeſts. Cicero's meaning is, that there is no jeſt ſo flat or inſipid but one or other is pleaſed with. For the reſt, we do not learn which way Cytheris came to be turned over from Volumnius to Marc Antony, whether by gift, or thro' the natural inconſtancy and ingratitude of the miſtreſs. I ſhould rather believe the firſt, it being certain that Volumnius was one of Marc Antony's good friends.

This appears from the following paſſage of Cicero (9): 'Scripſi ad Antonium de legatione, ne ſi ad Dolabellam ſolum ſcripſiſſem iracundus homo commoveretur: quod autem aditus ad eum difficilior eſſe dicitur, ſcripſi ad Eutrapelum, ut is ei meas litteras redderet, legatione mihi opus eſſe. —— I wrote to Antony concerning the lieutenantſhip left, if I had written only to Dolabella, the choleric gentleman might have reſented it: but knowing that he was difficult of acceſs, I wrote to Eutrapelus, to give him my letters, informing him that I ſtood in need of the lieutenantſhip.' This he wrote to Atticus a few months after the death of Julius Cæſar. It is the ſame Volumnius, if I miſtake not, that Cicero means in the thirteenth Philippic, giving a liſt of Marc Antony's gaming companions (10). Cornelius Nepos tells us, that Volumnius, Marc Antony's intimate friend, had name Volumnia, in her travels with Marc Antony through the towns of Italy. Marc Antony cauſed great honours to be paid her, carried her about in an open litter, and made his mother's equipage follow, as it were to make up the train of this courtezan (b). It was upon this occaſion, that lions were yoked in Marc Antony's chariot [C].

had a conſiderable poſt in his army. ‘Familiares ejus (M. Volumnius . . . . He cleared L. Julius Calidius, Antony's craftſman, who, in his abſence, had been put, by P. Volumnius, the prefect, in the number of the proſcribed, on account of his large poſſeſſions in Africa.' This Volumnius's houſe was a ſanctuary to Pomponius Atticus, during the rage of the triumviral proſcriptions (13). It is impoſſible, I think, to determine, whether our Volumnius is the ſame, who was killed in cold blood by Brutus's men (14). The grounds for doubting it are, I. that Plutarch calls him, who was killed by Brutus's party, a Comedian. Ἦν δέ τις Βολούμνιος Μῖμος καὶ Σακκουλίων γελωτοποιὸς ἡλωκότες, οὓς ἐν οὐδενὶ λόγῳ τιθεμένου τοῦ Βρούτου, προσάγοντες οἱ φίλοι κατηγόρουν, ὡς οὐδὲ νῦν τοῦ λέγειν καὶ σκώπτειν πρὸς ὕβριν αὐτῶν ἀπεχομένους. Erat quidam Volumnius mimus & Sacculio Sannio capti. Hos Brutus quum contemneret, adductos ad eum accuſaverunt amici ejus ne tunc quidem à dicteriis & contumeliis in ipſos jaciendis temperare (15). —— One Volumnius, and Sacculio a buffoon, were taken: theſe Brutus deſpiſed; but his friends brought them before him, and accuſed them of not refraining even then from jeſting upon them. II. That he joins him to a buffoon. And III. that he obſerves, that Brutus deſpiſed them both. This does not agree with the Volumnius mentioned by Cornelius Nepos. But, on the other hand, the drolling humour perfectly ſuits him; that itch of witticiſm, which Plutarch's Volumnius was ſo over-run with, that he could not forbear jeſting even on thoſe, who kept him in a priſon. One of Cicero's Epiſtles, which I have before-cited (16), ſhews, that Volumnius Eutrapelus (17) was full of witty ſayings. Cicero feared no man but him in this way, and recommends two things to him; one, that he would not ſuffer the ſilly quibbles, ridiculous puns, and pitiful rebus's, which went about in his name, during his abſence from Rome, to be aſcribed to him; the other, that he would aſſert the rights of polite converſation againſt the fatal encroachments of uncourtly buffoonry. Is not this repreſenting Volumnius as a wit? ‘Quibus in litteris omnia mihi perjucunda fuerunt, præter illud, quod parum diligenter poſſeſſio ſalinarum mearum à te procuratore defenditur. Ais enim, ut ego diſceſſerim, omnia omnium, dicta, in his etiam Seſtiana, in me conferri. Quid? tu id pateris? nonne defendis? non reſiſtis? equidem ſperabam, it notata me reliquiſſe genera dictorum meorum, ut cognoſci ſua ſponte poſſent (18). —— In which letters every thing pleaſed me, excepting that you neglect to defend the poſſeſſion of my ſalt-pits. For you ſay, that, no ſooner is my back turned, but every one's ſayings, even Seſtius's, are aſcribed to me. What! do you ſuffer it? do you not defend me? do you make no reſiſtance? I thought my words might eaſily be diſtinguiſhed from thoſe of others.' After theſe words, Cicero gives him a juſt ſtandard of his own ſayings, and deſires Volumnius to vouch even upon oath (19), that whatever would not bear ſuch a teſt never came from his mint. ‘Urbanitatis poſſeſſionem, amabo, quibuſvis interdictis defendamus: in qua te unum metuo, contemno ceteros (20). —— I beſeech you, let us defend, at any rate, the poſſeſſion of politeneſs, in which I fear you alone, and deſpiſe others.' Here is another very great elogy: ‘Opus eſt hinc limatulo & polito tuo judicio, & illis interioribus litteris meis quibus ſæpe verecundiorem me in loquendo facis (21). —— There is need of your exact and polite judgment, and thoſe middle parts of my letters, in which you often make me expreſs my ſelf more modeſtly.' Can a man of this merit and character be the Comedian mentioned by Plutarch? Is it not more probable, that this Comedian was a man made free by Volumnius, and that, like Cytheris, he took the name of his maſter, to whom he owed his liberty? I determine nothing. I believe Plutarch might be miſtaken, for the following reaſons. Volumnius, according to all appearance, gave a full ſwing to his rallying and jocoſe humour, and had no more regard to decorum, or his own quality, than a profeſſed Comedian. This was almoſt unavoidable in a man, who, like him, had a talent for witty ſayings, and an intimate acquaintance with Marc Antony, the moſt liberal man in the world to thoſe, who knew how to divert him, and to the Comedians in particular, with whom his houſe was always crouded. ‘Agrum Campanum, qui cum de vectigalibus eximebatur ut militibus daretur, tamen infligi magnutm Reip. vulnus putabamus: hunc tu compranſoribus uis & colluſoribus dividebas: mimos dico & mimas P. C. in agro Campano collocatos (22). —— When your Campanian farm was exempted from taxes, to be given to the ſoldiers, we thought the commonwealth greatly wounded: this you divided among your bottle companions, and fellow-gameſters; I mean thoſe Actors and Actreſſes, who frequented that ſeat.' We have ſeen above (23), that Volumnius was one of his jeſters: the paſſage, I have cited, gives the ſame title to the Comedians of both ſexes. It happened then, perhaps, that Volumnius, mixing daily with this ſort of people at Marc Antony's, and drolling and playing the buffoon as much as they, came to be treated as a Comedian, ſo that Plutarch honeſtly miſtook him for a man of that profeſſion. A learned critic (24), aſſures us, that Plutarch's Volumnius, is the ſame with Cicero's, I ſhall not venture to join with him, and chuſe rather to ſay non liquet: tho' I own this critic's opinion ſeems much more probable, than that of any one, who ſhould affirm the contrary. I muſt further obſerve, concerning our Volumnius, that it is of him Horace is ſuppoſed to ſpeak when he ſays, that Eutrapelus gave fine cloaths to ſuch as he deſigned a miſchief to. This doubtleſs was founded on one of his common-places, in which he explains by what degrees vanity betrays men into the vileſt practices.

Veſtimenta dabat pretioſa: beatus enim jam
Cum pulchris tunicis ſumet nova conſilia & ſpes:
Dormiet in lucem: ſcorto poſtponet honeſtum
Officium: nummos alienos paſcet: ad imum
Thrax erit, aut olitoris aget mercede caballum (25).

Eutrapelus . . . . . .
Beſtow'd fine cloaths on thoſe he meant to hurt,
Thus reaſoning, that the rich attire would give
A different turn to the gay wearer's mind.
He'll ſleep till noon, drink, whore, and run in debt;
Till, beggar'd quite, he's forc'd to earn his bread,
And drive an herb-man's cart for wretched hire.

[C] Lions were yoked in Marc Antony's chariot.] He was the firſt among the Romans who put them to this kind of ſervice. ‘Jugo ſubdidit eos primuſque Romæ ad currum junxit M. Antonius, & quidem civili bello cum dimicatum eſſet in Pharſalicis campis, non ſine quodam oſtento temporum generoſos ſpiritus jugum ſubire illo prodigio ſignificante: nam quod ita vectus eſt cum Mima Cytheride ſupra monſtra etiam illarum calamitatum fuit (26). —— Marc Antony was the firſt at Rome who yoked them to his chariot, and that during the civil war, and at the time of the battle of Pharſalia; which was looked upon as a kind of prodigy, importing, that generous ſpirits now ſubmitted to the yoke; for that he was thus carried about with the Actreſs Cytheris was beyond all the prodigies of thoſe calamitous times.' According to theſe words of Pliny, this ſight had never been ſeen in Italy, till after the battle of Pharſalia: and yet Cicero ſeems to ſay the contrary in one of his epiſtles (27) to Atticus, before this famous battle; ‘Tu Antonii

Another author ſays no more, than that Cytheris's train was not inferior to that of her galant's mother [D]. He would have ſaid ſomething more probable, had he affirmed, that they, who expected favours from Marc Antony, made their court more ſubmiſſively to his miſtreſs, than his mother. Servius would have obliged us, if he had marked with more exactneſs, the time when this courtezan followed Marc Antony to the army [E]. I do not think ſhe followed him into Aſia after the battle of Philippi

'tonii leones pertimeſcas cave: nihil eſt illo homine 'jucundius. —— Never fear Antony's lions: he is the 'pleaſanteſt man alive.' He means, I think, that Atticus ought not to be afraid, becauſe Cæſar's lieutenant had his chariot drawn by lions. He affirmed this more clearly, if Victorius's conjecture be right. This learned critic (28) will have it read leonibus, inſtead of lenonibus, in the paſſage of the ſecond Philippic, which I cite in the margin (29). His reaſons are ſpecious, and I could eaſily believe him in the right, with Father Abram (30). In this caſe Plutarch (31) and Pliny would not have been faithful Hiſtorians; for it is certain that the words of the ſecond Philippic relate to Marc Antony's progreſs through the towns of Italy, in honour of the Comedian Cytheris, whilſt Cæſar made war in Spain againſt Pompey's lieutenants, a year before the battle of Pharſalia. At worſt, I venture to ſay, without any regard to Cicero's words, that Andrew Alciatus is guilty of a groſs falſhood in ſuppoſing Marc Antony did not harneſs a ſet of lions, till after he had put to death the ſather of eloquence.

That is,

After that this dire plague of his country, by killing Cicero, had given the laſt blow to the Roman eloquence, he mounted his car victorious, drawn by lions, whom he compelled to bear the yoke; thus emblematically ſignifying his victory over great commanders.

This falſity (33) is the more inexcuſable, as the author has founded on it an elogy on Cicero, and ſome moral reflexions.

[D] Cytheris's train was not inferior to that of her galant's mother.] Plutarch's making the two equipages equal, extreamly weakens Cicero's ideas; 'Rejecta 'mater amicam impuri filii tanquam nurum ſequebatur '(34). —— The mother came after, following the mi-'ſtreſs of her debauched ſon, as if ſhe had been her 'daughter-in-law.' Theſe are the ideas Cicero gives us; and the following are Plutarch's (35): Ὁ δὲ καὶ τὰς πόλεις ἐπιὼν ἐν φορείῳ περιήγετο, καὶ τὸ φορεῖον οὐκ ἐλάττους ἢ τὸ τῆς μητρὸς αὐτοῦ περιέποντες ἠκολούθουν. Hanc urbes peragrans cicumducebat lectica; lecticam ejus non minor comitatus quam matris ipſius ſequebatur. —— In his progreſs through the towns, he carried this Actreſs with him in a litter, with an equipage not leſs than that of his mother. Neither he nor Cicero ſpeak of Marc Antony's wiſe, which is a ſign he was not then married. See the article FULVIA (36).

But did ſhe follow Marc Antony, when he went to ſerve in Gaul (39) under Julius Cæſar, or when he retired thither, after he was beaten at Modena? I ſhould chuſe the latter opinion; otherwiſe Virgil applied a plaiſter to a very old wound; he comforted the man ten years after Lycoris had jilted him. Virgil's Bucolics were written after the death of Julius Cæſar; and conſequently, if Lycoris had forſaken Gallus, to go into Gaul with Marc Antony, whilſt Cæſar was making war there, Virgil muſt have exerciſed his muſe on a ſuperannuated intrigue of infidelity. But ſuppoſing the other part of the alternative, Gallus's wound muſt have been freſh, and Virgil's verſes might come in a proper time. According to this laſt ſuppoſition, Marc Antony appears not to have been a man of his word. He had promiſed Fulvia, in the year 709, to part for ever with his dear Comedian (40). He quitted her probably for a time, and in that interval Gallus took poſſeſſion of Cytheris. If he had not time for the writing his four books of verſes, before the war of Modena had debauched her away, he employed the following years; for it is not neceſſary to ſuppoſe, that there were not a great many ſharp reproaches of her peſidiouſneſs in ſuch a number of verſes. I have obſerved above, that the letter, in which Cicero excuſes his being at an entertainment with Cytheris, is ſuppoſed to have been written in the year 703. This is an objection againſt thoſe, who ſay, that Cytheris went into Gaul with Marc Antony, before the rupture between Cæſarand Pompey. See the marginal note. I confeſs, I ſee nothing to induce me to believe, that the date of this letter is rightly fixed. However, the opinion I follow has been eſtabliſhed by Servius himſelf (41), though with leſs exactneſs than I could wiſh. Add theſe words to thoſe in the margin (42). 'Hic Gallus amavit Cytheridem meretricem libertam 'Volumnii, quæ, eo ſpreto, euntem Antonium ad 'Gallias eſt ſecuta: propter quod dolorem Galli nunc 'videtur conſolari Virgilius. Nec nos debet movere, 'quod cum mutaverit partem quarti Georgicorum, 'hanc Eclogam ſic reliquit. Nam licet conſoletur in 'ea Gallum, tamen altiùs intenuenti vituperatio eſt. 'Nam & in Gallo impatientia turpis amoris oſtenditur, & aperte hic Antonius carpitur inimicus Auguſti, 'quem contra Romanum morem Cytheris eſt in caſtra 'comitata. —— This Gallus was in love with the 'courtezan Cytheris, the freed woman of Volumnius, 'who deſpiſing him, followed Antony in his expedition 'into Gaul: on which account Virgil now ſeems to comfort Gallus in his grief: nor ought it to move us, that 'when he changed part of the fourth Georgic, he left 'this Eclogue as it is. For tho' in it he comforts Gallus, yet whoever examines it more narrowly, will find 'that he is blamed. For in Gallus is ſhewn the impatience of unchaſte love, and Antony, the enemy 'of Auguſtus, is here plainly laſhed, whom Cytheris, 'contrary to the Roman cuſtom, followed to the wars.' We will end with this remark of the ſame Commentator: there were three famous ladies of pleaſure at the ſame time, Cytheris, Origo, and Arbuſcula. The two latter are found in Horace's verſes (43) under the notion of Comedians; they therefore all three were Players.

Philippi [F]. When Ovid obſerves, that the name of Lycoris was famous from Eaſt to Weſt (c), I do not doubt, but he had in view Gallus's verſes on this courtezan. Cicero mentions a piece of raillery, in which Fulvia perhaps was leſs concerned than Lycoris [G].

[F] I do not think ſhe followed him into Aſia after the battle of Philippi.] And yet an ingenious author is of this opinion (44). ‘ Marc Antony was betwiched to the Comedian Cytheris (it is the anſwer he ſuppoſes Fulvia gave Helena to the queſtion, whether ſhe inſtiſtigated Marc Antony to make war with Auguſtus) and, to be revenged on him, I would fain have had Auguſtus fall in love with me, but Auguſtus was nice in his miſtreſſes. He neither thought me young, nor handſome enough; and tho' I let him underſtand, that he was like to be involved in a civil war for want of ſome regard for me, yet I never could drag him to one act of complaiſance. I will repeat you too, if you pleaſe, ſome verſes (45) he made upon that evaſion, and which are not the moſt to my honour. They are theſe.

Parce qu'Antoine eſt charmé de Glaphire (46)
Antoine eſt infidele. Hé bien donc? eſt-ce à dire Que des fautes d'Antoine on me ſera patir?
  Qui? moi? que je ſerve Fulvie?
  Suffit-il, qu'elle en ait envie?
A ce compte on verroit ſe retirer vers moi,
  Mille épouſes mal ſatisfaites.
Aime-moi, me dit-elle, ou combatons. Mais quoi?
Elle eſt bien laide! Allons, ſonnez trompettes.

That is,

Becauſe Antony is in love with Glaphyra, therefore Fulvia would fain captivate me. Antony's falſe: what then? Muſt I pay off Antony's ſcores? Muſt I be Fulvia's galant, only becauſe ſhe deſires it? At this rate every jealous wife will have recourſe to me. Either love me, ſays ſhe, or fight with me. She is very ugly; therefore ſound to arms.

Take notice that theſe verſes relate to the year after the battle of Philippi, in which Brutus and Caſſius fell. Auguſtus was then in Italy, and Marc Antony in Aſia. We have ſeen, in the article of GLAPHYRA, that ſhe was accounted a lady of pleaſure, who had gained the affections of Marc Antony, and it does not appear that Cytheris was with him at that time. I believe then, the name in Auguſtus's Epigram is not diſguiſed. It was not on account of Cytheris, but of Glaphyra, that Fulvia deſired Auguſtus to revenge her. Beſides, her menaces were not that ſhe would, in caſe of refuſal, excite Marc Antony to make war on Auguſtus, but that ſhe would take up arms herſelf: and we have ſeen in her article, that ſhe actually did ſo, and that, without the concurrence of her husband, ſhe put all Italy in combuſtion; for which Marc Antony chid her ſeverely the next time he ſaw her.

[G] Cicero mentions a piece of raillery, in which Fulvia, perhaps, was leſs concerned than Lycoris.] Marc Antony is upbraided, in the ſecond Philippic, with a trick he ſerved his wife. He rode into town by night, as a courier diſpatched by Marc Antony; and gave Fulvia a letter, in which her husband ſaid the tendereſt things to her in the world (47). He had diſguiſed his face, that he might not be known in preſenting Fulvia the letter; but whilſt ſhe read it, he diſcovered himſelf, and threw himſelf on her neck. He was asked, why he would take ſuch a method, which alarmed the whole city? He anſwered, He was come about an affair of his own. This gave occaſion to a jeſt on him. Let us cite Cicero's words (48). ‘ O hominem nequam! . . , . . Ergo ut te catamitum nec opinato cum oſtendiſſes, præter ſpem mulier adſpiceret, idcirco urbem terrore nocturno, Italiam multorum dierum metu perturbaſti? Et domi quidem cauſſam amoris habuit, foris etiam turpiorem, ne L. Plancus prædes ſuos venderet. Productus in concionem à Trib. Pleb. cum reſpondiſſes, te rei tuæ cauſſa veniſſe, populum etiam dicacem in te reddidiſti. ——Infamous man! . . . Becauſe your wife diſcovered your pederaſtic intentions, therefore have you diſturbed the quiet of Rome, and of all Italy? At home, indeed, the pretence was love; abroad, a more ſcandalous one, leſt L. Plancus ſhould ſell his farms. When you anſwered before the tribune of the people, that your affairs brought you to town, you gave the populace a handle to jeſt upon you.' Manutius hath made a note upon this, which is more indeterminate than that of Valeſius the younger. ‘ Ex ambiguo ſenſu, ſays Manutius, illorum verborum, rei tuæ cauſſa: quod referri etiam ad concubitum poteſt. —— The words rei tuæ cauſa are equivocal, and may ſignify lying with a woman.' But ſee the other note: it is in the Valeſiana (49).

Plurima, quæ invideant pure apparere tibi rem (50).

‘ Id eſt cunnum. Quod noto primus, ut apud Ciceronem Philippica II. . . . . O hominem nequam! ergo ut te catamitum, &c. (51) cum reſpondiſſes te rei tuæ cauſa veniſſe populum in te dicacem etiam reddidiſti. Scil. populus luſit in nomine rei, & quod Antonius dixerat ſe rei ſuæ, id eſt rerum ſuarum cauſa in urbem veniſſe, populus, ut eſt dicax, eum cunni uxoris cauſa veniſſe dixit, & dicacitatis materiam invenit in eo verbo.

The envious litter, and ſurrounding guards,
The flowing robe, and garment girt, conſpire
From your too prying eyes to hide th' affair.

‘ i. e. the . . . . which I firſt remark, as in Cicero, Philipp. II. . . . . . . Infamous man! &c. when you anſwered, that your affairs brought you to town, you expoſed yourſelf to the jeſts of the populace. That is, the people jeſted upon the word affair; and, Antony ſaying that his affairs brought him to town, the people, who love a jeſt, ſaid that he came for his wife's affair.' You will find what follows in the 71ſt page of the ſame book. ‘ Probavi alibi ex Cicerone in Philippica II. de Marco Antonio, qui rei ſuæ causâ ſe veniſſe dicebat, populumque his verbis dicacem reddidit; & ex Horatio, plurima quæ impediunt pure apparere tibi rem, & ex aliis rem aliquando cunnum ſignificare. Sic Martialis:

Parce tuis igitur dare maſcula nomina rebus.

‘ Id eſt, podici tuo & cunno, ô uxor (52). —— I have proved elſewhere, out of Cicero, Philipp. II, concerning Marc Antony, who ſaid he came upon his affairs, and gave the people opportunity for a jeſt; as alſo from Horace, who ſpeaks of the many things, which hide the affair; and from other authors, that the word res, (affair or thing) ſignifies cun . . . . . Martial uſes it in the ſame ſenſe.' Valeſius indirectly cenſures Scaliger, qui in Priapeia ex Arnobii neſcio quibus locis & ex verſione carminum Orphei ait mentulam rem vocari. I do not think Scaliger is miſtaken: the word res had doubtleſs as extenſive a ſignification among the Latins, as the word affaire among the French, or the word thing in Engliſh. Now it is certain, that the word affaire ſometimes ſignifies the natural parts of either ſex. This is ſo true, that even they, who know but little of the French tongue, are acquainted with this ſignification. I have heard ſome young Dutch gentlemen make a great many jeſts on the ſermon of a Monk, who preached at Spa. His ſubject was the importance of ſalvation; he ſhewed them, that it was the grand affaire of man, the affaire, by way of excellence; and reckoning up all the ways of ſin, he ſhewed, that they ruined their affaire: gentlemen and ladies, ſaid he. take heed to yourſelves, if you do this, or that, you will ſpoil your affair. The too frequent repetition of this term led ſeveral of his hearers into the groſs and burleſque ſenſe of the word affaire; ſo that it became the ſubject of jeſt for a long time. We read in the Chevræana (53), ‘ that a gentleman, coming to wait on a prince, to thank him for his kindneſs in recommending his intereſts to a lady of great virtue, expreſſed himſelf thus; That it was happy for him, that his highneſs had got his affair

*‘ to paſs thro’ the channel of Madam * * .’ The whole company burſt out a laughing. I have another remark to make againſt Valeſius. In Horace’s verſes, quoted by him, the word res ought to ſignify, in general, merchandiſe: the Poet does not confine himſelf to that part which Valeſius names in Latin; but extends to all the reſt, which the clothes cover. The preceding and following words manifeſt this ſenſe. Here are thoſe that follow.

Altera, nil obſtat: Cois tibi pœne videre eſt
Ut nudam: ne crure malo, ne ſit pede turpi:
Metiri poſſis oculo latus: an tibi mavis
Inſidias fieri pretiumque avellier, ante
Quam MERCEM oſtendi?

With Catia, ’tis not ſo: ſhe ſtands confeſt;
The ſilken garb permits the curious eye
To pry, and meaſure each minute defect.
You wou’d not, ſurely, buy a pig in poke,
And pay the price before you ſee the goods.

I believe then, that they, who gave Marc Antony’s words ſuch a malicious turn, had at leaſt as much regard to Scaliger’s ſenſe, as to Valeſius’s: and as it is the nature of ſcandal to rub the ſoreſt part, I do not doubt but it was meant by Marc Antony, with reſpect to his miſtreſs the Comedian Cytheris, rather than his wife; for ſince he promiſes, in his letter, to part with his Comedian, it is a ſign that the Roman people were ſtill perſuaded he ſaw her. Thus you have the whole commentary belonging to the text of this remark.

LYCURGUS, the legiſlator of Lacedæmon, lived I know not when. The diverſity of opinions is too great and too perplexed upon this head (a), to fix upon any thing certain. He gave extraordinary proofs of his generoſity, by the care he took to ſecure the crown to the perſon who had the rightful title to it, when he might have eaſily ſeized it himſelf, had he taken advantage of the occaſions offered him (b). You will find this in Moreri’s Dictionary, with ſeveral other facts, which I avoid repeating. I ſhall inſiſt upon one thing, which this author has not touched. Lycurgus’s regulations againſt luxury are moſt admirable. He wiſely judged, that the way to prevent the degeneracy of the courage of the Lacedæmonians, was to keep them from pleaſure; and that, to this end, he ought to baniſh from among them all thoughts of growing rich, and deprive them of all opportunities of it. His method of training up their children was very proper to make them good ſoldiers; but he carried it too far, ſince he would have the young girls perform the ſame exerciſes as the boys, and dance naked before them, ridiculing, or praiſing them, according as they acquitted themſelves [A]. Note, that the boys danced naked before them. Was not this the way to make both ſexes impudent? And is it any wonder after this, that Lacedæmonian girls had ſo bad a character [B]. I queſtion whether he judged right in ſaying, that theſe practices would excite

[A] He would have the young girls perform the ſame exerciſes as the boys, and dance naked before them.] I ſhall cite Plutarch’s words (1). ‘He (2) looked upon the education of children as the greateſt and moſt important affair of a legiſlator, and therefore made an early proviſion for it, by regulating whatever concerned marriages and births; for we muſt not believe what Ariſtotle ſays, that, having endeavoured to regulate, and reform the women, he gave it over, finding it impoſſible to reſtrain their unbridled licentiouſneſs, and the too great aſcendant they had got over their huſbands, who, by reaſon of their frequent warlike expeditions, were obliged to leave them to their own conduct, and, to prevent their abuſing this liberty, were forced to flatter them, and ſooth them, by calling them their ladies and miſtreſſes. On the contrary, he took all the care of them that was poſſible. In effect, whilſt they were maids, he hardened their bodies, by exerciſing them at running, wreſtling, pitching the coit, and darting the javelin, that the fruit they ſhould afterwards conceive, finding a ſtrong and vigorous body, might take ſtronger root in it, and that they themſelves, made robuſt by theſe exerciſes, might, with greater eaſe, ſtrength, and courage, undergo the pains of child-birth. To retrench all kind of delicacy, and effeminacy, he accuſtomed them to appear ſtark-naked in public, and dance in that poſture at ſolemn feaſts, ſinging witty ſongs, in which they ſeaſonably intermixed ſome ſharp touches of raillery on thoſe, who had done amiſs, and praiſe to ſuch as had acquitted themſelves worthily. By this means, they fired the youth with the love of glory and virtue, and kindled in them a noble emulation. For he, whoſe brave actions were ſo much extolled, and who ſaw his name celebrated by theſe young laſſes, returned proud of the praiſes he had received, whilſt their ſcoffs and railleries touched the undeſerving more ſenſibly, than the ſevereſt remonſtrances and harſheſt corrections; the more, as all this paſſed in the preſence of the whole body of the people, citizens, ſenate, and even the kings themſelves.’

[B] Is it any wonder after this, that the Lacedæmonian maids had a bad character.] They were called bare-buttocks, and furious for a male: ſlanders, which, by Plutarch’s own confeſſion, were founded on the too great liberty Lycurgus allowed them. I ſpeak thus of Plutarch, becauſe he has made an apology for that great legiſlator on this head; Ἡ δὲ γύμνωσις ſays he, (3) τῶν παρθένων οὐδὲν αἰσχρὸν εἶχεν αἰδοῦς μὲν παρούσης, ἀκρασίας δὲ ἀπούσης· ἀλλ’ ἐθισμὸν ἀφελῆ καὶ ζῆλον εὐεξίας ἐνειργάζετο, καὶ φρόνημα τὸ θῆλυ παρέγευεν ἐκ ἀγεννοῦς, ὡς μηδὲν ἧττον αὐτῷ καὶ ἀρετῆς καὶ φιλοτιμίας μετουσίαν οὖσαν. That is, And as to thoſe laſſes, who ſhewed themſelves thus ſtark naked, there was nothing ſhameful in it, Sparta being the throne of modeſty (4), and diſſoluteneſs not ſo much as known there. This did only accuſtom them to a ſimplicity of manners, gave them a wonderful emulation, who ſhould have the ſtrongeſt and robuſteſt conſtitution of body, and at the ſame time raiſe their courage, by letting them underſtand, that they ought to participate in glory with the men, and aſpire to the ſame principles of honour and virtue. Plutarch, forgetting this apology, thirty pages after, confeſſes, that Numa Pompilius acted much wiſer, in reſtrainig maids to the decency of their ſex, and that the liberties Lycurgus allowed, expoſed them to poetical ſatires. Ἔτι δὲ μᾶλλον ἡ περὶ τας παρθένους φυλακὴ καθέςαλται τῷ Νουμᾷ πρὸς τὸ θῆλυ καὶ κόσμιον. ἡ δὲ τοῦ Λυκούργου, παντάπασιν ἀναπεπταμένη καὶ θῆλυς ἐσα, τοῖς ποιηταῖς λόγον παρέσχησε. Φαινομηρίδας τε γὰρ αὐτὰς ἀποκαλοῦσιν, ὡς Ἴβυκος. καὶ ἀνδρομανεῖς λοιδοροῦσιν, ὡς Εὐριπίδης. Præterea curam puellarum reſtrinxit ad pudorem muliebrem & verecundiam Numa arctius: Lycurgi ſoluta prorſus & fluxa in jocos incurrit poëtarum. φαινομηρίδας enim vocant eas, velut Ibicus, quòd inceſſu coxas retegerent: & ἀνδρομανεῖς, quaſi viroſas & in viros inſano ardentes amore, ut Euripides (5). The two verſes of Euripides cited by Plutarch, do not ſufficiently prove my aſſertion. I ſhall therefore ſet down that paſſage of this Poet at length, by which we ſhall ſee, that the appearing naked, and exerciſing promiſcuouſly with the boys, was reckoned the true cauſe of the immodeſty of the Lacedæmonian maids.

The readers will not be diſpleaſed to find here the tranſlation of this paſſage of Plutarch. ‘The carriage of maids, who were married according to the ordinance of Numa, was ſtricter and more becoming the honour of the ſex; that of Lycurgus, being too free and licentious, occaſioned ſatires upon them, and ſcandalous nick-names. Ibycus calls them Phænomeridas, that is to ſay, bare buttocks; and Andromanes, that is to ſay, mad for man; and Euripides ſays alſo of them,

In vain the Spartan virgin would be chaſt:
With flowing robe, and naked limbs expos'd,
They mix with boys in exerciſe robuſt:
And is it ſtrange a Spartan woman's lewd?

‘And indeed the ſkirts of their petticoats were not tacked at bottom, ſo that, as they walked, they ſhewed their naked thighs; which Sophocles very plainly declares in theſe verſes:

You ſing the maſculine Hermione
Whoſe op'ning coats diſcloſe her naked thighs.

‘However, they ſay, they were daring, maſculine, and ſtout, even to their huſbands themſelves in the firſt place (8).’ We need not wonder at Euripides's ſaying, that it was impoſſible for the women of Lacedæmon to be honeſt with ſuch an education. Maids thus dreſſed, who went abroad with the young fellows, had their ears accuſtomed betimes to all kind of obſcene language. Such converſation muſt needs have been a ſchool of impudence; I leave you to judge, whether young fellows, who, leſt they ſhould be thought ſtupid (9), imagine they muſt do more than cuſtom permits, ever let their hands or tongues reſt in the company of ſuch maids. Beſides that, they were allowed to diſcover their nakedneſs, only in order to get a huſband; for when once they were married, they covered themſelves decently. This we learn from Plutarch. Πυνθανομένου δέ τινος διὰ τί τὰς μὲν κόρας ἀκαλύπτους, τὰς δὲ γυναῖκας ἐγκεκαλυμμένας εἰς τοὐμφανὲς ἄγουσιν, Ὅτι (ἔφη) τὰς μὲν κόρας, ἄνδρας εὑρεῖν δεῖ, τὰς δὲ γυναῖκας, σώζειν τοὺς ἔχοντας. Quærenti cur Spartani virgines detectas, mulieres velatas in publicum emitterent; Quia, inquit, virginibus quærendi ſunt viri, mulieribus opera danda ut ſervent maritos (10). I paſs over this touch of Martial, Aut libidinoſæ Ledæas Lacedæmonis paleſtras (11).

I have a ſtronger proof than the obloquy of the Poets. The Lacedæmonians being employed for ten years in a ſiege, and being called home by the complaints of their wives, who could not bear ſo long a widowhood (12), ſent back to Lacedæmon the youngeſt of their ſoldiers, and gave them leave to lie indifferently with as many of their wives as they pleaſed. Theſe youths were very well received; an evident ſign, that the women of Lacedæmon had no virtue. The children, that ſprung from theſe embraces, ſounded a colony at Tarentum. Not one of them knew who was his father. ‘Itaque legunt juvenes ex eo genere militum, qui poſt jusjurandum in ſupplementum venerant, quibus Spartam remiſſis promiſcuos omnium ſœminarum concubitus permiſere; maturiorem futuram conceptionem rati, ſi eam ſingulæ per plures viros experientur. Ex his nati, ob notam materni pudoris, Partheniæ vocati. Qui cum ad annos xxx perveniſſent, metu inopiæ (nulli enim pater exiſtebat, &c (13).’ I do not take notice here of the laſcivious impudence theſe girls might have contracted, by ſeeing the boys naked, becauſe I am to ſpeak of it in the following remark.

A father of the church, amongſt other enormities, reproaches the oracle of Apollo with it's praiſing the Lacedæmonian women; women, adds he, who ſatisfied nature with whatever man they liked. Οὗτος καὶ τὰς Λακεδαιμονίων ἐπαινεῖ γυναῖκας ἀδέως οἷς ἂν ἐθέλωσι μιγνυμένας. Hic idem & Lacænas mulieres laudat, licenter ſe cum quibuſlibet viris commiſcentes (14).

[C] He pretended, that theſe practices would excite the young folks to marry.] We learn from Plutarch that Lycurgus preſcribed this kind of education, and ordered the maids to appear naked, that they might excite love in the young men. Ἦν μὲν οὖν καὶ ταῦτα παρορμητικὰ πρὸς γάμον. λέγω δὲ τὰς πομπὰς τῶν παρθένων. καὶ τὰς ἀποδύσεις, καὶ τοὺς ἀγῶνας ἐν ὄψει τῶν νέων, ἀγομένων οὐ γεωμετρικαῖς, ἀλλ' ἐρωτικαῖς (ὥς φησὶν ὁ Πλάτων) ἀνάγκαις. Et quanquam hi quoque ad nuptias erant ſtimuli, pompas dico virginum veſtium detractionem, certamina, quæ inſpectantibus adoleſcentibus peragebant, non geometricis ſed amatoriis (ut ait Plato) coactibus (15). —— It was moreover, ſays he, an attractive to marriage; I ſpeak of thoſe dances and wreſtlings, in which the young maids, thus naked, exerciſed themſelves before the young men, who were drawn, as Plato ſays, not by a geometrical neceſſity, but by one much ſtronger, and which proceeds from the force of love. Lycurgus conſidered perhaps, that the number of beautiful women, being generally very ſmall, in compariſon of thoſe, who are otherwiſe; and they, who are not handſome, very often receiving from nature a notable recompence in the parts concealed, it was thought neceſſary to give the girls an opportunity of diſplaying all their charms. Probably he believed, they, who could not kindle love by a handſome face, might happen to diſcover charms elſewhere to touch the heart of ſome young man. See, in Athenæus, the good fortune of two country-women, who cauſed a temple to be built (16). On the the other hand, the young fellows, who were clumſy, and againſt whom the maids let fly their ſcornful railleries, might, by the help of their nakedneſs, prevail, and ſubdue the heart of a laſs, without the aſſiſtance of any higher ſtar, by Juvenal's favour.

Thus they found out a counterbalance to deformity, and ordered it ſo, that no one ſhould eſcape the darts of love, or complain of being prejudiced in his market, by not having the liberty of ſeeing the commodity he was to buy. But was not this to introduce into common life, where modeſty ought to reign, the pretended advantage of the ſtews, ſo much celebrated by Horace?

Was it not begetting in theſe girls the impudence of the eye, which is worſe than that of the ear? It was a means, ſay they, of blunting the edge of a curioſity, which is very keen. But this pretended reaſon has not hindered civilized nations from inſtilling into the ſex a horror for nudities even in a picture; and here is a legiſlator of Lacedæmon, who permits young girls to view nudities in the original. He ſhould be ſent to the ſchool of the Romans.

Nil dictu fœdum viſuque hæc limina tangat,

The curioſity I ſpeak of has been delicately touched by Mr de la Bruyere: 'Every one knows that long bank, which bounds and ſhuts in the channel of the Seine, on that ſide where it enters Paris along with the Marne, which it has but newly received. Men bathe themſelves here during the dog-days; people ſee them, at a good diſtance, throw themſelves into the water, and ſee them come out again; it is an amuſement; before this ſeaſon's come, the women of the city never walk out that way; and when it is paſt, they quit that walk (20).' Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus praiſes the Romans for having conſtantly made the champions wear girdles: ancient Greece did the ſame; he proves it from ſome paſſages of Homer, and ſays, that the Lacedæmonians were the firſt, who aboliſhed this wiſe cuſtom; and he names the Lacedæmonian, who firſt appeared naked at the Olympic games, in the fifteenth Olympiad (21). It is a remark, which leaves a blot upon that nation. We muſt add, that the wreſtlers appearing naked was doubtleſs the cauſe of making laws which condemned all the women, who had the curioſity or confidence to be ſpectators at the Olympic games, to be thrown headlong from the top of a rock (22).

[D] He would have husbands not approach their wives, but by ſtealth, and that they ſhould riſe from this table with an appetite.] Thus Plutarch ſpeaks. 'When they had a mind to marry, their courtſhip was a ſort of rape upon the perſons whom they had a fancy for, and thoſe they choſe were neither too little nor too young, but in the flower of their age, and full ripe for a husband: after this, ſhe, who managed the wedding, came and ſhaved cloſe the hair of the bride, dreſſed her up compleatly in man's clothes, and laid her upon a matreſs; this done, in came the bridegroom, in his every day cloaths, ſober and compoſed, as having ſupped at his ordinary, and ſtole in as privately as he could into the room where the bride lay, untied her virgin zone, and took her into his embraces; and ſo having ſtayed ſome time together, he returned as ſecretly as he could to his apartment with the reſt of his comrades, with whom he ſpent all the day and good part of the night too, unleſs he ſtole a ſhort viſit to his bride, and that with a great deal of circumſpection and fear of being diſcovered; nor was ſhe wanting (as may be ſuppoſed) on her part, to uſe her woman's wit in watching the moſt favourable opportunities for their meeting and making appointments, when company was moſt out of the way. In this manner they lived a long time inſomuch that they frequently had children by their wives, before ever they ſaw their faces by day-light. Their interview being thus difficult and rare, ſerved not only for a continual exerciſe of their temperance, and furthered very much the ends and intention of marriage; but beſides, theſe ſhort abſences kept their paſſion ſtill alive, which flaggs, and decays, and dies at laſt by too eaſy acceſs and long continuance with the beloved object; they always parted with regret, contriving when they ſhould come together again, and thought minutes hours till the next meeting (23).' Modern authors have deſcanted upon this order and here is what Lewis Guyon ſays of it (24). 'Lycurgus the legiſlator of Lacedæmon, willing and deſiring that the married couple ſhould receive a perfect and laſting pleaſure and ſatisfaction in marriage, and beget robuſt children, forbad the husband and wife to lie together; but, if they met by day in ſome ſecret place, then to embrace; for a ſhort pleaſure, and a little at a time, is beſt reliſhed; by this means the married pair are kept in heart, and even rendred more brisk and gay; whereas their lying conſtantly together makes the wife ſlighted, and other women deſired, and, which is commonly ſeen, makes the woman deſirous of another man: ſo that intermitting their matrimonial converſation ſerved to reinvigorate their love. And for this cauſe, the boys and girls, begot in theſe marriages, were ſtrong and luſty; whereas they, who abuſe the the female commerce, often beget maimed or weak children (25). In the mean time, he ordered, that children who diſobeyed their fathers and mothers, ſhould be put into a ſack, and caſt into the ſea (26).

[E] As for old men, who had young wives, he ſuffered them to impart them to handſome young men.] Plutarch continues his narration thus (27). 'Having thus ſet modeſty as a centinel over the marriage-bed, he next bethought himſelf of a remedy for that wild and womaniſh paſſion, jealouſy: and this he thought the beſt expedient; to allow men the freedom of imparting the uſe of their wives to thoſe, whom they ſhould think fit, that ſo they might have children by them; and this he would needs make a very commendable piece of liberality, and laughed at thoſe, who think the violation of their bed ſuch an inſupportable affront, that they revenge it by murthers often, and ſometimes by cruel wars. Lycurgus thought a man not to be blamed, who, being advanced in years, and having a young wife, ſhould recommend ſome virtuous handſome young man, that ſhe might have a child by him, who might inherit the good qualities of ſuch a father; and this child the good man loved as tenderly as if he had been of his own begetting: on the other ſide, an honeſt man, who had a love for a married woman upon the account of her modeſty, and the well favouredneſs of her children, might, without formality, beg of her husband a night's lodging, that he might have a ſlip of ſo goodly a tree, which he might tranſplant into his own garden. And indeed, Lycurgus was perſuaded, that children were not ſo much the property of their parents, as of the whole commonwealth. And therefore he would not have them begot by firſt comers, but the latter to beget children for a neighbour, upon agreeing with the huſbands. This was all wrong; it was authorizing adultery, and even making the huſbands pimps to their wives. From the ſame policy came the barbarous law againſt infants, who at their birth did not promiſe a robuſt body, and good ſhape. Lycurgus would have them made away with [F]. Was not this a cruel injuſtice? The impious Vanini would not have agreed to it (c). Lycurgus's laws are liable to cenſure in other points (d). But one there is, in which he is more to be commended than Numa Pompilius: it is that of not permitting maids to marry too young [G]. Ariſtotle deſcants largely on this head, and it is eaſy to by the beſt men that could be found: the laws of other nations ſeemed to him very defective and incongruous, they were very ſollicitous about the breed of their dogs and horſes, and ſent a great way, and were at no ſmall charges to get the beſt ſtallions; and yet kept their wives under lock and key, for fear of other men, whereas themſelves were crazy, old, or infirm, and more fit to propagate diſeaſes than their ſpecies: if they had made the leaſt reflexion in the world, they would have taken notice, that the honour and diſhonour of children (who generally derive their good or ill qualities from thoſe that beget them) doth chiefly redound to thoſe, who have the charge of their education; and if they prove ill, they firſt feel the ſmart of it.'

The baniſhing jealouſy from a married ſtate is doubtleſs delivering it from a great plague; yet Lycurgus was much to blame in healing it by a remedy worſe than the diſeaſe. It is at bottom but a phyſical evil, which has it's uſes in the world (28); for it contributes more than is imagined to the preſervation of modeſty, and the preventing infinite ſcandals, whereas lewdneſs and adultery are moral evils. Now, according to good morality, a phyſical evil ought never to be remedied by a crime. Mr Dacier (29) juſtly blames Lycurgus for ſacrificing all ſort of honour and decorum to chimerical notions of the public utility, as if what was ſhameful could ever be uſeful. It may even be ſaid, that this great legiſlator baniſhed all ſort of good breeding, by permitting the women to grow impudent; for it is certain, if the fair ſex preſerved not the modeſty and honour, which is kept up in civilized nations, mankind would univerſally ſink into a filthy and brutal leudneſs.

For the reſt, Plutarch pretends, that Numa Pompilius in ſome meaſure imitated Lycurgus. 'By the community of women and children, ſays he (30), they both deſigned to baniſh from marriage all kind of jealouſy; but they did not purſue the ſame methods, for the Roman huſband, who had children enough and deſired no more, gave his wife to him that had none, and who deſired her of him; and he was at liberty, either to leave her with this ſecond huſband or take her again. Whereas the Lacedæmonian, when any one deſired his wife to have children by her, lent her without quitting her, and his marriage ſtill continued undiſſolved; and very often, as we have ſaid, if he ſaw a handſome man, from whom he might expect a good and generous race, he intreated him to get him children, and conducted him to his wife. Mr Dacier's marginal note deſerves to be ſet down. This is true of Lycurgus, ſays he, but it no where appears, that Numa had the ſame deſign; and it were eaſy to prove, that this community of women began not at Rome, under Numa, but much later, and that it was not general.' To be ſatisfied of this, we need no other witneſs than Plutarch himſelf. See the diſcourſe he puts into Hortenſius's mouth. I have mentioned it elſewhere (31). Bodin, whom I have confuted, is ignorant of what Plutarch imputes to Numa; if he had known it, his criticiſms would not have ſo much deſerved to be criticiſed. It is difficult for an author, who has written ſo many books as Plutarch, not to contradict himſelf frequently.

[F] Children, who did not promiſe . . . to be . . . robuſt, Lycurgus would have them made away with.] 'Nor was it in the power of the father to diſpoſe of the child as he thought fit, but he was obliged to bring it before the examiners, who were ſome of the graveſt men of the tribe to which the child belonged: their buſineſs was carefully to view the infant, and, if they found it luſty and well-favoured, they gave order for it's education, and allotted it one of the nine thouſand ſhares of land abovementioned for it's maintenance; but if they found it deformed, and of an ill complexion, they ordered it to be caſt into a deep cavern in the earth, near the mountain Taygetus, as thinking it neither for the good of the child itſelf, nor for the public intereſt, that it ſhould be brought up, ſince nature had denied it the means of happineſs in it's own particular, by not giving it health nor ſtrength ſufficient to make it ſerviceable to the public: upon the ſame account the women did not bathe the new-born children with water, as is the cuſtom in all other countries, but with wine, to prove the temper and complexion of their bodies; for they had a conceit, that weakly children would fall into fits, or immediately faint, upon their being thus bathed; on the contrary, thoſe who were of a ſtrong and vigorous habit, would acquire a greater degree of firmneſs by it, and get a temper in proportion, like ſteel in the quenching (32).'

[G] He did not allow maids to marry too young.] Let us hear Plutarch. 'Now the time which both (33) ordained, either in relation to virgins or married women, were anſwerable to the manner of their education: for Lycurgus eſteeming the procreation of children to be the principal end of marriage, would fix no ſet term of age, when men or women ſhould be eſteemed capable of giving their conſents to each other in marriage; for he thought that nature, being the principle guide in that matter, ſhould not be reſtrained with violence, which produces hatred and fear; but rather being gently indulged, when youth, and love, and kindneſs, move, the coition might be more ſatisfactory, and conſequently the children become more robuſt, ſtrong, and healthful (34). But the Romans, deſigning, in the firſt place, to deliver the bodies of their daughters pure and undefiled into the embraces and poſſeſſion of the huſband, made it lawful for fathers to marry their daughters at twelve years of age, or under: which firſt way of Lycurgus ſeems more agreeable to the deſires of nature, which only reſpects the procreation of children; but the other is better adapted to make a conjugal life comfortable, and calculated for the rules of moral living.'

The diſtinction Plutarch here makes between the two legiſlators does not ſeem juſt, nor obliging to the ſex. This author diſcovers in Lycurgus's laws a phyſical, and in thoſe of Numa a moral good. Is not this inſinuating that, after the age of twelve, a man has reaſon to ſuſpect in his conſort the want of purity both in mind and in body (35)? Is not this a ſatire on the fair ſex? He ſhould have given all the advantage to the laws of Lacedæmon; for thoſe of the Romans were, on one hand, very apt to ſpoil morality, and, on the other, prejudicial to the ſtrength of the children, and the lives of the mothers. Ariſtotle gives upon this topic ſome well argued precepts. He would not (36) have maids marry till eighteen, nor men till thirty ſeven. He obſerves, that the inhabitants of all the towns, where marriages are contracted too early, are infirm and ſmall of ſtature, and that immature marriages make the child-bed the death-bed of ſeveral women. He mentions 'a famous oracular anſwer given to the Trezenians, the meaning whereof was, that they died becauſe they eat their fruits too green, and which was interpreted, as if the oracle had ſaid, that they died becauſe they married too young, and not becauſe they gathered their fruits before they were ripe (37).' Ariſtotle obſerves, that children, who are not much younger than thoſe who gave them being, have but little reſpect for them, from whence ariſe innumerable domeſtic jars. This is one moral inconvenience: he touches on another of the ſame claſs, which concerns chaſtity. Ἔτι δὲ καὶ πρὸς σωφροσύνην συμφέρει τὰς ἐκδόσεις ποιεῖσθαι πρεσβυτέραις. ἀκολαστότεραι γὰρ εἶναι δοκοῦσι νέαι

The reſpect we have for the ſex, and the care we take, not to uſe too free diſcourſes before them, is not half ſo great towards thoſe, who, either have, or have had an husband. We look upon them as initiated perſons, from whom the myſteries are not to be concealed; ſo that the maids, who are married very young, have not time to uſe themſelves to a grave exterior, which has greater influence than is imagined upon the interior. The Romans were ſo perſuaded of the ill effects of looſe diſcourſes, that they would not ſuffer the young maids (38) to be preſent at feaſts (39). They ſuppoſed their ears were ſtopped againſt obſcenity, till little boys came and unſtopped them on their wedding-day. Pueri obſcœnis verbis novæ nuptæ aures returant (40). Horace's advice ought to be a law every where, as well as in Lacedæmon. It is this.

Reaſons of ſtate oblige princes to diſpenſe with this law: witneſs the conduct of Charles V towards Margaret, his natural daughter. 'She was but ten years of age 'when he promiſed her to Alexander de Medicis, in 'order to draw off Pope Clement VII from the intereſt of France; and the marriage was conſummated 'before ſhe was twelve (42).' By the way, I ſhall add, that this emperor did violence to nature in a quite contrary manner in Margaret's ſecond marriage. 'The young widow was not re-married for a long 'time, becauſe Charles, who had gained his point by 'her firſt marriage, ſought a new advantage by her 'ſecond. She deſired in vain to be given to Coſmo 'de Medicis Alexander's ſucceſſor, who ſought her 'the more importunately, becauſe thereby he would 'neither have dowry to pay, nor portion to reſtore. 'The match was agreeable: but Charles pretended to 'purchaſe by his daughter's ſecond marriage the friendſhip of Pope Paul III, as he had by the firſt that 'of Clement VII. And he beſtowed her on Octavian Farneſe, who was but twelve years of age, 'which gave occaſion to a Poet of Anjou * to make 'one of the fineſt epigrams, which has been ſeen in 'this laſt century (43).' There needs no great change in the epigram of the Menagiana, to make us believe it the ſame that Mr Varillas meant. 'I know not 'whoſe the following epigram is; but it is very elegant, 'and the ſubject finely treated.

This lets me ſleep all night, nor cares to touch.
I might, when I cou'd not; I may not, now I can;
Hymen! or give me years, or give me man.

Mr Menage might have read in Sammarthanus (45), that James Bouju, preſident in the parliament of Bretagne, and native of Chateauneuf in Anjou, is author of this epigram; but he ought to have corrected the ſatiata in the ſecond verſe, and put it ſociata, and have read in the fifth verſe, dum nollem, licuit, Mr Varillas is miſtaken in ſaying du Bois was the author. A like epigram was made in French (46). This is not my only ſupplement to the remark [G] of this article, in the ſecond edition. Here is another ſomewhat larger and which refers to the obſervation I have made upon the ill effects of free diſcourſe.

Muretus obſerves, that the antient Greeks very prudently forbad women to be preſent at feaſts; for the men being uſed to talk more freely there, it was hard for them to forbear now and then a ſmutty jeſt. They muſt therefore have offended the chaſt ears of the ſex, or, by being more reſerved, have loſt a great part of the mirth that belongs to ſuch entertainments. For theſe reaſons they introduced this cuſtom. If any woman appeared at a public feaſt, ſhe was reckoned thorough paced, and declared thereby, that ſhe was not only content to hear whatever was ſaid, but alſo to ſuffer what they pleaſed. 'Neque ulla in virorum 'ſympoſiis accumbebat mulier, niſi quæ quidvis non 'audire modo, verum etiam perpeti poſſet (47).' Muretus cites two or three paſſages. He alledges the anſwer Thais makes in Terence to the ſpark, who deſired that young Pamphila might be at the feaſt (48). He alledges what Cicero relates of Rubrius's impudence, for whom Verres had procured a lodging at Philodamus's, a burgher of Lampſacus, for a leud deſign. The burgher, one of the chief men of the place, would never ſuffer his daughter to come into the feaſt room, as Rubrius deſired. 'Poſteaquam ſatis ca'lere res Rubrio viſa eſt: Quæſo, inquit, Philodame, 'cur ad nos filiam tuam non intro vocari jubes? homo, 'qui & ſumma gravitate, & jam id ætatis, & parens 'eſſet, obſtupuit hominis improbi dicto; inſtare Ru'brius; tum ille, ut aliquid reſponderet, negavit moris 'eſſe Græcorum, ut in convivio virorum accumberent 'mulieres (49). —— As the gueſts grew warm, ſays 'Rubrius, prithee, Philodamas, why do you not order 'your daughter to be called in? Philodamus, who was 'a grave, elderly, man, and a father, was ſurprized 'at Rubrius's unreaſonable requeſt: Rubrius perſiſted; 'then the other, by way of anſwer, ſaid, that it was 'not the cuſtom of the Greeks to admit women to their 'banquets.' You ſee Philodamus alledges for his reaſon it's being contrary to the Grecian cuſtom. Some learned men believe that this was an invented excuſe. But Muretus oppoſes the teſtimony of a great Orator (50), and he might have confirmed it by the words of Cornelius Nepos, which are to be found above (51), and by thoſe in the tenth chapter of the ſixth book of Vitruvius. He might have urged, that, even at the court of Macedon, the princeſſes were not admitted to the feaſts given to ſtrangers, and that the complaiſance ſhewn to the king of Perſia's embaſſadors had conſequences, which proved that the refuſal of their requeſt had been more prudent; for when at their entreaty the ladies were introduced, they took ſuch liberties, as it was neceſſary to put a ſtop to with the ſword's point. 'Legati benigne excepti, inter epulas ebrietate cre'ſcente, rogant Amyntam, ut apparatui epularum ad'jiciat jus familiaritatis, adhibitis in convivium ſuis ac 'filii uxoribus, id apud Perſas haberi pignus ac fœdus 'hoſpitii. Quæ ut venerunt, petulantius Perſis eas con'trectantibus, filius Amyntæ Alexander rogat patrem, 'reſpectu ætatis ac gravitatis ſuæ abiret convivio, pol'licitus ſe hoſpitum temperaturum jocos, &c (52).

converſation was too free. I have ſomething to obſerve againſt the author of old and new Lacedæmon [H]. He is too much a gentleman to be diſturbed at it.

'—— The embaſſadors being kindly received, and at 'a banquet growing warm with wine, deſire Amyntas 'to ſend for his own, and his ſon's wives to grace the 'entertainment, and plead, that, among the Perſians, 'it was looked on as a pledge of hoſpitality. When they 'were introduced, the Perſians began to be too free with 'them; whereupon Alexander, the ſon of Amyntas, de-'ſires his father, in reſpect to his age and dignity, to 'leave the banquet, promiſing to reſtrain the mirth of 'his gueſts.' Laſtly, Muretus obſerves, that the Romans contented themſelves with forbidding maids the liberty of going to feaſts. I have in another place (53) obſerved with what ſeverity they prohibited women the uſe of wine; but, in Seneca's time, that cuſtom was loſt: their manners were ſo corrupted, that they got drunk as much as the men. 'Non mutata fœminarum 'natura, ſays he (54), ſed vita eſt. Nam cum virorum 'licentiam æquaverint, corporum quoque virilium vi-'tia æquaverunt. Non minus pervigilant, non minus 'potant, & oleo & mero viros provocant: æque invitis 'ingeſta viſceribus per os reddunt, & vinum omne vo-'mitu remetiuntur: æquè nivem rodunt, ſolatium ſto-'machi æſtuantis. — The nature of women is not changed, 'but their way of life. For, by taking the ſame liber-'ties as men, they have equalled their vices. They ſit 'up as late, drink as much, and challenge the men in 'luxury: they get drunk and ſpew, they ſwallow ſnow 'to cool their ſtomachs, no leſs than the men.' The change is as great in France, if we may believe travellers. They had no laws prohibiting women the uſe of wine; and yet, in the days of our fathers, they drank hardly any thing but water; but we are told that, for ſome time paſt, they indulge themſelves with the beſt wines and ſtrongeſt liquors, and it is to be feared they will fall by degrees, or even all at once, into the exceſſes of the Flemiſh girls (55). Read theſe words. 'Who would have thought that the women . . . . . 'would have added tobacco, and brandy to ſo many 'other vices they have gloried in for above thirty years 'paſt? They carry as yet but runlets of brandy at 'their ſide; who knows but that in time they will 'carry barrels?' This is what a Phyſician of Paris (56) has publiſhed in a book printed in 1696 (57). If Ovid, the eaſieſt of Caſuiſts, be the director theſe tipplers have made choice of, they ought, at leaſt, to keep within the bounds he has preſcribed; he would indeed have women drink, but not to exceſs. He diſcourages them by the threats of a puniſhment, which muſt be worſe than a bare diſgrace, otherwiſe the perſons, he ſpeaks to, would not have regarded the evil denounced as very terrible.

    Cum Veneris puero non male, Bacche, facis.
Hoc quoque, qua patiens caput eſt; animuſque pedeſque,
    Conſtent; nec, quæ ſint ſingula, bina vide.
Turpe jacens mulier multo madefacta Lyæo:
    Digna eſt concubitus quoſlibet illa pati.
Nec ſomnis poſitâ tutum ſuccumbere menſâ:
    Per ſomnos fieri multa pudenda ſolent (58).

To drink her glaſs the fair one may be free:
Bacchus and Cytherea's ſon agree.
Yet let the nymph this caution take along;
To bear the liquor, let her head be ſtrong;
Leſt mounting fumes her giddy brain ſurprize,
And double objects to her ſwimming eyes.
A drunken woman is a monſtrous thing,
Prepar'd to meet whatever chance may bring,
Her womanhood in public to diſgrace,
And ſuffer every leacher's foul embrace.
Nor let her, when the banquet's ta'en away,
Retire to ſleep; for ſlumbers oft betray
Th' unthinking fair, to acts that ſhame the day.

I have loſt ſight of my ſubject, but I ſhall come up with it again by the help of a citation, proving what I have ſaid concerning the diminution of reſpect to married woman. The chevalier d'Her . . . writing to one of his kinſwomen, who made a ſcruple of marrying clandeſtinely, expatiates upon the advantages ſhe may find in the condition of a wife, whilſt ſhe paſſes for a maid. 'You will be, Madam de la F . . . ſays 'he (59), and you will be called Mademoiſelle d'Her '. . . you will ſtill be free of the charming tribe of 'maiden ladies, who will ſeem to be all like you, 'and perhaps really are. You may pretend not to 'underſtand ſome things, which indiſcreet people may 'ſay, and you will be allowed to bluſh at them. 'whereas if your marriage be once declared, you muſt 'aſſume an air ſomewhat leſs innocent, and more know-'ing; in fine, you will have a right to give yourſelf 'all the little affected airs of a meer maid; and can 'any thing be prettier? for naturally modeſty loves 'theſe little affectations; and why not? ſince it is be-'lieved ſhe commonly owes her all to them. You 'may practiſe them upon Monſieur de la F . . . him-'ſelf; you will be a demi-virgin even to him; and as 'long as you do not bear his name, you will have a 'right to be ſomewhat more coy, and more reſerved 'in your carriage to him.' Note, that he rallies her thus (60), becauſe ſhe would have 'the banns thrice 'openly and audibly publiſhed, the contract made 'in form, and a wedding afterwards, where all the 'relations might come, and talk over their fooleries (61).'

[H] I have ſomething to obſerve againſt the author of Old and New Lacedæmon.] I have only three things to object to him.

In the firſt place I could wiſh he had not attempted to apologize for the nakedneſs of the Lacedæmonian maids. Mr Dacier had a much better taſte: he openly declared againſt that cuſtom; he ſaw, that Lycurgus had ſacrificed the laws of decency, and the impreſſions of modeſty, to a falſe notion of politics.

In the ſecond place, I do not think the apology founded on good reaſons. This I am now to examine Mr Guillet's words are theſe (62): 'The Spartan 'maids danced ſtark-naked in public; and few people 'are perſuaded, that this was a modeſt ſight. Yet I 'cannot but think, that the Lacedæmonians had their 'reaſons for it, and that the thing, being very com-'mon, made no dangerous or ſinful impreſſions on 'their minds. There grows a familiarity betwixt the 'eye and the object, which diſpoſes to inſenſibility, 'and expels the foul deſires of imagination. The emo-'tion proceeds only from the novelty of the thing. A 'perpetual cuſtom cloys the eye more than it tempts; 'and if you conſider the integrity of that nation's morals, 'you will acknowledge the truth of this ſentence; The 'maids of Sparta were not naked; the public honeſty was 'a covering to them. I ſhall not ſay, that, generally 'ſpeaking, their excuſe would be any excuſe among 'us: but in ſhort, there are ſeveral countries in North 'America at this time, where the women always ap-'pear in the dreſs of theſe Spartan dancers, and yet 'our travellers affirm, that they are abſolutely exempt 'from crime. But, tho' I ſhould be ten whole years in 'pleading the cauſe of the maids of Sparta; I foreſee 'I ſhould never give you a good opinion of their 'modeſty. You will rather believe the biting ſatires of 'the Athenians, and even of Ariſtotle himſelf, who, 'as much a Macedonian as he was, had lived too 'long at Athens, to be untainted with that general 'hate, which reigned there againſt the Spartans. Ob-'ſerve what he has ſaid of the Lacedemonians in the 'ſecond book of his Politics. When Lycurgus un-'dertook to introduce conſtancy and patience into 'Sparta, it is evident, that, as to the men, he did 'ſucceed; but he was more remiſs as to the women; 'for they lived there in a general ſoftneſs and diſſolute-'neſs. He adds, that Lycurgus vainly attempted to 'reform them; in which he is contradicted by Plu-'tarch.' What we are told of this familiarity between the eye and the object, which diſpoſes to inſenſibility, is good and ſolid, generally ſpeaking, and is one of Balzac's reflexions againſt the famous ſonnet of Job. The Author of the ſonnet (63) was charged with contradicting himſelf (64); and thus they endeavoured to convict him: 'He is afraid his lady will not be 'moved by an object worthy of compaſſion, and im-'mediately after, deſires ſhe would accuſtom herſelf 'to ſee this object. Conſequently he deſires what he 'fears. The cuſtom of ſeeing, tending to cure his 'lady of all emotion, it is plain, he deſires what he 'has declared he ſhould be ſorry were the caſe.

(64) In theſe words,
Il craint
Que vous n'en ſoiez pas emue
. . . .
Accoutumez vous à la vuë
D'un homme qui ſouffre & ſe plaint.

'Let him, if he pleaſes, reconcile this, and remember this old maxim, with which the univerſities ring; Ab aſſuetis non fit paſſio. The ſoul receiving the emotion only by the inlet of the eyes, when once theſe are hardened, all ſurprize ceaſes. When the eyes have once contracted an acquaintance and familiarity with the ſtrangeſt objects, theſe, how terrible ſo ever at firſt, grow tractable by degrees, and, entring the ſoul as friends, raiſe no longer any diſturbance, nor cauſe the leaſt emotion. The cuſtom of ſeeing monſters, makes them ceaſe to be ſuch to the eyes which are uſed to them. Even the ſight of ſpectres and furies, armed with their torches and ſerpents, would loſe it's force and horror, in our imaginations, by a long acquaintance with them. By a ſtronger reaſon, &c. (65).' But as ſolid as this doctrine may be, I queſtion whether it can be applied in our caſe, ſince the maids of Lacedæmon appeared naked only on certain ſolemn days; and, at other times, wore a habit, which only ſhewed their thighs. This was a ſure way of irritating concupiſcence, and not diſpoſing to inſenſibility by a perpetual cuſtom. Beſides, there is a great difference betwixt Lycurgus and thoſe ſavage nations. Theſe have ever gone naked; but Lycurgus introduced the cuſtom into a town, where it had not been known before, and whilſt all the neighbouring nations obſerved the rules of decency. He cannot therefore be excuſed. Laſtly, the virtue of the Americans, if what travellers ſay be true, is no juſtification of this legiſlator; for the event has ſhewn, that Lacedæmon was not a place where ſuch novelties could innocently be introduced. In vain is Ariſtotle's teſtimony attempted to be invalidated. Nothing is more grave and rational, than the book, in which this Philoſopher ſpeaks ſo ill of the Lacedæmonian women. Ὅλην γὰρ τὴν πόλιν ὁ νομοθέτης εἶναι βουλόμενος καρτερικὴν, κατὰ μὲν τοὺς ἄνδρας φανερός ἐστι τοιοῦτος ὤν, ἐπὶ δὲ τῶν γυναικῶν ἐξημέληκε. ζῶσι γὰρ ἀκολάστως πρὸς ἅπασαν ἀκολασίαν, καὶ τρυφερῶς. Nam cum totam civitatem lator legum vellet ad tolerandos & perferendos labores eſſe fortem ac robuſtam, in viris quidem perſpicue quod volebat aſſecutus eſt: in mulieribus vero negligentem ſe præbuit. Vivunt enim intemperanter & luxurioſe, ad omne ſcilicet intemperantiæ genus ſolutæ atque effuſæ (66).—For the lawgiver being willing the whole people ſhould be ſtrong, and enured to toil, gained his point with the men, but took no care of the women; for they live intemperately and luxuriouſly. The ſpirit of partiality does not appear in this work; ſo that, inſtead of ſaying, that the ſlanders of Poets made an impreſſion on this Philoſopher, we muſt on the contrary ſay, that his authority juſtifies their reproaches. For the reſt, it is not true, that Plutarch hath contradicted Ariſtotle in the matter in queſtion. It is plain, if we conſider it, that this Philoſopher ſpoke only of a cuſtom among the Lacedæmonian wives of governing their husbands. Lycurgus would reform this abuſe, and retrench their empire; but ſeeing no likelihood of ſucceſs, he deſiſted from his eterprize, but however made ſeveral regulations relating to the ſex, which qualified them for producing ſtrong children Τὰς δὲ γυναῖκας φασὶ μὲν ἄγειν ἐπιχειρῆσαι τὸν Λυκοῦργον ἐπὶ τοὺς νόμους· ὡς δ' ἀντέκρουον, ἀποστῆναι πάλιν. Fœminas autem ajunt Lycurgum ſub legum jugum adducere conatum, cum illæ reclamarent, & contra niterentur, ab incœpto deſtitiſſe (67). It is on account of theſe regulations, that Plutarch has contradicted Ariſtotle; but he is fallen into the fallacy, which they call ignoratio elenchi; he knew not the point in queſtion. 'Lycurgus, ſays he, (68), at firſt regulated all that related to marriage and births; for we muſt not believe, what Ariſtotle ſays, that having attempted to regulate and reform the women, he gave it over, not being able to put a ſtop to their unbridled licentiouſneſs, and the too great authority they had uſurped over their husbands.' It is plain, that Plutarch reaſons ill; a legiſlator, who gives over the attempt of bringing the wives into ſubjection to their husbands, does not thereby abandon all care relating to the education of maids, to their marriages, &c. and yet Plutarch here, to ſhew that Ariſtotle had no reaſon to ſay, that Lycurgus renounced the deſign of reſtraining the power of the women, alledges the regulations of Lycurgus, which tended only to the provoking of the men to marriage, and begetting luſty children. Thouſands of ſuch fallacies might be found in Plutarch, if we took the pains to trace them. He mentions, in the following page, an anſwer, which manifeſtly ſuppoſes the truth of this fact, that the Lacedemonian husbands were governed by their wives. A ſign that Lycurgus did not reform this abuſe: Note, that Ariſtotle acknowledges, in the ſame place, that Lycurgus made laws relating to the multiplying of children. Βουλόμενος γὰρ ὁ νομοθέτης ὡς πλείστους εἶναι τοὺς Σπαρτιάτας, προάγεται τοὺς πολίτας ὅτι πλείστους ποιεῖσθαι παῖδας. Nam cum vellet lator legis quamplurimos eſſe Spartiatas, invitavit atque allexit civeis ad quamplurimos liberos procreandos (69).— For the law-giver, willing to multiply the Spartans, invited, and inticed the citizens to get children.

My third remark concerns theſe words of Mr Guillet. 'I venture not, ſays he (70), to deſcribe the habits of the maids of ancient Lacedæmon. Sophocles will acquaint you with it, if you obſerve how he has deſcribed that of Hermione, in a fragment cited by Plutarch; it was ſo ſhort, that the Poet Ibycus, laughing at them, called them Phænomerides.' It is certain, I. That we do not find, in this fragment of Sophocles, the deſcription of an habit; for this Poet only ſays, that Hermione's petticoat was ſlit from her hips downwards, and ſhewed her thighs. II. Ibycus's calling the Lacedæmonian maids Phænomerides, was not from their wearing a very ſhort habit, but from their habits being ſlit on each ſide, and ſhewing their thighs. Plutarch moſt clearly gives us this reaſon of Ibycus's raillery (71). I wonder Cragius could commit the following fault. 'Eæ (mulieres) inſtituto veteri veſtes ſupra genua decurtatas deferebant. Unde φαινομερίδες dictæ ſunt ab Ibyco Poëta, ut teſtatur Plutarchus, tanquam quæ ſemora nuda oſtenderint (72).—Theſe women, following the old cuſtom, wore ſhort garments, that reached no lower than their knees. Whence they are called naked thighs by Ibycus the Poet, as Plutarch witneſſes.' Can a habit which reaches only to the knees, leave the thighs naked? Do not the breeches, which men have worn for ſo many ages, prove the contrary in all the variations the faſhion paſſes through? III. It is not true, generally ſpeaking, that the Lacedæmonian habit was ſhort. The authority of Clemens Alexandrinus is ill alledged. Cragius has not taken it by the right handle. Οὐδὲ γὰρ, ſays this Father (73) ὑπὲρ γόνυ καθάπερ τὰς Λακαίνας φασὶ παρθένους ἐστολίσθαι καλὸν· οὐδὲν γὰρ μέρος ὁτιοῦν ἀπογυμνοῦσθαι γυναικὸς εὐπρεπές. That is, It is not becoming to wear ſuch garments as reach only to the knees, as is ſaid of thoſe of the Lacedæmonian maids; for decency ſuffers not a woman to ſhew any part of her body naked. Firſt, we ſee, Clemens Alexandrinus does not pretend that the Lacedæmonian habit expoſed the thighs; he only blames them for ſhewing their feet and legs. Cragius ought to have ſtopped there. I add, that all the neceſſary truths may be preſerved to this paſſage, without ſuppoſing, that Clemens Alexandrinus pretended, that the Lacedæmonian maids went always thus habited; it ſuffices that they were in this dreſs, when they went a hunting, or to wreſtle, or performed any other exerciſe. Now this does not prove, that their habit was very ſhort, but only that they tucked it up above the knee, that they might not be incommoded by it. This muſt neceſſarily be ſuppoſed, unleſs we accuſe Virgil of groſs ignorance; for he has given the maids of Lacedæmon a long and flowing habit, but tied up above the knee, when they hunted:

> Cui mater media ſeſe tulit obvia ſilva
> Virginis os habitumque gerens, & virginis arma
> SPARTANÆ . . . . .

The deſcription, Pollux has left us of the habit of the Spartan maids, leaves no room to doubt, that it was long, long; for he ſays, that, when they unlaced themſelves to a certain point, they ſhewed from their feet upwards to their thighs. This is his way of expreſſing it. Ἐκαλεῖτο δὲ καὶ ὁ τῶν παρθένων οὕτω χιτωνίσκος, ὃ παραλύσαντες ἄχει τινὸς τὰς πτέρυγας, ἐκ τῆς κάτω πτέρνης παρέφαινον τοὺς μηροὺς μάλιστα αἱ Σπαρτιάτιδες, ἃς διὰ τοῦτο φαινομηρίδας ὠνόμαζον. Ita autem dicebatur etiam virginum tunicula; cujus poſtquam aliquo uſque pinnas ſolviſſent, à malleolo inferiore pedis femora oſtendebant, maxime Spartanæ, quas idcirco phænomeridas appellabant (75). We may take it for granted then, as to the fact, that Cragius, and thoſe who follow him, are miſtaken; but ſomething may be ſaid in their favour, as to their reaſoning, founded upon the fact. An habit might be ſo ſhort, as to leave the thighs naked. See theſe words of Martial:

Dimidiaſque nates Gallica palla tegit (76);

And half the buttock's by the garment hid.

And what Dubravius obſerves of the modes which a king of Bohemia (77) brought from France. 'He 'let his hair grow very long; he wore round-toed 'ſhoes; and dreſſed himſelf in a ſhort cloak, which 'reached only to his hips. Inerat ei perigrinus habitus 'in neutriendis comis, in calceandis pedibus roſtratis 'calceis, in veſtiendo corpore palliolis vix dimidias nates 'tegentibus (78).' But ſtill I maintain, the nakedneſs of the thighs, which the Lacedemonian women were reproached with, proceeded not from the ſhortneſs of their petticoats; for if they had reſembled our pages breeches, or the habits mentioned by Martial and Dubravius, it would not have been enough to have called them Phænomerides. There is no body but eaſily underſtands, that, if their petticoats, which were ſlit on both ſides, without being ſewed at the bottom, came but little lower than their breech, they had done much worſe than ſhew their thighs in walking; ſo that the Poets, who took a greater liberty than they do at preſent, and expreſſed themſelves more groſsly, would have given them a much ſtronger epithet than that of Phænomerides, or naked thighs. I need not explain this thought more at large.

For the reſt, the faſhion of ſhort habits was carried to a great exceſs in the court of France, if what we read in an Italian Author, who lived towards the end of the XVth century, be true. He ſuppoſes, that an Italian would not travel into France (§ α), as well becauſe the French were ignorant, as becauſe their very king wore a habit ſo ſhort, as not to cover the nameleſs parts. 'Cur obſecro trans Alpes non profectus? Quod 'ſcirem Gallos maximè ſtolidos eſſe, corpuſque curare 'magis quam animum colere: regemque eorum quam'vis ſpledidiſſimum tam brevi tamen veſtitu incedere, 'ut pudenda non velet, ac ſi Cynicorum ſectator ſit 'inſtitutorum (79).'

[§ (α) The faſhion of ſhort habits had reigned in France, at leaſt from the year 1346: [and Gaguin, on the time of the battle of Creſſy, book 8th of his Hiſtory, ſpeaks in this manner, both of this faſhion, and of the inconſtancy of the French nation in point of dreſs: 'Fuiſſe per id tempus per Franciam veſtimen'torum nimiam deformitatem, Scriptores tradunt: 'ita ut joculatoriam vitam agere Francos à veſtibus ju'dicares. Crediderim non defuiſſe illis & laſciviam atque 'ſuperbiam, quotidiana gentis mala. Itaque vel anguſtia, 'vel laxitate: item brevitate, ſeu longitudine veſtimento'rum, Galli ſemper peccant—Writers tell us, that dreſs 'was at that time too much deformed in France; inſomuch 'that you would judge the French lived a merry life from 'their garb. I ſuppoſe they were both wanton and proud, 'the daily evils of the nation. Therefore the French 'always dreſs in extremes: their cloaths being either 'too ſtrait or too looſe, too ſhort or too long.' Probably, as Gaguin inſinuates, they were ſoon tired of theſe ſhort habits; but, however it be, they appeared again, and more than ever 120 years after, ſince king Charles V was obliged to baniſh that faſhion, and others no leſs ridiculous, by edicts mentioned by Mezerai, in the year 1365: and yet, ſo true is Gaguin's remark, the ſame faſhion of ſhort cloaths was anew in France, and even in truth on the throne, towards the end of the XVth century; according to Jovian Pontanus, who was an eye-witneſs of it. LYCURGUS, an Athenian Orator, ſon of Lycophron, and grandſon to another Lycurgus, whom the thirty tyrants put to death, flouriſhed at the ſame time with Demoſthenes. He firſt ſtudied Philoſophy under Plato; but afterwards betook himſelf to Oratory under Iſocrates, and advanced himſelf to public employments (a). He was a ſevere judge, and fit to be compared with the Prætor Caſſius [A]. He is ſpoken of pretty fully in the Supplement to Moreri, but not without ſome miſtakes [B]. He is ſometimes

[A] He was a ſevere judge, and fit to be compared with the Prætor Caſſius.] This is evident from theſe words of Ammianus Marcellinus. 'Verum ille, he 'ſpeaks of the Emperor Julian, judicibus Caſſiis triſtior '& Lycurgis cauſarum momenta æquo jure perpen'dens, ſuum cuique tribuebat, nuſquam à vero ab'ductus, acrius in calumniatores exſurgens quos ode'rat, multorum hujuſmodi petulantem ſæpe demen'tiam aduſque diſcrimen expertus, dum eſſet adhuc 'humilis & privatus (1) —— But he, a more rigid 'judge than the Caſſii and Lycurgi, weighed cauſes equi'tably, and diſtributed juſtice to every one, never de'viating from the right; the ſcourge of calumniators, 'whom he hated, having had frequent experience of 'their malice, when in a private ſtation.' Plutarch obſerves, that it was ſaid of this Lycurgus, that he dipped his pen in death; a thought which well enough agrees with the reproach made to Draco, that he writ his laws, not with ink, but in blood (2). Ἔσχε δὲ καὶ τοῦ ἄστεος τὴν φυλακὴν, καὶ τῶν κακούργων τὴν σύλληψιν, οὓς ἐξήλασεν ἅπαντας, ὥς καὶ τῶν σοφιστῶν ἐνίους λέγειν, Λυκοῦργον οὐ μέλανι ἀλλὰ θανάτῳ χρίοντα τὸν κάλαμον κατὰ τῶν πονηρῶν, οὕτω συγγράφειν. Urbis etiam cuſtodia ei mandata fuit, & maleficorum comprehenſio. Quos quidem omnes expulit: adeò ut ſophiſtarum quidam dicerent, Lycurgum ita contra malos ſcribere, ut qui calamum non atramento ſed morte imbueret (3). Diodorus Siculus repreſents him as a violent accuſer (4). Add to this theſe words of Cicero. 'Noſmetipſi, qui Lycurgei à principio fuiſſe'mus, quotidie demitigamur (5).——We who at firſt, 'had the ſeverity of Lycurgus, grew milder every day.' See the following remark, at the place concerning Ibis.

[B] Not without ſome miſtakes.] I. He ſhould have ſaid in general, that he baniſhed all malefactors (6), and not ſimply all loiterers and vagabonds. II. I do not find he excelled in exerciſes, or was commonly victor in the public games. III. He ſhould not have ſaid, that, when he made himſelf be carried to the ſenate, there publickly to give an account of all his actions, they were applauded by all the people: he ſhould not have ſaid this, without obſerving, that an accuſer appeared againſt him, whoſe calumnies he confuted (7); nor ſhould he have paſſed over in ſilence, that he was ſeveral times accuſed (8). IV. The Athenians, if we may credit the ſupplement, regarding him as a perſon, who had ſomething divine in him, conſecrated, after his death, an Ibis to him (an Egyptian bird much like a ſtork), as the owl had been conſecrated to Xenophon. This is miſunderſtanding Plutarch's words. Amiot tranſlated them thus: Lycurgus was ſirnamed Ibis, which is a Black Stork, and it was commonly ſaid, to Lycurgus the Ibis, to Xenophon the Owl. This paſſage of Plutarch (9) is much corrupted; but it is eaſy to ſee, that it does not ſignify what is pretended in the Supplement. The learned Henry Valeſius will help us to underſtand it. 'Unde, (10) ſays he, etiam Ibis cogno'minatus eſſe videtur, quòd ſcilicet ut Ibis angues, ſic 'ipſe noxios cives & peregrinos expelleret. ‘ ſententiam confirmare videtur Plutarchus in Lycurgi Rhetoris vita: ubi & verſum illum Ariſtophanis adducit, ſed mendoſum (11). —— Whence he ſeems to have been ſirnamed Ibis, becauſe, as the Ibis deſtroys ſerpents, ſo he drove out miſchievous citizens, and foreigners. Ariſtophanes, in his birds, ſays ; To Lycurgus the Ibis, to Chærephon the owl : tho' I am aware, that his ſcholiaſt gives another reaſon of that ſirname, to wit, either becauſe Lycurgus was a native of Egypt, or becauſe he had long legs. But Plutarch ſeems to confirm my opinion, in his life of Lycurgus the Orator ; in which he alledges that verſe of Ariſtophanes, but incorrect.’ A ſmall doubt comes into my head. This Comedy of Ariſtophanes was acted in the ſecond year of the XCIſt Olympiad (12); and Lycurgus was not only alive, in the ſecond year of the CXIth Olympiad, but he was one of the famous Orators whom the Athenians refuſed to deliver up to Alexander (13). Of what an age then muſt he have been, when he died, if he be the ſame that Ariſtophanes ſpoke of in this Comedy ? Did this Poet mention perſons of obſcure condition ? V. When it is ſaid, that, upon Demoſthenes's teſtimony, Lycurgus's ſons were preſently ſet at liberty, it is plainly intimated, that Demoſthenes aſſerted their innocence ; but this is falſe. Demoſthenes was then in exile, and he wrote to the Athenians, that they were blamed for the treatment they gave Lycurgus's ſons (14). Hereupon they were releaſed. It was not becauſe, on the teſtimony of Demoſthenes, it was believed they had been unjuſtly accuſed. VI. He ought not to have cited Herodotus, who being dead, before Lycurgus was born, could ſay nothing of him. The citing Pauſanias is more pardonable, tho' he has ſaid (15) but a ſmall part of what is aſcribed to him ; but the not citing Plutarch, is an unpardonable omiſſion.

LYDIAT (Thomas) an Engliſhman, publiſhed ſome books in the beginning of the XVIIth century, in which he attacked the opinions of Scaliger, and thoſe of Ariſtotle, &c [A]. Scaliger was very angry with him, and confuted him with a deal of haughtineſs. See the Prolegomena to his Chronological Canons. He inſerted in it a Greek epigram (a), which is very injurious to Lydiat. The latter wrote a-freſh againſt Scaliger, and took in ſome other matters [B], and died the third of April, 1646, at ſeventy four years of age (b).

[A] He publiſhed ſome writings . . . . in which he attacked the opinions of Scaliger, and thoſe of Ariſtotle.] He publiſhed at London, in 1605, a treatiſe De variis annorum formis, in which he confutes Clavius, and the Mathematicians of the college of Rome, and Joſeph Scaliger. See here a paſſage of the Scaligerana, which charges him with not underſtanding what he cenſures in Clavius : ‘ Lydiat eſt melancholicus, Æquinoctium mirum ſtatuit 36 diebus poſt ſolitum, & dicit à veteribus ſic obſervatum. Reprehendit Clavium, & illum non capit (1). —— Lydiat has the ſpleen : he makes the æquinox 36 days later than uſual, and ſays the antients ſo obſerved it : he finds fault with Clavius, without underſtanding him.’ Mr Konig makes mention of this work of Lydiat, and of that De annis miniſterii Chriſti, printed in the year 1613 ; but he does not ſpeak of this other work of his ; ‘ Prælectio aſtronomica de natura cœli & conditionibus elementorum : tum autem de cauſis præcipuorum motuum cœli & ſtellarum. Item diſquiſitio phyſiologica de origine fontium perennium frigidorum & calidorum : eaque occaſione de ortu & cauſis plerorumque omnium ſubterraneorum, atque etiam æſtus & ſalſedinis maris, nec non diluvii univerſalis. Quibus duabus commentatiunculis adumbratur conſtitutio univerſi : ita ut receptæ à multis hodiè Philoſophorum Peripateticorum opiniones de quinta cœli eſſentiâ immutabili, & de elementorum proportionibus ſituque refutentur ; naturalis autem hiſtoria ſacrarum literarum de aquâ ſupercœleſti atque igne ſubteraneo juxta genuinam antiquitùs receptam earum ſententiam confirmetur. Auctore Thoma Lydiat.’ It was printed at London in 1605, in 8vo. The author, in his advertiſement to the reader, declares he could not bear, that people ſhould be deafened with Ariſtotle's authority, as to the pretended difference betwixt the celeſtial and elementary matter, or that this ſilly reaſon ſhould be alledged, that there are things true in Philoſophy, which are falſe in Divinity (2). He maintains that this is making Divinity the ſport of Atheiſts. ‘ Haudquaquam ratus oportere me contentum eſſe eo quod vulgo ſolitum eſſet reſponderi ad hujuſmodi dogmata Ariſtotelica ſententiæ ſacrorum bibliorum contraria, ſcilicet verum eſt Phyſicè non Theologicè, quandoquidem hoc videretur nihil aliud quam Theologiam exponere ludibrio hominum atheorum . . . . LYDIUS (Martin) miniſter of the Goſpel, having quitted the Palatinate on account of the perſecution, retired into the Low-Countries, in 1576, and was made profeſſor of Divinity at Franeker. He was a native of Lubec, and had been principal of the Collegium Sapientiæ, at Heidelberg, in conjunction with Zachary Urſin (a). He left two ſons, who were miniſters. Balthasar Lydius, the eldeſt, began the exerciſe of his miniſtry at Dort, about the year 1603, and died in 1629 (b). He compoſed ſome books [A], and had four ſons, who were all miniſters. The eldeſt was called Isaac,

[A] Balthaſar Lydius compoſed ſome books.] He publiſhed two volumes, in 8vo, intituled Waldenſia, id eſt, conſervatio veræ Eccleſiæ demonſtrata ex confeſſionibus Taboritarum & Bohemorum. The firſt tome

Isaac, and died miniſter at Dort, leaving a ſon named Matthew, who died a miniſter about the year 1685, and had a good library. James Lydius, Balthaſar's ſecond ſon, was miniſter of Dort, and wrote ſeveral books [B]. The other ſon of Martin Lydius was called John. He exerciſed his miniſtry at Oudewater in Holland, and publiſhed ſeveral books [C]. His two ſons were miniſters. No one family perhaps has furniſhed more miniſters than this.

was printed at Rotterdam, in 1616, and the other at Dort, the year following. This author's other works are, Facula accenſa hiſtoriæ Waldenſium. Novus orbis ſeu navigationes primæ in Americam (1).

[B] James Lydius wrote ſeveral books.] I do not mention ſeveral poems he publiſhed in Flanders, nor his Roomſchen Uylenſpiegel (2) printed at Dort, in 1671, in 8vo; but here are two or three books, which ſhew he was verſed in the Belles Lettres. I. Sermonum convivalium libri duo, quibus variarum gentium mores ac ritus in uxore expetenda, ſponſalibus contrahendis, nuptiiſque faciendis ac perficiendis enarrantur. They were printed at Dort in 1643, in 4to. They were printed afterwards in 12mo. II. Agoniſtica ſacra. III. Florum ſparſio ad hiſtoriam paſſionis Jeſu Chriſti. He wrote a book alſo intituled Belgium Glorioſum, and a dialogue De cœna Domini.

His heirs have ſome works of his in their hands, which he did not publiſh. Mr Van Til, miniſter and profeſſor at Dort, having ſeen the manuſcript of the Syntagma Sacrum de re militari, and that of the diſſertation De Juramento, judged them worthy to be publiſhed, and adviſed a Bookſeller to do it. This advice was followed, as appears by the volume printed at Dort, in 4to, 1698, and called, Jacobi Lydii Syntagma ſacrum de re militari: nec non de Jurejurando diſſertatio Philologica: Opus Poſthumum & multa eruditione commendatum, cum figuris æneis elegantiſſime inciſis, quod nunc primum ex tenebris eruit, notiſque illuſtravit Salomon Van Til Theologus Dordracenus. See the Journal of Utrecht (3), and that of Leipſic (4).

[C] JOHN LYDIUS publiſhed ſeveral books.] He printed at Leyden, in 1610, a book of Prateolus, intituled, Concilia Eccleſiæ Chriſtianæ, with his criticiſms on it. Five years after he put out the lives of the Popes, written by Robert Barnes and John Bale, and continued it to his own time. He was author of that continuation. He had given an edition of Nicolas de Clemangis, in 1613, with notes, and a gloſſary.

LYSERUS (Polycarp), a famous Divine of the Augſburg confeſſion, was born at Winenden, in the country of Wirtemberg, the eighteenth of March 1552. He was but two years old when his father (a) died; however his mother, marrying a ſecond huſband (b), gave him a father-in-law, who took great care of his education. The progreſs he made in his childhood recommended him as worthy to be educated in the college of Tubingen, at the charge of the prince of Wirtemberg. He employed his time ſo well, that he was ordained miniſter in 1573, and commenced doctor of Divinity in 1576. His reputation ſpread into all parts, ſo that Auguſtus, elector of Saxony, called him to be miniſter of the church of Wirtemberg in 1577. He had no ſooner diſcovered his great abilities in that church, but he was added to the number of Divinity Profeſſors. He was one of the principal directors for drawing up the book of Concord, and vigorouſly diſcharged the office of a miſſionary [A], in order to get it ſigned by by all who were in employments. He aſſiſted at all the aſſemblies, which were held about this book, or about the re-union of the Calviniſts and Lutherans, negotiated by the agents of the king of Navarre. Chriſtian, elector of Saxony, who ſucceeded (c) to the dignity of his father, but not to his rigid Lutheraniſm, was overjoyed at Lyſerus's communicating to him the advantageous conditions offered him at Brunſwic [B]. He diſmiſſed him with all his heart, but to the great regret of his ſubjects. Lyſerus was at firſt only coadjutor at Brunſwic, but became afterwards intendant. He was recalled to Wittemberg, after the death of Chriſtian; and was made miniſter of the court of Dreſden in 1594. He ſtayed there all the reſt of his life, and employed his time not only in the functions of the miniſtry, but alſo in the education of the young princes, and in writing books [C]. He died the twenty ſecond of February 1601, a father of thirteen children [D], and grand-father to three grandſons and one grand-daughter. His will was an evidence of his charity to the poor, and to neceſſitous ſtudents [E]. He had had a great many quarrels upon his hands (d) [F].

‘ expence of Augustus, elector of Saxony, and received the approbation of ſeveral churches. Polycarp contributed not the leaſt to the ſucceſs of this undertaking, whilſt, in obedience to the command and will of the elector, together with the reſt of the nobles and Divines deputed for this purpoſe, he was obliged to require ſubſcriptions, not only at Wittemberg, but at Torgau, Leipſic, Meiſſen, and in other places, of thoſe, who were public teachers in the churches or ſchools. Having performed this great and difficult task, &c.

[B] Chriſtian . . . . . was overjoyed at Lyſerus's communicating to him the advantageous conditions which were offered him at Brunſwic] The accepting them was the leaſt of his thoughts; but he believed that the propoſal might gain him the advantage of being retained, with uſeful teſtimonies of the high eſteem they had for him. How aſtoniſhed muſt Lyſerus be, when he heard the elector's anſwer; for there was no way left of handſomely refuſing the gentlemen of Brunſwic: he was under a neceſſity of accepting their offer. This was a thunder-ſtroke to the zealots; their reiterated remonſtrances to the court were all in vain. See here the words of Melchior Adam (2): ‘ Cum aliud agens Lyſerus, conditionis opimæ occaſionem apud Brunſuicenſes ſibi obtingere, datis ad aulam literis, oſtendiſſet: reſponſum plane ἀπροσδόκητον tulit: ut frueretur, quam ſibi oblatum putaret, felicitate: eccleſiæ Wittembergenſi de alio paſtore proſpectum iri. Hoc reſponſo ordines conſternati non literis modo, ſed & legatis ad aulam Electoralem miſſis, cauſas plane ſonticas, expoſuerunt, ob quas de retinendo Lyſero ſint ſolliciti: verum irrito plane conatu. —— Lyſerus having ſignified to the court by letter, that he had received advantageous offers from Brunſwic, was unexpectedly anſwered, that he might enjoy the happineſs, he thought was offered him, and that the church of Wittemberg, muſt ſeek another paſtor. This anſwer thunderſtruck the aſſemblies, who, not only by letter, but by their agents, repreſented to the electoral court the juſt reaſons they had to be ſollicitous to retain Lyſerus; but to no purpoſe.’

[C] He ſpent his time in writing books.] The chief of them are: Hiſtoria paſſionis Dominicæ ſecundum IV Evangelia, at Leipſic 1605, in 4to. Hiſtoria reſurrectionis & aſcenſionis Dominicæ, & miſſionis Spiritus ſancti homiliis aliquot explicata, Leipſic 1610, 4to. *Schola Babylonica ex cap. 1. But as to the diſpute between him and a Swiſs miniſter (5), who taught that God had elected all men to eternal life, it was much more obſtinate; for it laſted ſeventeen years. Cum iſto, inquam, totis annis ſeptendecim pugnavit (6). In the 542d, and 543d pages of the ſame Theatre, you will find the catalogue of his books. Note that his Syſtema Thetico-Exegeticum was not printed till 1699. In the Leipſic Journal of October, the ſame year, at the 473d, and 474th pages, you will find the names and qualities of ſome perſons of this family.

[E] His will is a proof of his charity to the poor, and to neceſſitous ſtudents.] Theſe are Melchior Adam's words. ‘ Teſtamento cavit, ut quotannis in die Polycarpi & Eliſabethæ, certa quædam pecuniæ ſumma impenderetur, in lautiorem victum eorum, qui communi menſa uterentur (8).’ This author tells us a thing here (9) which perhaps needs ſome reformation. The miniſters would be more reſpected in Germany than they are, if the ſtudents in Divinity were not often in ſuch a condition as he ſpeaks of.

[F] He had a great many quarrels upon his hands.] Refer hither what I have ſaid above (10), and add to it another thing not mentioned by Melchior Adam. There was a Poet called John Major, who wrote verſes againſt the methods uſed to procure ſubſcriptions to the Formulary, and which particularly abuſed the Divines of Wittemberg. Lyſerus took this John Major to task with ſo much vigour, that he never let him reſt till he got him expelled the univerſity. He made himſelf many enemies by this victory; and, in his turn, fell under their aſſaults, loſing all the preferments he had at Wittemberg. So true it is, that, on ſome occaſions, it is better to be contented with a moderate advantage over an adverſary, than drive things to extremities. But where are thoſe, who can moderate themſelves, when they have ſo proſperous a gale, and the governing faction permits them to revenge themſelves? ‘ Sub initium anni 86 ſupra ſeſquimilleſimum turbas Collegio Theologico Wittebergenſi dari cœpit Joannes Major Poeta, homo deſperatæ levitatis, qui editis in publicum carminibus, Religionis ſinceritatem, & bonorum Virorum Theologorum cum primis famam vellicare haud dubitaverat, cujus improbis conatibus, cum Polycarpus tum publicè tum privatim magno ſpiritu ſe oppoſuiſſet, tandemque effeciſſet, ut Poeta Wittebergenſi Academia, ſit proſcriptus; dici non poteſt quos quantoſque crabrones tunc excitaverit tam in Aula quam in Academia, quantamque invidiam ſibi apud multos attraxerit; quæ poſtea non ſine gravi Eccleſiæ ſcandalo in nervum ita erupit, ut Polycarpus tota Eccleſia, & Academia reclamante functione ſua exciderit (11).’ His retirement did not ſecure him from calumny (12). If we had a full account of this matter, we ſhould find, perhaps, that our Lyſerus was partly in the wrong.

LYSERUS (JOHN) author of ſeveral writings concerning Polygamy. See the news from the Republic of Letters (a), and add to it what follows. He had an elder brother, ſuperintendant of the church of Magdeburg. He was reduced to extream poverty at Amſterdam, when he printed his laſt book (b), for which the Bookſeller gave him but twenty ducatoons; and in his laſt ſickneſs was lodged in a garret juſt joining to the roof (c). This I have from one of his friends, who frequently viſited him.

I muſt not forget, that the book de Polygamia, which he publiſhed under the name of Theophilus Alethæus in 1676, in 8vo, was condemned by an arrèt of Chriſtian V, king of Denmark, and that the author was baniſhed from all the dominions of his Daniſh majeſty. He there ſerved in quality of miniſter to the army. A Daniſh Divine, named John Brunſman, refuted this book by another, which he intituled Monogamia victrix, and which was printed at Francfort in 1679, in 8vo. Lyſerus had publiſhed in high Dutch a Polygamic treatiſe intituled, das Konigliche Marc aller Lander (d).

LYSIMACHUS, tutor to Alexander. I ſhould have ſaid nothing of this perſon, if Amiot had faithfully tranſlated Plutarch's account of him [A].

[A] If Amiot had well tranſlated what Plutarch ſays of him.] Theſe are his words (1): 'Now there 'were about Alexander, as we may ſuppoſe, ſeveral 'perſons appointed to inſtruct and educate him, as 'governours, chamberlains, maſters, and tutors: but 'Leonidas was the perſon, who had the ſuperintendence of all the reſt; a man of an auſtere temper, 'and related to queen Olympias; but as for his part, 'he hated the name of maſter, or præceptor, altho' 'it be a fine and honourable employment; for which 'reaſon, ſome called him Alexander's governour and 'conductor, out of regard to the dignity of his 'perſon, and his relation to the prince: but he who 'had the place and title of maſter, was one Lyſimachus, a native of the country of Arcania (2), who 'had nothing good or genteel in him; yet, becauſe 'he was called Phœnix, and Alexander was called 'Achilles, and Philip was called Peleus, he held the 'ſecond place after the governour.' The fault of this verſion conſiſts in this: Amiot ſays, that Lyſimachus held the ſecond place, becauſe he was called Phœnix, and Alexander was called Achilles, and Philip was called Peleus. This is abſurd; Plutarch had too much ſenſe to aſſign ſuch reaſons. But his meaning is this; he ſays, that Lyſimachus, a man otherwiſe void of politeneſs, made himſelf agreeable by the new names, with which he adorned his employment, and which he borrowed from Homer. The king, ſaid he, is Peleus, the prince his ſon is Achilles, and I am Phœnix. This was likely enough to tickle Alexander, and pleaſe king Philip: This was awakening in him great and ſublime ideas. This invention made him be loved, and gave him the firſt place after Leonidas in the young prince's family. I have in another place (3) touched upon the diſtinction of a governour and a tutor; you will find it plainly enough in Plutarch's words, which I muſt copy, that my readers may perceive Amiot's error. Λεωνίδας . . . μὲν οὖν φεύγων τὸ τῆς παιδαγωγίας ὄνομα, καλὸν ἔργον ἐχούσης καὶ λαμπρὸν, ὑπὸ δὲ τῶν ἄλλων, διὰ τὸ ἀξίωμα καὶ τὴν οἰκειότητα, τροφεὺς Ἀλεξάνδρου καὶ καθηγητὴς καλούμενος, ὁ δὲ τὸ σχῆμα τοῦ παιδαγωγοῦ καὶ τὴν προσηγορίαν ὑποποιούμενος ἦν Λυσίμαχος, τῷ γένει Ἀκαρνάν. ἄλλο μὲν οὐδὲν ἦχων ἀστεῖον, ὅτι δ' ἑαυτὸν μὲν ὠνόμαζεν φοίνικα, τὸν δὲ Ἀλέξανδρον, Ἀχιλλέα, Πηλέα δὲ, τὸν Φίλιππον, ἠγαπᾶτο, καὶ δευτέραν εἶχε χώραν. Leonidas . . . . pædagogi nomen cum honeſto & ſpecioſo conjunctum officio repudiabat, atque ab aliis dignitatis & neceſſitudinis cauſa nutritius Alexandri & rector vocabatur: ille qui ſpeciem pædagogi & vocabulum ſumebat Lyſimachus, natione Acarnan, urbanitate nulla præditus erat alia, ſed, quod Phœniceen nominaret ſe, Alexandrum Achillem, & Philippum Pelea, ideo gratus erat, & ſecundum locum tenebat (4).

(2) It is ſo in my edition; but without doubt Amiot wrote Acarnania.
